CLEMENT, klem'ent (Κλήμης, Klēmēs, "mild"): A fellow-worker with Paul at Philippi, mentioned with especial commendation in Phil 4 3. The name being common, no inference can be drawn from this statement as to any identity with the author of the Epistle to the Corinthians published under this name, who was also the third bishop of Rome. The truth of this supposition ("it cannot be called a tradition," Donaldson, The Apostolical Fathers, 120), although found in Origen, Eusebius, Epiphanius and Jerome, can neither be proved nor disproved. Even Roman Catholic authorities dispute it (art. "Clement," Cath. Cyclopaedia, IV, 13). The remoteness between the two in time and place is against it; "a wholly uncritical view" (Cruttwell, Literary History of Early Christianity, 31). H. E. JACOBS

CLEOPAS, klē'ō-pas (Κλεόπας, Kleōpas, "renowned father"): One of the two disciples whom Jesus met on the way to Emmaus (Lk 24 18). The name is a contraction of Cleopatros, not identical with Clopas of Jn 19 25. See also ALPHAEUS; CLOPAS.

CLEOPATRA, klē-ō-pā'tra (Κλεοπάτρα, Kleo-pātra, "from a famous father"): A daughter of Ptolemy VI (Philometor) and of Queen Cleopatra, who was married first to Alexander Balas 150 BC (1 Macc 10 58; Jos, Ant., XIII, iv, 1) and was afterward taken from him by her father and given to Demetrius Nicator on the invasion of Syria by the latter (1 Macc 11 12; Jos, Ant., XIII, iv, 7). Alexander was killed in battle against the joint forces of Ptolemy and Demetrius while Demetrius was in captivity in Parthia. Cleopatra married his brother Antiochus VII (Sidetes), who in the absence of Demetrius had gained possession of the Syrian throne (137 BC). She was probably privy (Appian, Syr., 68) to the murder of Demetrius on his return to Syria 125 BC, but Josephus (Ant., XIII, ix, 3) gives a different account of his death. She afterward murdered Seleucus, her eldest son by Nicator, who on his father's death had taken possession of the government without her consent. She attempted unsuccessfully to poison her second son by Nicator, Antiochus VIII (Grypus), for whom she had secured the succession, because he was unwilling to concede to her what she considered her due share of power. She was herself poisoned (120 BC) by the draught which she had prepared for their son (Justin 39). She had also a son by Antiochus VII (Sidetes Antiochus Cyzicenus), who took his name from the place in which he was educated. He was killed in battle 95 BC. The name Cleopatra was borne by many Egypt princesses, the first of whom was daughter of Antiochus III and was married to Ptolemy V (Epiphanes) 193 BC. J. HUTCHISON

CLEOPHAS, klē'ō-fas. See CLOPAS.

CLERK. See TOWN CLERK.

CLIFF, CLIFT. See CLEFT.

CLOAK, klōk, CLOKE (מִעֵיל, mē'īl, שִׁמְלָה, simlāh, etc; ἱμάτιον, himátion, στολή, stolē, etc): "Cloke" is retained in ERV, as in AV, instead of mod. "cloak" (ARV). In the OT, mē'īl (cf NT himation) uniformly stands for the ordinary upper garment worn over the coat (k'thōnelh). In Mt 6 40 both "cloak" and "coat" are mentioned together; cf Lk 6 29. In size and material the "cloak" differed according to age and sex, class and occupation, but in shape it was like our mantle or shawl. It might be sewed up to have the surplice form of the robe of the Ephod (Ex 39 23), or be worn loose and open like a Rom toga, the Arab. Abaa, or the Geneva gown. This is the "garment" referred to in Gen 39 12; Ex 22 26; Dt 24 13; "the robe" that Jonathan "stripped himself of" and gave to David (1 S 18 4); "the robe" of Saul, "the robe" in which it is said the "old man" (Samuel) was "covered" (1 S 28 14); and in the NT "the best robe" put on the returning prodigal (Lk 15 22). Paul's "cloak" that he left at Troas (2 Tim 4 13; phainōlēs, Lat paenula, WH phelonēs), it has been suggested, "may have been a light mantle like a cashmere dust-cloak, in which the books and parchment were wrapped" (HDB, s.v.).

Figuratively: The word lent itself easily and naturally to fig. uses. We find Paul (1 Thess 2 5) disclaiming using "a cloak of covetousness" (cf 1 Pet 2 16) and Jesus (Jn 15 22) saying, "Now they have no excuse ["cloak"] for their sin." Some such usage seems common to all languages; cf Eng. "pal-liate." See DRESS. GEO. B. EAGER

CLOD: In Job 7 5 (גִּישׁ, gīsh, גִּישׁ, gūsh, "a mass of earth"), "clods of dust," the crust of his sores, formed by the dry, swollen skin—a symptom of leprosy, though not peculiar to it. In Job 21 33; 38 38 (בִּלְבָּ, reghebbh, "a soft clod," "lump of clay"), "The clods of the valley shall be sweet unto him," "The clods cleave fast together." In Joel 1 17 (מִגִּרְפָּה, meghrāphāh, "a furrow," "some-thing thrown off" [by the spade]), "The seeds rot [m "shrivel"] under their clods."

Figurative: "Jacob shall break his clods" (Hos 10 11), i.e. "must harrow for himself," used fig. of spiritual discipline (cf Isa 28 24 AV).

M. O. EVANS
CLOPAS, klō'pas (Κλωπᾱς, Klōpās), CLEO-PHAS: The former in RV, the latter in AV, of Jn 19 25, for the name of the husband of one of the women who stood by the cross of Christ. Upon the philological ground of a variety in pronunciation of the Heb root, sometimes identified with Alphaeus, the father of James the Less. Said by tradition to have been the brother of Joseph, the husband of Mary; see BRETHREN OF THE LORD. Distinguished from Cleopas, a Gr word, while Clopas is Aram.

CLOSE, vb. klōz; adj. and advb., klōs (סָגַר, kāsāh, סָגַר, sāghar; καμύω, kammūtō): Other words are hārāh, "to burn"; "Shalt thou reign, because thou closest thyself in cedar?" (Jer 22 15 AV), RV "strivest to excel in cedar," m "viest with the cedar"; ācam, "to harden"; "Jeh hath closed your eyes" (Isa 29 10); gādhār, "to hedge" or "wall up" (Am 9 11); ācar, "to restrain" (Gen 20 18). In Lk 4 20, ptūssō, "to fold up." RV has "was closed," m "is opened," for "are open" (Nu 24 3.15), "closed" for "narrow" or "covered" (Ezk 40 16; 41 16.26). To "keep close," sigāō (Lk 9 36), RV "held their peace." We have also "kept close" (RV Nu 5 13; Heb sāthār, "to hide"); also Job 23 21; "kept himself close," RVm "shut up" (1 Ch 12 1); "close places," misgereth (2 S 22 46; Ps 18 45="castles or holds shut in with high walls"). W. L. WALKER

CLOSET, kloz'et: Is the rendering in AV of (1) חֲפָה, huppāh, and (2) ταμείον, tameion, also tameion. Huppāh, derived from hāphāh, "to cover," was probably originally the name of the tent specially set apart for the bride, and later (Joel 2 16) used for the bride's chamber. The word tameion, originally storeroom (cf Lk 12 24, AV "storehouse"; RV "storechamber"), but since for safety it was the inner rooms of the Heb house which were used for storage purposes, the word came to mean inner room, as in Mt 6 6; Lk 12 3, in both AV "closet" (cf Mt 24 26, AV "secret chamber"). In all cases RV uses "inner chamber." See also HOUSE.

DAVID FOSTER ESTES

CLOTH, kloth, CLOTHING, klōth'ing. See DRESS.

CLOTHED, klōthd, UPON (ἐνεδύω, ependūō, "to put on over" another garment): Used only in 2 Cor 5 2,4. In ver 4 in contrast with unclothed, cf 1 Cor 15 53 f, in which the idea of putting on, as a garment, is expressed of incorruption and immortality. The meaning here is very subtle and difficult of interpretation. In all probability Paul thinks of a certain enswathement of his physical mortal body even in this life ("in this we groan," i.e. in this present body), hence the force of the prefixed preposition. The body itself was regarded by the philosophers of his day as a covering of the soul, and hence it was to be clothed upon and at the same time transformed by the superimposed heavenly body. Ependūtēs, an outer garment, is used several times in LXX for mēl, an upper garment or robe (cf Jn 21 7).

WALTER G. CLIPFINGER

CLOTHES, klōthz, RENDING OF (קִרְיָת, krī'ath bēghādhim): This term is used to describe an ordinary tear made in a garment. Samuel's skirt was rent when Saul laid hold upon it (1 S 15 27). Jesus spoke about a rent being made in a garment (Mt 9 16). The term is also used to describe a Heb custom which indicated deep sorrow. Upon the death of a relative or important personage, or when there was a great calamity, it was customary for the Hebrews to tear their garments. Reuben rent his clothes when he found that Joseph had been taken from the pit (Gen 37 29). The sons of Jacob rent their clothes when the cup was found in Benjamin's sack (Gen 44 13). A messenger came to Eli with his clothes rent to tell of the taking of the ark of God and of the death of his two sons (1 S 4 12). David rent his garments when he heard that Absalom had slain his brothers (2 S 13 31). See also 2 S 15 32; 2 K 18 37; Isa 36 22; Jer 41 5. Rending of clothes was also an expression of indignation. The high priest rent his garment when Jesus spoke what he thought was blasphemy (Mt 26 65). See also MOURNING.

CLOUD, kloud (נֶפֶשׁ, 'ānān, אָבֶה, 'ābh; νεφέλη, nephēlē, νέφος, nēphos):

I. Clouds in Palestine.—In the Bible few references are found of particular clouds or of clouds in connection with the phenomena of the weather conditions. The weather in Pal is more even and has less variety than that in other lands. It is a long, narrow country with sea on the W. and desert on the E. The wind coming from the W. is always moist and brings clouds with it. If the temperature over the land is low enough the clouds will be condensed and rain will fall, but if the temperature is high, as in the five months of summer, there can be no rain even though clouds are seen. As a whole the winter is cloudy and the summer clear.

In the autumn rain storms often arise suddenly from the sea, and what seems to be a mere haze, "as small as a man's hand," such as

1. Rain Clouds Gehazi saw (1 K 18 44) over the sea, within a few hours becomes the black storm cloud pouring down torrents of rain (1 K 18 45). Fog is almost unknown and there is very seldom an overcast, gloomy day. The west and southwest winds bring rain (Lk 12 54).

In the months of April, May and September a hot east wind sometimes rises from the desert and brings with it a cloud of dust which fills the air and penetrates everything. In the summer afternoons, esp. in the month of August, on the seacoast there is apt to blow up from the S. a considerable number of low cirro-stratus clouds which seem to fill the air with dampness, making more oppressive the dead heat of summer. These are doubtless the detested "clouds without water" mentioned in Jude ver 12, and "heat by the shade of a cloud" (Isa 25 5).

II. Figurative Uses.—The metaphoric and symbolic uses of clouds are many, and furnish some of the most powerful figures of Scripture.

1. Jehovah's Presence and Glory In the OT, Jeh's presence is made manifest and His glory shown forth in a cloud. The cloud is usually spoken of as bright and shining, and it could not be fathomed by man: "Thou hast covered thyself with a cloud, so that no prayer can pass through" (Lam 3 44). Jeh Himself was present in the cloud (Ex 19 9; 24 16; 34 5) and His glory filled the places where the cloud was (Ex 16 10; 40 38; Nu 10 34); "The cloud filled the house of Jeh" (1 K 8 10). In the NT we often have "the Son of man coming on" or "with clouds" (Mt 24 30; 26 64; Mk 13 26; 14 62; Lk 21 27) and received up by clouds (Acts 1 9). The glory of the second coming is indicated in Rev 1 7 for "he cometh with the clouds" and "we that are alive . . . shall together with them be caught up in the clouds, to meet the Lord" and dwell with Him (1 Thess 4 17).

The pillar of cloud was a symbol of God's guidance and presence to the children of Israel in their journeys to the promised land. The Lord appeared in a pillar of cloud and of Cloud forsook them not (Neh 9 19). They followed the guidance of this cloud (Ex 40 36; Ps 78 14).

The clouds are spoken of in the OT as the symbol of God's presence and care over His people; and so the "bow in the cloud" (Gen 9 13) is a sign of God's protection.

As the black cloud covers the sky and blots out the sun from sight, so Jeh promises "to blot out the sins" of Israel (Isa 44 22); Egypt also shall be conquered, "As for her, a cloud shall cover her" (Ezk 30 18; cf Lam 2 1).

There is usually a wide difference in temperature between day and night in Pal. The days are warm and clouds coming from the sea are often completely dissolved in the warm atmosphere over the land. As the temperature falls, the moisture again condenses into dew and mist over the hills and valleys. As the sun rises the "morning cloud" (Hos 6 4) is quickly dispelled and disappears entirely. Job compares the passing of his prosperity to the passing clouds (Job 30 15).

God "bindeth up the waters in his thick clouds" (Job 26 8) and the "clouds are the dust of his feet" (Nah 1 3). Jeh "commands the clouds that they rain no rain" (Isa 5 6), but as for man, "who can number the clouds?" (Job 38 37); "Can any understand the spreadings of the clouds?" (Job 36 29); "Dost thou know the balancings of the clouds, the wondrous works of him who is perfect in knowledge?" (Job 37 16). See BALANCING. "He that regardeth the clouds shall not reap" (Eccl 11 4), for it is God who controls the clouds and man cannot fathom His wisdom. "Thick clouds are a covering to him" (Job 22 14).

Clouds are the central figure in many visions. Ezekiel beheld "a stormy wind . . . out of the north, a great cloud" (Ezk 1 4), and 7. Visions John saw "a white cloud; and on the cloud one sitting" (Rev 14 14). See also Dnl 7 13; Rev 10 1; 11 12.

The cloud is also the symbol of the terrible and of destruction. The day of Jeh's reckoning is called the "day of clouds" (Ezk 30 3) and a day of "clouds and thick darkness" (Zeph 1 15). The invader is expected to "come up as clouds" (Jer 4 13). Joel (2 2) foretells the coming of locusts as "a day of clouds and thick darkness" which is both literal and figurative. Misfortune and old age are compared to "the cloudy and dark day" (Ezk 34 12) and "the clouds returning after rain" (Eccl 12 2).

Clouds are used in connection with various other figures. Rapidity of motion, "these that fly as a cloud" (Isa 60 8). As swaddling clothes of the newborn earth (Job 38 9); indicating great height (Job 20 6) and fig. in Isa 14 14, "I will ascend above the heights of the clouds," portraying the self-esteem of Babylon. "A morning without clouds" is the symbol of righteousness and justice (2 S 23 4); partial knowledge and hidden glory (Lev 16 2; Acts 1 9; Rev 1 7).

ALFRED H. JOY

CLOUD, PILLAR OF. See CLOUD, II, 2; PILLAR OF CLOUD.

CLOUT, klout: As subst. (הַסָּהָבוֹת, ha-s'hābhōth) a patch or piece of cloth, leather, or the like, a rag, a shred, or fragment. Old "cast clouts and old rotten rags" (Jer 38 11.12 AV). As vb. (צָלַה, ṣālā) "to bandage," "patch," or mend with a clout. "Old shoes and clouted [ARV "patched"] upon their feet" (Josh 9 5; cf Shakespeare, Cym., IV, 2: "I thought he slept, And put my clouted brogues from off my feet"; Milton, Comus: "And the dull swain treads on it daily with his clouted shoon."

CLOVEN, klōv'n: In the OT, represented by a participle from צָסַע, shāsa', "to split," and applied to beasts that divide the hoof (Lev 11 3; Dt 14 7). Beasts with hoofs completely divided into two parts, that were also ruminant, were allowed the Israelites as food; see CUD; HOOF. In the NT, for διαμερίζουσαι, diamerizomenai, in Acts 2 3 AV, RV "tongues parting asunder," i.e. "bifurcated flames." Another explanation found in RVm applies the word, not to tongues, but to the multitude, "parting among them," or "distributing themselves among them," settling upon the head of each disciple.

H. E. JACOBS

CLUB, klub. See ARMOR, III, 1; SHEPHERD; STAFF.

CLUSTER, klus'tér:

(1) אֶשְׁכּוֹל, 'eshkōl; cf proper name VALE OF ESHCOL (q.v.), from root meaning "to bind together." A cluster or bunch of grapes (Gen 40 10; Nu 13 23; Isa 65 8; Cant 7 8; Mic 7 1, etc); a cluster of henna flowers (Cant 1 14); a cluster of dates (Cant 7 7). "Their grapes are grapes of gall, their clusters are bitter" (Dt 32 32). (2) βότρυς, bōtrus, "gather the clusters of the vine of the earth" (Rev 14 18).

The "cluster of raisins" (ḥimmūḳīm) of 1 S 25 18; 30 12, should rather be "raisin cakes" or "dried raisins."

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

CNIDUS, nī'dus, knī'dus (Κνίδος, Knidos, "age"): A city of Caria in the Rom province of Asia, past which, according to Acts 27 7, Paul sailed. At the S.W. corner of Asia Minor there projects for 90 miles into the sea a long, narrow peninsula, practically dividing the Aegean from the Mediterranean. It now bears the name of Cape Crio. Ships sailing along the southern coast of Asia Minor here turn northward as they round the point. Upon the very end of the peninsula, and also upon a small island off its point was the city of Cnidus. The island which in ancient times was connected with the mainland by a causeway is now joined to it by a sandy bar. Thus were formed two harbors, one of which could be closed by a chain. Though Cnidus was in Caria, it held the rank of a free city. There were Jews here as early as the 2d cent. BC.

The ruins of Cnidus are the only objects of interest on the long peninsula, and as they may be reached by land only with great difficulty, few travelers have visited them; they may, however, be reached more easily by boat. The nearest modern village is Yazı Keui, 6 miles away. The ruins of Cnidus are unusually interesting, for the entire plan of the city may easily be traced. The sea-walls and piers remain. The acropolis was upon the hill in the western portion of the town; upon the terraces below stood the public buildings, among which were two theaters and the odeum still well preserved. The city was esp. noted for its shrine of Venus and for the statue of that goddess by Praxiteles. Here in 1875-78 Sir C. Newton discovered the statue of Demeter, now in the British Museum. See also the Aphrodite of Cnidus in the South Kensington Museum, one of the loveliest statues in the world. From here also came the huge Cnidian lion. The vast necropolis W. of the ruins contains tombs of every size and shape, and from various ages.

E. J. BANKS

COAL, kōl (פֶּחֶם, peham, "charcoal"; cf Arab. fahm, "charcoal"; גַּהֲלֵת, gaheleth, "burning coal" or "hot ember"; cf Arab. jaḥam, "to kindle"; שֶׁחֹר, shēhōr, "a black coal" [Lam 4 8]; cf Arab. shahhār, "soot" or "dark-colored sandstone"; רִצְפָּה, riṣpāh [1 K 19 6], רִצְפָּה, riṣpāh [= Rīz-pah] [Isa 6 6], מ "a hot stone"; cf רֶשֶׁפֶת, resheph, "a flame" [Cant 8 6; Hab 3 5]; ἀνθράξ, anthrax, "a live coal" [Rom 12 20] [= gaheleth in Prov 25 22]; ἀνθρακία, anthrakia, "a live coal" [Jn 18 18; 21 9]): There is no reference to mineral coal in the Bible. Coal, or more properly lignite, of inferior quality, is found in thin beds (not exceeding 3 ft.) in the sandstone formation (see GEOLOGY, Nubian Sandstone), but there is no evidence of its use in ancient times. Charcoal is manufactured in a primitive fashion which does not permit the conservation of any by-products. A flat, circular place (Arab. beidar, same name as for a threshing-floor) 10 or 15 ft. in diameter is prepared in or conveniently near to the forest. On this the wood, to be converted into charcoal, is carefully stacked in a dome-shaped structure, leaving an open space in the middle for fine kindlings. All except the center is first covered with leaves, and then with earth. The kindlings in the center are then fired and afterward covered in the same manner as the rest. While it is burning or smoldering it is carefully watched, and earth is immediately placed upon any holes that may be formed in the covering by the burning of the wood below. In several days, more or less, according to the size of the pile, the wood is converted into charcoal and the heap is opened. The charcoal floor is also called in Arab. mashharah, from shahhār, "soot"; cf Heb shēhōr. The characteristic odor of the mashharah clings for months to the spot.

In Ps 120 4, there is mention of "coals of juniper," RVm "broom," rōthem. This is doubtless the Arab. retem, Retama roetam, Forsk., a kind of broom which is abundant in Judaea and Moab. Charcoal from oak wood, especially Quercus coccifera, L., Arab. sindyān, is much preferred to other kinds, and fetches a higher price.

In most of the passages where Eng. VSS have "coal," the reference is not necessarily to charcoal, but may be to coals of burning wood. Peḥam in Prov 26 21, however, seems to stand for charcoal:

"As coals are to hot embers, and wood to fire,
So is a contentious man to inflame strife."

The same may be true of peḥam in Isa 44 12 and 54 16; also of sh'hōr in Lam 4 8.

ALFRED ELY DAY

COAST, kōst (גִּבְרִיל, g'bhūl, etc, "boundary"; cf גִּבְרִיל, g'bhāl, "mountain," and Arab. jebel, "mountain"; חֶבְלִי, hebbel, lit. "a rope"; cf Arab. ḥabl [Josh 19 29 AV; Zeph 2 5.6.7]; חֹפֶה, hōph, lit. "that which is washed"; cf Arab. ḥaffet [Josh 9 1 AV; Ezk 25 16]; Παράλιος, parālios, lit. "by the sea" [Lk 6 17]: "Coast" (fr Lat costa, "rib" or "side") in the sense of "seacoast," occurs but a few times in the Bible. In nearly all the many passages where AV has "coast," RV correctly has "border," i.e. "boundary," translating g'bhūl, etc; in Acts 27 2 ARV, "coast" is the tr of τόπος, tōpos, lit. "place." That the seacoast is but seldom mentioned arises naturally from the fact that, while the promised land extended to the sea, the coast was never effectively occupied by the Israelites.

RVm in a number of places renders יִי, EV "isle" or "island" (q.v.), by "coastland," e.g. Isa 11 11; 23 6; 24 15; 59 18; Jer 25 22; Ezk 39 6; Dnl 11 18; Zeph 2 11. In Isa 20 6, AV has "isle," AVm "country," and RV "coast-land." In Jer 47 4, AV has "country," AVm and RV "isle," and RVm "sea-coast." See ISLE.

ALFRED ELY DAY

COAT, kōt. See CLOAK; DRESS, etc.

COAT OF MAIL, māl. See ARMOR, ARMS; BRIGANDINE.

COCK, kok (ἀλέκτωρ, alēktōr; Lat gallus): There is no reference in the OT to domesticated poultry, which was probably first introduced into Judaea after the Rom conquest. See CHICKEN. The cock is several times mentioned in the NT and always with reference to its habit of crowing in eastern countries with such regularity as to be almost clocklike. The first full salute comes almost to the minute at half-past eleven, the second at half-past one, and the third at dawn. So uniformly do the cocks keep time and proclaim these three periods of night that we find cock-crowing mentioned as a regular division of time: "Watch therefore: for ye know not when the lord of the house cometh, whether at even, or at midnight, or at cock-crowing, or in the morning" (Mk 13 35). Jesus had these same periods of night in mind when he warned Peter that he would betray Him. Mt 26 34; Lk 22 34; Jn 13 38, give almost identical wording of the warning. But in all his writing Mark was more explicit, more given to exact detail. Remembering the divisions of night as the cocks kept them, his record reads: "And Jesus saith unto him, Verily I say into thee, that thou today, even this night, before the cock crow twice, shalt deny me thrice" (Mk 14 30). See CHICKEN. It is hardly necessary to add that the cocks crow at irregular intervals as well as at the times indicated, according to the time of the year and the phase of the moon (being more liable to crow during the night if the moon is at the full), or if a storm threatens, or there is any disturbance in their neighborhood.

GENE STRATTON-PORTER

COCKATRICE, kok'a-tris, kok'a-trīs (כִּנְזִי, cephā; כִּנְזִי, giph'ōnī; LXX, βασιλίσκος, basiliskos, "basilisk" [q.v.], and ἀσπίς, aspis, "asp" [see ADDER; ASP; SERPENT]): A fabulous, deadly, monster. The name "cockatrice" appears to be a corruption of Lat calcatrrix, from calcare, "to tread," calcatrrix being in turn a tr of the Gr ἰχνεύμων, ichneumōn, from ἵχνος, ichnos, "track" or "footstep." Herpestes ichneumon, the ichneumon, Pharaoh's rat, or mongoose, a weasel-like animal, is a native of northern Africa and southern Spain. There are also other species, including the Indian mongoose. It preys on rats and snakes, and does not despise poultry and eggs.

Pliny (see Oxford Dictionary, s.v. "Cockatrice") relates that the ichneumon darts down the open mouth of the crocodile, and destroys it by gnawing through its belly. In the course of time, as the story underwent changes, the animal was metamorphosed into a water snake, and was confused with the crocodile itself, and also with the basilisk. According to the Encyclopaedia Britannica, 11th ed, the cockatrice was believed as late as the 17th cent. to be produced from a cock's egg and hatched by a serpent, and "to possess the most deadly powers, plants withering at its touch, and men and animals being poisoned by its look. It stood in awe however of the cock, the sound of whose crowing killed it. . . . The weasel alone among animals was unaffected by the glance of its evil eye, and attacked it at all times successfully; for when wounded by the monster's teeth it found a ready remedy in rue, the only plant which the cockatrice could not wither." The real ichneumon does kill the most deadly snakes, and has been supposed to resort to a vegetable antidote when bitten. It actually dies however when bitten by a deadly snake, and does not possess a knowledge of herbs, but its extraordinary agility enables it ordinarily to escape injury. It is interesting to see how the changing tale of this creature with its marvelous powers has made a hodge-podge of ichneumon, weasel, crocodile, and serpent.

The Bib. references (AV Isa 11 8; 59 5; Jer 8 17) are doubtless to a serpent, the word "cockatrice," with its mediaeval implications, having been introduced by the translators of AV. See SERPENT.

COCK-CROWING, kok'krō-ing (ἀλεκτοροφωνία, alektorophōnía): An indefinite hour of the night between midnight and morning (Mk 13 35), referred to by all the evangelists in their account of Peter's denial (Mt 26 34.74; Mk 14 30; Lk 22 34; Jn 13 38). It is derived from the habit of the cock to crow esp. toward morning. See COCK.

COCKER, kok'ēr (τιθηνέω, tithēnēō, "to nurse," "coddle," "pamper"): Occurs only in Eccles 30 9 with the meaning "to pamper": "Cocker thy child, and he shall make thee afraid"; so Shakespeare, "a cockered silken wanton"; now seldom used; Jean Ingelow, "Poor folks cannot afford to cocker themselves."

COCKLE, kok'l (AVm "stinking weeds," RVm "noisome weeds"; כֹּשֶׁשׁ, bo'shāh, from Heb root כָּשַׁ, bā'ash, "to stink"; βᾶτος, bátos): "Let thistles grow instead of wheat, and cockle instead of barley" (Job 31 40). On account of the meaning of the Heb root we should expect that the reference was rather to repulsive, offensive weeds than to the pretty corn cockle. It is very possible that no particular plant is here intended, though the common Palestinian "stinking" arums have been suggested by Hooker.

CODE OF HAMMURABI. See HAMMURABI, CODE OF.

COELE-SYRIA, sē-lē-sir'i-a (AV Celosyria; Κοίλη Συρία, Koīlē Suriā, "hollow Syria"): So the Greeks after the time of Alexander the Great named the valley lying between the two mountain ranges, Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon. It is referred to in the OT as Bik'ath ha-L'bhānōn, "the valley of Lebanon" (Josh 11 17), a name the echo of which is still heard in el-Bukā, the designation applied today to the southern part of the valley. This hollow, which extends about 100 miles in length, is the continuation northward of the Jordan valley. The main physical features are described under LEBANON (q.v.). The name, however, did not always indicate the same tract of territory. In Strabo (xvi.2) and Ptolemy (v.15), it covers the fertile land between Jebel esh-Sharkey and the desert presided over by Damascus. In 1 Esd 2 17; 2 Macc 3 8, etc, it indicates the country S. and E. of Mt. Lebanon, and along with Phoenicia it contributed the whole of the Seleucid dominions which lay S. of the river Eleutherus. Jos includes in Coele-Syria the country E. of the Jordan, along with Scythopolis (Beisan) which lay on the W., separated by the river from the other members of the Decapolis (Ant, XIII, xiii, 2, etc). In XIV, iv, 5, he says that "Pompey committed Coele-Syria as far as the river Euphrates and Egypt to Scaurus." The term is therefore one of some elasticity.

COFFER, kof'ēr (כֹּפֶר, 'argāz): A small box such as that in which the Philis placed their golden mice and other offerings in returning the Ark (1 S 6 8.11.15).

COFFIN, kof'in. See CHEST; BURIAL.

COGITATION, koj-i-tā'shun, רַעְיוֹן, ra'yōn, "the act of thinking or reflecting," as in Dnl 7 28, "my cogitations much troubled me" (RV "my thoughts").

COHORT, kō'hort: In RVm of Mt 27 27; Mk 15 16; Jn 18 3.12; Acts 10 1; 21 31; 27 1, the tr of speira (AV and RV, "band"); the tenth part of a legion; ordinarily about 600 men. In Jn 18 the word seems to be used loosely of a smaller body of soldiers, a detachment, detail. See ARMY; BAND.

COINS, koinz: There were no coins in use in Pal until after the Captivity. It is not quite certain whether gold and silver were before that time divided into pieces of a certain weight for use as money or not, but there can be no question of coinage proper until the Pers period. Darius I is credited with introducing a coinage system into his empire, and his were the first coins that came into use among the Jews, though it seems probable that coins were struck in Lydia in the time of Croesus, the contemporary of Cyrus the Great, and these coins were doubtless the model upon which Darius based his system, and they may have circulated to some extent in Babylonia before the return of the Jews. The only coins mentioned in the OT are the Darics (see DARIC), and these only in the RV, the word "dram" being used in AV (Ezr 2 69; 8 27; Neh 7 70-72). The Jews had no native coins until the time of the Maccabees, who struck coins after gaining their independence about 143-141 BC. These kings struck silver and copper, or the latter, at least (see MONEY), in denominations of shekels and fractions of the shekel, until the dynasty was overthrown by the Romans. Other coins were certainly in circulation during the same period, esp. those of Alexander and his successors, the Ptolemies of Egypt and the Seleucids of Syria, both of whom bore sway over Pal before the rise of the Maccabees. Besides these coins there were the issues of some of the Phoen towns, which were allowed to strike coins by the Persians and the Seleucids. The coins of Tyre and Sidon, both silver and copper, must have circulated largely in Pal on account of the intimate commercial relations between the Jews and Phoenicians (for examples, see under MONEY). After the advent of the Romans the local coinage was restricted chiefly to the series of copper coins, such as the mites mentioned in the NT, the silver denarii being struck mostly at Rome, but circulating wherever the Romans went. The coins of the Herods and the Procurators are abundant, but all of copper, since the Romans did not allow the Jewish rulers to strike either silver or gold coins. At the time of the first revolt (66-70 AD) the Jewish leader, Simon, struck shekels again, or, as some numismatists think, he was the first to do so. But this series was a brief one, lasting between 3 and 4 years only, as Jerus was taken by Titus in 70 AD, and this put an end to the existence of the Jewish state. There was another short period of Jewish coinage during the second revolt, in the reign of Hadrian, when Simon Barcochba struck coins with Heb legends which indicate his independence of Rom rule. They were of both silver and copper, and constitute the last series of strictly Jewish coins (see MONEY). After this the coins struck in Judaea were Rom, as Jerus was made a Rom colony.

COLA, kō'la. See CHOLA.

COLD, köld (קָרָד, kōr; ψυχρός, psuchrós [adj.], ψύχος, psúchos [noun]): Pal is essentially a land of sunshine and warmth. The extreme cold of northern latitudes is unknown. January is the coldest month; but the degree of cold in a particular place depends largely on the altitude above the sea. On the seacoast and plain the snow never falls; and the temperature reaches freezing-point, perhaps once in thirty years. In Jerus at 2,500 ft. above the sea the mean temperature in January is about 45° F., but the minimum may be as low as 25° F. Snow occasionally falls, but lasts only a short time. On Mt. Hermon and on the Lebanon snow may be found the whole year, and the cold is most intense, even in the summer. In Jericho and around the Dead Sea, 1,292 ft. below sea-level, it is correspondingly hotter, and cold is not known.

Cold is of such short duration that no adequate provision is made by the people to protect themselves against the cold. The sun is always bright and warm, and nearly always shines for part of the day, even in winter. After sunset the people wrap themselves up and go to sleep. They prefer to wrap up their heads rather than their feet in order to keep warm. The only means of heating the houses is the charcoal brazier around which as many as possible gather for a little warmth. It is merely a bed of coals in an iron vessel. Peter was glad to avail himself of the little heat of the coals as late as the beginning of April, when the nights are often chilly in Jerus: "Having made a fire of coals; for it was cold: . . . and Peter also was with them, standing and warming himself" (Jn 18 18). There is no attempt made to heat the whole house. In the cold winter months the people of the mountains almost hibernate. They wrap up their heads in shawls and coverings and only the most energetic venture out: "The sluggard will not plow by reason of the winter" (Prov 20 4, AV "cold"). The peasants and more primitive people of the desert often make a fire in the open or in partial shelter, as in Melita where Paul was cast ashore after shipwreck: "The barbarians . . . kindled a fire . . . because of the cold" (Acts 28 2).

The cold is greatly dreaded because it causes so much actual suffering: "Who can stand before his cold?" (Ps 147 17). The last degree

3. Dread of Cold of degradation is to have "no covering in the cold" (Job 24 7).

In the heat of the long summer, the shadow of a rock or the cool of evening is most grateful, and the appreciation of a cup of cold water can easily be understood by anyone who

4. Cold Grateful in Summer has experienced the burning heat of the Syrian sun: "As cold waters to a thirsty soul, so is good news from a far country" (Prov 25 25); "cold of snow in the time of harvest" (Prov 25 13), probably with reference to the use of snow (shaved ice) in the East to cool a beverage.

Figurative uses: "The love of the many shall wax cold" (Mt 24 12); "I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot" (Rev 3 15).

ALFRED H. JOY

COL-HOZEH, kol-hō'ze (כֹּל-הֹזֶה, kol-hōzeh, "all seeing"; LXX omits): A man whose son Shallum rebuilt the fountain gate of Jerus in the days of Nehemiah (Neh 3 15). The C. of Neh 11 5 is probably another man.

COLIUS, kō'li-us (Κόλιος, Kōlios, 1 Esd 9 23). See CALITAS.

COLLAR, kol'ar, kol'ēr:

(1) (נָטִיפֹת, nēṭīphōth, pl. nēṭīphōth, lit. "drops," from נָטַף, nāṭaph, "to drop"). Jgs 8 26 includes nēṭīphōth among the spoils taken from the Midianites and Ishmaelites; RV "pendants," AV "collars." Kimhi ad loc. suggests "perfume-drop-per."

(2) (פֶּה, peh, lit. "mouth"). In Job 30 18 the word is used to indicate the collar band, or hole of a robe, through which the head was inserted. Job, in describing his suffering and writhing, mentions the disfiguring of his garment, and suggests that the whole thing feels as narrow or close-fitting as the neckband, or perhaps that in his fever and pains he feels as if the neckband itself is choking him.

(3) (עֲנִיִּים, ʿānīyīm, Jer 29 26, "stocks"; RV "shackles," which see; RVm "collar"). An instrument of torture or punishment.

NATHAN ISAACS

COLLECTION, kō-lek'shun:

(1) In the OT (מַסְעָה, mas'ēh, "something taken up"), used in 2 Ch 24 6.9 AV with reference to the tax prescribed in Ex 30 12.16; RV "tax."

(2) In the NT "collection" is the tr given to λογία, logia, found only twice (classical, συλλογή, sullogē). It is used with reference to the collection which Paul took up in the gentile churches for the poor Christians in Jerus, as, for some reason, perhaps more severe persecutions, that church was esp. needy (1 Cor 16 1.2; ver 2 AV "gatherings"). Other words, such as bounty, contribution, blessing, alms, ministration, are used to indicate this same ministry. Paul seems to have ascribed to it great importance. Therefore, he planned it carefully long in advance; urged systematic, weekly savings for it; had delegates carefully chosen to take it to Jerus; and, in spite of dangers, determined himself to accompany them. Evidently he thought it the crowning act of his work in the provinces of Galatia, Asia, Macedonia and Achaia, for as soon as it was finished he purposed to go to Rome and the West (Acts 24 17; Rom 15 25.26; 2 Cor 8, 9). See also COMMUNION.

G. H. TREVER

COLLEGE, kol'ej: This is the rendering of AV for Heb Mishneh (מִשְׁנֶה, mishneh, 2 K 22 14= 2 Ch 34 22; cf Zeph 1 10). It is found in the Tg of Jonathan on 2 K 22 14 and rests on a faulty combination with Mish, the well-known code of laws of the 2d cent. AD. RV renders "second quarter" (of the city); 2 Ch 34 22 AVm "the school."

COLLOP, kol'up (כֹּלֶפֶת, pīmāh): A slice of meat or "fat," AV in Job 15 27, "maketh collops of fat [thick folds of flesh] on his flanks," said of the "wicked man." ARV reads "[hath] gathered fat upon his loins."

COLONY, kol'ō-ni (κολωνία, kolōnía, Gr translation of Lat colonia, from √ col, "cultivate"): The word occurs but once (Acts 16 12) in reference to Philippi in Macedonia. Rom colonies were of three kinds and of three periods: (1) Those of the early republic, in which the colonists, established in conquered towns to serve the state as guardians of the frontier, were exempt from ordinary military service. They were distinguished as (a) c. civium Romanorum, wherein the colonists retained Rom citizenship, also called c. maritumae, because situated on the coast, and (b) c. Latinae, situated inland among the allies (socii), wherein the colonists possessed the ius Latinum, entitling them to invoke the Rom law of property (commercium), but not that of the family (connubium), and received Rom citizenship only when elected to magistracies. (2) The colonies of the Gracchan period, established in pursuance of the scheme of agrarian reforms, to provide land for the poorer citizens. (3) After the time of Sulla colonies were founded in Italy by the Republic as a device for granting lands to retiring veterans, who of course retained citizenship. This privilege was appropriated by Caesar and the emperors, who employed it to establish military colonies, chiefly in the provinces, with various rights and internal organizations. To this class belonged Philippi. Partly organized after the great battle of 42 BC, fought in the neighboring plain by Brutus and Cassius, the champions of the fated Republic, and Antonius and Octavian, it was fully established as a colony by Octavian (afterward styled Augustus) after the battle of Actium (31 BC), under the name Colonia Aug. Iul. Philippi or Philippensis. It received the ius Italicum, whereby provincial cities acquired the same status as Italian cities, which possessed municipal self-government and exemption from poll and land taxes. See CITIZENSHIP; PHILIPPI; ROMAN.

WILLIAM ARTHUR HEIDEL

COLOR, kul'ēr, COLORS, kul'erz: The word tr<sup>d</sup> "color" in AV is 'ayin, which lit. means "eye" or "appearance," and has been so tr<sup>d</sup> in RV. In the NT the Gr πρόφασις, próphasis, has the meaning of pretense or show (Acts 27 30; cf Rev 17 4 AV). The references to Joseph's coat of many colors (Gen 37 3.23.32) and "garments of divers colors" (2 S 13 18.19) probably do not mean the color of the garment at all, but the form, as suggested in ARVm, "a long garment with sleeves." In Jgs 5 30 the word for "dip" or "dye" appears in the original and has been so tr<sup>d</sup> in ARV (see DYE). In 1 Ch 29 2 רִקְמָה, rīqmāh, meaning "variegated," hence "varicolored," is found. In Isa 54 11, pūkh is used. This name was applied to the sulphide of antimony (Arab. kohl) used for painting the eyes. Hence the ARVm rendering "antimony" instead of "fair colors" (see PAINT). In Ezk 16 16 טָלָא, tālā, is found, meaning "covered with pieces" or "spotted," hence by implication "divers colors."

Although the ancient Hebrews had no specific words for "color," "paint" or "painter," still, as we know, they constantly met with displays of the art of coloring among the Babylonians (Ezk 23 14) and Egyptians and the inhabitants of Pal. Pottery, glazed bricks, glassware, tomb walls, sarcophagi, wood and fabrics were submitted to the skill of the colorist. This skill probably consisted in bringing out striking effects by the use of a few primary colors, rather than in any attempt at the blending of shades which characterizes modern coloring. That the gaudy show of their heathen neighbors attracted the children of Israel is shown by such passages as Jgs 8 27; Ezk 23 12.16.

Two reasons may be given for the indefiniteness of many of the Bib. references to color. (1) The origin of the Heb people: They had been wandering tribes or slaves with no occasion to develop a color language. (2) Their religious laws: These forbade expression in color or form (Ex 20 4). Yielding to the attractions of gorgeous display was discouraged by such prophets as Ezekiel, who had sickened of the abominations of the Chaldeans (Ezk 23 14.15.16); "And I said unto them, Cast ye away every man the abominations of his eyes" (Ezk 20 7).

Indefiniteness of color language is common to oriental literature, ancient and modern. This does not indicate a want of appreciation of color but a failure to analyze and define color effects. The inhabitants of Syria and Pal today delight in brilliant colors. Bright yellow, crimson, magenta and green are used for adornment with no evident sense of fitness, according to the foreigners' eyes, other than their correspondence with the glaring brightness of the eastern skies. A soapmaker once told the writer that in order to make his wares attractive to the Arabs he colored them a brilliant crimson or yellow. A peasant chooses without hesitation a flaring magenta or yellow or green zun-nar (girdle), rather than one of somber hues. The oriental student in the chemical or physical laboratory often finds his inability to distinguish or classify color a real obstacle. His closest definition of a color is usually "lightish" or "darkish." This is not due to color blindness but to a lack of education, and extends to lines other than color distinctions. The colloquial language of Pal today is poor in words denoting color, and an attempt to secure from a native a satisfactory description of some simple color scheme is usually disappointing. The harmonious color effects which have come to us from the Orient have been, in the past, more the result of accident (see DYE) than of deliberate purpose, as witness the clashing of colors where modern artificial dyes have been introduced.

This inability of the peoples of Bible lands to define colors is an inheritance from past ages, a consideration which helps us to appreciate the vagueness of many of the Bib. references.

The following color words occur in the AV or RV: (1) bay, (2) black, (3) blue, (4) brown, (5) crimson, (6) green, (7) grey, (8) hoar, (9) purple, (10) red, (11) scarlet, (12) sorrel, (13) vermilion, (14) white, (15) yellow. In addition there are indefinite words indicating mixtures of light and dark: (a) grised (grizzled), (b) ringstraked (ring-streaked), (c) speckled, (d) spotted.

(1) Bay or red is more properly tr<sup>d</sup> "strong" in the RV.

(2) Black (blackish): Eight different words have been tr<sup>d</sup> "black." They indicate various meanings such as "dusky like the early dawn," "ashen," "swarthy," "moved with passion." Black is applied to hair (Lev 13 31; Cant 5 11; Mt 5 36); to marble or pavement (Est 1 6); to mourning (Job 30 28.30; Jer 14 2); to passion (Jer 8 21 AV; Lam 5 10); to horses (Zec 6 2.6; Rev 6 5); to the heavens (1 K 18 45; Job 3 6; Prov 7 9 AV; Jer 4 28; Mic 3 6); to the sun (Rev 6 12); to the skin (racial) (Cant 1 5.6); to flocks (Gen 30 32.33.35.40); to brooks because of ice (Job 6 16).

(4) Brown: The Heb word meaning "sunburnt" or "swarthy" is tr<sup>d</sup> "black" in RV (Gen 30 32 ff).

(5) Crimson (כַּרְמִיל, karmīl): This word is probably of Pers origin and applies to the brilliant dye obtained from a bug. A second word תוֹלַא'אֶת, tōla'ath, is also found. Its meaning is the same. See DYE. Crimson is applied to raiment (2 Ch 2 7.14; 3 14; Jer 4 30 AV); to sins (Isa 1 18).

(6) Green (greenish): This word in the tr refers almost without exception to vegetation. The Heb יָרֵאֵךְ, yārāk, lit. "pale," is considered one of the three definite color words used in the OT (see WHITE; RED). The Gr equivalent is chlōros; of Eng. "chlorine." This word occurs in the following vs: Gen 1 30; 9 3; Ex 10 15; Lev 2 14 (AV); 23 14 (AV); 2 K 19 26; Ps 37 2; Isa 15 6; 37 27; Job 39 8; chlōros, Mk 6 39; Rev 8 7; 9 4. רֶאֱנָן, ra'ānān, closely allied in meaning to yārāk, is used to describe trees in the following passages: Dt 12 2; 1 K 14 23; 2 K 16 4; 17 10; 19 26; 2 Ch 28 4; Job 15 32; Ps 37 35; 52 8; Cant 1 16; Isa 57 5; Jer 2 20; 3 6; 11 16; 17 2.8; Ezk 6 13; Hos 14 8. In the remaining vs the Heb equivalents do not denote color, but the condition of being full of sap, fresh or unripe (cf similar uses in Eng.) (Gen 30 37 [AV]; Jgs 16 7.8; Ps 23 2; Cant 2 13; Job 8 16; Ezk 17 24; 20 47; Lk 23 31). In Est 1 6 the Heb word refers to a fiber, probably cotton, as is indicated by ARVm. Greenish is used to describe leprous spots in Lev 13 49; 14 37. The same word is tr<sup>d</sup> "yellow" in Ps 68 13.

(7) Gray: The Heb שֵׁבְחָה, sēbhāh, means old age, hence refers also to the color of the hair in old age (Gen 42 38; 44 29; 44 31; Dt 32 25; Ps 71 18; Hos 7 9). See Hoar, next paragraph.

(8) Hoar (hoary): The same word which in other vs is tr<sup>d</sup> "gray" is rendered "hoar" or "hoary," applying to the hair in 1 K 2 6.9; Isa 46 4; Lev 19 32; Job 41 32; Prov 16 31. Another Heb word is tr<sup>d</sup> "hoar" or "hoary," describing "frost" in Ex 16 14; Job 38 29; Ps 147 16.

(9) Purple: The Heb equivalent is אֶרְמָזִין, 'argāmān; Gr πορφύρα, porphūra. The latter word refers to the source of the dye, namely, a shellfish found on the shores of the Mediterranean. See DYE. This color, which varied widely according to the kind of shellfish used and the method of dyeing, was utilized in connection with the adornment of the tabernacle (Ex 25, 26, 27, 28, 35, 36, 38, 39; Nu 4 13). There were workers in purple called to assist in beautifying the temple (2 Ch 2 7.14; 3 14). Purple was much used for royal raiment and furnishings (Jgs 8 26; Est 1 6; 8 15; Cant 3 10; Mk 15 17.20; Jn 19 2.5). Purple was typical of gorgeous apparel (Prov 31 22; Jer 10 9; Cant 7 5; Ezk 27 7.16; Lk 16 19; Acts 16 14; Rev 17 4; 18 12.16).

(10) Red: The Heb אֶדְמוֹם, 'ādām, is from דָּם, dām, "blood," hence, "bloodlike." This is one of the three distinctive color words mentioned in the OT (see GREEN; WHITE), and is found in most of the references to red. Four other words are used: (a) הַכְלִילִי, hakhhlīlī, probably "darkened" or "clouded" (Gen 49 12; Prov 23 29); (b) הָמָר, hāmar, "to ferment" (Ps 75 8m; Isa 27 2 AV); (c) בָּהֵט, bāhat, probably "to glisten" (Est 1 6); (d) πυρρός, purros, "firelike" (Mt 16 2.3; Rev 6 4; 12 3). Red is applied to dyed skins (Ex 25 5; 26 14; 35 7.23; 36 19; 39 34); to the color of animals (Nu 19 2; Zec 1 8; 6 2; Rev 6 4; 12 3); to the human skin (Gen 25 25; ruddy, 1 S 16 12; 17 42; Cant 5 10; Lam 4 7); to the eyes (Gen 49 12; Prov 23 29); to sores (Lev 13); to wine (Ps 75 8m; Prov 23 31; Isa 27 2 AV); to water (2 K 3 22); to pavement (Est 1 6); to pottage (Gen 25 30); to apparel (Isa 63 2); to the sky (Mt 16 2.3); to sins (Isa 1 18); to a shield (Nah 2 3).

(11) Scarlet: Scarlet and crimson colors were probably from the same source (see CRIMSON; DYE). תוֹלַאֲתִי, tōla'ath, or derivatives have been tr'd by both "scarlet" and "crimson" (Gr kókkinos). A Chald word for purple has thrice been tr'd "scarlet" in AV (Dnl 5 7.16.29). Scarlet is applied to fabrics or yarn used (a) in the equipment of the tabernacle (Ex 25 ff; Nu 4 8); (b) in rites in cleansing lepers (Lev 14); in ceremony of purification (Nu 19 6); to royal or gorgeous apparel (2 S 1 24; Prov 31 21; Lam 4 5; Dnl 5 7.16.29, "purple"; Nah 2 3; Mt 27 28; Rev 17 4; 18 12.16); to marking thread (Gen 38 28.30; Josh 2 18.21); to lips (Cant 4 3); to sins (Isa 1 18); to beasts (Rev 17 3); to wool (He 9 19).

(12) Sorrel: This word occurs once in the RV (Zec 1 8).

(13) Vermilion: This word, שֶׁשֶׁר, shāshar, occurs in two passages (Jer 22 14; Ezk 23 14). Vermilion of modern arts is a sulphide of mercury. It is not at all improbable that the paint referred to was an oxide of iron. This oxide is still taken from the ground in Syria and Pal and used for decorative outlining.

(14) White: The principal word for denoting whiteness in the Heb was לָבָן, lābhān, a distinctive color word. Some of the objects to which it was applied show that it was used as we use the word "white" (Gen 49 12). Mt. Lebanon was probably named because of its snow-tipped peaks (Jer 18 14). White is applied to goats (Gen 30 35); to rods (Gen 30 37); to teeth (Gen 49 12); to leprous hairs and spots (Lev 13; Nu 12 10); to garments (Ecl 9 8; Dnl 7 9); as symbol of purity (Dnl 11 35; 12 10; Isa 1 18); to horses (Zec 1 8; 6 3.6); to tree branches (Joel 1 7); to coriander seed (Ex 16 31). The corresponding Gr word, leukós, leukós, is used in NT. It is applied to hair (Mt 5 36; Rev 1 14); to raiment (Mt 17 2; 28 3; Mk 9 3; 16 5; Lk 9 29; Jn 20 12; Acts 1 10; Rev 3 4.5.18; 6 11; 7 9.13.14; 19 14); to horses (Rev 6 2; 19 11.14); to a throne (Rev 20 11); to stone (Rev 2 17); to a cloud (Rev 14 14). Besides lābhān, four other Heb words have been tr'd "white": (a) הָוֵי, hōvī, or הָוֵר, hūr, meaning, "bleached," applied to bread (Gen 40 16); to linen (Est 1 6; 8 15); (b) צָה, zah, or צָהֹר, zāhōr, lit. "dazzling," is applied to asses (Jgs 5 10); to human appearance (Cant 5 10); to wool (Ezk 27 18); (c) דָּר, dar, probably mother of pearl or alabaster (Est 1 6); (d) רִיר, rīr, lit. "saliva," and, from resemblance, "white of egg" (Job 6 6).

(15) Yellow: This word occurs in Est 1 6 to describe pavement; in Lev 13 to describe leprous hair; in Ps 68 13 to describe gold.

Mixtures of colors: (a) grizzled (grised), lit. "spotted as with hail," applied to goats (Gen 31 10.12); to horses (Zec 6 3.6); (b) ringstreaked (ringstraked), lit. "striped with bands," applied to animals (Gen 30 35 ff; 31 8 ff); (c) speckled, lit. "dotted or spotted," applied to cattle and goats (Gen 30 32 ff; 31 8 ff); to a bird (Jer 12 9); to horses (Zec 1 8 AV); (d) spotted, lit. "covered with patches," applied to cattle and goats (Gen 30 32 ff). In Jude ver 23 "spotted" means "defiled."

COLOSSAE, kō-loš'ē (Κολοσσαί, Kolossai, "punishment"; AV Colosse): A city of Phrygia on the Lycus River, one of the branches of the Maeander, and 3 miles from Mt. Cadmus, 8,013 ft. high. It stood at the head of a gorge where the two streams unite, and on the great highway traversing the country from Ephesus to the Euphrates valley, 13 miles from Hierapolis and 10 from Laodicea. Its history is chiefly associated with that of these two cities. Early, according to both Herodotus and Xenophon, it was a place of great importance. There Xerxes stopped 481 BC (Herod. vii.30) and Cyrus the Younger marched 401 BC (Xen. Anab. i.2.6). From Col 2 1 it is not likely that Paul visited the place in person; but its Christianization was due to the efforts of Epaphras and Timothy (Col 1 1.7), and it was the home of Philemon and Epaphras. That a church was established there early is evident from Col 4 12.13; Rev 1 11; 3 14. As the neighboring cities, Hierapolis and Laodicea, increased in importance, Colossae declined. There were many Jews living there, and a chief article of commerce, for which the place was renowned, was the colossinus, a peculiar wool, probably of a purple color. In religion the people were specially lax, worshipping angels. Of them, Michael was the chief, and the protecting saint of the city. It is said that once he appeared to the people, saving the city in time of a flood. It was this belief in angels which called forth Paul's epistle (Col 2 18). During the 7th and 8th cents. the place was overrun by the Saracens; in the 12th cent. the church was destroyed by the Turks and the city disappeared. Its site was explored by Mr. Hamilton. The ruins of the church, the stone foundation of a large theater, and a necropolis with stones of a peculiar shape are still to be seen. During the Middle Ages the place bore the name of Chonae; it is now called Chonas. E. J. BANKS

COLOSSIANS, kō-losh'ans, kō-loš'i-anz, EPISTLE TO THE: This is one of the group of St. Paul's epistles known as the Captivity Epistles (see PHILEMON, EPISTLE TO, for a discussion of these as a group).

I. Authenticity.—The external evidence for the Epistle to the Colossians, prior to the middle of the 2d cent., is rather indeterminate. In

1. External Ignatius and Polycarp we have here Evidence and there phrases and terminology that suggest an acquaintance with

Col but not much more (Ignat., Ephes., x.3, and Polyc. x.1; cf with Col 1 23). The phrase in Ep Barnabas, xii, "in him are all things and unto him are all things," may be due to Col 1 16, but it is quite as possibly a liturgical formula. The references in Justin Martyr's Dialogue to Christ as the firstborn (prōtōtokos) are very probably suggested by Col 1 15, "the firstborn of all creation" (Dial., 84, 85, 138). The first definite witness is Marcion, who included this epistle in his collection of those written by St. Paul (Tert., Adv. Marc., v.19). A little later the Muratorian Fragment mentions Col among the Epistles of St. Paul (10b, l. 21, Colossensis). Irenaeus quotes it frequently and by name (Adv. haer., iii.14, 1). It is familiar to the writers of the following cents. (e.g. Tert., De praescrip., 7; Clem. Alex., Strom., I, 1; Orig., Contra Celsum, v.8).

The authenticity was not questioned until the second quarter of the 19th cent. when Mayerhoff claimed on the ground of style, vocabulary, and thought that it was not by the apostle. The Tübingen school claimed, on the basis of a supposed Gnosticism, that the epistle was the work of the 2d cent. and so not Pauline. This position has been thoroughly answered by showing that the teaching is essentially different from the Gnosticism of the 2d cent., esp. in the conception of Christ as prior to and greater than all things created (see V below). The attack in later years has been chiefly on the ground of vocabulary and style, the doctrinal position, esp. the Christology and the teaching about angels, and the relation to the Ephesian epistle. The objection on the ground of vocabulary and style is based, as is so often the case, on the assumption that a man, no matter what he writes about, must use the same words and style. There are thirty-four words in Col which are not in any other NT book. When one removes those that are due to the difference in subject-matter, the total is no greater than that of some of the acknowledged epistles. The omission of familiar Pauline particles, the use of genitives, of "all" (pás), and of synonyms, find parallels in other epistles, or are due to a difference of subject, or perhaps to the influence on the language of the apostle of his life in Rome (von Soden). The doctrinal position is not at heart contradictory to St. Paul's earlier teaching (cf Godet, Intro NT; St. Paul's Epistles, 440 f.). The Christology is in entire harmony with Phil (q.v.) which is generally admitted as Pauline, and is only a development of the teaching in 1 Cor (8 6; 15 24-28), esp. in respect of the emphasis laid on "the cosmical activity of the preincarnate Christ." Finally, the form in which St. Paul puts the Christology is that best calculated to meet the false teaching of the Colossian heretics (cf V below). In recent years H. Holtzmann has advocated that this epistle is an interpolated form of an original Pauline epistle to the Colossians, and the work of the author of the Epistle to the Ephesians (q.v.). A modification of this theory of interpolation has recently been suggested by J. Weiss (TLZ, September 29, 1900). Both these theories are too complicated to stand, and even von Soden, who at first followed Holtzmann, has abandoned the position (von Soden, Eint., 12); while Sanday (DB<sup>2</sup>) has shown how utterly untenable it is. Sober criticism today has come to realize that it is impossible to deny the Pauline authorship of this epistle. This position is strengthened by the close relationship between Col and Philem, of which Renan says: "Paul alone, so it would seem, could have written this little masterpiece" (Abbott, ICC, lviii). If Philem (q.v.) stands as Pauline, as it must, then the authenticity of Col is established beyond controversy.

II. Place and Date.—The Pauline authorship being established, it becomes evident at once that the apostle wrote Col along with the other Captivity Epistles, and that it is best dated from Rome (see PHILEMON, EPISTLE TO), and during the first captivity. This would be about 58 or, if the later chronology is preferred, 63 or 64.

III. Destination.—The epistle was written, on the face of it, to the church at COLOSSAE (q.v.), a town in the Lycus valley where the gospel had been preached most probably by Epaphras (Col 1 7; 4 12), and where St. Paul was, himself, unknown personally (1 4.8.9; 2 1.5). From the epistle it is evident that the Colossian Christians were Gentiles (1 27) for whom, as such, the apostle feels a responsibility (2 1 ff.). He sends to them Tychicus

(4 7), who is accompanied by Onesimus, one of their own community (4 9), and urges them to be sure to read another letter which will reach them from Laodicea (4 16).

IV. Relation to Other NT Writings.—Beyond the connection with Eph (q.v.) we need notice only the relation between Col and Rev. In the letter to Laodicea (Rev 3 14-21) we have two expressions: "the beginning of the creation of God," and "I will give to him to sit down with me in my throne," in which we have an echo of Col which "suggests an acquaintance with and recognition of the earlier apostle's teaching on the part of St. John" (Lightfoot, Col, 42, n. 5).

V. The Purpose.—The occasion of the epistle was, we may be sure, the information brought by Epaphras that the church in Colossae was subject to the assault of a body of Judaistic Christians who were seeking to overthrow the faith of the Colossians and weaken their regard for St. Paul (Zahn). This "heresy," as it is commonly called, has had many explanations. The Tübingen school taught that it was gnostic, and sought to find in the terms the apostle used evidence for the 2d cent. composition of the epistle. Plērōma and gnōsis ("fulness" and "knowledge") not only do not require this interpretation, but will not admit it. The very heart of Gnosticism, i.e. the theory of emanation and the dualistic conception which regards matter as evil, finds no place in Col. The use of plērōma in this and the sister epistle, Eph, does not imply gnostic views, whether held by the apostle or by the readers of the letters. The significance in Col of this and the other words adopted by Gnosticism in later years is quite distinct from that later meaning. The underlying teaching is equally distinct. The Christ of the Colossians is not the aeon Christ of Gnosticism. In Essenism, on the other hand, Lightfoot and certain Germans seek the origin of this heresy. Essenism has certain affinities with Gnosticism on the one side and Judaism on the other. Two objections are raised against this explanation of the origin of the Colossian heresy. In the first place Essenism, as we know it, is found in the neighborhood of the Dead Sea, and there is no evidence for its establishment in the Lycus valley. In the second place, no references are found in Col to certain distinct Essene teachings, e.g. those about marriage, washings, communism, Sabbath rules, etc.

The Colossian heresy is due to Judaistic influences on the one hand and to native beliefs and superstitions on the other. The Judaistic elements in this teaching are patent, circumcision (2 11), the Law (2 14.15), and special seasons (2 16). But there is more than Judaism in this false teaching. Its teachers look to intermediary spirits, angels whom they worship; and insist on a very strict asceticism. To seek the origin of angel worship in Judaism, as is commonly done, is, as A. L. Williams has shown, to miss the real significance of the attitude of the Jews to angels and to magnify the bitter jeers of Celsus. Apart from phrases used in exorcism and magic he shows us that there is no evidence that the Jew ever worshipped angels (JTS, X, 413 f.). This element in the Colossian heresy was local, finding its antecedent in the worship of the river spirits, and in later years the same tendency gave the impulse to the worship of St. Michael as the patron saint of Colossae (so too Ramsay, HDB, s.v. "Colossae"). The danger of and the falsehood in this teaching were twofold. In the first place it brought the gospel under the bands of the Law once more, not now with the formality of the Galatian opponents, but none the less surely. But as the apostle's readers are Gentiles (1 27) St. Paul is not interested in showing the preparatory aspect of the Law. He simply insists to them that they are quite free from all obligations of the Law because Christ, in whom they have been baptized (2 12), has blotted out all the Law (2 14). The second danger is that their belief in and worship of the heavenly powers, false ideas about Christ and the material world, would develop even further than it had. They, because of their union with Him, need fear no angelic being. Christ has triumphed over them all, leading them as it were captives in His train (2 15), as He conquered on the cross. The spiritual powers cease to have any authority over the Christians. It is to set Christ forward, in this way, as Head over all creation as very God, and out of His relation to the church and to the universe to develop the Christian life, that the apostle writes.

1 1-2: Salutation.

1 3-8: Thanksgiving for their faith in Christ, their love for the saints, their hope laid up in heaven, which they had in and through the gospel and of which he had heard from Epaphras.

1 9-13: Prayer that they might be filled with the full knowledge of God's will so as to walk worthy of the Lord and to be fruitful in good works, thankful for their inheritance of the kingdom of His Son.

1 14-23: Statement of the Son's position, from whom we have redemption. He is the very image of God, Creator, preëxistent, the Head of the church, preëminent over all, in whom all the fullness (plērōma) dwells, the Reconciler of all things, as also of the Colossians, through His death, provided they are faithful to the hope of the gospel.

1 24-2 5: By his suffering he is filling up the sufferings of Christ, of whom he is a minister, even to reveal the great mystery of the ages, that Christ is in them, the Gentiles, the hope of glory, the object of the apostle's preaching everywhere. This explains Paul's interest in them, and his care for them, that their hearts may be strengthened in the love and knowledge of Christ.

2 6-3 4: He then passes to exhortation against those who are leading them astray, these false teachers of a vain, deceiving philosophy based on worldly wisdom, who ignore the truth of Christ's position, as One in whom all the Divine plērōma dwells, and their relation to Him, united by baptism; raised through the faith; quickened and forgiven; who teach the obligation of the observance of various legal practices, strict asceticisms and angel worship. This exhortation is closed with the appeal that as Christ's they will not submit to these regulations of men which are useless, esp. in comparison with Christ's power through the Resurrection.

3 5-17: Practical exhortations follow to real mortification of the flesh with its characteristics, and the substitution of a new life of fellowship, love and peace.

3 18-4 1: Exhortation to fulfil social obligations, as wives, husbands, children, parents, slaves and masters.

4 2-6: Exhortation to devout and watchful prayer.

4 7-18: Salutations and greeting.

COLT, kōlt (FOAL) (צִיר, ayir, בֶּן, ben; πῶλος, pōlos, viōs, huiōs, with some word such as ὑποζυγιον, hupozygiou, understood; huiōs alone="son"): The Eng. words "colt" and "foal" are used in the Bible of the ass everywhere except in Gen 32 15, where the word "colt" is used of the camel in the list of animals destined by Jacob as presents for Esau. In most cases ayir (cf Arab. ayir, "ass") means "ass's colt," but it may be joined with ben, "son," as in Zec 9 9, where we have: 'al-hāmōr w-'al-'ayir ben-'āthōnōth, lit. "on an ass, and on an ass's colt, the son of the she-asses"; cf Mt 21 5: ἐπὶ ὄνου καὶ ἐπὶ πῶλον υἱὸν ὑποζυγίου, epi ōnou kai epi pōlon huiōn hypozygiou, "upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass." In Jn 12 15 we have ἐπὶ πῶλον ὄνου, epi pōlon ōnou, and in the previous ver the diminutive, ὄναριον, onāriōn. The commonest NT word for "colt" is pōlos, akin to which is Ger. Fohle and Eng. "foal" and "filly." The Lat pullus signifies either "foal" or "chicken," and in the latter sense gives rise to Fr. poulet and Eng. "pullet."

In view of the fact that horses are but little mentioned in the Bible, and that only in connection with royal equipages and armies, it is not surprising that "colt" does not occur in its ordinary Eng. sense. ALFRED ELY DAY

COME, kum: The tr of many Heb and Gr words. In the phrase "The Spirit of Jeh came mightily upon him" (Jgs 14 6.19; 15 14; 1 S 10 10; 11 6; 16 13), the word is chāḥēh; Jgs 14 6; 15 14 "came mightily," which is the uniform tr of RV (cf 13 25 "to move," i.e. to disturb or stir up). In Jgs 6 34; 1 Ch 12 18; 2 Ch 24 20, it is labhēsh, "to clothe"; RVm "The Spirit . . . clothed itself with Gideon" and . . . "with Zechariah," "The Spirit clothed Amasai."

Among its many changes, RV has "come forth" for "come" (Mt 2 6); "gone up" for "come" (14 32, a different text); "come all the way" for "come" (Jn 4 15); "got out upon the" for "come to" (21 9); "draw near" for "come" (He 4 16); "come" for "come and see" (Rev 6 1); "secure" for "come by" (Acts 27 16); "attain unto" for "come in" (Eph 4 13); and "I come" for "I come again" (Jn 14 28). W. L. WALKER

COMELINESS, kum'li-nes, COMELY, kum'li: Cognate with "becoming," viz. what is suitable, graceful, handsome. The servant of Jeh in Isa 53 2 is without "comeliness" (hādhār, "honor"), i.e. there is in his appearance nothing attractive, while he is bowed beneath man's sin. "Praise is comely" (nā'wāh, f. of nā'weh; Ps 33 1; 147 1), i.e. suitable or befitting "for the righteous," and, therefore, an honor and glory; "uncomely parts," aschēmōna (1 Cor 12 23), viz. less honorable. See also 1 S 16 18, "a comely person"; Cant 6 4, "comely as Jerus," etc.

COMFORT, kum'fērt (נַחֵם, nāham; παρακαλέω, parakalēō): The NT word is variously tr<sup>d</sup>, as "comfort," "exhort," "beseech," the exact tr to be determined by the context. Etymologically, it is "to call alongside of," i.e. to summon for assistance. To comfort is to cheer and encourage. It has a positive force wanting in its synonym "console," as it indicates the dispelling of grief by the impartation of strength. RV has correctly changed the tr of paramuthēomai from AV "comfort," to "consolation." So in the OT, "Comfort ye my people" (Isa 40 1) is much stronger than "console," which affords only the power of calm endurance of affliction, while the brightest hopes of the future and the highest incentives to present activity are the gifts of the Divine grace that is here bestowed.

COMFORTABLY, kum'fēr-ta-bli (נֶחֱמָה, al lēbh, "to the heart"): "To speak to the heart," i.e. to speak kindly, to console, to comfort, is the ordinary Heb expression for wooing: e.g. Boaz spake "to the heart" of Ruth (Ruth 2 13m; AV "friendly," RV "kindly"). The beauty of the Heb term is illustrated in Gen 50 21 where Joseph "spoke kindly" unto his brethren, winning them from fear to confidence. Rendered "comfortably" in five passages: thrice of human speaking, and twice of the tenderness of God's address to His people. David was urged to win back the hearts of the people by kind words: "speak comfortably" (2 S 19 7). Hezekiah in like manner comforted the Levites (2 Ch 30 22) and encouraged his captains (2 Ch 32 6). The term has exceptional wealth of meaning in connection with God's message of grace and forgiveness to His redeemed people. The compassionate love that has atoned for their sins speaks to the heart ("comfortably") of Jerus, saying "that her iniquity is pardoned" (Isa 40 2). The same promise of forgiveness is given to the penitent nation by the prophet Hosea (Hos 2 14); "comfortable words" (Zec 1 13), i.e. words affording comfort. DWIGHT M. PRATT

COMFORTER, kum'fēr-tēr: This is a tr of the word παράκλητος, parákletos, in the Johannine writings. In the Gospel it occurs in 14 16,26; 15 26; 16 7, and refers to the Holy Spirit. The word means lit. "called to one's side" for help. The tr "Comforter" covers only a small part of the meaning as shown in the context. The word "Helper" would be a more adequate tr. The Spirit does a great deal for disciples besides comforting them, although to comfort was a part of His work for them. The Spirit guides into truth; indeed, He is called the Spirit of truth. He teaches and quickens the memory of disciples and glorifies Christ in them. He also has a work to do in the hearts of unbelievers, convicting the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment (Jn 14-16). The Comforter remains permanently with disciples after He comes in response to the prayers of Christ. The word parákletos does not occur elsewhere in the Scriptures except in 1 Jn 2 1. In Job 16 2 the active form of the word (parákletos is passive) is found in the pl., where Job calls his friends "miserable comforters." The word "Comforter" being an inadequate, and the word "Helper" a too indefinite, tr of the word in the Gospel of John, it would probably be best to transfer the Gr word into Eng. in so far as it relates to the Holy Spirit (see PARACLETE).

In 1 Jn 2 1 the word parákletos refers to Christ: "If any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous." Here the tr Advocate is quite correct. As the next ver shows the writer has in mind the intercession of Christ for Christians on the basis of His mediatorial work: "And he is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the whole world" (1 Jn 2 2). See ADVOCATE; HOLY SPIRIT; PARACLETE.

E. Y. MULLINS

COMFORTLESS, kum'fērt-les (ὀρφανός, orphanoús, "orphans"): The Gr original is found but twice in the NT; rendered "comfortless" in Jn 14 18, RV "desolate"; "fatherless" in Jas 1 27 (cf Ps 68 5). The term signifies bereft of a father, parents, guardian, teacher, guide, and indicates what must be the permanent ministry of the Holy Spirit to the disciples of Jesus, in comforting their hearts. In harmony with these parting words Jesus had called the chosen twelve "little children" (Jn 13 33); without Him they would be "orphans," comfortless, desolate. The coming of the Holy Spirit would make Christ and the Father forever real to them, an abiding spiritual presence. DWIGHT M. PRATT

COMING OF CHRIST. See ADVENT; PAROUSIA.

COMING, SECOND. See PAROUSIA.

COMMANDMENT, kō-mand'ment, COMMANDMENTS (מִצְוָה, miṣvāh; ἐντολή, entolē): The commandments are, first of all, prescriptions, or directions of God, concerning particular matters, which He wanted observed with reference to circumstances as they arose, in a period when He spake immediately and with greater frequency than afterward. They were numerous, minute, and regarded as coördinate and independent of each other. In the Ten Commandments, or, more properly, Ten Words, EVm (דְּבָרִים, d'bhārim), they are reduced to a few all-comprehensive precepts of permanent validity, upon which every duty required of man is based. Certain prescriptions of temporary force, as those of the ceremonial and forensic laws, are applications of these "Words" to transient circumstances, and, for the time for which they were enacted, demanded perfect and unconditional obedience. The Pss, and esp. Ps 119, show that even under the OT, there was a deep spiritual appreciation of these commandments, and the extent to which obedience was deemed a privilege rather than a mere matter of constrained external compliance with duty. In the NT, Jesus shows in Mt 22 37,40; Mk 12 29,31; Lk 10 27 (cf Rom 13 8,10) their organic unity. The "Ten" are reduced to two, and these two to one principle, that of love. In love, obedience begins, and works from within outward. Under the NT the commandments are kept when they are written upon the heart (He 10 16). While in the Synoptics they are referred to in a more abstract and distant way, in both the Gospel and the Epp. of Jn their relation to Jesus is most prominent. They are "my commandments" (Jn 14 15,21; 15 10,12); "my Father's" (Jn 10 18; 15 10); or, many times throughout the epp., "his [i.e. Christ's] commandments." The new life in Christ enkindles love, and not only makes the commandments the rule of life, but the life itself the free expression of the commandments and of the nature of God, in which the commandments are grounded. Occasionally the word is used in the singular collectively (Ex 24 12; Ps 119 96; 1 Cor 14 37). See TEN COMMANDMENTS, THE. H. E. JACOBS

COMMANDMENT, THE NEW, nū (ἐντολή καινή, entolē kainē): The word "commandment" is used in the Eng. VSS of the OT to translate several Heb words, more esp. those meaning "word" (dābhār) as the ten words of God (Ex 34 28) or king's "command" (Est 1 12); "precept" (miṣvāh) of God (Dt 4 2), of a king (2 K 18 36); "mouth" or "speech" (peh) of God (Ex 17 1), of Pharaoh (2 K 23 35). They express the theocratic idea of morality wherein the will or law of God is imposed upon men as their law of conduct (2 K 17 37).

This idea is not repudiated in the NT, but supplemented or modified from within by making love the essence of the command. Jesus

1. Christ Christ, as reported in the Synoptics, and the Old came not "to destroy the law or the prophets . . . but to fulfil" (Mt 5 17). He taught that "whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven" (Mt 5 19). He condemned the Pharisees for rejecting the commandments of God as given by Moses (Mk 7 8-13). There is a sense in which it is true that Christ propounded no new commandment, but the new thing in His teaching was the emphasis laid on the old commandment of love, and the extent and intent of its application. The great commandment is "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, . . . [and] thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments the whole law hangeth, and the prophets" (Mt 22 34-40; Mk 12 28-34; cf Dt 6 5; Lev 19 18).

When the law realizes itself as love for God and man in men's hearts, it ceases to bear the aspect of a command. The force of authority and the active resistance or inertia of the subject disappear; the law becomes a principle, a motive, a joyous harmony of man's will with the will of God; and in becoming internal, it becomes universal and transcends all distinctions of race or class. Even this was not an altogether new idea (cf Jer 31 31-34; Ps 51); nor did Christ's contemporaries and disciples think it was. The revolutionary factor was the death of Christ

2. Principle instead of Law

3. Christ's Love Fulfilled in Death Becomes the Law of the Church

wherein the love of God was exemplified and made manifest as the basis and principle of all spiritual life (Jn 13 34). Paul therefore generalizes all pre-Christian morality as a system of law and commandments, standing in antithesis to the grace and love which are through Jesus Christ (Rom 5-7). Believers in Christ felt their experience and inward life to be so changed and new, that it needed a new term (agápē = "love") to express their ideal of conduct (see CHARITY). Another change that grew upon the Christian consciousness, following from the resurrection and ascension of Christ, was the idea that He was the permanent source of the principle of life. "Jesus is Lord" (1 Cor 12 3). Hence in the Johannine writings the principle described by the new term agápē is associated with Christ's lordship and solemnly described as His "new commandment." "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another; even as I have loved you, that ye also love one another" (Jn 13 34). To the Christians of the end of the 1st cent. it was already an old commandment which they had from the beginning of the Christian teaching (1 Jn 2 7; 2 Jn 5); but it was also a new commandment which ever came with new force to men who were passing from the darkness of hatred to the light of love (1 Jn 2 8-11). The term 4. The New Revelation in the Gospel we may owe to the evangelist, but it brings into relief an element in the consciousness of Jesus which the author of the Fourth Gospel had appreciated more fully than the Synoptists. Jesus was aware that He was the bearer of a special message from the Father (Jn 12 49; Mt 11 27), that He fulfilled His mission in His death of love and self-sacrifice (Jn 10 18), and that the mission fulfilled gave Him authority over the lives of men, "even as I have loved you, that ye also love one another." The full meaning of Christ's teaching was only realized when men had experienced and recognized the significance of His death as the cause and principle of right conduct. The Synoptists saw Christ's teaching as the development of the prophetic teaching of the OT. Paul and John felt that the love of God in Christ was a new thing: (a) new as a revelation of God in Christ, (b) new as a principle of life in the church, and (c) new as a union of believers with Christ. While it is love, it is also a commandment of Christ, calling forth the joyous obedience of believers. See also BROTHERLY LOVE.

COMMEND, kō-mend'

(1) For παρατίθημι, paratithēmi (Lk 23 46), translating the Heb pākadh (Ps 31 5), in the dying words of Jesus: "Into thy hands I commend my spirit." AV in Ps has the more general word "commit." The use of the Gr word in the sense of "deposit what belongs to one into the hands of another" is not uncommon in the classics. So also the derivatives parathēkē (2 Tim 1 12) and parakatathēkē (1 Tim 6 20; 2 Tim 1 14). See DEPOSIT. This sense of the Eng., while slightly archaic, corresponds to the first meaning of the Lat, whence it comes, "to commit for preservation," esp. of the dying; to commend children, parents, etc., to the care of others (for examples, see Harper's Latin Dictionary).

(2) For συνίστημι, sunistēmi, "to stand together," and then, by standing together, to establish, prove, exhibit, as "righteousness" and "love of God" (Rom 3 5; 5 8), and thus to attest (2 Cor 3 1; 4 2), and, finally, to certify or to recommend a stranger (Rom 16 1; 2 Cor 6 4). The use of paristēmi in 1 Cor 8 8 is equivalent.

(3) "To praise," ἐπαίνέω, epainēō (Lk 16 8), and sunistēmi in 2 Cor 10 12, 18; for the OT, Heb hillel, in Gen 12 15 AV; Prov 12 8. H. E. JACOBS

LITERATURE

I. The Word—General Scope.—Etymologically, a commentary (from Lat commentor) denotes jottings, annotations, memoranda, on a given subject, or perhaps on a series of events; hence its use in the pl. as a designation for a narrative or history, as the Commentaries of Caesar. In its application to Scripture, the word designates a work devoted to the explanation, elucidation, illustration, sometimes the homiletic expansion and edifying utilization, of the text of some book or portion of Scripture. The primary function of a good commentary is to furnish an exact interpretation of the meaning of the passage under consideration; it belongs to it also to show the connection of ideas, the steps of argument, the scope and design of the whole, in the writing in question. This can only be successfully accomplished by the help of a knowledge of the original language of the writing, and of the historical setting of the particular passage; by careful study of the context, and of the author's general usages of thought and speech; and by comparison of parallel or related texts. Aid may also be obtained from external sources, as a knowledge of the history, archaeology, topography, chronology, manners and customs, of the lands, peoples and times referred to; or, as in Deissmann's recent discoveries, from the light thrown on peculiarities of language by papyri or other ancient remains (see his Light from the Ancient East).

II. Differences in Character.—It is obvious that commentaries will vary greatly in character and value according as they are more scholarly, technical, and critical, entering, e.g. into philological discussions, and tabulating and remarking upon the various views held as to the meaning; or again, more popular, aiming only at bringing out the general sense, and conveying it to the mind of the reader in attractive and edifying form. When the practical motive predominates, and the treatment is greatly enlarged by illustration, application, and the enforcement of lessons, the work loses the character of commentary proper, and partakes more of the character of homily or discourse.

III. Range of Commentaries.—No book in the world has been made the subject of so much commenting and exposition as the Bible. Theological libraries are full of commentaries of all descriptions and all grades of worth. Some are commentaries on the original Heb or Gr texts; some on the Eng. or other VSS. Modern commentaries are usually accompanied with some measure of introduction to the books commented upon; the more learned works have commonly also some indication of the data for the determination of the textual readings (see CRITICISM, TEXTUAL). Few writers are equal to the task of commenting with profit on the Bible as a whole, and, with the growth of knowledge, this task is now seldom attempted. Frequently, however, one writer contributes many valuable works, and sometimes, by coöperation of like-minded scholars, commentaries on the whole Bible are produced. It is manifestly a very slight survey that can be taken in a brief art. of the work of commenting, and of the literature to which it has given rise; the attempt can only be made to follow the lines most helpful to those seeking aid from this class of books. On the use and abuse of commentaries by the preacher, C. H. Spurgeon's racy remarks in his Commenting and Commentaries may be consulted.

Rabbinical interpretations and paraphrases of the OT may here be left out of account (see next art.; also TARGUMS; TALMUD; F. W. Farrar's History of Interpretation, Lect II). Commentaries on the NT could not begin till the NT books themselves were written, and had acquired some degree of authority as sacred writings (see BIBLE). The earliest commentaries we hear of are from the heretical circles of the Gnostics. Heracleon, a Valentinian (cir 175 AD), wrote a commentary on the Gospel of John (fragments in Origen), and on parts at least of the Gospel of Luke. Tatian, a disciple of Justin Martyr, about the same time, compiled his Diatessaron, or Harmony of the Four Gospels, on which, at a later time, commentaries were written. Ephraem Syrus (4th cent.) wrote such a commentary, of which an Armenian tr has now been recovered. The Church Father Hippolytus (beginning of 3d cent.), wrote several commentaries on the OT (Ex, Pss, Prov, Eccl, Dnl, Zec, etc), and on Mt, Lk and Rev.

(1) Origen, etc.—The strongest impulse, however, to the work of commenting and exposition of Holy Scripture undoubtedly proceeded from the school of Alexandria—esp. from Origen (203–54 AD). Clement, Origen's predecessor, had written a treatise called Hypotypōseis, or "Outlines," a survey of the contents of Holy Scripture. Origen himself wrote commentaries on all the books of the OT, Ruth, Est and Eccl alone excepted, and on most of the books of the NT (Mk, 1 and 2 Cor, 1 and 2 Pet, 1, 2, and 3 Jn, Jas, Jude, Rev excepted). He furnished besides, scholia, or notes on difficult passages, and delivered Homilies, or discourses, the records of which fill three folio volumes. "By his Tetrapla and Hexapla," says Farrar, "he became the founder of all textual criticism; by his Homilies he fixed the type of a popular exposition; his scholia were the earliest specimens of marginal explanations; his commentaries furnished the church with her first continuous exegesis" (op. cit., 188). Unfortunately the Alexandrian school adopted a principle of allegorical interpretation which led it frequently into the most extravagant fancies. Assuming a threefold sense in Scripture—a literal, a moral, and a spiritual—it gave reins to caprice in foisting imaginary meanings on the simplest historical statements (Farrar, op. cit., 189 ff). Some of Origen's commentaries, however, are much freer from allegory than others, and all possess high value (cf Lightfoot, Galatians, 217). The later teachers of the Alexandrian school continued the exegetical works of Origen. Pamphilus of Caesarea, the friend of Eusebius, is said to have written OT commentaries.

(2) Chrysostom, etc.—At the opposite pole from the allegorizing Alexandrian school of interpretation was the Antiochian, marked by a sober, literal and grammatical style of exegesis. Its reputed founder was Lucian (martyred 311 AD); but its real heads were Diodorus of Tarsus (379–94 AD) and Theodore of Mopsuestia (393–428 AD); and its most distinguished representative was John Chrysostom (347–407 AD). Chrysostom wrote continuous commentaries on Isa (only 1–8 10 remaining) and on Gal; but his chief contributions were his Homilies, covering almost the whole of the OT and NT. Of these over 600 remain, chiefly on the NT. They are unequal in character, those on Acts being reputed the feeblest; others, as those on Mt, Rom and Cor, are splendid examples of expository teaching. Schaff speaks of Chrysostom as "the prince of commentators among the Fathers" (Hist., Ante-Nicene Per., 816). Thomas Aquinas is reported to have said that he would rather possess Chrysostom's homilies on Mt than be master of all Paris. In the West, Ambrose of Milan (340–97 AD) wrote expositions of OT histories and of Lk (allegorical and typical), and Jerome (346–420 AD) wrote numerous commentaries on OT and NT books, largely, however, compilations from others.

The mediaeval and scholastic period offers little for our purpose. There was diligence in copying MSS, and producing catenae of the opinions of the Fathers; in the case of the schoolmen, in building up elaborate systems of theology; but the Scriptures were thrown into the background.

Nicolas de Lyra.—The 14th cent., however, produced one commentator of real eminence—Nicolas de Lyra (1270–1340). Nicolas was a Franciscan monk, well versed in Heb and rabbinical learning. While recognizing the usual distinctions of the various senses of Scripture, he practically builds on the literal, and exhibits great sobriety and skill in his interpretations. His work, which bears the name Postillae Perpetuae in Universa Biblia, was much esteemed by Luther, who acknowledged his indebtedness to it. Hence the jest of his opponents, Si Lyra non lyrasset, Lutherus non saltasset (a notice of Lyra may be seen in Farrar, op. cit., 274–78).

The Reformation brought men's minds back to the Scriptures and opened a new era in Bib. exposition and commentary. It became the custom to expound the Scriptures on Sundays and week-days in all the pulpits of the Protestant churches. "Luther's custom was to expound consecutively in a course of sermons the Old and New Testaments" (Köstlin). The Reformation began at Zürich with a series of discourses by Zwingli on the Gospel of Mt. The same was true of Calvin, Beza, Knox and all associated with them. The production of commentaries or expository homilies was the necessary result.

(1) Luther and Calvin.—As outstanding examples may be mentioned Luther's Commentary on Gal, and the noble commentaries of Calvin. Not all by any means, but very many of the commentaries of Calvin were the fruit of pulpit prelections (e.g. the expositions of Job, the Minor Prophets, Jer, Dnl). Others, as the commentaries on Rom and the Pss (reputed his best), were prepared with great care. Calvin's supreme excellence as a commentator is disputed by no one. From every school and shade of opinion in Christendom could be produced a chorus of testimony to the remarkable gifts of mind and heart displayed in his expositions of Scripture—to his breadth, moderation, fairness and modernness of spirit, in exhibiting the sense of inward genius of Holy Writ. The testimony of Arminius is as striking as any: "I exhort my pupils to peruse Calvin's commentaries . . . for I affirm that he excels beyond comparison in the interpretation of Scripture, and that his commentaries ought to be more highly valued than all that is handed down to us by the library of the Fathers."

(2) Beza, Grotius, etc.—Lutheranism had its distinguished exegetes (Brenz, d. 1572), who wrote able commentaries on the OT, and in both the Calvinistic and Arminian branches of the Reformed church the production of commentaries held a chief place. Beza, Calvin's successor, is acknowledged to have possessed many of the best exegetical qualities which characterized his master. Grotius, in Holland (d. 1645), occupies the foremost place among the expositors in this cent. on the Arminian side. His exegetical works, if not marked by much spirituality, show sagacity and learning, and are enriched by parallels from classical literature. The school of Cocceius (d. 1669) developed the doctrine of the covenants, and revelled in typology. Cocceius wrote commentaries on nearly all the books of Scripture. His pupil Vitranga (d. 1716) gained renown by his expositions of Isa and the Apocalypse.

(3) Later writers.—Partly fostered by the habit of basing commentary on pulpit exposition, the tendency early set in to undue prolixity in the unfolding of the meaning of Scripture. "In the Lutheran church," says Van Oosterzee, "they began to preach on whole books of the Bible; sometimes in a very prolix manner, as, e.g. in the case of the 220 sermons by one Striegnitz, a preacher at Meissen, on the history of Jonah, of which four are devoted to the consideration of the words 'Unto Jonah'" (Practical Theol., 120). The habit spread. The commentaries of Peter Martyr (Swiss Reformer, d. 1562) on Jgs and Rom occupy a folio each; N. Byfield (Puritan, d. 1622) on Col fills a folio; Caryl (Independent, d. 1673) on Job extends to 2 folios; Durham (d. 1658) on Isa 53 consists of 72 sermons; Venema (Holland, d. 1787) on Jer fills 2 quartos, and on the Pss no less than 6 quartos. These are only samples of a large class. H. Hammond's A Paraphrase and Annotations on the NT, from an Arminian Standpoint belong to this period (1675). Another work which long took high rank is M. Poole's elaborate Synopsis Criticorum Bibliorum (5 vols, folio, 1669-76)—a summary of the opinions of 150 Bib. critics; with which must be taken his Eng. Annotations on the Holy Bible, only completed up to Isa 58 at the time of his death (1679). The work was continued by his friends.

(1) Calmet, M. Henry, etc.—The 18th cent. is marked by greater sobriety in exegesis. It is prolific in commentaries, but only a few attain to high distinction. Calmet (d. 1757), a learned Benedictine, on the Roman Catholic side, produced his Commentaire littéral sur tous les livres de l'Ancien et du Nouveau Testament, in 23 quarto vols

4. 18th Century —a work of immense erudition, though now necessarily superseded in its information. On the Protestant side, Matthew Henry's celebrated Exposition of the Old and New Testament (1708-10) easily holds the first place among devotional commentaries for its blending of good sense, quaintness, original and felicitous remark, and genuine insight into the meaning of the sacred writers. It is, of course, not a critical work in the modern acceptation, and often is unduly diffuse. M. Henry's work extends only to the end of Acts; the remaining books were done by various writers after his death (1714). Le Clerc (d. 1736) may be named as precursor of the critical views now obtaining on the composition and authorship of the Pent. His commentaries began with Gen in 1693 and were not completed till 1731. Other commentators of note of Arminian views were Daniel Whitby (d. 1726; converted to Arianism), and, later, Adam Clarke, Wesleyan (1762-1832), whose work extends into the next cent. Clarke's Commentary on the Holy Scriptures (1810-26), still held by many in high esteem, is marred to some extent by eccentricities of opinion.

(2) Patrick, Lowth, Scott.—In the Anglican church the names of chief distinction in this cent. are Bishop Patrick, Bishop Lowth, and later, Thomas Scott. Bishop Patrick, usually classed with the Cambridge Platonists (d. 1707), contributed paraphrases and commentaries on the OT from Gen to Cant, while Bishop Lowth (d. 1787) acquired lasting fame by his Prelections on Heb Poetry, and A New Translation, with Notes on Isaiah. He was among the first to treat the poetical and prophetic writings really as literature. The commentaries of Patrick and Lowth were subsequently combined with those of Whitby and other divines (Arnold, etc) to form a complete Critical Commentary (1809), which went through many editions. The well-known commentary of Thomas Scott (1747-1821), representing a moderate Calvinism, is a solid and "judicious" piece of work, inspired by an earnest, believing spirit, though not presenting any marked originality or brilliance. Brilliance is not the characteristic of many commentators of this age.

(3) Gill, Doddridge.—Two other Eng. writers deserving notice are Dr. John Gill (d. 1771; Calvinistic Baptist), who wrote Expositions on the OT and the NT and a separate Exposition of the Song of Solomon—learned, but ponderous and controversial; and Dr. Philip Doddridge (d. 1751), whose Family Expositor, embracing the entire NT, with a harmony of the Gospels, and paraphrases of the meaning, is marked by excellent judgment, and obtained wide acceptance.

(4) Bengel.—Meanwhile a new period had been preluded in Germany by the appearance in 1742 of the Gnomon Novi Testamenti of J. A. Bengel (d. 1751), a work following upon his critical edition of the NT issued in 1734. Though belonging to the 18th cent., Bengel's critical and expository labors really herald and anticipate the best work in these departments of the 19th cent. His scholarship was exact, his judgment sound, his critical skill remarkable in a field in which he was a pioneer; his notes on the text, though brief, were pregnant with significance, and were informed by a spirit of warm and living piety.

The modern period, to which Bengel in spirit, if not in date, belongs, is marked by great changes in the style and character of commentaries. The critical temper was now strong; great advances had been made in the textual criticism of both OT and NT (see CRITICISM, TEXTUAL); the work of the higher criticism had begun in the OT; in Germany, the spirit of humanism, inherited from Lessing, Herder and Goethe, had found its way into literature; knowledge of the sciences, of oriental civilizations, of other peoples and religions, was constantly on the increase; scholarship was more precise and thorough; a higher ideal of what commentary meant had taken possession of the mind. Learning, too, had enlarged its borders, and books on all subjects poured from the press in such numbers that it was difficult to cope with them. This applies to commentaries as to other departments of theological study. Commentaries in the 19th cent., and in our own, are legion. Only the most prominent landmarks can be noted.

(1) Germany (a) The liberal school.—In Germany, as was to be anticipated, the rise of the critical spirit and the profound influence exercised by it are reflected in most of the commentaries produced in the first half of the cent. On the liberal side, the rationalistic temper is shown in the rejection of miracle, the denial of prediction in prophecy, and the lowering of the idea of inspiration generally. The scholarship, however, is frequently of a very high order. This temper is seen in De Wette (d. 1849), whose commentaries on the NT, written when his views had become more positive, show grace and feeling; in Gesenius (d. 1842), who produced an epoch-making commentary on Isa; in Knobel (d. 1863), pronouncedly rationalistic, but with keen critical sense, as evinced in his commentaries on the Pent and Josh, Eccl, and Isa; in Hupfeld (d. 1866) in his Commentary on the Pss (4 vols); in Hitzig (d. 1875), acute but arbitrary, who wrote on the Pss and most of the Prophets; above all, in Ewald (d. 1875), a master in the interpretation of the poetical and prophetic books, but who commented also on the first three Gospels, on the writings of John, and on Paul's epistles. Ewald's influence is felt in the History of the Jewish Church by Dean Stanley, in England. The Ezegetical Handbook (Kurzgefasstes exegetisches Handbuch) embraced compendious annotations by Knobel, Hitzig, Bertheau (school of Ewald), etc, but also Olshausen (d. 1839; wrote likewise on the NT), on all the books of the OT.

(b) Believing tendency.—On the believing side, from a variety of standpoints, evangelical, critical, mediating, confessional, a multitude of commentaries on the OT and NT were produced. The extremely conservative position in criticism was defended by Hengstenberg (d. 1869; on Pss, Eccl, Ezk, Jn, Rev), by Keil (d. 1888) in the well-known Keil and Delitzsch series (Gen to Est, Jer, Ezk, Dnl, Minor Prophets; also NT commentaries), and by Hävernick (d. 1845; Dnl, Ezk). Delitzsch (d. 1890) wrote valued commentaries on Gen, Job, Pss, Prov, Cant, Eccl, Isa; also on He. After the rise of the Wellhausen school, he considerably modified his views in the newer critical direction. His New Comm. on Gen (1887) shows this change, but, with his other works, is still written in a strongly believing spirit. On the other hand, the critical position (older, not newer) is frankly represented by A. Dillmann (d. 1894) in his commentaries on the books of the Pent and Josh (ET of Genesis, 1897; many also of the above works are tr<sup>d</sup>).

The mediating school, largely penetrated by the influence of Schleiermacher, had many distinguished representatives. Among the most conspicuous may be named Lücke (d. 1855), who wrote on John; Bleek, the OT and NT critical scholar (d. 1859), who has a work on the first three Gospels, and lectures on Eph, Col, Philem, He and Rev (his Comm. on He is the best known), and Tholuck

(d. 1877), whose expositions and commentaries on Pss, Jn, Rom and He with his Comm. on the Sermon on the Mount, are fine pieces of exegetical work.

A special place must be given to two names of high distinction in the present connection. One is J. P. Lange (d. 1884), the projector and editor of the great Bibelwerk (theological and homiletical) in 22 vols, to which he himself contributed the commentaries on Gen to Nu, Hag, Zec, Mal, Mt, Mk, Jn, Rom, Rev, with introductions and homiletic hints. The other is H. A. W. Meyer (d. 1873), whose Critical and Exegetical Comm. on the NT from Mt to Phil (the remaining books being done by other scholars, Lünemann, Huther, etc) is an essential part of every NT scholar's equipment.

With the more positive and confessional theologians may be ranked E. R. Stier (d. 1862), whose Words of the Lord Jesus (ET in 8 vols; Bib., mystical, tendency to prolixity), with commentaries on 70 selected Pss, Prov, 2d Isa, Eph, He, Jas and Jude, found much acceptance. A. von Harless (d. 1879) wrote a Comm. on Eph, praised by Tholuck as one of the finest extant. Philippi (d. 1882), of Jewish extraction, best known by his Comm. on Rom, was strictly Lutheran. One of the ablest of the Lutheran Confessionalists was Luthardt (d. 1892), whose works include a Comm. on St. John's Gospel. Ebrard (d. 1887), as stoutly confessional on the Reformed side, has an esteemed Comm. on He. An eminent continental theologian who cannot be overlooked is the Swiss F. L. Godet (d. 1900), whose admirable Comm. on St. John's Gospel, and commentaries on Rom and Cor are highly appreciated.

(2) Britain and America.—Meanwhile the English-speaking countries were pursuing their own paths in the production of commentaries, either in continuing their old traditions, or in striking out on new lines, under the foreign influences which, from the beginning of the cent., had begun to play upon them. In England Bishop Blomfield (d. 1857) published Lectures on Jn and Acts. In the United States there appeared from the pen of Dr. J. A. Alexander, of Princeton (d. 1860), a noteworthy Comm. on Isa, fully abreast of the modern learning, but staunchly conservative; also a Comm. on Pss. From the same seminary proceeded the massive commentaries of Dr. Charles Hodge (Calvinistic) on Rom, Eph and Cor. Adapted for popular use and greatly in demand for Sunday-school purposes were the Notes, Critical, Explanatory and Practical of Albert Barnes (d. 1871; New School Presbyterian). These Notes, the fruit of the use of the early morning hours in a busy pastoral life, covered the whole of the NT, with several books of the OT (Job, Pss, Isa, Dnl). Sensible and informative, rather than original or profound, they proved helpful to many. Over 1,000,000 copies are stated to have been sold. Of similar aim, though less widely known, were the Notes of Professor M. W. Jacobus (d. 1876; on the NT, Gen and Ex).

A new era was opened in critical commentary in England by the publication of the Gr Testament (1849-61) of Dean Alford (d. 1871), followed by his NT for Eng. Readers (1868). Here was presented a thoroughly critical treatment of the texts, with a full display of the critical apparatus, and notes philological and exegetical, accompanied by learned and lucid introductions, on all the books of the NT. About the same time appeared the solid, if more theological and homiletical, commentaries of the Scottish scholar, J. Eadie (d. 1876), on Gal, Eph, Phil, 1 and 2 Thess. Anglican scholarship produced its ripest fruits in this line in the classical Critical and Grammatical Comms. of Bishop Ellicott (d. 1905) on Gal, Eph, Phil, Col, Philem, Thess, Pastoral Epistles, and the yet more remarkable series of commentaries of Bishop J. B. Lightfoot (d. 1889), massive in learning, and wider in outlook than Ellicott's, on Gal, Phil, Col and Philem. A large part of the value of Lightfoot's works consists in the special essays or dissertations on important subjects embodied in them (e.g. "St. Paul and the Three", "The Christian Ministry", "The Colossian Heresy," etc). With these names should be associated that of Bishop Westcott, Dr. Lightfoot's successor in the see of Durham (d. 1901), whose commentaries on the Gospel and Epistles of St. John, and on He, take a place among the foremost. Bishop Moule, who, in turn, succeeded Dr. Westcott, has also written commentaries, simpler in character, on Rom, Eph, Phil and Col, in the Cambridge Bible Series, and on Rom in the Expositor's Bible. In OT exposition mention should be made of Bishop Perowne's valuable work on the Book of Psalms (2d ed, revised, 1870), with his contributions to the Cambridge Bible (see below).

The critical and theological liberalism of Germany has made its influence felt in England in the rise of a Broad Church party, the best products of which in commentary were Dean Stanley's (d. 1881) graphic and interesting Comm. on 1 and 2 Cor (1855) and Dr. B. Jowett's Epistles of St. Paul to the Thess, Gal, and Rom, with Critical Notes and Dissertations (1855). The new spirit culminated in the appearance of the famous Essays and Reviews (1860), and in the works of Bishop Colenso on the Pent and Josh (1862-79). Bishop Colenso had already published a tr of Rom, with commentary (1861).

Besides works by individual authors, there appeared during this period several general commentaries, to the production of which many writers contributed. The following may be mentioned. The Speaker's Comm. (10 vols, 1871-82), under the general editorship of Canon F. C. Cook (d. 1889), was called forth by the agitation over Bishop Colenso. Dr. Cook himself wrote introductions to Ex, Pss and Acts, and contributed the entire commentaries on Job, Hab, Mk, Luke, 1 Pet, with parts of commentaries on Ex, Pss and Mt. The work is of unequal value. A serviceable series is the Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges (1877 ff), edited by Bishop Perowne, with Smaller Cambridge Bible for Schools, and Cambridge Gr Test. for Schools and Colleges (still in process). Dr. Perowne (d. 1904) himself contributed to the first-named the commentaries on Ob, Jon, Hag, Zec, Mal and Gal. Many valuable contributions appear in this series, e.g. A. F. Kirkpatrick on 1 and 2 S and Pss, A. B. Davidson on Job and Ezk, Driver on Dnl, G. G. Findlay on Thess, etc. Next, under the editorship of Bishop Ellicott, were produced (1877-84) A NT Comm. for Eng. Readers (3 vols), and An OT Comm. for Eng. Readers (5 vols), which contained some valuable work (Gen by R. Payne Smith, Ex by Canon G. Rawlinson, etc). Akin to this in character was the Popular Comm. on the NT (4 vols, 1879-83), edited by Dr. W. Schaff. This embraced, with other excellent matter, commentaries on Thess by Dr. Marcus Dods, and on 1 and 2 Pet by Dr. S. D. F. Salmond. The Pulpit Comm. (49 vols, 1880 ff), edited by J. S. Exell and Canon H. D. M. Spence, has expositions by good scholars, and an abundance of homiletical material by a great variety of authors. The series of Handbooks for Bible Classes (T. & T. Clark, Edinburgh) has a number of valuable commentaries, e.g. that of Dr. A. B. Davidson on He.

In the most recent period the conspicuous feature has been the production of commentaries in series or by individual writer embodying the results of an advanced OT criticism—in less degree of a radical NT criticism.

(1) Germany.—In Germany, in addition to the Kurzgefasstes exegetisches Handbuch, of older standing (see above), to which Dillmann contributed, may be mentioned Marti's Kurzer Hand-Commentar zum AT (1897 ff) and Nowack's Handkommentar zum AT; also Strack and Zöckler's Kurzgefasster Kommentar (OT and NT; critical, but moderate). Marti contributes to his Hand-Commentar the vols on Isa, Dnl and the Minor Prophets; Nowack contributes to his Handkommentar the vols on Jgs and Ruth, 1 and 2 S and the Minor Prophets (of special importance in Nowack's series are the vols on Gen by H. Gunkel, and on Dt and Josh by C. Steuernagel); Strack writes in his own work the vols on Gen to Nu (Oettli contributes Dt, Josh and Jgs). Much more conservative in spirit are the commentaries of H. C. von Orelli (Basel) on Isa, Jer, Ezk and the Minor Prophets. In the NT, Meyer's Commentary has been "revised" by later writers, many of them (J. Weiss, W. Bousset, etc) of much more advanced tendency than the original author.

(2) Britain and America.—In Britain and America like currents are observable. Professor T. K. Cheyne, who wrote a helpful commentary on the Prophecies of Isa (1880-81), and subsequently commentaries on Mic and Hos (Cambridge Bible), Jer (Pulpit Comm.), and on The Book of Psalms (1884), has become more and more extreme in his opinions. Of works in series the most important is The International Critical Commentary, edited by Drs. Driver and Plummer in England, and Dr. C. A. Briggs in the United States, of which 16 vols in the OT and the NT have already appeared. It need not be said that the commentaries in this series are always scholarly and able; those on the OT are, however, all built on the Wellhausen foundations (see CRITICISM OF THE BIBLE, III). Dr. Driver himself writes on Dt; Dr. J. Skinner, on Gen; Dr. G. F. Moore, on Jgs; Dr. H. P. Smith, on 1 and 2 S; Dr. Briggs, on Pss; Dr. Toy, on Prov; Dr. W. R. Harper (d. 1906), on Am and Hos; while Mt in the NT is covered by W. C. Allen, Lk by Dr. Plummer, Rom by Drs. Sanday and Headlam, etc. A similar series is the Westminster Comm., recently commenced, to which Dr. Driver contributes the vol on Gen (1904; 7th ed, 1909). Yet another recent popular series is The Century Bible, to which again leading critical scholars lend their aid (Dr. W. H. Bennett on Gen; also on "General Epistles"; Dr. A. R. S. Kennedy on 1 and 2 S; Dr. Skinner on 1 and 2 K; Dr. A. S. Peake on Job; also on He; Dr. Driver on a group of the Minor Prophets, etc). A well-planned one-vol Comm. on the Holy Bible, by various writers, has recently been edited by J. R. Dummelow (Cambridge). It is prefaced by a general Introduction, with a large number of arts. on the principal subjects with which a reader of the Bible will desire to be acquainted.

It need only be added that very many of the foreign works mentioned above (not simply those specially noted) are now accessible in Eng. trs.

LITERATURE.—Works and arts. specially devoted to commentaries are not numerous. Dr. S. Davidson has an art. "Commentary" in Kitto's Bib. Enc. Vol I. See also F. W. Farrar's Hist of Interpretation (Hampton Lects for 1885). C. H. Spurgeon's popular talks on Commenting and Commentaries are accompanied by extensive lists of Commentaries on all parts of the Bible (severely exclusive of works deemed dangerous). Lists of commentaries on the Bible as a whole, on the OT and NT separately, and on the several books, may be seen in most good works on Introduction, or in prolegomena to commentaries on the different books; e.g. in the general Introduction prefixed to Lange's Comm. on Genesis; also in the lengthy sections on Jewish, Gr. Lat and Protestant commentators, and again in the "Index of the More Important Expository Works on the Bks of the OT." In Bleek's Introduction to the OT, very full information is given up to the author's date. Full bibliographies of modern books, including commentaries on the OT, are furnished in Dr. Driver's Introduction. Similar lists are given in other works regarding the NT.

For the writers of the commentaries on the special books in the above-noted German and Eng. series, lists may generally be seen attached to each vol. of the series.

LITERATURE

The following outline alludes to the leading Jewish commentators and their works in chronological order. However widely the principles which guided the various Jewish schools of exegesis, or the individual commentators, differ from those of the modern school, the latter will find a certain suggestiveness in the former's interpretation which well merits attention.

Philo Judaeus: A Hellenistic Jew of Alexandria, Egypt. Born about 20 BC; died after 40 AD. By his allegorical method of exegesis (a

1. Philo method he learned from the Stoics), Philo exercised a far-reaching influence not only on Jewish thought, but even more so on the Christian church. We have but to mention his influence on Origen and other Alexandrian Christian writers. His purpose in employing his allegorical method was, mainly, to reconcile Gr philosophy with the OT. See PHILO JUDAEUS.

Josephus cannot be called a Bible commentator in the proper sense of the term. See JOSEPHUS.

Targūm (pl. Targūmim): The Aram. tr of the OT. Lit. the word designates a tr in general; its use, however, has been restricted to the Aram. version of the OT, as contrasted with the Heb text which was called mikrā. The

2. Targum Tg includes all the books of the OT excepting Dnl and Ezr-Neh, which are written in part in Aram. Its inception dates back to the time of the Second Temple, and it is considered a first approach to a commentary before the time of Jesus. For the Tg is not a mere tr, but rather a combination of a tr with a commentary, resulting in a paraphrase, or an interpretative tr—having its origin in exegesis. The language of this paraphrase is the vernacular tongue of Syria, which began to reassert itself throughout Pal as the language of common intercourse and trade, as soon as a familiar knowledge of the Heb tongue came to be lost. The Targūmim are:

TO THE PENTATEUCH

- (1) Targūm 'Onkelōs or Bab Tg (the accepted and official);
- (2) Targūm yerūshalmī or Palestinian Tg ("Pseudo-Jonathan"; aside from this [complete] Tg, there are fragments of the Palestinian Tg termed "Fragment Targūm").

TO THE PROPHETS

- (1) Targūm Jonathan ben Uzziel (being the official one; originated in Pal and was then adapted to the vernacular of Babylonia);
  - (2) A Palestinian Targūm, called Targūm yerūshalmī (Palestinian in origin; ed. Lagarde, "Prophetæ Chaldaice").
- Other Targūmim (not officially recognized): (1) To the Psalms and Job; (2) to Proverbs; (3) to the Five Rolls; (4) to Chronicles—all Palestinian. See TARGUM.

Midhrāsh: Apparently the practice of commenting upon and explaining the meaning of the Scriptures originated in the synagogues (in the stand the language in which it was read. Such commentaries, however, were oral and extempore; they were not until much later crystallized into a definite form. When they assumed a definite and, still later, written shape, the name Midhrāsh (meaning "investigation," "interpretation," from dārash, "to investigate" a scriptural passage) was given. The word occurs in 2 Ch 13 22 where the RV translates "commentary." From this fact some have drawn the inference that such Midhrāshim were recognized and extant before the time of the Chronicler. They are: Midhrāsh Rabbā' on the Pent and the Five Rolls (the one on Gen occupies a first position among the various exegetical Midhrāshim, both on account of its age and importance). Next comes the one on Lam. (Zunz pointed out that the Midhrāsh Rabbā' consists of ten entirely different Midhrāshim.) On the same ten books there is a similar collection, called ha-Midhrāsh ha-gādhōl (the "Great Midrash"), being a collection of quotations from a good many works including the Midhrāsh Rabbā'. Other Midhrāshim are: The Midhrāsh Tanhūmā' on the Pentateuch; the M'khilā' on Exodus (this has been [Leipzig, 1909] tr'd into German by Winter and Wuensche; the latter also published, under the main title Bibliotheca Rabbinica, a collection of the old Midhrāshim in a German tr with introductions and notes). Further, Šiphra' on Lev; Šiphre' on Nu and Dt; p'sikṭā', which comments on sections taken from the entire range of Scriptures for various festivals. There are also extant separate Midhrāshim on the Pss, Prov, etc.

In this connection we have yet to mention the Yalkuṭ Shim'ōnī, a haggadic compilation attributed to the 11th or, according to Zunz, the 13th cent. The Yalkuṭ extends over the whole of the OT and is arranged according to the sequence of those portions of the Bible to which reference is made. Further, the Yalkuṭ ha-Makirī, a work similar in contents to the Yalkuṭ Shim'ōnī, ed. Greenup. See COMMENTARIES; MIDRASH.

Talmud (Talmūd): This term is used here to designate the entire body of literature exclusive of the Midhrāsh.

4. Talmud Ample exegetical material abounds in the Talm as it does in the Midhrāshim. The critical notes on the Bible by some Talmudists are very characteristic of their intellectual temper. Some of them were extremely radical, and expressed freely their opinions on important problems of Bible criticism, such as on the integrity of the text, on doubtful authorship, etc. An Amora' of the 3d cent. AD held the opinion that the story of Job is purely fictitious, both as to the name of the hero and as to his fate. The Talmudists also generalized, and set up critical canons. The "Bārāithā'" of the Thirty-two Rules" is the oldest work on Bib. hermeneutics (Philo's hermeneutical rules being rather fantastic), and contains exegetical notices valid to this very day. Hermeneutics, of course, is not exegesis proper, but the theory of exegesis; one results from the other, however. This Bārāithā' calls attention, for instance, to the fact that words occur in the OT in an abbreviated form—a thing now generally accepted. See TALMUD.

Karaites: "Followers of the Bible." They are sometimes referred to as the "Protestants of the Jews," professing to follow the OT

5. Karaites to the exclusion of the rabbinical tradition. The founder of this Jewish sect was a Bab Jew in the 8th cent., Anan ben David, by name; hence they were first called Ananites. The principal Karaite commentators of the 9th, 10th and 11th cents. are: Benjamin al-Nahawendi (he was the first to use the term "Karaites," "Ba'ālē Mikrā'"), Solomon ben Jeroham, Sahl ibn Mazliah, Yusuf al-Basir, Yafith ibn Ali (considered the greatest of this period), and Abu al-Faraj Harun. Of a later date we will mention Aaron ben Joseph and Aaron ben Elijah (14th cent.).

The struggle between the Rabbinites and the Karaites undoubtedly gave the impetus to the great exegetical activity among the Jews in Arab-speaking countries during the 10th and 11th cents. The extant fragments of Saadia's commentary on the Pent (not less than his polemical writings proper) are full of polemics against the Karaite interpretation. And the same circumstance aroused Karaites to like efforts.

Middle Ages: In the old Midhrāshim as well as elsewhere the consciousness of a simple meaning of a text was never entirely lost. The 6. Middle Ages principal tendencies in exegesis were four; these were afterward designated by the acrostic "PaRDeS": i.e. P'shat (or the simple philological explanation of words); Remez (or the allegorical); D'rash (or the ethico-homiletical); and Sōdh (or the mystical). Naturally enough this division could never be strictly carried out; hence variations and combinations are to be found.

Saadia ben Joseph (892–942), the severest antagonist of the Karaites, tr<sup>d</sup> the OT into Arab. with notes. The parts published are: Pent, Isa, Prov and Job.

Moses ha-Darshān (the Preacher) of Narbonne, France, and Tobiah ben Eliezer in Castoria, Bulgaria (11th cent.), are the most prominent representatives of midrashic-symbolic Bible exegesis. The former's work is known only by quotations, and contained Christian theological conceptions; the latter is the author of "Lekah Tōbh" or "P'sik-tā' Zūrtā'" on the Pent and the five M'ghillōth.

Rashi (Solomon ben Isaac, of Troyes; born 1040, died 1105) wrote a very popular commentary, which extends over the whole of the OT, with the exception of Ch, Ezr-Neh, and the last part of Job. He strives for the P'shat, i.e. for a sober, natural and rational interpretation of the Bible. His is still a commentary both for the boy and the man among the Jews. Christian exegetes of the Middle Ages as well as of more modern times made use of his Bible commentary. Nicolas de Lyra (see COMMENTARIES) followed Rashi closely; and it is a known fact that Luther's tr of the Bible is dependent upon Nicolas de Lyra. Rashi's commentary has called forth numerous supercommentaries.

An independent and important exegete was Joseph Karā' (about 1100). He edited and partly completed Rashi's commentary, particularly the part on the Pent.

Abraham ibn Ezra's (1092–1168) commentary on the Pent, like Rashi's commentaries, has produced many supercommentaries. His is very scholarly. He was the first to maintain that Isa contains the work of two authors; and his doubts respecting the authenticity of the Pent were noticed by Spinoza.

The grammarians and the lexicographers were not merely exegetical expounders of words, but many of them were likewise authors of actual commentaries. Such were the Kimhīs, Joseph (father), Moses and David (his sons); esp. the latter. The Kimhīs were the most brilliant contributors to Bible exegesis and Heb philology (like Ibn Ezra) in mediaeval times.

Maimonides (1135–1204): Philo employed his allegorical method for the purpose of bringing about a reconciliation of Plato with the OT. Maimonides had something similar in view. To him Aristotle was the representative of natural knowledge and the Bible of supernatural—and he sought for a reconciliation between the two in his religious philosophy. Exegesis proper was the one field, however, to which this great genius made no contribution of first-class importance.

The Maimonists, those exegetes of a philosophical turn, are: Joseph ibn Aknin, Samuel ibn Tibbon, his son Moses, and his son-in-law, Jacob ben Abba Mari Anatolio, whose Malmadh ha-Talmidhim is the most important work of philosophical exegesis of the period.

Joseph ibn Kaspi, chiefly known as a philosopher of the Maimonist type, deserves attention. Ibn Kaspi is an exegete of the first quality. His exposition of Isa 53 might be the work of the most modern scholar. He refers the prophecy to Israel, not to an individual, and in this his theory is far superior to that of some other famous Jewish expositors who interpret the chapter as referring to Hezekiah.

Through the philosophical homily, which began to be used after the death of Maimonides, Aristotle was popularized from the pulpit. The pulpit changed to a chair of philosophy. Aristotle's concepts—as Matter and Form, the Four Causes, Possibility and Reality—were then something ordinary in the sermon, and were very popular.

The principal commentators with a Kabbalistic tendency are: Nahmanides (1194–1270?) whose great work is his commentary on the Pentateuch; Immanuel of Rome (1270?–1330?) who does, however, not disregard the lit. meaning of the Scriptures; Bahya ben Asher (d. 1340) who formulated the four methods of exegesis of "PaRDeS" referred to above; he took Nahmanides as his model; many supercommentaries were written on his commentary on the Pent; and Gersonides (1288–1334), a maternal grandson of Nahmanides, who sees symbols in many Bib. passages; on account of some of his heretical ideas expressed in his philosophy, some rabbis forbade the study of his commentaries.

We must not fail to make mention of the Zōhar (the "Bible of the Kabbalists"), the book of all others in the Middle Ages that dominated the thinking and feeling of the Jews for almost 500 years, and which was in favor with many Christian scholars. This work is pseudepigraphic, written partly in Aram. and partly in Heb. It first appeared in Spain in the 13th cent., and was made known through Moses de Leon, to whom many historians attribute it.

Mention must also be made of Isaac Arama (1430–94), whose ʿĀkedhāh, his commentary on the Pent (homiletical in style), was the standard book for the Jewish pulpit for cents., much esteemed by the Christian world, and is still much read by the Jews, esp. in Russia and Poland.

Modern Times: Isaac Abravanel (or Abarbanel; 1437–1508): A statesman and scholar who came nearest to the modern idea of a Bible

7. Modern Times commentator by considering not only the literary elements of the Bible but the political and social life of the people as well. He wrote a general introduction to each book of the Bible, setting forth its character; and he was the first to make use of Christian commentaries which he quotes without the least prejudice. Moses Alshech (second half of 16th cent.) wrote commentaries, all of which are of a homiletical character. In the main the Jewish exegesis of the 16th and 17th cents. branched out into homiletics.

We will pass over the critical annotations connected with the various editions of the Heb Bible, based upon the comparison of MSS, on grammatical and Massoretic studies, etc., such as those of Elijah Levita, Jacob ben Hayyim of Tunis (afterward a convert to Christianity), etc.

The "Bi'urists" ("Commentators"): A school of exegetes which had its origin with Mendelssohn's

8. The (1729–86) lit. German tr of the Bible, at a time when Christian Bib. studies "Bi'urists" of a modern nature had made some progress, and under whose influence the Bi'urists wrote. They are: Dubno, Wessely, Jaroslav, H. Homberg, J. Euchel, etc. They laid a foundation for a critico-historical study of the Bible among modern Jews. It bore its fruit in the 19th cent. in the writings of Philippon, Munk, Fuerst, etc. The same cent. produced Zunz's (1794-1886) Gottesdienstlichen Vortraege der Juden, the book of "Jewish science." It also produced three Jewish exegetes, Luzzatto in Italy, Malbim and Ehrlich in Russia (the latter since 1878 residing in New York); he published, in Heb., a commentary on the OT, entitled Mikrā' ki-P'shūtāh (Berlin, 1899-1901, 3 vols), and, in German, Randglossen z. hebr. Bibel, two scholarly works written from the conservative standpoint (Leipzig, 1908-). Malbim was highly esteemed by the Christian commentators Franz Delitzsch and Muehlau, who studied under him. Others are Joseph Halévy, a French Jew, a most original Bible investigator, and D. Hoffmann (the last two named are adversaries of "higher criticism") and D. H. Mueller. M. Heilprin wrote a collection of Bibelkritische Notizen (Baltimore, 1893), containing comparisons of various passages of the Bible, and The Historical Poetry of the Ancient Hebrews (N.Y., 1879-80, 2 vols), and the American rabbi B. Szold, a Commentary on Job (Baltimore, 1886), written in classic Heb., and with accurate scholarship and in which full account is taken of the work of the Massorites. A new Heb commentary on the whole of the OT has been since 1903 in progress under the editorship of A. Kahana. This is the first attempt since Mendelssohn's Bi'ur to approach the Bible from the Jewish side with the latest philological and archaeological equipment. Among the authors are Kahana on Genesis and Jonah, Krauss on Isaiah, Chajes on Psalms and Amos, Wynkoop on Hosea and Joel, and Lambert on Daniel. This attempt well deserves attention and commendation.

There is still to be mentioned the work of M. M. Kalisch (1828-85), whose special object was to write a full and critical comm. on the OT. Of his Historical and Critical Comm. on the OT, with a New Tr., only the following parts were published: Exodus, 1855; Genesis, 1858; Leviticus (pts 1-2), 1867-72. They contain a résumé of all that Jewish and Christian learning had accumulated on the subject up to the dates of their publication. In his Lev he anticipated Wellhausen to a large extent.

We conclude with some names of the liberals: Geiger (whose Urschrift is extremely radical), Graetz, the great Jewish historian, and Kohler (president of the Hebrew Union College, Cincinnati, O.) whose Der Segen Jacobs is one of the earliest essays of "higher criticism" written by a Jew.

LITERATURE.—Steinschneider, Jewish Literature, London, 1857; Zunz, Gottesdienstlichen Vortraege der Juden, 2d ed., Frankfurt a. M., 1892; Jew Enc. (arts. by Bacher and Ginzberg); Catholic Enc. (arts. "Commentaries"); Rosenau, Jewish Biblical Commentaries, Baltimore, 1906 (popular); Winter-Wuenschel, Geschichte der Juedischen Literatur, Leipzig, 1892-95, 3 vols (the best existing anthology of Jewish literature in a modern language; it contains very valuable introductions); Wogue, Histoire de la Bible et l'exegèse biblique jusqu'à nos jours, Paris, 1881.

COMMENTARY, kom'en-ta-ri (מדרש, midhrāsh, "an investigation," from מדרש, dārash, "to search," "inquire," "explore"; AV "story"): "The c. of the prophet Iddo" (2 Ch 13 22), "the c. of the book of the kings" (24 27). In these passages the word is not used exactly in its modern sense. The Heb term means "an imaginative development of a thought or theme suggested by Scripture, esp. a didactic or homiletic exposition, or an edifying religious story" (Driver, LOT<sup>6</sup>, 497). In the commentaries (Midhrāshim) mentioned by the Chronicler as among his sources, the story of Abijah's reign was presumably related and elaborated with a view to moral instruction rather than historic accuracy. M. O. EVANS

COMMERCE, kom'ers (ἐμπορία, emporía):

1. OT Times.—There were forces in early Heb life not favorable to the development of commerce.

Intercourse with foreigners was not encouraged by Israel's social and religious customs. From the days of Commerce the appearance of the Hebrews in Canaan, however, some commercial contact with the peoples around was inevitable. There were ancient trade routes between the East and the West, as well as between Egypt and the Mesopotamian valley. Pal lay as a bridge between these objective points. There were doubtless traveling merchants from very remote times, interchanging commodities of other lands for those of Pal. Some of the Heb words for "trading" and "merchant" indicate this (cf שֹׁחֵר, šāḥar, "to travel," רָכַח, rākhal, "to go about"). In the nomadic period, the people were necessarily dependent upon overland commerce for at least a part of their food supply, such as grain, and doubtless for articles of clothing, too. Frequent local famines would stimulate such trade. Companies or caravans carrying on this overland commerce are seen in Gen 37 25.28, "Ishmaelites" and "Midianites, merchantmen," on their way to Egypt, with spices, balm and myrrh. Jacob caused his sons to take certain products to Egypt as a present with money to Joseph in return for grain: balsam, spices, honey, myrrh, nuts, almonds (Gen 43 11 f.). The presence of a "Bab mantle" among the spoils of Ai (Josh 7 21) indicates commerce between Canaan and the East.

While there are slight indications of a possible sea trade as early as the days of the Judges (Jgs 5 17; cf Gen 49 13), we must wait till the days of the monarchy of David and esp. Solomon for the commerce of ships. Land traffic was of course continued and expanded (1 K 10 15.23.29; 2 Ch 1 16). Sea trade at this time made large strides forward. The Philis were earlier in possession of the coast. Friendship with Hiram king of Tyre gave Solomon additional advantages seaward (1 K 5; 9 26; 10 19-29; 2 Ch 8 17; 9 14), since the Phoenicians were preëminently the Mediterranean traders among all the people of Pal. Later, commerce declined, but Jehoshaphat attempted to revive it (1 K 22 48; 2 Ch 20 36), but without success. Tyre and Sidon as great commercial centers, however, long impressed the life of Israel (Isa 23; Ezk 26-27). Later, in the Maccabean period, Simon acquired Joppa as a Jewish port (1 Macc 14 5), and so extended Mediterranean commerce.

During the peaceful reign of Solomon, there came, with internal improvements and foreign friendships, a stimulus to traffic with Egypt and the Far East over the ancient trade routes as well as with Phoenicia on the northwest. He greatly added to his wealth through tariffs levied upon merchantmen (1 K 10 15). Trade with Syria in the days of Omri and Ahab is indicated by the permission Benhadad gave to Israelites to open streets, or trading quarters, in Damascus, as Syrians had in Samaria (1 K 20 34). The prophets disclose repeatedly the results of foreign commerce upon the people in the days of Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, and of Jeroboam II, under whom great material prosperity was attained, followed by simple luxury (Isa 2 6.7.16; Hos 12 1.7.8; Am 6 3-6). The people in their greed of gain could not observe Sabbaths and feast days (Am 8 5); cf Sabbath trading and its punishment in the days of the restoration (Neh 13 15-22). "Canaanite" became the nickname for traffickers (Zec 14 21; cf Isa 23 8).

II. NT Times.—After the conquests of Alexander 333 BC, trade between East and West was greatly stimulated. Colonies of Jews for trade purposes had been established in Egypt and elsewhere. The dispersion of the Jews throughout the Gr and Rom world added to their interest in commerce. The Mediterranean Sea, as a great Rom lake, under Rom protection, became alive with commercial fleets. The Sea of Galilee with its enormous fish industry became the center of a large trading interest to all parts. The toll collected in Galilee must have been considerable. Matthew was called from his collectorship to discipleship (Mt 9 9); Zaccheus and other publicans became rich collecting taxes from large commercial interests like that of balsam. Jesus frequently used the commerce of the day as illustration (Mt 13 45; 25 14-30). Along the Palestinian coast there were several ports where ships touched: Lydda, Joppa, Caesarea; and further north Ptolemais, Tyre, Sidon and Antioch (port Seleucia).

The apostle Paul made use of ships touching at points on the coast of Asia Minor, and the islands along the coast, and also doing coast trade with Greece, Italy and Spain, to carry on his missionary enterprises (Acts 13 4-13; 16 11 f; 18 18; 20 13-16; 21 1-8; 27 1-44; 28 1-14). The rapidity with which the gospel spread throughout the Rom world in the 1st cent. was due no little to the use of the great Rom highways, built partly as trade routes; as well as to the constant going to and fro of tradesmen of all sorts; some of whom like Aquila and Priscilla (Acts 18 2.18.26), Lydia, (16 14.40) and Paul himself (who was a traveling tent-maker) were active in disseminating the new faith among the Gentiles. In Jas 4 13 we have a good representation of the life of a large number of Jews of this period, who would "go into such a city, and continue there a year, and buy and sell, and get gain" (AV). See also TRADE.

COMMIT, kō-mit': Used in two senses:

(1) "To give in charge" or "entrust": sīm, "to put" (Job 6 8); gālal, "to roll" (Ps 37 5; Prov 16 3); pākadh, "to give in charge" (Ps 31 5 AV; cf Lk 23 46); ūthēmi, "committed to us [RVm "placed in us"] the word of reconciliation" (2 Cor 5 19); parathēke, "that which I have committed unto him" (2 Tim 1 12; RVm "that which he hath committed unto me," Gr "my deposit"); "that which is committed unto thee" (1 Tim 6 20, Gr "the deposit"); "that good thing," etc (2 Tim 1 14, Gr "the good deposit").

(2) "To do or practise [evil]": prāssō, "commit such things" (Rom 1 32, RV "practise"; cf 2 2). In 1 Jn 3 4.8 "doeth sin" (poiēō, AV "committeth sin") shows that it is not committing a single sin that is in view, but sinful practice.

W. L. WALKER

COMMODIOUS, kō-mō'di-us (ἀνεύθετος, aneuthetos, "not well placed"): The word occurs only in Acts 27 12. "As regards wintering, the place was certainly 'not commodious,' but as regards shelter from some winds (including N.W.), it was a good anchorage" (CH, XXIII, 639).

COMMON, kom'un: κοινός, koinós, in the classics, and primarily in the NT, means what is public, general, universal, as contrasted with idios, what is peculiar, individual, not shared with others. Thus, "common faith" (Tit 1 4), "common salvation" (Jude ver 3), refer to that in which the experience of all Christians unites and is identical: "common," because there is but one faith and one salvation (Eph 4 4-6). From this comes the derived meaning of what is ordinary and, therefore, to be disesteemed, as contrasted with what pertains to a class, and to be prized, because rare. This naturally coincides with OT exclusivism, particularly and separation. Its religion was that of a separated people, with a separated class as its ministers, and with minute directions as to distinctions of meat, drink, times, places, rites, vessels, etc. Whatever was common or ordinary, it avoided. The NT, on the other hand, with its universalism of scope, and its spirituality of sphere, rose above all such externals. The salvation which it brought was directed to the redemption of Nature, as well as of man, sanctifying the creature, and pervading all parts of man's being and all relations of life. The antithesis is forcibly illustrated in Acts 10 14 f, where Peter says: "I have never eaten anything that is c. and unclean," and the reply is: "What God hath cleansed, make not thou c." H. E. JACOBS

COMMONWEALTH, kom'un-welth (πολιτεία, politeia): Spoken of the theocracy (Eph 2 12). The same word is rendered "freedom," AV; "citizenship" RV. Also in the sense of commonwealth in the Apoc (2 Macc 4 11; 8 17; 13 14); in the sense of citizenship (3 Macc 3 21.23). See CITIZENSHIP.

COMMUNE, kō-mūn', COMMUNICATE, kō-mūn'ī-kāt, COMMUNICATION, kō-mū-ni-kā'shun: To commune is to converse confidentially and sympathetically. It is represented in both Heb and Gr by several words lit. signifying to speak (cf Lk 6 11, διαλαλέω, dialalēō; also Lk 22 4; Acts 24 26, διηκέω, homilēō). To communicate is to impart something to another, so that it becomes common to giver and receiver. In 1 Tim 6 18, "willing to communicate" (RVm "sympathize"), represents a single word κοινωνικὸς, koinōnikós, and refers to the habit of sharing with others either sympathy or property. RV gives "companionships" for homilatai in 1 Cor 15 33 (AV "communications"). See also COMMUNION.

COMMUNION, kō-mūn'yun (FELLOWSHIP): The terms "communion" and "fellowship" of the Eng. Bible are varying trs of the words κοινωνία, koinōnía, and κοινωνέω, koinōnēō, or their cognates. They designate acts of fellowship observed among the early Christians or express the unique sense of unity and fellowship of which these acts were the outward expression. The several passages in which these terms are used fall into two groups: those in which they refer to acts of fellowship, and those in which they refer to fellowship as experienced.

I. Acts of Fellowship.—The acts of fellowship mentioned in the NT are of four kinds.

Our information concerning the nature of the fellowship involved in the observance of this sacrament is confined to the single notice in 1 Cor 10 16.17, "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not a communion of the body of Christ?" Owing to the presence of the material elements in the sacrament there is a temptation to limit the word for communion to the sense of partaking. This, however, does not entirely satisfy the requirements of the context. The full significance of the term is to be sought in the light of the argument of the whole section (vs 14-22).

Paul is making a protest against Christians participating in idolatrous feasts on the ground that such feasts are really celebrated in honor of the demons associated with the idols, and that those who participate in them come into fellowship with demons. As a proof of this point the apostle cites the Lord's Supper with which his readers are familiar. By partaking of the cup and the bread the communicants are linked together in unity: "We, who are many, are one bread, one body: for we all partake of the one bread." Thus the communion of the elements is a real communion of the worshippers one with another and with Christ. Unless the communion be understood in this spiritual sense Paul's illustration falls short of the mark. See EUCHARIST.

The term for fellowship as used in Acts 2 42 is by some interpreted in this sense: "They continued stedfastly in the apostles' teaching and fellowship, in the breaking of bread and the prayers." The fact that the four terms are used in pairs

2. Communism and that three of them refer to specific acts observed by the company of believers suggests that the term for fellowship also refers to some definite act similar to the others. It is very plausible to refer this to the community of goods described in the verses immediately following (see COMMUNITY OF GOODS). The author might, however, with equal propriety have regarded the interchange of spiritual experiences as an act of worship in the same class with "the breaking of bread and the prayers."

Christian fellowship found a natural mode of expression in almsgiving. This is enjoined as a duty in Rom 12 13; 1 Tim 6 18; He 13 16. An example of such giving is the great collection raised among the gentile converts for the poor saints of Jerus (Rom 15 26; 2 Cor 8 4; 9 13). To this collection St. Paul attached so much importance as a witness to the spirit of fellowship which the gospel inspires in all hearts alike, whether Jew or Gentile, that he desired even at the peril of his life to deliver it with his own hand. See COLLECTION.

A form of fellowship closely related to almsgiving was that of formal aid or coöperation in Christian work, such as the aid given to St. Paul by the Philippians (Phil 1 5). A unique form of this coöperation is the formal endorsement by giving the right hand of fellowship as described in Gal 2 9.

II. Fellowship as Experienced.—From the very beginning the early Christians experienced a peculiar sense of unity. Christ is at once the center of this unity and the origin of every expression of fellowship. Sometimes the fellowship is essentially an experience and as such it is scarcely susceptible of definition. It may rather be regarded as a mystical union in Christ. In other instances the fellowship approaches or includes the idea of intercourse. In some passages it is represented as a participation or partnership. The terms occur most frequently in the writings of Paul with whom the idea of Christian unity was a controlling principle.

In its various relations, fellowship is represented: (1) As a communion between the Son and the Father. The gospel record represents Jesus as enjoying a unique sense of communion and intimacy with the Father. Among many such expressions those of Mt 11 25-27 (cf Lk 10 21.22) and Jn 14-15 are especially important. (2) As our communion with God, either with the Father or the Son or with the Father through the Son or the Holy Spirit. "Our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ" (1 Jn 1 3; cf also Jn 14 6.23.26). (3) As our communion one with another. "If we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another" (1 Jn 1 7). Sometimes the idea of communion occurs in relation with abstract ideas or experiences: "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness" (Eph 5 11); "the fellowship of his sufferings" (Phil 3 10); "the fellowship of thy faith" (Philem ver 6). In three passages the relation of the fellowship is not entirely clear: the "fellowship of the Spirit"

(Phil 2 1); "the communion of the Holy Spirit" (2 Cor 13 14); and "the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ" (1 Cor 1 9). The fellowship is probably to be understood as that prevailing among Christians by virtue of the grace of Christ and the ministry of the Holy Spirit.

It is not to be inferred that the idea of fellowship is limited to the passages in which the specific words for communion are used. Some of the clearest and richest expressions of unity and fellowship are found in the Gospels, though these words do not occur in them. In fact, perhaps, the most familiar and forcible expressions of the idea are those in which they are represented symbolically, as in the parable of the Vine and the Branches (Jn 15 1 ff) or in the figure of the Body and its Members (Mt 5 29 ff; Rom 12 5; 1 Cor 12).

RUSSELL BENJAMIN MILLER

COMMUNION WITH DEMONS, démonz (DEVILS, dev'lz):

I. Use of Term.—The actual expression "communion with demons" (κοινωνία τῶν δαιμονίων, koînōnía tōn daimonion) occurs but once in Scripture (1 Cor 10 20) where its fig. meaning is evident, but it is implied in the Eng. version of a number of passages by the terms "one who has" or "those who have" "familiar spirits" (Lev 19 31; 20 6.27; Dt 18 11; 1 S 28 3.7.8.9; 2 K 21 6; 23 24; 1 Ch 10 13; 2 Ch 33 6; Isa 8 19; 19 3; 29 4). These passages seem to be somewhat incongruous with Paul's statement, but are in reality so intimately related to it as to give and receive light through the connection.

II. Teaching of Scripture.—To begin with, we may safely say, in general, that there is no ground for asserting that the Bible admits the possibility of conscious and voluntary communion with spirits. This is an essential element of popular demonology in all ages, but it is absent from Scripture. Even in the passages mentioned above which refer to necromancers and wizards, while, as we shall see, the words indicate that such practitioners professed to rely upon spirits in their divinations, the Scriptures carefully refrain from sanctioning these claims, and a number of features in the various passages serve to indicate that the true scriptural view is quite the opposite. As this is not a prevalent opinion, we should do well to examine the passages with some little care.

(1) We may first deal with the NT. In the Gospels the demoniacs are consistently looked upon and treated as unconscious and helpless victims (see DEMON, DE-TESTAMENT MONOLOGY). The frequent use of this term "demonized" (daimonizomenoi) together with all that is told us of the methods of treating these cases adopted by Our Lord and His apostles (see EXORCISM) indicates the belief of the NT writers that the control of demons over men is obtained outside of or below the region of conscious volition and that the condition of the sufferers is pathological.

(2) The same must be said of the Lydian maiden whose cure by Paul is recorded in Acts 16 16. This is the one instance in the NT where divination is connected with spirits. The account emphasizes the excitable neurosis of the patient; and the belief on the part of the apostles and of the writer of Acts that the girl was not the conscious accomplice of her masters, but their unfortunate victim through her mysterious malady, is clear. She was treated, as the other cases recorded in the NT, not as a conscious wrongdoer, but as a sick person to be healed.

(1) Turning now to the OT, the instance which requires the most careful treatment, because it holds the key to all the rest, is the narrative of Saul's visit to the Witch of Endor in 1 S 28 3-25. The Heb word 'ōbh which is usually tr<sup>d</sup> "one who has a familiar spirit" (see list of passages at beginning of art.) occurs in this narrative four times (vs 3, 7 twice, 8). According to the ordinary interpretation it is used in three different senses, two of which occur here. These three senses are (a) a person who controls a spirit, (b) the spirit controlled, (c) the power to control such a spirit. This meaning appears to be altogether too broad. Omitting to translate the word we have: (ver 3) "Saul had put away 'ōbhōth, and yidh'ōnīm"; (ver 7), a woman, a mistress of an 'ōbh; (ver 8) "Divine unto me . . . by the 'ōbh." It is extremely unlikely that the same word should be used in two senses so far apart as "person who has a spirit" and the "spirit itself" in the same context. In the last passage mentioned (ver 8) there is a double indication that the word 'ōbh cannot have either signification mentioned. Saul says: "Divine unto me by the 'ōbh and bring me up whomsoever I shall name unto thee." The expression "divine by" clearly points to some magical object used in divination. Control of a spirit through some magical object is familiar enough. The rest of Saul's statement confirms this view. The result of the divination is the calling up of a spirit. A spirit would hardly be used to call up another spirit. This conclusion is confirmed by the etymology. The word 'ōbh is supposed to mean "one who has a familiar spirit," from its root-significance of hollow and its primary meaning of wineskin. According to this derivation the word is applied to a necromancer on the supposition that the spirit inhabits his body and speaks from within. The transference to spirit is extremely unlikely and the explanation is not consistent with primitive ideas on spirit manifestation (see BDB, אֹב, end).

(2) We, therefore, hold with H. P. Smith (ICC, "Samuel" in loc.), though partly on different grounds, that the word 'ōbh has the same meaning in all the passages where it occurs, and that it refers to a sacred object or fetish by which spiritistic divination was carried on.

The significance of this conclusion is that the misleading expression "familiar spirit" disappears from the text, for Dr. Driver's interpretation of the companion word yidh'ōnīm (see ICC, Comm. Dt in loc.) will scarcely be maintained in the face of this new meaning for 'ōbh. The prohibition contained in the law (Lev 20 27) against 'ōbhōth, and those using them, places them in the same catalogue of offence and futility with idol-worship in general.

(3) This opinion is confirmed by two separate items of evidence. (a) In the Witch of Endor story Samuel's appearance, according to the idea of the narrator, was due to a miracle, not to the magic power of the feeble and cheating old woman to whom Saul had resorted. God speaks through the apparition a stern message of doom. No one was more startled than the woman herself, who for once had a real vision (ver 12). She not only gave a loud cry of astonishment and alarm but she described the figure which she saw as "a god coming up out of the earth." The story is told with fidelity and clearly indicates the opinion that the actual appearance of a spirit is so violently exceptional as to indicate the immediate power and presence of God.

(b) In Isa 8 19 the 'ōbhōth and yidh'ōnīm are spoken of as those who "chirp and mutter." These terms refer to the necromancers themselves (LXX translates 'ōbhōth by eggastromuthoi = ventriloquists) who practiced ventriloquism in connection with their magical rites. In Isa 29 4 it is said "Thy voice shall be as an 'ōbh, out of the ground." Here 'ōbh is usually interpreted as "ghost," but it is far more probable (see BDB sub loc.) that it refers as in 8 19 to the ventriloquistic tricks of those who utter their oracles in voices intended to represent the spirits which they have evoked. They are stamped in these passages, as in the Witch of Endor narrative, as deceivers practising a fraudulent art. By implication their power to evoke spirits with whom they were in familiar intercourse is denied.

This leaves the way clear for a brief consideration of the words of Paul in 1 Cor 10 20 in connection with cognate passages in the OT.

3. The Meaning of Idol-Worship

(1) He argues that since idol-worship is really demon-worship, the partaking of heathen sacrifice is a communion with demons and a separation from Christ. It is usually taken for granted that this characterization of heathen worship was simply a part of the Jewish-Christian polemic against idolatry. Our fuller knowledge of the spiritism which conditions the use of images enables us to recognize the fact that from the viewpoint of heathenism itself Paul's idea was strictly correct. The image is venerated because it is supposed to represent or contain an invisible being or spirit, not necessarily a deity in the absolute sense, but a superhuman living being capable of working good or ill to men.

(2) In the AV the term devils is used in four OT passages (Lev 17 7; Dt 32 17; 2 Ch 11 15; Ps 106 37). In RV "devils" has disappeared from the text—the word he-goats appears in Lev 17 7 and 2 Ch 11 15, while "demons" appears in Dt 32 17 and Ps 106 37. The tr of s'irīm as "he-goats" is literally correct, but conveys an erroneous conception of the meaning. The practice reprobated is the worship of Satyrs (see SATYR) or wood-demons supposed to be like goats in appearance and to inhabit lonely places. The same word is used in Isa 13 21; 34 14. The word tr<sup>d</sup> "demons" in RV is shēdhīm, a term used only twice and both times in connection with the rites and abominations of heathen worship. It is interesting to note that the word shidu is applied to the beings represented by the bull-colossi of Assyria (Driver, Dt in loc.). BDB holds that the word shēdhīm is an Assyrian loan-word, while Briggs (ICC, Ps 106 37) holds that shēdhīm were ancient gods of Canaan. In either case the word belongs to heathenism and is used in Scripture to describe heathen worship in its own terminology. The interpretation of these beings as evil is characteristic of Bib. demonism in general (see DEMON, etc.). The worship of idols was the worship of personal beings more than man and less than God, according to Jewish and Christian ideas (see Driver op. cit., 363). LXX translates both the above words by daimōnia.

The term "communion with demons" does not imply any power on the part of men to enter into voluntary relationship with beings of another world, but that, by sinful compliance in wrongdoing, such as idol-worship and magical rites, men may enter into a moral identification with evil powers against which it is their duty to fight.

LITERATURE.—The Dictionaries and Commentaries dealing with the passages quoted above contain discussions of the various aspects of the subject. Jewish superstitions are ably treated by Edersheim, LTJM (8th ed), II, 771, 773.

LOUIS MATTHEWS SWEET COMMUNITY, kō-mū'nī-tī, OF GOODS (ἀνατα κοινὰ εἶχον, hápanta koiná eichon, lit. "They had all things [in] common"): In Acts 2 44, it is said that, in the infant church at Jerus, "all that believed were together, and had all things common," and (4 34f) "as many as were possessors of lands or houses sold them, and brought the prices of the things that were sold, and laid them at the apostles' feet." The inference from this, that there was an absolute disposal of all the property of all the members of the church, and that its proceeds were contributed to a common fund, has been disputed upon the ground that the example of Barnabas in selling "a field" for this purpose (4 37) would not have been mentioned, if this had been the universal rule. The thought conveyed is that all believers in that church held their property as a trust from the Lord, for the benefit of the entire brotherhood, and, as there was need, did as Barnabas.

No commandment, of which record has been preserved, prescribed any such course. It came from the spontaneous impulse of the sense of brotherhood in Christ, when the band of disciples was still small, making them in a sense one family, and under the external constraint of extreme want and persecution. So much there was, that they realized, under such conditions they had in common, that they were ready to extend this to all things. It was, in a sense, a continuance of the practice of a common purse in the band of immediate followers of Our Lord during his ministry. The penalty inflicted on Ananias and Sapphira was not for any failure to comply fully with this custom, but because this freedom which they possessed (Acts 5 4) they falsely professed to have renounced, thus receiving in the estimation of their brethren a credit that was not their due. This custom did not last long. It was possible only within a limited circle, and under very peculiar circumstances. The NT recognizes the right of individual property and makes no effort to remove the differences that exist among believers themselves. The community of goods which it renders possible is spiritual (1 Cor 3 21 f), and not one of visible and external things. With respect to the latter, it enjoins upon the Christian, as a steward of God, the possession and administration of property for the progress of the kingdom of God, and the highest interests of men. The spirit of Acts 4 34 is always to pervade the association of believers as a true Christian community. Meyer, on the above passage, has suggested that it is not unlikely that the well-known poverty of the church at Jerus, and its long dependence upon the alms of other churches, may be connected with this early communistic practice, which, however justifiable and commendable at the time, bore its inevitable fruits in a subsequent season of great scarcity and lack of employment.

COMPACT, kom-pakt', COMPACTED, kom-pakt'ed (חָבַר, hābhar, "to be joined"; συμβιβάζω, sumbibázō, "to raise up together"): "Compact" appears as tr of hābhar in Ps 122 3, "Jerus . . . a city that is compact together" (well built, its breaches restored, walls complete, and separate from all around it); and "compacted" (sumbibázō) occurs in AV Eph 4 16, "fitly joined together and compacted," RV "fitly framed and knit together." In RV "compacted" is also the tr of συνίστημι, sunístēmi, "to set together" (2 Pet 3 5), "an earth compacted out of water and amidst [m, through] water," which suggests the idea of water as the primary material (cf Gen 1 2).

COMPANY, kum'pa-ni: The fertility of the original languages in synonyms and varied shades of meaning is seen by the fact that 20 Heb and 12 Gr words are represented by this single term. An analysis of these words shows that "company" is both an indefinite and limitless term, signifying few or many, and all kinds of assemblages of people, e.g.: (1) Caravan, (a) migratory (Isa 21 13 AV); (b) commercial (Gen 37 25 AV); Job 6 19, "The companies of Sheba waited [in vain] for them."

(2) Military, g'dhādāh, "troop," hāmōn, 2 Ch 20 12; rō'sh, "head," "detachment"; Jgs 7 16.20: "three companies"; 9 34.37.43: "four companies."

(3) Band (hebher) or "gang," as rendered by Keil and Delitzsch; a gang of murderous priests (Hos 6 9).

(4) Camp or encampment (Gen 32 8.21; 50 9).

(5) Religious body, "company of prophets" (1 S 19 20).

(6) Assembly, congregation, "company of nations" (Gen 35 11; Ezk 38 4.7.13.15).

(7) A tumultuous crowd (2 K 9 17).

(8) Associate, companion, often with reference to moral affinity (Job 34 8; Prov 29 3; Acts 10 28), kolláomai, "to glue or cement together," indicative of the binding power of moral affinity (RV "to join himself"); as a verb, to "company with" or "keep company" (Acts 1 21; 1 Cor 5 9.11; 2 Thess 3 14). In Apoc in the sense of "to cohabit" (Sus 1 54.57.58).

(9) A host. "Great was the company," etc (Ps 68 11 RV "The women . . . are a great host"). In the East it is the women who celebrate victories with song and dance (see 1 S 18 6.7).

(10) A chorus, dance (m'hōlāh). "The company of two armies" (Cant 6 13 AV; RV "the dance of Mahanaim").

(11) Meal party, κλίσια, klisia, "a reclining company at meals." "Make them sit down [Gr "recline"] in companies" (Lk 9 14). Cf "companion," from Lat com, "together," and panis, "bread."

(12) A myriad, a ten-thousand, an indefinite number (myrias; He 12 22 [RV "hosts"]).

(13) Companions on a journey, sunodia, "a journeying together" (Lk 2 44).

(14) Signifying kinship of spirit, idios, "one's own." "They came to their own company" (Acts 4 23).

(15) A mob (Acts 17 5 [RV "a crowd"]).

I. The Subject in General.—The science of comparative religion is perhaps the latest born of all sciences. Largely in consequence of this fact, our knowledge of what it really proves is still far from definite, and men draw most contradictory conclusions on this point. As in the case of all new sciences in the past, not a few people have endeavored under its shelter to attack Christianity and all revealed religion. These assaults already give signs of failure—as in similar cases previously—and a new evidence of Christianity is emerging from the conflict. It is only "a little learning" that is proverbially dangerous. The subject with which the science of comparative religion deals is religion in general and all the facts which can be learnt about all religions, ancient and modern, whether professed by savages or prevalent among highly civilized communities, whether to be studied in sacred books or learnt orally from the people.

In this way we learn first of all that religion is a universal phenomenon, found among all nations,

1. Universality of Religion in all conditions, though differing immensely in its teachings, ceremonies and effects in different places. It is perhaps the most powerful for good or evil of all the instincts (for it is an instinct) which influence mankind.

To account for the origin and growth of religion various theories have been propounded: (1) "Humanism," which is the revival of the

2. Theories of Origin and Growth of Religion ancient view of Euhēmeros (cir 400 BC) that all religion arose from fear of ghosts, and all the gods were but men who had died; (2) "Animism," which traces religion to early man's fancy that every object in Nature had a personality like his own; (3) the Astral Theory, which supposes that religion originated from worship of the heavenly bodies. It is clear that there are facts to support each of these hypotheses, yet no one of them satisfies all the conditions of the case. To (1) it has been replied that most tribes from the earliest times clearly distinguished between those deities who had been men, and the gods proper, who had never been men and had never died. Regarding (2), it should be observed that it admits that man's consciousness of his own personality and his fancy that it exists in other creatures also does not account for his worshipping them, unless we grant the existence of the sensus numinis within him: if so, then this explains, justifies, and necessitates religion. (3) The Astral Theory is in direct opposition to Euhēmerism or Humanism. It ascribes personality to the heavenly bodies in man's early fancy; but it, too, has to presuppose the sensus numinis, without which religion would be impossible, as would be the science of optics if man had not the sense of sight.

It is often held that religion is due to evolution. If so, then its evolution, resulting ex hypothesi in Christianity as its acme, must be the

3. Evolution working out of a Divine "Eternal Purpose" (próthesis tón aiônôn, Eph 3 11), just as has been the evolution of an amoeba into a man on the Evolutionary Theory. This would be an additional proof of the truth of Christianity. But, though doubtless there has been evolution—or gradual progress under Divine guidance—in religion, the fact of Christ is sufficient to show that there is a Divine self-revelation too. Hence the claim of Christianity to be the absolute religion. "The pre-Christian religions were the age-long prayer, the Incarnation was the answer" (Illingworth). Christianity as revealed in Christ adds what none of the ethnic faiths could prove their claim to—authority, holiness, revelation.

II. Relation of Christianity to Ethnic Faiths and Their Tenets.—It is very remarkable that Christianity—though clearly not a philosophy but a religion that has arisen under historical circumstances which preclude the possibility of supposing it the product of Eclecticism—yet sums up in itself all that is good in all religions and philosophies, without the bad, the fearful perversions and corruptions of the moral sense, too often found in them. The more the study of comparative religion is carried on the more plainly evident does this become. It also supplements in a wonderful way the half-truths concealed rather than revealed in other systems, whether religious or philosophical. We subjoin a few instances of this.

Karma is strongly insisted on in Hindūism and Buddhism. These teach that every deed, good or bad, must have its result, that "its fruit must be eaten" here or hereafter. So does Christianity quite as forcibly (Gal 6 7.8). But neither

1. Karma Indian faith explains how sin can be forgiven, evil be overruled for good, nor how, by trampling under foot their vices, men may rise higher (Aug., Sermo iii, De Ascensione). They recognize, in some sense, the existence of evil, and illogically teach that rites and certain ascetic practices help to overcome it. They know of no Atonement, though modern Hindūism endeavors to propitiate the deities by sacrifices, as indeed was done in Vedic times. Conscience they cannot explain. Christianity, while showing the heinousness of sin as no other system does, and so supplementing the others, supplements them still further by the Atonement, showing that God is just, and teaching how His very righteousness can be brought to "justify" the sinner (Rom 3 26).

Mahāyāna Buddhism proclaims an immanent but not transcendent being (Dharma-kāya), who

2. God is "the ultimate reality that underlies all particular phenomena" (Suzuki), who wills and reflects, though not fully personal. He is not the Creator of the world but a kind of Animus mundi. He is the sum total of all sentient beings, and they have no individual existence, no "ego-soul." The world of matter has no real existence but is his self-manifestation. Christianity supplements and corrects this by teaching the transcendence as well as the immanence (Acts 17 28) of the Creator, who is at least personal, if not something higher, who is the Source of reality though not Himself the sole reality, and of our personality and life, and "who only hath immortality" (1 Tim 6 16).

Vedāntism and Śūfism proclaim that ultimate absorption in the impersonal "It" is the summum bonum, and the Chāndogya Upanishad

3. The Bonum says, "There is just one thing, without a second" (Book VI, 2 1, 2). Of this one thing everything is, so to speak, a part: there being no ultimate difference between the human and the Divine. Thus sin is denied and unreality proclaimed (Māyā, illusion). The yearning for union with God underlying all this is satisfied in Christianity, which provides reconciliation with God and shows how by new spiritual birth men may become children of God (Jn 1 12.13) and "partakers of the divine nature" (2 Pet 1 4), without being swallowed up therein like a raindrop in the ocean: the union being spiritual and not material.

Orthodox (Sunnī) Muslim theology declares God to be separated from man by an impassable gulf and hence to be unknowable.

4. Self-Revelation of God Philosophically this leads to Agnosticism, though opposed to Polytheism. Among the Jews the philosophy of Maimonides ends in the same failure to attain to a knowledge of the Divine or to describe God except by negations (Šēpher Ha-maddā, 1 11). The Bible, on the other hand, while speaking of Him as invisible, and unknowable through merely human effort (Job 11 7.8; Jn 1 18), yet reveals Him in Christ, who is God and man. Jewish mysticism endeavored to solve the problem of creation by the invention of the ʿĀdām kadīmōn (archetypal man), and earlier by Philo's Logos doctrine and the Mēmra of the Targums. But these abstractions have neither reality nor personality. The Christian Logos doctrine presents no theoretical but the actual historical, eternal Christ (cf Jn 1 1-3; He 1 2).

5. Incarnation He 1 2). Heathenism seeks to give some idea of the Invisible by means of idols; Vaishnavism has its doctrine of avatāras; Bābūism and Bahā'ism their dogma of "manifestations" (mazhar) in human beings; the 'Alī-ilāhīs are so called because they regard 'Alī as God. Instead of these unworthy theories and deifications, Christianity supplies the holy, sinless, perfect Incarnation in Christ.

Hindūism offers mukti (mōksha), "deliverance" from a miserable existence; Christianity in Christ offers pardon, deliverance from sin, and

6. Salvation reconciliation with God.

Krishnaism teaches unreasoning "devotion" (bhakti) of "mind, body, property" to certain supposed incarnations of Krishna (Vishnu), quite regardless of their immoral conduct;

7. Faith Christianity inculcates a manly, reasonable "faith" in Christ, but only after "proving all things."

Pilgrimages in Islām and Hindūism indicate but do not satisfy a need for approach to God; Christianity teaches a growth in grace and in like-

8. Approach ness to Christ, and so a spiritual drawing near to God.

III. General Characteristics of Ethnic Faiths.—In all religions we find, though in many various forms, certain common beliefs, such as:

(1) the existence of some spiritual power or powers, good or bad, superior to man and able to affect his present and future life; (2) that there is a difference between right and wrong, even though not clearly defined; (3) that there is an after-life of some sort, with happiness or misery often regarded as in some measure dependent upon conduct or upon the observance of certain rites here. In the main the fact of the all but universal agreement of religions upon these points proves that they are true in substance. Even such an agnostic philosophy as original Buddhism was, has been constrained by human need to evolve from itself or admit from without deistic or theistic elements, and thus Buddha himself has been deified by the Mahāyāna School. Yet no ethnic faith satisfies the "human soul naturally Christian," as Tertullian calls it (Liber Apologeticus, cap. 17), for none of them reveals One God, personal, holy, loving, just, merciful, omniscient and omnipotent. Even Islām fails here. Ethnic religions are either (1) polytheistic, worshipping many gods, all imperfect and some evil, or (2) mystical, evaporating away, as it were, God's Personality, thus rendering Him a mental abstraction, as in the Hindū philosophical systems and in Mahāyāna Buddhism. Christianity as revealed in Christ does just what all other faiths fail to do, reconciling these two tendencies and correcting both.

As a general rule, the nearer to their source we can trace religions, the purer we find them. In

2. Tendency to Degradation, not to Progress, in Ethnic Faiths most cases a tendency to degradation and not to progressive improvement manifests itself as time goes on, and this is sometimes carried to such an extent that, as Lucretius found in Rome and Greece, religion becomes a curse and not a blessing. Thus, for example, regarding ancient Egypt,

Professor Renouf says: "The sublimer portions of the Egypt religion are not the comparatively late result of a process of development. The sublimer portions are demonstrably ancient, and the last stage of the Egypt religion was by far the grossest and most corrupt" (Hibbert Lectures, 91). Modern Hindūism, again, is incomparably lower in its religious conceptions than the religion of the Vedas. In Polynesia the same rule holds good, as is evident from the myths about Tangaroa. In Samoa he was said to be the son of two beings, the "Cloudless Heaven" and the "Outspread Heaven." He originally existed in open space. He made the sky to dwell in. He then made the earth. Somewhat later he was supposed to be visible in the moon! But a lower depth was reached. In Hawaii, Tangaroa has sunk to an evil being, the leader of a rebellion against another god, Tane, and is now condemned to abide in the lowest depths of darkness and be the god of death. In South Africa, Australia and elsewhere, traditions still linger of a Creator of all things, but his worship has been entirely laid aside in favor of lower and more evil deities.

Almost everywhere mythology has arisen and perverted religion into something very different from what it once was. The same

3. Mythology and Religion tendency has more than once manifested itself in the Christian church, thus rendering a return to Christ's teachings necessary. As an instance, compare the modern popular religion of Italy with that of the NT. It is remarkable that no religion but the Christian, however, has shown its capability of reform.

For the most part, in ethnic religions, there is no recognized connection between religion and morality. The wide extension of phallic

4. Religion and Moral-Ethnic Faiths rites and the existence of hieródouloi and hieródouloi in many lands show that religion has often consecrated gross immorality. Mythology aids in this degradation. Hence Seneca, after mentioning many evil myths related of Jupiter, etc., says: "By which nothing else was effected but the removal from men of their shame at sinning, if they deemed such beings gods" (L. A. Seneca, De beata vita cap. 26). With the possibly doubtful exception of the religion of certain savage tribes, in no religion is the holiness of God taught except in Christianity and its initial stage, Judaism. Ethnic deities are mostly born of heaven and earth, if not identified with them in part, and are rarely regarded as creating them. It was otherwise, however, with Ahura Mazda in Zoroastrianism, and with certain Sumerian deities, and there are other exceptions, too. The "religions of Nature" have generally produced gross immorality, encouraged and even insisted upon as a part of their ritual; cf Mylitta-worship in Babylon and that of the "Mater deum," Venus, Anāhita, etc.

IV. Supposed Resemblances to Revealed Religion.—Much attention has been called to real or

1. Rites supposed community of rites and "myths," esp. when any ethnic faith is compared with Christianity. Sacrifice, for instance, is an essential part of every religion. In Christianity none are now offered, except the "living sacrifice" of the believer, though that of Christ offered once for all is held to be the substance foreshadowed by Jewish sacrifices. Purificatory bathings are found almost everywhere, and that very naturally, because of the universality of conscience and of some sense of sin.

Belief in the fiery end of the world existed among the Stoics, and is found in the Eddas of Scandinavia and the Purāṇas of India.

2. Dogmas Traditions of an age before sin and death came upon mankind occur in many different lands. Many of these traditions may easily be accounted for. But in some cases the supposed resemblance to revealed religion does not exist, or is vastly exaggerated. The Yōga philosophy in India is popularly supposed to aim at union with God, as does Christianity; but (so understood) the Yōga system, as has already been said, implies loss of personality and absorption into the impersonal, unconscious "It" (Tat). The doctrine of a Trinity is nowhere found, only Triads of separate deities. Belief in a resurrection is found in only very late parts of the Pers (Zoroastrian) scriptures, composed after cents. of communication with Jews and Christians. In the earlier Avesta only a "restoration" of the world is mentioned (cf Acts 3 21). Original (Hīnayāna) Buddhism teaches "immortality" (amata), but by this is meant Nirvāna ("extinction"). Mithraism has been said to teach the "resurrection of the body," but, according to Eubulus and Porphyry, it taught rather the transmigration of the soul.

The assertion is often made that many of the leading gospel incidents in the life of Our Lord are paralleled in other religions. It is

3. Asserted said, for instance, that the resurrec-
Parallels to tion of Adonis, Osiris and Mithra
Gospel was believed in by their followers. It
History is true that, in some places, Adonis was said to have come to life the day after he had met his death by the tusk of a boar (the cold of winter); but everywhere it was recognized that he was not a man who had been killed, but the representative of the produce of the soil, slain or dying down in the cold weather and growing again in spring. As to Osiris, his tomb was shown in more than one place in Egypt, and his body was never supposed to have come to life again, though his spirit was alive and was ruler of the underworld. Mithra was admitted to be the genius of the sun. He was said to have sprung from a rock (in old Pers and Sanskrit the same word means "sky," "cloud" and "rock"), but not to have been incarnated, nor to have died, much less to have risen from the dead. The modern erroneous fancy that Mithraists believed in his resurrection rests solely on one or at most two passages in Christian writers, which really refer to the burial of Osiris and the removal of his body from the tomb by his hostile brother Typhon (Set). The high morality attributed to Mithraism and even to the worship of Isis rests on no better foundation than the wrong rendering of a few passages and the deliberate ignoring of many which contradict the theory.

Virgin birth, we have been told, is a doctrine of many religions. As a matter of fact, it is found in hardly one ethnic faith. Nothing of

4. Virgin the kind was believed regarding
Birth Osiris, Adonis, Horus, Mithra, Krishna, Zoroaster. Of Buddha it is denied entirely in all the books of the Southern Canon (Pāli), and is found expressed only vaguely in one or two late uncanonical works of the Northern (Sanskrit) School. It was doubtless borrowed from Christianity. Supernatural birth of quite a different (and very repulsive) kind is found in many mythologies, but that is quite another thing.

Heathenism contains some vague aspirations and unconscious prophecies, the best example of which is to be found in Vergil's Fourth

5. Heathen Eclogue, if that be not rather due to Aspirations Jewish influence. Any such foregleams and Un- of the coming light as are real and not conscious merely imaginary, such, for instance,
Prophecies as the Indian doctrine of the avatāras or "descents" of Vishnu, are to be accounted for as part of the Divine education of the human race. The "false dawn," so well known in the East, is not a proof that the sun is not about to rise, nor can its existence justify anyone in shutting his eyes to and rejecting the daylight when it comes. It is but a harbinger of the real dawn.

6. Lessons Comparative religion teaches us that Taught by religion is essential to and distinctive Comparative of humanity. The failures of the ethnic Religion faiths no less than their aspirations show how great is man's need of Christ, and how utterly unable imagination has ever proved itself to be even to conceive of such an ideal character as He revealed to us in the full light of history and in the wonder-working effects of His character upon the lives and hearts of those who then and in all ages since have in Him received life and light.

COMPARE, kom-pār' (דָּמָה, dāmāh, מָשַׁל, māshal, מִשַּׁל, 'ārakh; παραβάλλω, parabállō, συγκρίνω, sugkrinō): "Compare" is the tr of דָּמָה, dāmāh, "to be like" (Cant 1 9); of מָשַׁל, māshal, "to liken," "compare" (Isa 46 5); of מִשַּׁל, 'ārakh, "to set in array," "compare" (Ps 89 6; Isa 40 18); of שָׁוָה, shāwāh, "to be equal" (Prov 3 15; 8 11).

In the NT sugkrinō, "to judge" or "sift together," is tr<sup>d</sup> "comparing," "comparing spiritual things with spiritual" (1 Cor 2 13 ERV), ARV "combining" ("adapting the discourse to the subject," Thayer), RVm "interpreting spiritual things to spiritual [men]."

COMPASS, kum'pas, COMPASSES, kum'pas-iz: "Compass," noun, is the tr of חֹדֶן, hūgh, "a circle," "vault" or "arch" ("when he set a compass upon the face of the depth" Prov 8 27 AV, RV, ARV "circle"; cf Job 26 10; and see CIRCLE; VAULT OF EARTH); of כַּרְכֹּב, karkōbh, "a margin," "border" (Ex 27 5, "the compass of the altar," RV "the ledge round," so 38 4); the phrase "to fetch a compass" is the tr of סָבַח, sābhahb, "to turn about," "go round about" (Nu 34 5; Josh 15 3, RV "turn about," 2 S 5 23; 2 K 3 9, RV "make a circuit"); of periérchomai, "to go about" (Acts 28 13, RV "made a circuit"; m "Some ancient authorities read cast loose"; see CIRCUIT).

"Compasses" is RV for "compass," מְחֹדֶה, m'hūghāh, an instrument for describing a circle: "He marketh it out with the compasses" (Isa 44 13) in making an idol.

The vb. "to compass" occurs frequently in the senses of "to surround" and "to go round about," e.g. Gen 2 11, "which compasseth the whole land of Havilah," Dt 2 1, "We compassed [went around] mount Seir many days"; in Jer 31 22 we have "A new thing on the earth: a woman shall compass a man," RV "encompass"; possibly as a suitor; but more probably as a protector. In those happy days, the protection of women (under God, ver 28) will be sufficient, while the men are at their work; "to encompass" ("The cords of death compassed me," Ps 18 4; "the waves of death," 2 S 22 5). "To gird" (Isa 50 11 RV); "to lie around," "to be laid around" (He 6 2, "compassed with infirmity" [clothed with it]; 12 1, "compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses").

In Apoc we have "compassed about with yawning darkness" (Wisd 19 17); "compassed the circuit of heaven" (Ecclus 24 5); "compassed with pomegranates of gold" (45 9); "The rainbow compasseth the heaven" (Ecclus 43 12); the course of the sun (1 Esd 4 34). W. L. WALKER

COMPASSION, kom-pash'un: Compassion is the tr of רַחַם, rāham, "to love," "pity," "be merciful" (Dt 13 17; 30 3); of רַחֲמִים, rahāmim, "mercies" (1 K 8 50); of רַחֲמָה, hāmāh, "to pity," "spare" (Ex 2 6; 1 S 23 21); רַחֲמֵם, rahūm (Ps 78 38; 86 15; 111 4; 112 4; 145 8), is rendered by ARV "merciful." We have συμπάσχειν, sympaschein, "to have the bowels yearning," in Mt 9 36; 14 14, etc; sumpathēō (He 10 34), "to suffer with [another]"; sumpathēs (1 Pet 3 8, RV "compassionate," m "Gr sympathetic"); metriopathēō (He 5 2, RV "who can bear gently with"); eleōō, "to show mildness," "kindness" (Mt 18 33; Mk 5 19; Jude ver 22, RV "mercy"); oikteirō, "to have pity" or "mercy" (Rom 9 15 bis).

Both rāham and sympaschein are examples of the physical origin of spiritual terms, the bowels being regarded as the seat of the warm, tender emotions or feelings. But, while rāham applied to the lower viscera as well as the higher, sympaschein denoted chiefly the higher viscera, the heart, lungs, liver.

RV gives "compassion" for "mercy" (Isa 9 17; 14 1; 27 11; 49 13; Jer 13 14; 30 18; Dnl 1 9 AV "tender love with"; for "bowels of compassion," 1 Jn 3 17); for "mercy" (He 10 28); "full of compassion" for "merciful" (ARV "merciful" in all cases) (Ex 34 6; Neh 9 17; Ps 103 8; Joel 2 13; Jon 4 2); "compassions" for "mercies" (Isa 63 15; Phil 2 1), for "repentings" (Hos 11 8).

Compassion, lit. a feeling with and for others, is a fundamental and distinctive quality of the Bib. conception of God, and to its prominence the world owes more than words can express. (1) It lay at the foundation of Israel's faith in Jeh. For it was out of His compassion that He, by a marvelous act of power, delivered them from Egypt bondage and called them to be His own people. Nothing, therefore, is more prominent in the OT than the ascription of compassion, pity, mercy, etc, to God; the people may be said to have gloried in it. It is summed up in such sayings as that of the great declaration in Ex 34 6: "Jehovah—a God full of compassion [ARV merciful] and gracious" (cf Ps 78 38; 86 15; 111 4; 112 4; 145 8; Lam 3 22, "His compassions fail not"). And, because this was the character of their God, the prophets declared that compassion was an essential requirement on the part of members of the community (Hos 6 6; Mic 6 8; cf Prov 19 17). (2) In Jesus Christ, in whom God was "manifest in the flesh," compassion was an outstanding feature (Mt 9 36; 14 14, etc) and He taught that it ought to be extended, not to friends and neighbors only, but to all without exception, even to enemies (Mt 5 43-48; Lk 10 30-37).

The God of the NT, the Father of men, is most clearly revealed as "a God full of compassion." It extends to the whole human race, for which He effected not merely a temporal, but a spiritual and eternal, deliverance, giving up His own Son to the death of the cross in order to save us from the worst bondage of sin, with its consequences; seeking thereby to gain a new, wider people for Himself, still more devoted, more filled with and expressive of His own Spirit. Therefore all who know the God and Father of Christ, and who call themselves His children, must necessarily cultivate compassion and show mercy, "even as he is merciful." Hence the many apostolic injunctions to that effect

(Eph 4 32; Col 3 12; Jas 1 27; 1 Jn 3 17, etc). Christianity may be said to be distinctively the religion of Compassion. W. L. WALKER

COMPEL, kom-pel': Our Eng. word always has in it now the flavor of force, not always, however, physical. It may be strong moral urgency, though "constrain" better expresses this.

There are several words indicative of such strong pressure: (1) אָנָס, ānas, "to press": "none could compel" to drink (Est 1 8); (2) נָדַח, nādhah, "to drive," "force": "compelled Judah thereto" (AV, RVm); "led Judah astray" RV (2 Ch 21 11). The same word rendered "force," as the adulteress by flattering words her victim (Prov 7 21); (3) עָבַד, ābhadh, "to serve": not to compel him to serve as a bond servant (Lev 25 39 AV, RV "make him serve"); (4) פָּרַץ, pāraç, "to break forth upon," "urge": "his servants compelled him" (1 S 28 23 AV, RV "constrained").

In the NT two words are found: (1) ἀγγαρεύω, aggareuō: The word is of Pers origin and means to employ a courier. The Aggaroi

2. In the NT were public couriers stationed by appointment of the kings of Persia, at fixed localities, with horses ready for use, to transmit speedily from one to another the royal messages. These couriers had authority to press into their service, in case of need, horses, vessels, and even men, they might meet (Jos, Ant., XIII, ii, 3); "compel thee to go a mile" (Mt 5 41 AV; RVm "impress"); "compelled Simon to bear his cross" (Mt 27 32; Mk 15 21 AV; RVm "impressed"). (2) ἀναγκάζω, anagkázō, "to constrain," whether by force, threats, entreaties, persuasion, etc: "compel them to come in" (Lk 14 23 AV; RV "constrain"). This has been a favorite text of religious persecutors. As Robertson says in his history of Charles V, "As they could not persuade, they tried to compel men to believe." But it simply means that utmost zeal and moral urgency should be used by Christians to induce sinners to enter the Kingdom of God. Cf Acts 26 11.

GEORGE HENRY TREVER

COMPLAINING, kom-plan'ing (נִלְוָה, ḥāh, "cry," "outcry," שִׁיתִי, siṭiḥ, "meditation," "complaint"): ḥāh is tr "complain" (Ps 144 14, RV "outcry," "no c. [outcry] in our streets," i.e. "open places" where the people commonly assembled near the gate of the city (cf 2 Ch 32 6; Neh 8 1); a picture of peace in the city (cf Isa 24 11; Jer 14 2); some render "battledcry"; siḥāh (RV Prov 23 29, AV "babbling"), of the drunkard.

COMPLETE, kom-plēt': In AV for πληρόω, plērōō, the vb. ordinarily used for the coming to pass of what had been predicted. AV translates this "complete" in Col 2 10; 4 12 to express the final and entire attainment of what is treated, leaving nothing beyond to be desired or hoped for; otherwise rendered in RV ("made full"). In RV, c. appears once for Gr artios, from arō, "to join," in 2 Tim 3 17, in sense of "accurately fitted for," where AV has "perfect."

COMPOSITION, kom-pō-zish'un (מִתְכַּנֵּת, math-kōneth, "measure"); COMPOUND, kom'pound (subst.) (רֶקֶת, rākah, "to make perfume," רֶקֶת, rōkah, "perfume"): Used of the sacred anointing oil (Ex 30 25.32.33) and of the holy perfume (vs 37.38), which were not to be used for any profane purpose.

COMPREHEND, kom-prē-hend': Used in a twofold sense in both the OT and NT. This double meaning appears in two Heb and two Gr words which signify in turn (1) mental or spiritual perception, (2) capacity to hold or contain, as in a measure or in an all-inclusive principle, e.g.:

(1) יָדָה, yādha, "to see with the eyes or the mind," hence "know," "understand." Job was urged by Elihu to accept as inscrutable the ways of God, inasmuch as His operations in the physical world are so mighty and mysterious that "we cannot comprehend" them (Job 37 5). Modern science, in unveiling the secrets of Nature, is opening the way for a better understanding of God's creative purpose and plan.

καταλαμβάνω, katalambánō, "to lay hold of," hence mentally to apprehend: used of the spiritual capacity of the Christian "to comprehend [RV "apprehend"] with all saints" (Eph 3 18) the measureless love of God; and of the inability of the unrenewed heart to know or perceive the revelation of God made in Christ: "the darkness comprehended it not" (Jn 1 5 RV "apprehended"; RVm "overcame"; cf 12 35).

(2) כָּל, kāl, "to measure" or "contain," as grain in a bushel. So God's immeasurable greatness is seen in His being able to hold oceans in the hollow of His hand and "comprehend the dust of the earth in a measure" (Isa 40 12).

ἀνακεφαλαίω, anakephalaíō, "to sum up under one head," e.g. love includes every other moral principle and process. The entire law on its manward side, says Paul, "is comprehended [RV "summed up"] in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" (Rom 13 9).

DWIGHT M. PRATT

CONANIAH, kon-a-n'ia (כֹּנַנְיָהוּ, kōnanyāhū, "Jah has founded or sustained"; AV Cononiah):

(1) A Levite, appointed with his brother Shimei by Hezekiah, the king, and Azariah, the ruler of the house of God, to be overseer of the oblations and tithes and the dedicated things (2 Ch 31 12,13).

(2) One of the chiefs of the Levites mentioned in connection with the passover celebration in Josiah's reign (2 Ch 35 9).

CONCEAL, kon-sēl' (παράκαλύπτω, parakalúptō): Found but once in the NT (Lk 9 45). The primary meaning is to cover by hanging something in front of the object hidden. The purpose of the one concealing is made prominent. There is, therefore, a reserve and studied progress in regard to the statement of facts, that is not always a suppression of truth (Prov 12 16,23). God withholds more than He reveals (Prov 25 2; cf Ps 97 2; 1 Tim 6 16).

CONCEIT, kon-sēt': An idiomatic rendering of a phrase, φρόνιμοι ἐν ἑαυτοῖς, phrónimoi en heautois, in Rom 11 25; 12 16; meaning lit. "wise with one's self," i.e. "in one's own opinion," or, as in || OT passages (Prov 26 5,12 RVm), "in his own eyes" (Heb 'ayin).

CONCEPTION, kon-sep'shun, CONCEIVE, kon-sēv' (הָרָה, hārāh, and derivatives; συλλαμβάνω, sullambánō): Physically, the beginning of a new life in the womb of a mother, "to catch on," used thus some forty times, as in Gen 3 16; 4 1; Ps 51 5. Metaphorically, applied to the start and growth within the heart, of thought, purpose, desire, e.g. "c. mischief" (Job 15 35; Ps 7 14), "c. chaff" (Isa 33 11). This figure is carried out in details in Jas 1 15: "Lust, when it hath conceived, beareth sin."

CONCEPTION, IMMACULATE. See IMMACULATE CONCEPTION.

CONCERNING, kon-sūrn'ing:

RV makes frequent changes, such as "for," "as for," "from," "about," for "concerning"; "concerning" instead of "for," "of," "over," "in," "against," etc. Some of the other changes are, "unto that which is good" for "concerning" (Rom 16 19), "concerning" instead of "because of" (Jer 23 9), for "the miracle of" (Mk 6 52), for "with" (10 41), for "of the Lord" (Acts 18 25), "concerning Jesus" (different text), "by way of disparagement" (2 Cor 11 21), instead of "concerning reproach"; "Why askest thou me concerning that which is good?" (Mt 19 17) instead of "Why callest thou me good?" (different text; see RVm).

CONCISION, kon-sizh'un (κατατομή, katalomē, "mutilation," "cutting"): A term by which St. Paul contemptuously designates the merely fleshly circumcision upon which the Judaizers insisted as being necessary for gentile converts (Phil 3 2), as distinguished from peritomē, the true circumcision (ver 3). Cf Gal 5 12 and Dt 23 1, and see CIRCUMCISION.

CONCLUDE, kon-klōōd' (συμβιβάζω, sumbibázō): Used only in Acts 16 10, where AV has "assuredly gathering," i.e. "inferring." Where AV has "conclude," RV more accurately renders "reckon" (Rom 3 28); "giving judgment" (Acts 21 25); "shut up" (Rom 11 32; Gal 3 22).

CONCLUSION, kon-klōō'zhun (ἔσφ, ēsph): In Eccl 12 13 AV, where RV has "the end," viz. a summary of the entire argument of the book.

LITERATURE

The object of a concordance of Scripture is to guide the reader to any passage he is in search of by means of an alphabetical arrangement of the words found in Scripture, and the bringing together under each word of all the passages in which that word occurs. Thus, in the ver: "Cast thy burden upon Jeh" (Ps 55 22), the reader will look in the concordance under the words "cast" or "burden," and there will find a reference to the text. The merit of a concordance is obviously exhaustiveness and clearness of arrangement. There are abridged concordances of the Bible which give only the most important words and passages. These are seldom satisfactory, and a fuller work has in the end frequently to be resorted to.

The ordinary reader is naturally most familiar with concordances of the Eng. Bible, but it will be seen that, for scholarly purposes, concordances are just as necessary for the Scriptures in their original tongues, and for versions of the Scriptures other than Eng. There are required concordances of the OT in Heb, of the NT in Gr, of the LXX version (Gr) of the OT, of the Vulg version (Lat) of the NT, as well as of the trs of the Scriptures into German, French and other living languages. There are now, further, required concordances of the RVV of the English OT and NT, as well as of the AV. There are needed, besides, good concordances to the Apoc, alike in its AV and RV forms. Textual criticism leads to modifications of the earlier concordances of the Heb and Gr texts. It is customary in concordances of the Eng. version to facilitate reference by giving not only single words, but also phrases under which several passages are grouped, and to make the work more useful by furnishing lists of Scripture proper names, with their meanings, and, in the larger works, references to the Heb or Gr words for which the Eng. words stand.

The indispensableness of a good concordance for the proper study of the Bible is so apparent that it is not surprising that, since the idea was first conceived, much labor has been expended on the preparation of such works. The wonder rather is that the idea did not occur earlier than it did. No single scholar could ever hope to produce a perfect work of the kind by his own efforts. Modern concordances are based upon the labors of previous generations.

The oldest concordances date from the 13th cent., and are based, as was then natural, upon the Latin Vulgate. A Concordantie Morales is attributed to Antony of Padua (d. 1231). The first concordance of Latin which we have actual knowledge is that of Hugo of St. Caro, Dominican monk and cardinal (d. 1263). It was called Concordantie S. Jacobi from the monastery in which it was compiled. 500 monks are said to have been engaged upon its preparation. Hugo's Concordance became the basis of others into which successive improvements were introduced. The words of passages, at first wanting, were inserted; indeclinable particles were added; alphabetic arrangement was employed. Verse divisions were unknown till the time of Robert Stephens (1555). See BIBLE.

The earliest Heb concordance seems to have been that of Rabbi Mordecai ben Nathan (1438-48). It went through several editions (1556). It was tr<sup>d</sup> into Lat by Reuchlin (1556). Both original and tr contained many errors. It was improved by Calasio, a Franciscan friar (1621), and more thoroughly by John Buxtorf, whose Concordance was published by his son (1632). This latter formed the basis of Dr. Julius Fürst's Libr. Sacrorum Vet. Test. Concordantie Heb atque Chald; 1840 (Eng. tr, Hebrew and Chaldean Concordance). A later Heb Concordance in Germany is that of Solomon Mandelkern (1896). In England, in 1754, appeared the valuable Heb Concordance, Adapted to the Eng. Bible, by Dr. Taylor, of Norwich. With it may be classed The Englishman's Heb and Chald Concordance (1843; rev. ed, 1876).

Though earlier attempts are heard of, the first printed concordance of the LXX (the Gr OT) was that of Trommius, published in Amsterdam in 1718, in the author's 84th year. This important work remained the standard till quite lately. It is very complete, giving references not only to the LXX, but to other VSS (Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion) in which the words occur, and showing by an index at the end the Heb or Chald words to which the Gr words correspond. In 1887 Bagster published A Handy Concordance of the Sept. Earlier works are superseded by the recent publication (1892, 1897, 1900) of Hatch and Redpath's scholarly Concordance to the Sept. and Other Gr VSS of the OT.

Concordances of the Gr NT began with that of Xystus Betulius (his real name was Birk) in 1554.

The Concordance (Tameion) of Erasmus Schmid (1638) has often been reprinted and reredited. On it is based the useful abridged Concordance published by Bagster. Recent works are Bruder's (1842; 4th ed, 1888; based on Schmid, with many improvements); in America, Hudson's Critical Gr and Eng. Concordance, revised by Ezra Abbot (1870); in England, Moulton and Geden's Concordance to the Gr Test. according to the Texts of Westcott and Hort, Tischendorf, and the Eng. Revisers (1897).

The list of concordances to the Eng. Bible is a long one; it is necessary here to particularize only a few of the chief. The oldest is a Concordance of the NT, brought out before 1540 by one Thomas Gybson, English Bible, though, as appears from the Preface, it was principally the work of the printer John Day (the producer of Foxe's Book of Martyrs).

The first Concordance to the whole Bible was that of John Marbeck (1550). In the same year was published a tr by Walter Lynne of the Index Librorum of Bullinger, Conrad Pelican and others, under the title of A Briefe and a Compendious Table, in maner of a Concordance, opening the waye to the principall Histories of the whole Bible, etc. Alex. Cruden, whose own Concordance, the most adequate of all, was published in 1737, enumerates most of his predecessors in the intervening period. Cruden's personal history is a pathetic one. A recurring mental malady overshadowed his career; but his indomitable perseverance and fixity of purpose, joined with a clear idea of what he wished to accomplish, enabled him to overcome all obstacles, and produce a book for which the Christian world is grateful. The work is entitled A Complete Concordance to the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, etc; to which is added, a Concordance to the Books called Apocrypha. Mr. Spurgeon said regarding it, "Be sure you buy a genuine unabridged Cruden, and none of the modern substitutes, good as they may be at the price. . . . You need only one; have none but the best." Many editions of this valuable book have been published. It no longer remains, however, the only authority, nor even the most complete and serviceable, though perhaps still the most convenient, for the purpose of the student. In 1873 was published the Analytical Concordance to the Bible by Robert Young, LL.D., to which an appendix has since been added. This bulky work contains "every word in alphabetical order, arranged under its Heb or Gr original; with the literal meaning of each and its pronunciation." It marks 30,000 various readings, and gives geographical and antiquarian notes. Yet more comprehensive is The Exhaustive Concordance of the Bible by James Strong, LL.D. This includes the new feature of a comparative concordance of the Authorized and Revised (English) VSS. It embraces also condensed Dictionaries of the Heb and Gr words, to which references are made from the Eng. words by figures. It thus differs in plan from Young's, which gives the Heb and Gr words in the body of the concordance at the head of the passages coming under them. Lastly must be noticed the very valuable work published in the same year (1894) in America by J. B. R. Walker, Comprehensive Concordance, with an Introduction by Marshall Curtiss Hazard. It is stated to give 50,000 more passages than Cruden.

CONCOURSE, kon'kōrs (הִמָּה, hāmāh, "to hum," "to make a noise"; συστροφή, sustrophē, "a turning" or "twisting together"): Hāmāh, usually tr<sup>d</sup> by some word signifying "sound" is rendered "concourse" in Prov 1 21 (perhaps from the noise made by people thronging and talking together; cf 1 K 1 41, "uproar"), "She [wisdom] crieth in the chief place of concourse," RVm "Heb at the head of the noisy [streets]"; sustrophē is tr<sup>d</sup> "concourse" (Acts 19 40), a riotous crowd. Cf Jth 10 18.

CONCUBINAGE, kon-kū'bi-nāj. See FAMILY.

CONCUPISCENCE, kon-kū'pi-sens (ἐπιθυμία, epithumia): Not used in RV, but in AV, Rom 7 8; Col 3 5; 1 Thess 4 5. The Gr noun, like the vb. from which it comes, meaning "to yearn," "to long," "to have the heart set upon a thing," is determined in its moral quality by the source whence it springs or the object toward which it is directed. Thus Our Lord uses it to express the intensest desire of His soul (Lk 22 15). As a rule, when the object is not expressed, it refers to longing for that which God has forbidden, viz. lust. It is not limited to sexual desire, but includes all going forth of heart and will toward what God would not have us to have or be, as its use in the LXX of the Ten Commandments clearly shows, for "Thou shalt not covet" (Ex 20 17). CONDEMN, kon-dem', CONDEMNATION, kon-dem-nā'shun:

(1) The causative stem of רָשָׁה, rāsha', "to declare [or make] wrong," "to condemn," whether in civil, ethical or religious relations.

1. In the OT Taken in this sense the word needs no comment (Ex 22 9; Dt 25 1; Job 40 8); "Who then can condemn?" (Job 34 29, AV "make trouble").

(2) אָנַשׁ, 'anash, "to fine." "Condemned the land" (2 Ch 36 3 AV; AVm "mulcted"; RV "amerced"; ARV "fined"); "wine of the condemned" (Am 2 8; RV "fined" [unjustly]).

(3) The active part. of שָׁפַט, shāphat, "to judge." "From those that condemn his soul" (Ps 109 31 AV; RV "that judge his soul").

The NT usage is much more complicated, both because of the greater number of Gr words rendered "condemn" and "condemnation," and because AV tr<sup>s</sup> the same word in several different ways, apparently with no rule whatever.

2. In the NT (1) The most important word is κρίνω, krinō, "to judge." From it are a number of derivative vbs. and nouns. RV has rigidly excluded the harsh words "damn" and "damnation," substituting "judge," "condemn," "judgment," "condemnation." This is proper, since the word damn (Lat damnare, "to inflict loss" upon a person, "to condemn"), and its derivatives has, in process of time, suffered degradation, so that in modern Eng. it usually refers to eternal punishment. This special application of the word for some cents. ran side by side with the original meaning, but even as late as Wycliffe's version the word "damn" is usually employed in the sense of condemn, as in Job 9 20, "My mouth shall dampne me." It is even applied to the condemnation of Jesus by the chief priests and scribes (Mk 10 33). This degeneration of the word is perhaps due, as Bishop Sanderson says, "not so much to good acts as to bad manners." Krinō is rendered uniformly "judge" by RV, even where the context compels the thought of condemnation (Jn 3 17.18; 12 47; Acts 7 7; "might be damned," 2 Thess 2 12 AV; Rom 14 22; Jas 5 9).

(2) The more specific sense of condemn, however, is found in κατακρίνω, katakrinō, "to judge one down" (Mt 12 41.42; Mk 14 64): "is damned if he eat" (Rom 14 23; 1 Cor 11 32 AV; RV "condemned"). See also Mk 16 16; 2 Pet 2 6.

(3) For "condemnation" there is the noun κρίμα, kríma, or κρίμα, kríma (for accent see Thayer's Lexicon), in a forensic sense, "the sentence of the judge" (Lk 23 40; Mt 23 14, omitted in RV; "condemnation of the devil" 1 Tim 3 6; 5 12; Jude ver 4).

(4) Much stronger is κατάκριμα, katakríma, "condemnation" (Rom 5 16.18; 8 1) with reference to the Divine judgment against sin.

(5) κρίσις, krisis, "the process of judgment," "tribunal" (Jn 3 19; 5 24), with reference to "the judgment brought by men upon themselves because of their rejection of Christ."

(6) A stronger word is the adj. αὐτοκατάκριτος, autokatakrítos, "self-condemned" (Tit 3 11; cf 1 Jn 3 20.21). G. H. TREVER

CONEY, kō'ni (צִנְצִי, shāphān [Lev 11 5; Dt 14 7; Ps 104 18; Prov 30 26]): The word "coney" (formerly pronounced cooney) means "rabbit" (from Lat cuniculus). Shāphān is rendered in all four passages in the LXX χοιρογρύλλιος, choirogryllios, or "hedge-hog," but is now universally considered to refer to the Syrian hyrax, Procavia (or Hyrax) Syriaca, which in southern Pal and Sinai is called in Arab. wabar, in northern Pal and Syria īabsūn, and in southern Arabia shufun, which is etymologically closely akin to shāphān. The word "hyrax" (ὕραξ, hūraz) itself means "mouse" or "shrew-mouse" (cf Lat sorex), so that it seems to have been hard to find a name peculiar to this animal. In Lev 11 5 RVm, we find "rock badger," which is a tr of klip das, the rather inappropriate name given by the Boers to the Cape hyrax. The Syrian hyrax lives in Syria, Pal and Arabia. A number of other species, including several that are arboreal, live in Africa. They are not found in other parts of the world. In size, teeth and habits the Syrian hyrax somewhat resembles the rabbit, though it is different in color, being reddish brown, and lacks the long hind legs of the rabbit. The similarity in dentition is confined to the large size of the front teeth and the presence of a large space between them and the back teeth. But whereas hares have a pair of front teeth on each jaw, the hyrax has one pair above and two below. These teeth differ also in structure from those of the hare and rabbit, not having the persistent pulp which enables the rabbit's front teeth to grow continually as they are worn away. They do not hide among herbage like hares, nor burrow like rabbits, but live in holes or clefts of the rock, frequently in the faces of steep cliffs. Neither the hyrax nor the hare is a ruminant, as seems to be implied in Lev 11 5 and Dt 14 7, but their manner of chewing their food may readily have led them to be thought to chew the cud. The hyrax has four toes in front and three behind (the same number as in the tapir and in some fossil members of the horse family), all furnished with nails that are almost like hoofs, except the inner hind toes, which have claws. The hyraxes constitute a family of ungulates and, in spite of their small size, have points of resemblance to elephants or rhinoceroses, but are not closely allied to these or to any other known animals.

The camel, the coney and the hare are in the list of unclean animals because they "chew the cud but divide not the hoof," but all three of these are eaten by the Arabs.

The illustration is from a photograph of a group of conies in the Syrian Protestant College at Beirut, prepared by Mr. Douglas Carruthers, who collected these specimens in a cliff in the neighborhood of Tyre. Specimens from the Dead Sea are redder than those from Syria.

CONFECTION, kon-fek'shun, CONFECTIONARY, kon-fek'shun-ā-ri (רִקְחָה, rōkḥāh, "perfume," "spice," רִקְחָה, raḳḳāhāh, fem. "perfumer"):

(1) "Confection" is found in AV only, and but once "a c. after the art of the apothecary" (Ex 30 35; RV "perfume"); but the RV renders 1 Ch 9 30, "the c. [AV "ointment"] of the spices." It stands for something "made up," a mixture of perfumes or medicines, but never sweetmeats, as c. means with us.

(2) Likewise a "confectionary" is a perfumer. This word, too, is found but once (1 S 8 13), "He will take your daughters to be perfumers [AV "confectionaries"], and to be cooks, and to be bakers." See PERFUMES.

GEO. B. EAGER

CONFEDERATE, kon-fed'er-āt, CONFEDERACY, kon-fed'er-a-si: "Confederate" as an adj. in the sense of united or leagued is twice the tr of בְּרִית, berīth, "covenant," in several instances tr<sup>d</sup> "league" (Gen 14 13, ba'al berīth, "lord or master of a covenant," "an ally," "these were c. with Abram"; cf Ps 83 5; once of נִיחָה, nūḥāh, "to rest," "Syria is c. with Ephraim" (Isa 7 2, RVm "resteth on Ephraim"; also 1 Macc 10 47).

As a noun "confederate" occurs in 1 Macc 10 16, sūmmachos, "confederates" (1 Macc 8 20.24.31; 14 40; 15 17).

Confederacy, as a "league," occurs as the tr of berīth, "the men of thy c." (Ob ver 7); as a conspiracy it occurs in Isa 8 12 bis, as tr of kesher from kāshar, "to bind": "Say ye not, a c." Cf 2 S 15 12; 2 K 12 20, etc.

W. L. WALKER

CONFER, kon-fūr', CONFERENCE, kon-fēr-ens: The equivalent of three Gr words of different shades of meaning. In Gal 1 16, προσαναριθμη, prosanatithēmi, had been used in classical writers for resorting to oracles (Lightfoot on Gal 2 6; Ellicott on Gal 1 16); hence, "to take counsel with," "to consult." In Acts 4 15, συμβάλλω, sumballō, "to compare views," "discuss"; and in Acts 25 12, σullaλέω, sullalēō, "to talk together." Cf the single passage in the OT (1 K 1 7).

CONFESSION, kon-fesh'un (יָדָה, yādhāh; ὁμολογέω, homologéō, and their derivatives): The radical meaning is "acknowledgment," "avowal," with the implication of a change of conviction or of course of conduct on the part of the subject. In Eng. "profession" (AV 1 Tim 6 12; He 3 1; 4 14), besides absence of the thought just suggested, emphasizes the publicity of the act. C., like its Gr equivalent, connotes, as its etymology shows (Lat con, Gr homōi), that the act places one in harmony with others. It is the uniting in a statement that has previously been made by someone else. Of the two Gr words from the same root in the NT, the compound with the Gr preposition ek found, among other places, in Mt 3 6; Acts 19 18; Rom 14 11; Phil 2 11, implies that it has come from an inner impulse, i.e. it is the expression of a conviction of the heart. It is referred anthropopathically to God in Job 40 14, where Jeh says to the patriarch sarcastically: "Then will I also confess of [unto] thee"; and in Rev 3 5, where it means "to recognize" or "acknowledge."

When man is said to confess or make confession, the contents of the confession are variously distinguished. All, however, may be grouped under two heads, confession of faith and confession of sin. Confessions of faith are public acknowledgments of fidelity to God, and to the truth through which God is revealed, as 1 K 8 33. They are declarations of unqualified confidence in Christ, and of surrender to His service; Mt 10 32: "Every one . . . who shall confess me before men." In Phil 2 11, however, c. includes, alongside of willing, also unwilling, acknowledgment of the sovereignty of Jesus. The word c. stands also for everything contained in the Christian religion—"the faith" used in the objective and widest sense, in He 3 1; 4 14. In both these passages, the allusion is to the NT. The "High Priest of our c." (He 3 1) is the High Priest, of whom we learn and with whom we deal in that new revelation, which in that epistle is contrasted with the old.

Confessions of sins are also of various classes:

(1) To God alone. Wherever there is true repentance for sin, the penitent freely confesses his guilt to Him, against whom he has sinned. This is described in Ps 32 3-6; cf 1 Jn 1 9; Prov 28 13. Such c. may be made either silently, or, as in Dnl 9 19, orally; it may be general, as in Ps 51, or particular, as when some special sin is recognized; it may even extend to what has not been discovered, but which is believed to exist because of recognized inner depravity (Ps 19 12), and thus include the state as well as the acts of sin (Rom 7 18). (2) To one's neighbor, when he has been wronged (Lk 17 4): "If he sin against thee seven times in the day, and seven times turn again to thee, saying, I repent; thou shalt forgive him." It is to this form of c. that James refers (5 16): "Confess . . . your sins one to another"; cf Mt 5 23 f. (3) To a spiritual adviser or minister of the word, such as the c. of David to Nathan (2 S 12 13), of the multitudes to John in the wilderness (Mt 3 6), of the Ephesians to Paul (Acts 19 18). This c. is a general acknowledgment of sinfulness, and enters into an enumeration of details only when the conscience is particularly burdened. (4) To the entire church, where some crime has created public scandal. As "secret sins are to be rebuked secretly, and public sins publicly," in the apostolic age, where there was genuine penitence for a notorious offence, the acknowledgment was as public as the deed itself. An illustration of this is found in the well-known case at Corinth (cf 1 Cor 5 3 ff with 2 Cor 2 6 f).

For auricular c. in the sense of the mediaeval and Rom church, there is no authority in Holy Scripture. It is traceable to the practice of examining those who were about to make a public c. of some notorious offence, and of giving advice concerning how far the circumstances of the sin were to be announced; an expedient that was found advisable, since as much injury could be wrought by injudicious publishing of details in the c. as by the sin itself. The practice once introduced for particular cases was in time extended to all cases; and the private c. of sin was demanded by the church as a condition of the absolution, and made an element of penitence, which was analyzed into contrition, confession and satisfaction. See the Examen Concilii Tridentini (1st ed, 1565) of Dr. Martin Chemnitz, superintendent of Brunswick, for a thorough exegetical and historical discussion of this entire subject. On the historical side, see also Henry Charles Lea, History of Auricular Confession and Indulgences in the Latin Church (3 vols, Philadelphia, 1896).

CONFIDENCE, kon'fi-dens (כִּזְזִי, bāṭah, and forms, כֶּסֶל, keṣel; παρρησία, parrhēsia, πείθω, peithō, πεποιθήσις, pepoithēsis, ὑπόστασις, hypóstasis): The chief Heb word tr<sup>d</sup> "confidence" (bāṭah, and its forms) means, perhaps, radically, "to be open," showing thus what originated the idea of "confidence"; where there was nothing hidden a person felt safe; it is very frequently rendered "trust." In Ps 118 8.9 we have "It is better to take refuge in Jeh than to put confidence in princes," and in 65 5, "O God of our salvation, thou that art the confidence [mibhtāh] of all the ends of the earth." Mibhtāh is tr<sup>d</sup> "confidence" in Job 18 14; 31 24; Prov 21 22, etc.

Keṣel ("firmness," "stoutness") is rendered "confidence" in Prov 3 26, and kislah in Job 4 6; peithō ("to persuade") is tr<sup>d</sup> "confidence" in 2 Cor 2 3; Gal 5 10, etc; pepoithēsis, in 2 Cor 1 15; 8 22, etc; hypostasis ("what stands under"), in 2 Cor 11 17; He 3 14; 2 Cor 9 4; parrhēsia ("out-spokenness," "boldness") is invariably tr<sup>d</sup> in RV "boldness" (Acts 28 31; He 3 6; 4 16; 1 Jn 2 28; 3 21; 5 14); tharseō or tharrhēō ("to have good courage") is so tr<sup>d</sup> in RV, "being therefore always of good courage" (2 Cor 5 6); "I am of good courage concerning you" (2 Cor 7 16), AV "confident" and "confidence."

RV has "confidence" for "hope" (Job 8 14); for "assurance" (Isa 32 17); for "trust" (2 Cor 3 4); for "same confident boasting" (2 Cor 9 4); "is confident" for "trusted" (Job 40 23); "to have confidence" for "thinketh that he hath whereof he might trust" (Phil 3 4); "confidently" for "constantly" (Acts 12 15); "confidently affirm" for "affirm" (1 Tim 1 7); conversely, we have for "his confidence" (Job 18 14), "wherein he trusteth," for "with confidence" (Ezk 28 26) "securely therein."

The Bible teaches the value of confidence (Isa 30 15; He 10 35), but neither in "gold" (Job 31 24), nor in man, however great (Ps 118 8.9; Jer 17 5), nor in self (Prov 14 16; Phil 3 3), but in God (Ps 65 5; Prov 3 26; 14 26), as revealed in Christ (Eph 3 12; 1 Jn 5 13.14).

W. L. WALKER

CONFIRM, kon-fûrm, CONFIRMATION, kon-fēr-mā'shun: In the OT represented by several Heb words, generally with reference to an increase of external strength, as "c. the feeble knees" (Isa 35 3); "c. the kingdom" (2 K 15 19); "c. inheritance" (Ps 68 9). In the NT, this external, objective sense is expressed by βεβαίωω, bebaioō, as in Mk 16 20; Rom 15 8. The strengthening of mind, purpose, conviction, i.e. the inner or subjective sense (Acts 14 22; 15 32.41) corresponds to ἐπιστηρίζω, epistērízō. Used also of ratifying or making valid (κυρώω, kurōō) a covenant (Gal 3 15). The noun is used in the second sense (He 6 16; Phil 1 7). Confirmation, the rite, in some denominations, of admission to the full communion of the church, which the Rom church has elevated to the place of a sacrament, has only ecclesiastical, but no Scriptural, authority. It is grounded, however, in the Scriptural precedent of the laying on of hands after baptism. See HANDS, IMPOSITION OF.

CONFISCATION, kon-fis-kā'shun. See PUNISHMENTS.

CONFLICT, kon'fikt (ἀγών, agōn, "contest," "fight"): In Phil 1 30, "having the same c. which ye saw in me," and Col 2 1 AV; 1 Thess 2 2 (AV "contention"); ἀθλησις, athlēsis (lit. "combat in the public games"), in He 10 32 (AV "fight"). See also AGONY.

CONFORM, kon-fôrm', CONFORMABLE, kon-fôrm'a-b'l (συνμορφώω, summorphōō, "to become or be like," or "of the same form"): Indicating an inner change of nature, working into the outward life (Rom 8 29; Phil 3 10.21); while συσχηματίζω, syschēmatizō, "fashioned according to" (Rom 12 21 RV, AV "conformed"), refers to that which is external.

CONFOUND, kon-found': The physical origin of spiritual terms is well illustrated by the principal Heb words for "confounded" (rendered also "ashamed," etc); בֹּשָׁם, bōsh, is "to become pale" (2 K 19 26; Job 6 20; Ps 83 17; 129 5 AV; Isa 19 9, etc); חָפַז, hāphēz, "to become red" (Ps 35 4; Isa 1 29; 24 23, "the moon shall be confounded," Mic 3 7); יָבַשׁ, yābhash, "to be dried up" (Jer 46 24 AV; 48 1 20 AV; 50 2 AV; Zec 10 5); כָּלַם, kālam, "to blush" (Ps 69 6 AV; Isa 41 11, etc). In Gen 11 7.9, of the confusion of tongues, the word is בָּלַל, bālal, "to mix," "mingle." In Jer 1 17 AV it is חָתַח, hāthath, "to bring or put down."

In NT, kataischinō, "to put to shame" (1 Cor 1 27 AV; 1 Pet 2 6 AV); and sugchinō, "to pour together," "bewilder" (Acts 2 6; 9 22). RV frequently gives "ashamed" and "put to shame" instead of "confounded." W. L. WALKER

CONFUSION, kon-fū'zhun (בֹּשֶׁת, bōsheth, "shame, paleness," כְּלִמְיָה, kelimmāh, "blushing," תֹּהוּ, tōhū; ἀκαταστασία, akatastasia, σύγχυσις, sugchusis): In the OT bōsheth (1 S 20 30; Ps 109 29 AV) and kelimmāh (Ps 44 15; Isa 30 3) are the words most frequently tr<sup>d</sup> "confusion"; tōhū, "wastiness," "emptiness" is so tr<sup>d</sup> (Isa 24 10; 34 11; 41 29), also kālōn, "lightness," "contempt" (Job 10 15 = ignominy, ARV) and tebhel, "profanation" (Lev 18 23; 20 12); ra'ash, "shaking," "trembling," rendered "confused" in Isa 9 5 AV; cf RV. Gr akatastasia, "instability" is tr<sup>d</sup> "confusion" (1 Cor 14 33; Jas 3 16); sugchusis, "a pouring out together" (Acts 19 29). In Wisd 14 26, "changing of kind" (AV) is rendered "confusion of sex." W. L. WALKER

CONFUSION OF TONGUES. See BABEL, TOWER OF; TONGUES, CONFUSION OF.

CONGREGATION, kon-grē-gā'shun (קָהָל, kāhāl, קִרְיָה, 'edhah): These two words rendered by "congregation" or "assembly" are used 1. Terms apparently without any difference of sense. They appear to include an assembly of the whole people or any section that might be present on a given occasion. Indeed, sometimes the idea appears to correspond closely to that conveyed by "horde," or even by "crowd." 'Edhah is once used of bees (Jgs 14 8). It has been sought to distinguish the two words by means of Lev 4 13, "if the whole 'edhah of Israel err, and the thing be hid from the eyes of the kāhāl." The kāhāl would then be the smaller body representing the whole 'ēdhāh, but the general usage is not favorable to this view (compare e.g. Ex 12 19, "cutting off from the 'ēdhāh of Israel," with Nu 19 20, "cutting off from the kāhāl"). The idea denoted by these words is said by Wellhausen to be "foreign to Heb antiquity," though it "runs through the PC from beginning to end" (Prolegomena, 78). Yet it is Dt that presents us with laws excluding certain classes from the kāhāl, and the word is also found in Gen 49 6; Nu 22 4 (RV "multitude"); Dt 5 22; 9 10; 31 30; Josh 8 35; 1 S 17 47; 1 K 8 14; Mic 2 5, and other early passages, while 'ēdhāh occurs in 1 K 12 20 (see further, Eerdmans, Das Buch Exodus, 80 f). On the other hand taste and euphony appear to be responsible for the choice of one or other of the words in many cases. Thus the Chronicler uses kāhāl frequently, but 'ēdhāh only once (2 Ch 5 6 = 1 K 8 5).

Moses provided for the summoning of the congregation by trumpets (Nu 10 2-8). For the sin offering to be brought if the whole

2. Legal congregation erred, see Lev 4 13-21.

Provisions Dt 23 1-8 (in Heb 2-9) excludes bastards, Ammonites and Moabites from the assembly, even to the tenth generation, while Edomites and Egyptians were admitted in the third. Those who suffer from certain physical defects are also excluded.

One other word must be noted, מוֹעֵד, mō'ēdh. It occurs often in the phrase 'ōhel mō'ēdh ("tent of meeting"; see TABERNACLE). But in Nu 16 2 we find it used of certain

3. Other Terms princes who were "men of renown called to the assembly."

For עֲצֵרֶת, 'ācereth, rendered by RV "solemn assembly," see FEASTS. On מִקְרָא, mikrā, see CONVOCATION.

HAROLD M. WIENER

CONGREGATION, MOUNT OF (הַר־מוֹעֵד, har-mō'ēdh, Isa 14 13): The prophet has depicted the excitement caused in Sheol by the descent of the once mighty king of Babylon into the world of shades, and now himself points the contrast between the monarch's former haughty boastings and his present weak and hopeless condition: "Thou saidst in thy heart, I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God; and I will sit upon the mount of congregation, in the uttermost parts of the north." Instead he is brought down "to the uttermost parts of the pit" (ver 15). By the "mount of congregation" (meeting or assembly) is evidently meant the fancied Olympus of the gods on some lofty northern height. The king vaunted that he would make his abode with the gods in heaven; now he is cast down to the depths of Sheol.

CONIAH, kō-nī'a (כְּנִיָּהּ, konyāhū, "Jah is creating"): A form of the name Jehoiachin, found in Jer 22 24, 28; 37 1. See JEHOIACHIN.

CONONIAH, kon-ō-nī'a. See CONANIAH.

CONQUEROR, koṇ'kēr-ēr: Known only in the compound vb. (ὑπερνικῶμεν, hypervnikōmen, Rom 8 37): A usual meaning of the preposition in composition is "above all measure"; hence "more than conquerors," RV, AV. The comparison is to the completeness of the victory. Others may place their enemies in subjection; those here mentioned master not only their foes, but themselves. Others destroy their foes and their resources; while those who are "more than conquerors" convert foes into means of still farther promoting the interests for which they struggle (Rom 3 3-5). Nor is the victory external and transient, but internal and permanent.

I. Sequent Conscience.—The aspect of conscience earliest noticed in lit. and most frequently referred to at all times is what is called the

1. Judicial Sequent Conscience—that is to say, it follows action.

This is (1) judicial. No sooner is a decision formed than there ensues a judgment favorable or adverse, a sentence of guilty or not guilty. Conscience has often been compared to a court of law, in which there are culprit, judge, witnesses and jury; but these are all in the subject's own breast, and are in fact himself.

It is (2) punitive. In the individual's own breast are not only the figures of justice already mentioned, but the executioner as well; for, on the back of a sentence of condemnation or acquittal, there immediately follows the pain of a wounded or the satisfaction of an approving conscience; and of all human miseries or blisses this is the most poignant. Esp. has the remorse of an evil conscience impressed the human imagination, in such instances as Cain and Judas, Saul and Herod; and the poets, those knowers of human nature, have found their most moving themes in the delineation of this aspect of human experience. The ancient poets represented the terrors of conscience under the guise of the Erinyes or Furies, who, with swift, silent, unswerving footstep, tracked the criminal and pulled him down, while Shakespeare, in such dramas as Macbeth and Richard the Third, has burned the same lessons into the imagination of all readers of his works. The satisfaction of a good conscience may stamp itself on the habitual serenity of one face, and the accusations of an evil conscience may impart a hunted and sinister expression to another (cf Wisd 17 11).

It is (3) predictive. There is no instinct in the soul of man more august than the anticipation of something after death—of a tribunal

3. Predictive at which the whole of life will be reviewed and retribution awarded with perfect justice according to the deeds done in the body. It is this which imparts to death its solemnity; we instinctively know that we are going to our account. And such great natural instincts cannot be false.

It is (4) social. Not only does a man's own conscience pass sentence on his conduct, but the consciences of others pass sentence on it too; and to this may be due a great

4. Social intensification of the consequent sensations. Thus, a crime may lie hidden in the memory, and the pain of its guilt may be assuaged by the action of time, when suddenly and unexpectedly it is found out and exposed to the knowledge of all; and, only when the force of the public conscience breaks forth on the culprit, driving him from society, does he feel his guilt in all its magnitude. The "Day of Judgment" (q.v.), as it is represented in Scripture, is an application of this principle on a vast scale; for there the character and conduct of everyone will be submitted to the conscience of all. On the other hand, a friend may be to a man a second conscience, by which his own conscience is kept alive and alert; and this approval from without may, in some cases, be, even more than the judgment within, an encouragement to everything that is good or a protection against temptation.

II. Antecedent Conscience.—From the Sequent is distinguished the Antecedent Conscience, which designates a function of this faculty preceding moral decision or action. When the will stands at the parting of the ways, seeing clearly before it the right course and the wrong, conscience commands to strike into the one and forbids to choose the other. This is its imperative; and—to employ the language of Kant—it is a categorical imperative. What conscience commands may be apparently against our interests, and it may be completely contrary to our inclinations; it may be opposed to the advice of friends or to the solicitations of companions; it may contradict the decrees of principalities and powers or the voices of the multitude; yet conscience in no way withdraws or modifies its claim. We may fail to obey, giving way to passion or being overborne by the allurements of temptation; but we know that we ought to obey; it is our duty; and this is a sublime and sacred word. The great crises of life arise when conscience is issuing one command and self-interest or passion or authority another, and the question has to be decided which of the two is to be obeyed. The interpreters of human life have known how to make use of such moments, and many of the most memorable scenes in literature are of this nature; but the actual history of mankind has also been dignified with numerous instances in which confessors and martyrs, standing on the same ground, have faced death rather than contravene the dictates of the authority within; and there never passes an hour in which the eye of the All-seeing does not behold someone on earth putting aside the bribes of self-interest or the menaces of authority and paying tribute to conscience by doing the right and taking the consequences.

III. Intuitional and Associational Theories.—Up to this point there is little difficulty or difference of opinion; but now we come to a point at which very differing views emerge. It was remarked above, that when anyone stands at the parting of the ways, seeing clearly the right course and the wrong, conscience imperatively commands him which to choose and which to avoid; but how does anyone know which of the two alternatives is the right and which the wrong? Does conscience still suffice here, or is he dependent on another faculty? Here the Intuitional and the Associational, or—speaking broadly—the Scotch and the English, the German and the French schools of ethics diverge, those on the one side holding that conscience has still essential guidance to give, while those on the other maintain that the guidance must now be undertaken by other faculties. The Sensational or Experimental school holds that we are dependent on the authority of society or on our own estimate of the consequences of actions, while the opposite school teaches that in the conscience there is a clear revelation of certain moral laws, approving certain principles of action and disapproving others. The strong point of the former view is the diversity which has existed among human beings in different ages and in different latitudes as to what is right and what is wrong. What was virtuous in Athens might be sinful in Jerus; what is admired as heroism in Japan may be despised as fool-hardiness in Britain. To this it may be replied, first, that the diversity has been greatly exaggerated; the unanimity of the human conscience under all skies being greater than is allowed by philosophers of this school. "Let any plain, honest man," says Butler, "before he engages in any course of action, ask himself, Is this I am going about right, or is it wrong? Is it good, or is it evil? and I do not in the least doubt but that this question will be answered agreeably to truth and virtue by almost any fair man in almost any circumstances." Then, there are many moral judgments supposed to be immediate verdicts of conscience which are really logical inferences from the utterances of this faculty and are liable to all the fallacies by which reasoning in any department of human affairs is beset. It is only for the major premise, not for the conclusion, that conscience is responsible. The strong point of the Intuitional school, on the other hand, is the power and right of the individual to break away from the habits of society, and, in defiance of the commands of authority or the voices of the multitude, to follow a course of his own. When he does so, is it a logical conclusion as to the consequences of action he is obeying, or a higher intuition? When, for example, Christianity announced the sinfulness of fornication in opposition to the laxity of Greece and Rome, was it an argument about consequences with which she operated successfully, or an instinct of purity which she divined at the back of the actions and opinions of heathendom? The lettering of the moral law may have to be picked out and cleansed from the accumulations of time, but the inscription is there all the same.

IV. The Education of Conscience.—It may be, however, that a more exact analysis of the antecedent conscience is requisite. Between the categorical imperative, which commands to choose the right path and avoid the wrong, and the indicative, which declares that this is the right way and that the wrong, there ought perhaps to be assumed a certainty that one of the alternative ways is right and must be pursued at all hazards, while the other is wrong and must be abandoned at whatever cost. This perception, that moral distinctions exist, separate from each other as heaven and hell, is the peculiarity of conscience; but it does not exclude the necessity for taking time to ascertain, in every instance, which of the alternatives has the one character and which the other, or for employing a great variety of knowledge to make this sure. Those who would limit conscience to the faculty which utters the major premises of moral reasoning are wont to hold that it can never err and does not admit of being educated; but such a use of the term is too remote from common usage, and there must be room left for the conscience to enlighten itself by making acquaintance with such objective standards as the character of God, the example of Christ, and the teaching of Scripture, as well as with the maxims of the wise and the experience of the good.

Another question of great interest about the conscience is, whether it involves an intuition of God. When it is suffering the pain of remorse, who is it that inflicts the punishment? Is it only the conscience itself? Or is man, in such experiences, aware of the existence of a Being outside of and above himself? When the will is about to act, it receives the command to choose the right and refuse the wrong; but who issues this command? Is it only itself, or does the imperative come with a sanction and solemnity betokening a higher origin? Conscience is an intuition of moral law—the reading, so to speak, of a luminous writing, which hangs out there, on the bosom of Nature—but who penned that writing? It used to be thought that the word Conscience implied, in its very structure, a reference to God, meaning lit. "knowledge along with another," the other being God. Though this derivation be uncertain, many think that it exactly expresses the truth. There are few people with an ethical experience of any depth who have not sometimes been overwhelmingly conscious of the approval or disapproval of an unseen Being; and, if there be any trustworthy argument for the existence of a Deity, prior to supernatural revelation, this is where it is to be found.

V. History and Literature.—Only a few indications of history can be given here. The conscience, at least the sequent conscience, was identified in the ancient world, and the rise of a doctrine on the subject belongs to the period when the human mind, being shut out from public activity through political changes, was thrown back upon itself and began to watch closely its own symptoms. The word has a specially prominent place in the philosophical writings of Cicero. Strange to say, it does not occur in the OT; but, though not the name, the thing appears there frequently enough. On the very first page of revelation, the voice of God is heard calling among the trees of the garden (Gen 3 8); and, in the very next incident, the blood of Abel cries out to heaven from the ground (Gen 4 10). In the NT the word occurs with tolerable frequency, esp. in the speeches (Acts 24 16, etc) and writings of St. Paul (Rom 2 15; 9 1; 13 5; 1 Cor 6 7-12, etc); and this might have been expected to secure for it a prominent place in the doctrine of the church. But this did not immediately take effect, although Chrysostom already speaks of Conscience and Nature as two books in which the human mind can read of God, previous to supernatural revelation. In the Middle Ages the conscience received from two sources so much stimulation that both thing and name were certain to come into greater prominence in the speculations of the schools. The one of these influences was the rise of Monasticism, which, driving human beings into solitude, made the movements of their own minds the objects of everlasting study to themselves; and the other was the practice of auricular confession, which became, especially to many of the inmates of the houses of religion, the most interesting business of life; because, in order to meet the confessor, they scanned every thought and weighed every scruple, becoming adepts at introspection and self-discipline. Thus it came to pass that ethics took the form of Cases of Conscience, the priest having to train himself, or to be trained by professors and through books, to be able to answer every query submitted to him in the confessional. The ripe fruit of this method appears in the Summa of Aquinas, who discusses elaborately the doctrine of conscience, dividing it into two parts—synderesis (from συντήρησις, suntêrêsis) and scientia—the one of which supplies the major premises and cannot err, while the other draws the inferences therefrom and is liable to make mistakes. The Mystics identified the synderesis as the point in the spirit of man at which it can be brought into contact and connection with the Spirit of God.

At the Reformation the conscience was much in the mouths of men, both because the terrors of conscience formed a preparation for comprehending justification by faith and because, in appearing before principalities and powers in vindication of their action, the Reformers took their stand on conscience, as Luther did so memorably at the Diet of Worms; and the assertion of the rights of conscience has ever since been a conspicuous testimony of Protestantism; whereas Romanists, especially as represented by the Jesuits, have treated the conscience as a feeble and ignorant thing, requiring to be led by authority—that is, by themselves. The forms of mediaevalism long clung even to Protestant lit. on this subject. It may not be surprising to find a High Churchman like Jeremy Taylor, in his Ductor Dubitantium, discussing ethics as a system of cases of conscience, but it is curious to find a Puritan like Baxter (in his Christian Directory), and a Scottish Presbyterian like David Dickson (in his Therapeutica Sacra) doing the same. Deism in England and the Enlightenment in Germany magnified the conscience, to which they ascribed such a power of revealing God as made any further revelation unnecessary; but the practical effect was a secularization and vulgarization of the general mind; and it was against these rather than the system which had produced them that Butler in England and Kant in Germany had to raise the standard of a spiritual view of life. The former said of the conscience that, if it had power as it had right, it would absolutely govern the world; and Kant's sublime saying is well known, at the close of his great work on Ethics: "Two things fill the soul with ever new and growing wonder and reverence, the oftener and the longer reflection continues to occupy itself with them—the starry heavens above and the moral law within." The rise of an Associational and Developmental Philosophy in England, represented by such powerful thinkers as the Mills, father and son, Professor Bain and Herbert Spencer, tended to dissipate the halo surrounding the conscience, by representing it as merely an emotional equivalent for the authority of law and the claims of custom, so stamped on the mind by the experience of generations that, its earthly source forgotten, it came to be attributed to supernatural powers. But this school was antagonized with success by such thinkers as Martineau and T. H. Green. R. Rothe regarded conscience as a term too popular and of too variable signification to be of much use in philosophical speculation; but most of the great succession of writers on Christian ethics who followed him have treated it seriously; Dorner esp. recognizing its importance, and Newman Smyth bestowing on it a thoroughly modern treatment. Among German works on the subject that of Gass, which contains an appendix on the history of the term synderesis, is deserving of special attention; that by Kähler is unfinished, as is also the work in Eng. by Robertson; The Christian Conscience by Davison is slight and popular. Weighty discussions will be found in two books on Moral Philosophy—the Handbook of Calderwood, and the Ethics of Mezes. But there is abundance of room for a great monograph on the subject, which would treat conscience in a comprehensive manner as the subjective standard of conduct, formed by progressive familiarity with the objective standards as well as by practice in accordance with its own authority and with the will of God.

CONSECRATE, kon'sê-krât, CONSECRATION, kon-sê-krâ'shun: In the OT for several Heb words of different meanings:

(1) הָרָם, hâram: "I will consecrate [RV "devote"] their gain unto the Lord," i.e. the spoil of the nations shall be dedicated to the

1. In the service of Jeh (Mic 4 13). See BAN; OT CURSE.

(2) נָזַר, nâzar, נִזְרָה, nêzer (Nu 6 7. 9.12; RV "separate"). See NAZIRITE.

(3) קָדַשׁ, kâdhesh: "to be set apart," or "to be holy": of Aaron and his sons (Ex 28 3; 30 30; RV "sanctify"). The silver and gold and brass and iron of the banned city of Jericho are "consecrated" things (RV "holy") unto the Lord (Josh 6 19); of the priests (2 Ch 26 18); of sacrifices (2 Ch 29 33; 31 6; Ezr 3 5). See HOLINESS.

(4) מִלָּאֵךְ, millē' yadh, lit. "to fill the hand"; and subst. pl. מִלָּאֵרִים, millū'im, a peculiar idiom used frequently and generally for the installation of a priest into his office; and subst. for the installation offerings which were probably put into the priest's hands to symbolize his admission into office; hence the phrase, "and thou shalt consecrate Aaron and his sons" (Ex 29 9; so 28 41; 29 29.33.35; 32 29; Lev 8 33; 16 32; 21 10; Nu 3 3; Jgs 17 5.12; 2 Ch 29 31); of Jeroboam's non-Levitical priesthood (1 K 13 33; 2 Ch 13 9); of the altar (Ezk 43 26) and of those who contributed to build the temple (1 Ch 29 5). Subst. of an act of installation (Lev 7 37; 8 33), and of installation offerings (Ex 29 22.26.27.31; Lev 8 22.28.29.31).

2. In the NT In the NT τελειόω, teleiōō, "to make perfect" (He 7 28; RV "perfected"); ἐγκαινίζω, egkainizō, "to make new" (He 10 20; RV "dedicated"). T. REES

CONSENT, kon-sent': The vb. implies compliance with the guidance and direction of another, and, therefore, a secondary and subordinate relation of approval, sympathy and concurrence on the part of the one who consents. He does not take the initiative, but yields to what the principal proposes. The phrase ἐκ συμφώνου, ek sumphōnou, "by consent," means "by mutual agreement" (1 Cor 7 5), both parties concerned being placed on an equality. "With one consent" (Zeph 3 9, Heb "with one shoulder"; Lk 14 18) suggests, although it does not necessarily imply, the result of deliberation and consultation; it may have no other force than that of unanimity. H. E. JACOBS

CONSIDER, kon-sid'ēr: In the NT the force of the word is brought out most vividly in Mt 6 26 (καταμανθάνω, katamanthānō), where it means to "examine closely," as though the observer had to bend down for this purpose, and in Lk 12 27; He 10 24 (katanoō, to "observe well"), while in He 13 7 the anatheōrēō, "look up toward" or "look again at" is consistent with the reverential regard commended in the context. Used in the OT for a variety of Heb terms, signifying inspecting (Prov 31 16), examining (Lev 13 13), giving serious thoughts to (Ps 77 5; Isa 1 3), it often means little more than "see" or "behold" (Ps 8 3; 9 13).

CONSIST, kon-sist' (συνίστημι, sunistēmi): To stand together, exist, subsist (Col 1 17, "in him all things consist," i.e. the continuance of the universe is dependent upon His support and administration). In Lk 12 15, it tr<sup>s</sup> the vb. εἶμι, eimí, "to be," to express the thought that wealth is only an accident, not an essential to the highest ideal of life.

CONSOLATION, kon-sō-lā'shun (παράκλησις, paráklesis): "Consolation of Israel" (Lk 2 25), refers to the fulfilment of the promises in Isa 40 1 ff. See COMFORT. "Son of consolation" (Acts 4 36 AV and ARVm); see BARNABAS.

CONSORT, kon-sórt' (προσκληρώ, prosklēōō, "to allot," Acts 17 4). The vb. may be either in the middle or passive voice. RV, AV, and Luther's German tr regard it as middle, and render it: "cast their lots with," "associated," "united with." In advocacy of the passive, see Alford's Greek Testament, proposing: "were added," as if by lot, the allotment being determined by God who gave them the Holy Spirit directing their choice. The Eng. has the Lat for "lot" as its base.

CONSPIRACY, kon-spir'a-si. See CONFEDERACY.

CONSTANT, kon'stant, CONSTANTLY, kon'stant-li: In 1 Ch 28 (hāzak) meaning "firm," "strong." In Prov 21 28 the advb. ("constantly") of AV is replaced in ARV by "shall speak so as to endure," ERV "unchallenged." RV gives "confidently" for AV "constantly" in Acts 12 15; Tit 3 8.

CONSTELLATIONS, kon-ste-lā'shuns (כְּסִילִים, k'silīm, lit. "Orions"). See ASTRONOMY, II, 11.

CONSTRAIN, kon-strān': Generally in the sense of pressing urgently (2 K 4 8; Lk 24 29; Acts 16 15), to impel or carry away (2 Cor 5 14); sometimes to be compelled of necessity (Job 32 18; Acts 28 19; cf Gal 6 12). See COMPEL.

CONSULT, kon-sult' (שָׁאַל, shā'al, מָלַךְ, mālakh, יָצַף, yā'af, יָעַץ [Aram.] y'at; συμβουλευόμεναι, sumbouleuōmai):

(1) "To ask," "inquire," "seek advice." Ezekiel speaks of the king of Bab consulting the teraphim (Ezk 21 21), and the Israelites were admonished to have nothing to do with "a consulter with a familiar spirit" (Dt 18 11). See ASTROLOGY; COMMUNION WITH DEMONS; DIVINATION.

(2) "To take counsel," "devise," "plan." The various officials of Babylon "consulted together to establish a royal statute" (Dnl 6 7; cf Mt 26 4).

(3) "To deliberate with one's self," "make up one's mind." Nehemiah consulted with himself as to what might be done for Jerus (Neh 5 7). Jesus spoke of a king "consulting" (AV) whether he be able to wage a war (Lk 14 31; RV "take counsel"). A. W. FORTUNE

CONSUME, kon-sūm' (אָכַל, 'akhal, כָּלָה, kālāh, תָּמַם, tāmam; ἀναλίσκω, analiskō): In OT 'akhal ("to eat," "devour") occurs very frequently, and is tr<sup>d</sup> "consumed" (Gen 31 40; Ex 15 7; Ps 78 63, etc); kālāh ("to finish") is also frequently tr<sup>d</sup> "consume," "consumed" (Gen 41 30; Ex 32 10; Ps 69 13, etc); tāmam, "to be perfect," "finished" (Nu 17 13; Dt 2 15; Ps 73 19, etc). There are many other words tr<sup>d</sup> "consume" and "consumed," e.g. šūph, "to end" (Jer 8 13; Dnl 2 44; Zeph 1 2.3); bālāh, "to fade," "wear away" (Job 13 28; Ps 49 14); gāzal, implying violence (Job 24 19); šāphāh, "to end" (Gen 19 15.17; Isa 7 20, etc); āshēsh, "to be old" (Ps 6 7; 31 9.10 AV); māḳak, "to become completed" (Ezk 4 17; Zec 14 12 bis); āsāh kālāh is rendered "utterly consume" (Neh 9 31); analiskō, "to use up," occurs in Lk 9 54; Gal 5 15; 2 Thess 2 8 (AV); dapanōō, "to spend," is tr<sup>d</sup> "consume" in Jas 4 3 (RV "spend"); katalanaliskō, "to consume utterly," occurs only in He 12 29; "for our God is a consuming fire."

In RV "devour," "devoured" are several times substituted for "consume," "consumed," e.g. Job 20 26; Jer 49 27; Nu 16 35; "boil well" (Ezk 24 10); for "be consumed with dying" (Nu 17 13), "perish all of us"; "consume" is substituted for "corrupt" in Mt 6 19; "my spirit is consumed," for "my breath is corrupt" (Job 17 1); instead of "the flame consumeth the chaff" (Isa 5 24) we have "as the dry grass sinketh down in the flame"; and for "whom the Lord shall consume" (2 Thess 2 8), RV reads (after a different text) "whom the Lord Jesus shall slay," "consume" in ARVm.

CONSUMMATION, kon-su-mā'shun (כְּלִיָּה, kil-lāyōn, fr כָּלָה, kālāh): The word, meaning destruction, completion, or failing (Isa 10 23; 28 22; Dnl 9 27) is tr<sup>d</sup> interchangeably in the AV for another

Heb word referring to a physical disease, and best tr<sup>d</sup> "consumption"; cf Lev 26 16; Dt 28 22. Not used in RV. The Heb variously but more accurately tr<sup>d</sup> "full end"; cf Dnl 9 27; Isa 10 23; and "destruction"; cf Isa 10 22; 28 22. There seems therefore to be an inconsistency on the part of both the Authorized and Revised tr<sup>s</sup>.

WALTER G. CLIPPINGER

CONSUMPTION, kon-sump'shun (שחפת, shah-phepheth, "wasting away"): One of the punishments which was to follow neglect or breach of the law. It may mean pulmonary consumption, which occurs frequently in Pal; but from its association with fever in the texts, Lev 26 16; Dt 28 22, it is more likely to be the much more common condition of wasting and emaciation from prolonged or often recurring attacks of malarial fever.

CONTAIN, kon-tān'. See CONTINENCY.

CONTEND, kon-tend', CONTENTION, kon-ten'shun: The meeting of effort by effort, striving against opposition; sometimes physically, as in battle (Dt 2 9), or with horses (Jer 12 5), sometimes orally (Neh 13 11), sometimes spiritually (Isa 57 16). In the NT διακρίνειν, diakrinein, for the hostile separation of one from another, dispute (Jude ver 9), or ἐπαγωνίζομαι, epagōnizomai (Jude ver 3), descriptive of the strain to which a contestant is put. The noun is almost universally used with an unfavorable meaning, and as worthy of condemnation, for an altercation arising from a quarrelsome disposition. "By pride cometh only contention" (Prov 13 10). The contentions at Corinth (1 Cor 1 11) called forth the rebukes of Paul. Where used in AV in a good sense (1 Thess 2 2) RV has "conflict." In Acts 15 39, the noun has a peculiar force, where EV translates paroxysmōs (whence Eng. "paroxysm") by "sharp contention." The Gr word refers rather to the inner excitement and irritation than to its outward expression. H. E. JACOBS

CONTENT, kon-tent', CONTENTMENT, kon-tent'ment (צֶדֶק, ya'al; ἀρκέω, arkéō): To be free from care because of satisfaction with what is already one's own. The Heb means simply "to be pleased." The Gr brings out the full force of the word in 1 Tim 6 8; He 13 5. Contentment (1 Tim 6 6) is more inward than satisfaction; the former is a habit or permanent state of mind, the latter has to do with some particular occurrence or object.

CONTINENCY, kon'ti-nen-si (ἐγκρατεῖομαι, egkrateiōmai, "to have self-control" or "continency" RV, "to contain" AV): Paul, although he would that all men were like himself unmarried, yet advises that they should marry if they cannot control their sexual passions, and hold them in complete subjection to Christian motives (1 Cor 7 9). The same Gr vb. is used in 1 Cor 9 25, and tr<sup>d</sup> "is temperate" (AV and ERV) of the athlete who during the period of training abstains from all indulgence in food, drink, and sexual passion. For the general principle as expressed in subst. egkráteia (Acts 24 25; Gal 5 23; 2 Pet 1 6) and adj. egkratēs (Tit 1 8) see TEMPERANCE, TEMPERATE. T. REES

CONTINUAL, kon-tin'ū-al, CONTINUALLY, kon-tin'ū-li: Without cessation, although there may be intervals between its presence; that which regularly recurs throughout a period, as Lk 24 53: "[They] were continually in the temple"; "lest . . . by her continual coming" (Lk 18 5). In OT for Heb tādhār, "pursue," as one drop of rain follows another in swift succession, but more frequently by tāmīdh for offerings repeated at intervals, as

Ex 29 42; occasionally the Heb has the phrase lit. meaning "all the day" (kol ha-yōm), as Gen 6 5. In the NT most frequently for diá pantós, "through all" ("always" Mt 18 10; He 13 15), "sometimes," adialeiptós, "incessantly" (Rom 9 2 AV) and diēnekēs, "continuously" (He 7 3). H. E. JACOBS

CONTINUANCE, kon-tin'ū-ans: Not in RV; in Ps 139 16 AV, as an interpretation of Heb yāmīm, "days," treating of God's prevision, where RV has: "They were all written, even the days that were ordained for me," i.e. all my days were in view, before one of them actually existed. In Isa 64 5 AV, for 'ōlām, "of long time," RV; in Rom 2 7, for hupomonē, "patience," RV, or still better, "stedfastness," RVm.

CONTRADICTION, kon-tra-dik'shun: AV for ἀντιλογία, antilogia (He 7 7; 12 3). In the former passage, RV has "without any dispute," i.e. what has been said requires no argument; in the latter "gainsaying," which is scarcely an improvement, the reference being to the oral attacks upon the words and character of Jesus.

CONTRARY, kon'tra-ri (ἑναντίος, keri; ἐναντίος, enantios): In the OT it has the sense of antagonistic, as one person opposed or hostile to the other, esp. in Lev 26 21.23.24.27.28.40.41, where Jeh declares His attitude toward the people in such phrases as: "If ye will not for all this hearken unto me, but walk c. unto me; then I will walk c. unto you in wrath."

In the NT it has a more varied significance and is applied to both material and human relations as simply opposite, set over against an object or thing. Used of the wind as in Mt 14 24; Mk 6 48; Acts 27 4, where it is spoken of as c. Refers also to conflicting doctrines, customs or beliefs, as 1 Tim 1 10, "and if there be any other thing c. to the sound doctrine." Several other Gr words are tr<sup>d</sup> with almost an identical meaning. Occasionally a prefix gives a slightly different shade of meaning.

WALTER G. CLIPPINGER
CONTRIBUTION, kon-tri-bū'shun (κοινωνία, koinōnía, "communion" or "fellowship," Rom 15 26; 2 Cor 9 13): The meaning "contribution" is drawn from the context, rather than from the Gr word. The phrase in the passage cited, lit. rendered, would be "to exercise" or "put fellowship into activity." The koinōnía subsisting among believers because of their inner communion with Christ places them and their gifts and possessions at the service of one another (see COMMUNION). They are enjoined not to forget to communicate (He 13 16). To be "communicative" (koinōnikoi) is to be a habit of their lives, the Christian principle being that of the holding of all property as a trust, to be distributed as there is need (Acts 2 44f; 2 Cor 8 14f). The first occasion for calling this fellowship into activity, by way of "contributions," was within the church at Jerus and for its needy members (see COMMUNITY OF GOODS). The second occasion was repeatedly from the infant gentile churches for the poor within the same church (Acts 11 29; Rom 15 26; 2 Cor 8 1-4; 9 2); the fellowship thus widening from intra-congregational to general church benevolence. These contributions were gathered weekly (1 Cor 16 2f), were proportioned to the means of the givers (Acts 11 29; 1 Cor 16 2), were not exacted or prescribed, in a legalistic manner, but were called forth as the free-will offerings of grateful hearts (2 Cor 8 7), springing from the community spirit, and were sent to their destination by accredited representatives of the congregations (1 Cor 16 3; Acts 11 30). H. E. JACOBS

CONTRITE, kon'trit, CONTRITION, kon-trish'un (כָּדָה, dakkā, "bruise"): Only in OT (Ps 34 18; Ps 51 17; Isa 57 15); נָכְהָה, nākhēh, "smitten" (Isa 66 2). Contrite, "crushed," is only the superlative of "broken"; "a contrite heart" is "a heart broken to pieces." In Holy Scripture, the heart is the seat of all feeling, whether joy or sorrow. A contrite heart is one in which the natural pride and self-sufficiency have been completely humbled by the consciousness of guilt. The theological term "contrition" designates more than is found in these passages. It refers to the grief experienced as a consequence of the revelation of sin made by the preaching of the law (Jer 23 29). The Augsburg Confession (Art. XII) analyzes repentance into two parts: "Contrition and faith," the one the fruit of the preaching of the law, the other of the gospel. While c. has its degrees, and is not equal in all persons, the promise of forgiveness is not dependent upon the degree of contrition, but solely upon the merit of Christ. It is not simply a precondition of faith, but, as hatred of sin, combined with the purpose, by God's aid, to overcome it, grows with faith. H. E. JACOBS

CONTROVERSY, kon'tro-vēr-si (רִיב, ribh, "strife," "contention"; ὁμολογούμενος, homologouménos, "confessedly," "without controversy"): Used frequently of disputes among men (as Dt 17 8) and then transferred to the justice of God as directed against the sins of men. Thus we read of Jeh's controversy with the nations (Jer 25 31); with the inhabitants of the land (Hos 4 1); with His people (Mic 6 2). "Without controversy" (1 Tim 3 16), a positive rather than a negative expression, "by common consent," or better, "as unanimously confessed," introducing a quotation from a hymn or rhythmical confession of the early church. H. E. JACOBS

CONVENIENT, kon-vēn'yent: In RV limited to τὸ καὶρός, kaîrós, "suitable time," "season," and its compounds: "that which is seasonable" or "opportune" (Mk 6 21; Acts 24 25). AV is replaced, in Prov 30 8 RV, by "needful" (Heb hōk), "feed me with the food that is needful for me"; Jer 40 4, by "right"; Eph 5 4, by "befitting"; in Rom 1 28, by "fitting," and in 1 Cor 16 12, by "opportunity."

CONVENT, kon-vent': Found in the AVm of Jer 49 19: "Who will convent me in judgment?" and in Jer 50 44: "Who will convent me to plead?" The Heb term which is rendered convent is yā'adh, and it means to summon to a court, to call on to plead. Convent is obsolete, but it was formerly used, and meant to summon, or to call before a judge. Shakespeare used it several times. In King Henry VIII, Act V, he said, "The lords of the council hath commanded that the archbishop be convented to the council board."

CONVERSANT, kon-vūr'sant (הִלָּךְ, hālakh, "to go on," "to walk"): This word is trd "conversant" in Josh 8 35 AV (m "walked"), and 1 S 25 15 AV meaning "going along with them;" ARV "went."

CONVERSATION, kon-vēr-sā'shun (ἀναστροφή, anastrophē, ὁμιλία, homilia): This word is another illustration of the changes which time makes in a living language. The modern sense of the term is mutual talk, colloquy, but in AV it never means that, but always behavior, conduct. This broader meaning, at a time not much later than the date of AV, began to yield to the special, limited one of today, perhaps, as has been suggested, because speech forms so large a part of conduct. The NT words for "converse" in the modern sense are homilēō (Lk 24 14.15; Acts 20 11) and sunomilēō (Acts 10 27).

(1) In the OT the word used to indicate conduct is דֶּרֶךְ, derekh, "way," the course one travels (AV Ps 37 14; m 50 23). It is the common Heb idea of conduct, possibly due, as Hatch thinks, to the fact that in Syria intercourse between village and village was so much on foot, with difficulty on stony tracks over the hills, and this is reflected in the metaphor.

(2) In the NT the idea of deportment is once rendered by trópos, "Let your c. be without covetousness" (He 13 5 AV; RV "be ye free from the love of money"; RVm "let your turn of mind be free"). But the usual Gr word is anastrophē, "a turning up and down," possibly due to the fact, as Hatch again avers, that life in the bustling streets of Athens and Rome gave rise to the conception of life as quick motion to and fro. "Ye have heard of my c." (Gal 1 13 AV; RV "manner of life"). So also Eph 4 22; 1 Tim 4 12; He 13 7; "Let him show out of a good c." (Jas 3 13 AV; RV "by his good life"); "vexed with the filthy c." (2 Pet 2 7 AV; RV "lascivious life"); "holy c." (2 Pet 3 11 AV; RV "holy living"); "Our c. is in heaven" (Phil 3 20 AV; RV "citizenship" [q.v.]). See also in the Apoc (Tob 4 14; 2 Macc 5 8).

The trs in the Revisions put a wholesome emphasis upon conduct, and eliminate the danger of much misunderstanding. See further Hatch, Essays in Biblical Greek. G. H. TREVER

CONVERSION, kon-vūr'shun:

I. The Words "Conversion," "Convert," in Biblical Usage.—The noun "conversion" (ἐπιστροφή, epistrophē) occurs in only one passage

1. In the Bible, "They passed through both English Phoenicia and Samaria, declaring the conversion of the Gentiles" (Acts 15 3). Derived forms of the vb. "convert" are used in the RV in Jas 5 19, "convert," "converteth" (5 20), "converted" (Ps 51 13, m "return"), "converts" (Isa 1 27, m "they that return"). In other instances where the AV uses forms of the vb. "convert" the RV employs "turn again" (Isa 6 10; Lk 22 32; Acts 3 19), or "turn" (Isa 60 5; Mt 13 15; 18 3; Mk 4 12; Jn 12 40; Acts 28 27). In Ps 19 7 the reading of the AV, "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul," has been changed by the revisers into "restoring the soul." The words commonly used in the Eng. Bible as equivalent with the Heb and Gr terms are "turn," "return," "turn back," "turn again" (cf Dt 4 30; Isa 55 7; Jer 3 12 ff; 25 5; 35 15; Ezk 18 21-23; 33 11; Mal 3 7). Thus "convert" is synonymous with "turn," and "conversion" with "turning."

The principal Heb word is שָׁבַח, shūbh; other words are פָּנָה, pānāh, הִפָּחַח, hāphakh, שָׁבָב, šābhābh, in Hiphil. They are used (1) in

2. In the lit. sense, for instance, Gen 14 7; OT Dt 17 16; Ps 56 9; Isa 38 8. (2)

In the later prophetic writings the vb. shūbh refers, both in the Qal and Hiphil forms, to the return from the captivity (Isa 1 27; Jer 29 14; 30 3; Ezk 16 53; Zeph 2 7). (3) In the fig., ethical or religious sense (a) from God (Nu 14 43; 1 S 15 11; 1 K 9 6); (b) more frequently to turn back to God (1 S 7 3; 1 K 8 33; Isa 19 22; Joel 2 12; Am 4 6 ff; Hos 6 11; 7 10).

The words used in the LXX and NT are στρέφειν, stréphein, and its compounds, ἀπο, apotr., ἀνα, anastr., ἐπανα, epanastr., ὑπο, hupostr., and esp. ἐπιστρέφειν, epistréphein. The latter word occurs 39 times in the NT. It is used (1) in the lit. sense in Mt 9 22; 10 13; 24 18; Acts 9 40; 15 36, etc; (2) in the fig. sense, in transitive form (Lk 1 16 f; Jas 5 19 f).

3. In the NT

In Gal 4 9 and 2 Pet 2 21 it denotes to turn from the right way to the wrong. The opposite meaning, to turn from the wrong way to the right, we find in Lk 22 32; Acts 9 35; 11 21; 14 15; 15 19; 26 18; 2 Cor 3 16; 1 Thess 1 9; 1 Pet 2 25. In connection with metanoëin, "repent," it is used in Acts 3 19; 26 20. The root word strephein is used in the fig. sense in Mt 13 3; Jn 12 40. LXX and TR have here epistrephein.

II. The Doctrine.—While the words "conversion" and "convert" do not occur frequently in our Eng. Bible the teaching contained therein is fundamental in Christian doctrine. From the words themselves it is not possible to derive a clearly defined doctrine of conversion; the materials for the construction of the doctrine must be gathered from the tenor of Bib. teaching.

There is a good deal of vagueness in the modern use of the term. By some writers it is used in "a very general way to stand for the whole series of manifestations just preceding, accompanying, and immediately following the apparent sudden changes of character involved" (E. D. Starbuck, The Psychology of Religion, 21). "To be converted," "to be regenerated," "to receive grace," "to experience religion," "to gain an assurance," are so many phrases which denote the process, gradual or sudden, by which a self, hitherto divided and consciously wrong, inferior and unhappy, becomes unified and consciously right, superior and happy in consequence of its hold upon religious realities. This at least is what conversion signifies in general terms" (William James, The Varieties of Religious Experience, 189). In this general, vague way the term is used not only by psychologists, but also by theological writers and in common religious parlance. A converted man is a Christian, a believer, a man who has religion, who has experienced regeneration.

In its more restricted meaning the word denotes the action of man in the initial process of salvation as distinguished from the action of

2. Specific Meaning God. Justification and regeneration are purely Divine acts, repentance, faith, conversion are human acts although under the influence and by the power of the Divine agency. Thus conversion denotes the human volition and act by which man in obedience to the Divine summons determines to change the course of his life and turns to God. Arrested by God's call man stops to think, turns about and heads the opposite way. This presupposes that the previous course was not directed toward God but away from Him. The instances of conversion related in the Bible show that the objective point toward which man's life was directed may be either the service of idols (1 Thess 1 9) or a life of religious indifference, a self-centered life where material things engross the attention and deaden the sense of things spiritual (rich young ruler, Lk 18 22), or a life of sensuality, of open sin and shame (prodigal son, Lk 15 13) or even a mistaken way of serving God (Saul, Acts 26 9). Accordingly in conversion either the religious or the ethical element may predominate. The moral man who turns from self to God or, as Saul did, from an erroneous notion concerning God's will to a clear conception of his relation to God is more conscious of the religious factor. Conversion brings him into vital, conscious fellowship with God through Jesus Christ. The immoral man who is awakened to a realization of the holiness of God, of the demands of His law, and of his own sin and guilt is more conscious of the outward change in his manner of life. The ethical change is the more outstanding fact in his experience, although it can never be separated from the religious experience of the changed relation to God.

The mode of conversion varies greatly according to the former course of life. It may be a sudden

3. Mode crisis in the moral and intellectual life. This is very frequently the case in the experience of heathen who turn from the worship of idols to faith in Jesus Christ. A sudden crisis is frequently witnessed in the case of persons who, having lived a life of flagrant sin, renounce their former life. Conversion to them means a complete revolution in their thoughts, feelings and outward manner of life. In other instances conversion appears to be the climax of a prolonged conflict for supremacy of divergent motives; and, again, it may be the goal of a gradual growth, the consummation of a process of discerning ever more clearly and yielding ever more definitely and thus experiencing ever more vitally truths which have been implanted and nurtured by Christian training. This process results in the conscious acceptance of Jesus Christ as the personal Saviour and in the consecration of life to His service.

Thus conversion may be an instantaneous act, or a process which is more or less prolonged. The latter is more frequently seen in the case of children and young people who have grown up in Christian families and have received the benefit of Christian training. No conversions of this kind are recorded in the NT. This may be explained by the fact that most of our NT writings are addressed to the first generation of Christians, to men and women who were raised in Jewish legalism or heathen idolatry, and who turned to Christ after they had passed the age of adolescence. The religious life of their children as distinguished in its mode and manifestations from that of the adults does not appear to have been a matter of discussion or a source of perplexity so as to call forth specific instruction.

Conversion comprises the characteristics both of repentance and of faith. Repentance is conversion viewed from its starting-point, the turning from the former life; faith indicates the objective point of conversion, the turning to God.

Of late the psychology of conversion has been carefully studied and elaborately treated by psychologists. Much valuable material

4. Conversion and Psychology has been gathered. It is shown that certain periods of adolescent life are particularly susceptible to religious influences (cf G. Stanley Hall, Adolescence, II, ch xiv; E. D. Starbuck, Psychology of Religion, etc). Yet conversion cannot be explained as a natural process, conditioned by physiological changes in the adolescent, esp. by approaching puberty. The laws of psychology are certainly God's laws as much as all other laws of Nature, and His Spirit works in harmony with His own laws. But in genuine conversion there is always at work in a direct and immediate manner the Spirit of God to which man, be he adolescent or adult, consciously responds. Any attempt to explain conversion by eliminating the direct working of the Divine Spirit falls short of the mark. See REGENERATION; REPENTANCE.

LITERATURE.—See REGENERATION.

J. L. NUELSEN

CONVICT, kon-vikt', CONVICTION, kon-vik'-shun (ἐλέγχω, elégchō, and compounds, "to prove guilty"): Usual tr of EV, where AV has "convince," as in Jn 8 46; Tit 1 9; Jas 2 9; once also replacing AV "reprove" (Jn 16 8), while RV changes AV "convince" into "reprove" in 1 Cor 14 24. It always implies the presentation of evidence. It is a decision presumed to be based upon a careful and discriminating consideration of all the proofs offered, and has a legal character, the verdict being rendered either in God's judgment (Rom 3 19), or before men (Jn 8 46) by an appeal to their consciences in which God's law is written (Rom 2 15). Since such conviction is addressed to the heart of the guilty, as well as concerning him externally, the word "reprove" is sometimes substituted. To "convict . . . in respect of righteousness, and of judgment" (Jn 16 8), refers to the conviction of the inadequacy and perversity of the ordinary, natural standards of righteousness and judgment, and the approval of those found in Christ, by the agency of the Holy Spirit, as the great interpreter and applier of the work of Christ. H. E. JACOBS

CONVINCE, kon-vins' (ἐλέγχω, elégchō): Another form etymologically of "convict," means to bring to a decision concerning the truth or the falsehood of a proposition (Job 32 12). As usually applied to what is of a more individual and private character, and having reference to what is either good or bad, or what is in itself without moral quality, it has given way in RV to either "convict," "reprove" or "confute." See CONVICT.

CONVOCATION, kon-vō-kā'shun: A rendering for מִקְרָא, mikrā, chiefly in the frequent "Holy Convocation"; but the word is sometimes used alone, e.g. Nu 10 2; Isa 1 13; 4 5. On a holy convocation no work could be done. The phrase differs from "solemn assembly," which in the Pent is only applied to the concluding festivals at the end of Passover and Tabernacles, while "Holy Convocation" is used of the Sabbath and all the great holy days of the Mosaic legislation.

CONVULSING, kon-vuls'ing (Mk 1 26 m [AV torn]). See UNCLEAN SPIRIT.

COOKING, kōōk'ing. See FOOD.

COOL, kōōl (רָחַף, rāḥ, "wind"; καταψύχω, katapsúchō, "to cool down"): "Cool of the day" (Gen 3 8, m "wind"), when the evening breeze has tempered the heat of the day, enabling Orientals to walk abroad. "Cool my tongue" (Lk 16 24), a phrase reflecting the Jewish notion that Abraham had power to rescue his descendants from the fires of Hades.

COOS, kō'os. See COS.

COPING, kō'ping. See HOUSE.

COPPER, kop'ēr (נְחֹשֶׁת, n'hōsheth): The word is tr<sup>d</sup> "copper" in only one passage (Ezr 8 27 AV). In the ARV of this passage, "brass" has been substituted. Neither describes the actual alloy according to present definitions so well as the word "bronze." Copper was one of the earliest metals to be known and utilized in alloy, but copper, as a single metal, was probably little used. The remains of spears, balances, arms, vases, mirrors, statues, cooking utensils, implements of all kinds, etc, from Bible times are principally of an alloy of copper hardened with tin known today as bronze (see BRASS). In such passages as Dt 8 9, where reference is made to the native metal or ores, "copper" should be substituted for "brass" as in the ARV (cf Job 40 18). This is true also of coins as χαλκός, chalkós, in Mt 10 9.

Our modern Eng. word "copper" is derived from an old name pertaining to the island of Cyprus. Copper was known to the ancients as Cyprian brass, probably because that island was one of the chief sources for this metal. The Sinai peninsula and the mountains of northern Syria also contributed to the ancient world's supply (see AM TAB). No evidences of copper ore in any quantity are found in Pal proper. See METAL; MINE. JAMES A. PATCH

COPPERSMITH, kop'ēr-smith (χαλκεύς, chalkeús): The word is found in NT once only, in 2 Tim 4 14: "Alexander the copper-smith did [m "showed"] me much evil." As the Bible word rendered "copper" (see Ezr 8 27 AV) is tr<sup>d</sup> "brass" by RV, so the word here rendered "c." should be rendered "brazier," or "worker in brass." See COPPER.

LITERATURE

I. Language and Alphabet.—The Coptic alphabet consists of the Gr uncial letters, plus seven characters taken from the Egypt de-

1. Alphabet motie to express sounds not represented in the Gr. It can be traced back to the 4th cent., as the oldest Coptic MSS belong to the end of the 4th or beginning of the 5th cent. The language still prevailed in Egypt in the 9th cent., but was no longer understood in Middle Egypt in the 12th. Its last speaker died in 1633.

There were at least five written dialects and sub-dialects of Coptic. Of these the most important from a literary point of view was

2. Dialects the (1) Buhairic, the dialect of Lower Egypt, often called Coptic par excellence, and also (wrongly) Memphitic. It is used as the ecclesiastical language in the services of the Coptic church. The other four dialects are somewhat more closely allied to one another than to Buhairic, which shows greater traces of Gr influence. These dialects are, (2) the Sahidic (Sa'idî, or dialect of upper Egypt), also called Thebaic; (3) the Bashmûric—or rather Bushmûric—(for which Fayyûmic has been suggested); (4) the Middle Egypt proper (known from MSS found in the monastery of Jeremias near the Theban Serapeum), differing but little from (3); and (5) the Akhmîmic (Akhmîm=the ancient Chemmis). Akhmîmic is more primitive and more closely related to ancient Egypt than any other. Only a few fragments in it (of Ex, Ecclus, 2 Macc, the Minor Prophets, and Catholic epp.) have yet been found. The last three dialects are often classed together as "Middle Egypt" and (4) is then called "Lower Sahidic."

II. Versions.—In all 5 dialects more or less complete versions of the Bible once existed. They were the earliest made after the early Syr. At latest they began in the 3d cent., though some (e.g. Hyvernat) say as early as the 2d. It is thought that the Sahidic version was the earliest, then the Middle Egypt, and finally the Buhairic. The latter represents an early and comparatively pure Gr text, free from what are generally termed western additions, while the Sahidic, on the other hand, contains most of the peculiar western readings. It sometimes supports codex S, sometimes codex B, sometimes both, but generally it closely agrees with codex D (Bezae), esp. in the Acts. A Coptic (Sahidic) MS, written considerably before 350 AD, and published by the British Museum in April, 1912, contains Dt, Jon, and Acts, and is older than any other Bib. MS (except a few fragments) yet known to exist. It proves that this Sahidic version was made about 200 AD. It in general supports the "Western" text of cod Bezae (D).

Much of the NT esp. still exists in Sahidic, though not Rev. In Buhairic we have the Pent, Job, Pss, Prov, Isa, Jer, Ezk, Dnl, the 12 Minor Prophets, and fragments of the historical books of the OT, besides the whole NT, though the Book of Rev is later than the rest. In the other dialects much less had been preserved, as far as is known. In Bushmūric we have fragments of Isa, Lam, Ep. Jer, and a good many fragments of the NT. In more than one dialect we have apoc gospels (see Texts and Studies, IV, no. 2, 1896) and Gnostic papyri, etc. The OT was trd about the LXX. The Pss seem to have been trd about 303 AD.

III. Chief Editions.—The Buhairic Pss were first published in 1659. Wilkins published the Buhairic NT at London in 1716, and the Pent in 1731; Schwartz the Gospels in 1846–47; de Lagarde the Acts and Epp. in 1852. He also edited the Pss (transliterated) in 1875, 151 in number, of which the last celebrates David's victory over Goliath. He added fragments of the Sahidic Psalter and of the Buhairic Prov. Tattam published the Minor Prophets in 1836 and the Major in 1852, an ed of the Gospels in London in 1847, and of the rest of the NT in 1852 (SPCK), with a literal Arab. version. Horner's ed of the Buhairic NT (4 vols, 1898, etc, Clarendon Press) and of Sahidic Gospels (1910, 3 vols) is the standard ed. Ford published part of the Sahidic NT in 1799. Various edd of parts of OT and NT have since appeared: e.g. Ciasca published fragments of the Sahidic OT (Sacrorum Bibliorum Fragmenta Copto-Sahidica Musei Borgiani) at Rome, 1885–89.

COR, kōr (כֹּר, kōr): A liquid and dry measure, same as the homer, of about 90 gals. capacity (Ezk 45 14). See HOMER; WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

CORAL, kor'al (רֶאֱמוֹת, rā'mōth, פִּנְיָנִים, penānīm): The red coral or precious coral, Corallium rubrum, is confined to the Mediterranean and Adriatic seas. It is the calcareous axis of a branching colony of polyps. It does not form reefs, but occurs in small masses from 40 to 100 fathoms below the surface. It differs totally in structure from the white corals which form coral reefs, belonging to the order of Octactinia or Eight-rayed Polyps, while the reef-building corals belong to the Hexactinia or Six-rayed Polyps.

Rā'mōth, apparently from r. rā'am, "to be high" (cf rām, "to be high"), occurs in three passages. In Prov 24 7, EVV have "too high": "Wisdom is too high for a fool." In Job 28 12–19, where various precious things are compared with wisdom, EV has "coral" (AVm "Ramothe"). It is mentioned here along with ṣēghōr, "gold" (RVm "treasure"); kethem, "gold of Ophir"; shōham, "onyx" (RVm "beryl"); šappūr, "sapphire"; zāhābh, "gold"; z'khūkhūth, "crystal" (RV "glass"); pāz, "gold"; gābhīsh, "pearls" (RV "crystal"); penānīm, "rubies" (RVm "red coral" or "pearls"); pit'dhāh, "topaz." While the real meaning of some of these terms is doubtful (see STONES, PRECIOUS), they all, including rā'mōth, appear to be precious stones or metals. In Ezk 27 16, rā'mōth occurs with nōphekh, "emeralds" (RVm "carbuncles"); 'argāmān, "purple"; rik'māh, "brodered work"; būc, "fine linen"; kadhkōdh, "agate" (AVm "chrysoprase," RV "rubies"). Here the context does not require a precious stone or metal, and Vulg has sericum, i.e. "Chinese material" or "silk." Notwithstanding, therefore, the traditional rendering, "coral," the real meaning of rā'mōth must be admitted to be doubtful.

Penānīm (from r. pānan, "to divide up," "to separate"; cf Arab. fanan, "a branch of a tree") occurs in Job 28 18; Prov 3 15; 8 11; 20 15; 31 10; Lam 4 7. In all these passages EV has "rubies" (Job 28 18, RVm "red coral" or "pearls"; Lam 4 7, RVm "corals"). Everywhere a precious substance is indicated, but nowhere does the context give any light as to the nature of the substance, except in Lam 4 7, where we have the statement that the nobles of Jerus "were more ruddy in body" than penānīm. This and the etymology favor a branching red substance such as precious coral. The occurrence of penānīm and rā'mōth together in Job 28 18 is, if we give the precedence to penānīm, a further argument against rā'mōth meaning "coral."

COR-ASHAN, kōr-ash'an, kō-rā'shan (ERV, AV Chor-ashan; כֹּר אֶשְׁחָן, kōr 'āshān, 1 S 30 30): The original reading was probably Bor-ashan, "well of Ashan." See ASHAN.

CORBAN, kōr'ban (קֶרְבָּן, qorbān; δῶρον, dōron; trd "a gift," "a sacrificial offering," lit. "that which is brought near," viz. to the altar). An expression frequently used in the original text of the OT; in the Eng. Bible it occurs in Mk 7 11; cf also Mt 15 5. It is the most general term for a sacrifice of any kind. In the course of time it became associated with an objectionable practice. Anything dedicated to the temple by pronouncing the votive word "C." forthwith belonged to the temple, but only ideally; actually it might remain in the possession of him who made the vow. So a son might be justified in not supporting his old parents simply because he designated his property or a part of it as a gift to the temple, that is, as "C." There was no necessity of fulfilling his vow, yet he was actually prohibited from ever using his property for the support of his parents. This shows clearly why Christ singled out this queer regulation in order to demonstrate the sophistry of tradition and to bring out the fact of its possible and actual hostility to the Scripture and its spirit.

CORBE, kōr'bē. See CHORBE.

CORD, kōrd (חֶבֶל, hebbel, יֶתֶר, yether, מִיֶּתֶר, mēthār, עֲבֹתָ, 'ābhōth; σχοινίον, schointon):

(1) The Arab. hab'l corresponds to the Heb hebbel and is still the common name for cord or rope throughout the East. Such ropes or cords are made of goat's or camel's hair, first spun into threads and then twisted or plaited into the larger and stronger form. Hebbel is trd rather inconsistently in RV by "cord" (Josh 2 15; Job 36 8, etc); by "line" (2 S 8 2; Mic 2 5; Ps 16 6; 78 55; Am 7 17; Zec 2 1); by "ropes" (1 K 20 31), and by "tacklings" (Isa 33 23).

(2) Yether corresponds to the Arab. wittar, which means catgut. With a kindred inconsistency it is trd RV by "withes" (Jgs 16 7 RVm "bowstring"); by "cord" (Job 30 11), where some think it may mean "bowstring," or possibly "rein" of a bridle, and by "bowstring" (Ps 11 2), doubtless the true meaning. (3) Mēthār is considered the equivalent of Arab. atnāb, which means tent ropes, being constantly so used by the Bedouin. They make the thing so called of goat's or camel's hair. It is used of the "cords" of the tabernacle (Jer 10 20), of the "cords" of the "hangings" and "pillars" of the courts of the tabernacle in Ex and Nu, and fig. by Isa (54 2), "Lengthen thy cords," etc.

(4) 'Ābhōth is thought to have its equivalent in the Arab. rūbūts, which means a band, or fastening.

See BAND. It is tr<sup>d</sup> by "cords" in Ps 118 27; 129 4; by "bands" in Ezk 3 25; Job 39 10; Hos 11 4; by "ropes" in Jgs 15 13,14, and by "cart rope" in Isa 5 18. See CART. See also Nu 15 38 and AMULET. It seems to have the meaning of something twisted or interlaced.

(5) In the NT "cord" is found in Jn 2 15, translating schoinion, but in Acts 27 32 the same Gr word is rendered "ropes."

Figurative: (1) of affliction (Job 36 8); (2) of God's laws (Ps 2 3); (3) of the artifices of the wicked (Ps 129 4; 140 5); (4) of sinful habits (Prov 5 22); (5) of true friendship or companionship (Eccl 4 12); (6) possibly of the spinal cord (Eccl 12 6); (7) of falsehood (Isa 5 18); (8) of the spirit of enterprise and devotion (Isa 54 2); (9) of God's gentleness.

GEO. B. EAGER

CORDS, kôrdz, SMALL (σχοινίον, schoinion, the diminutive of schoinos, "a rush," hence "a rope of rushes"): Tr<sup>d</sup> "small cords" (Jn 2 15 AV; RV "cords"). The same word is tr<sup>d</sup> "ropes" in Acts 27 32. See also Job 41 2 m.

CORE, kô'rê (Κορέ, Koré): In AV, Jude ver 11, used as a variant for Korah. See KORAH, 3.

CORIANDER, kor-i-an'dër (קָדָי, qadh; κόριον, kórimon): The fruit of the Coriandrum Sativum (N.O. Umbelliferae), a plant indigenous around the Mediterranean and extensively cultivated. The fruits are aromatic and stomatic-carminative. They are of a grayish-yellow color, ribbed, ovate-globular and in size about twice that of a hemp-seed. "The manna was like coriander seed" (Nu 11 7; see also Ex 16 31).

CORINTH, kor'inth (Κόρινθος, Kórinthos, "ornament"): A celebrated city of the Peloponnesus, capital of Corinthia, which lay N. of Argolis, and with the isthmus joined the peninsula to the mainland. Corinth had three good harbors (Lechaëum, on the Corinthian, and Cenchræa and Schoenus on the Saronic Gulf), and thus commanded the traffic of both the eastern and the western seas. The larger ships could not be hauled across the isthmus (Acts 27 6,37); smaller vessels were taken over by means of a ship tramway with wooden rails. The Phoenicians, who settled here very early, left many traces of their civilization in the industrial arts, such as dyeing and weaving, as well as in their religion and mythology. The Corinthian cult of Aphrodite, of Melikertes (Melkart) and of Athene Phoenike are of Phoen origin. Poseidon, too, and other sea deities were held in high esteem in the commercial city. Various arts were cultivated and the Corinthians, even in the earliest times, were famous for their cleverness, inventiveness and artistic sense, and they prided themselves on surpassing the other Greeks in the embellishment of their city and in the adornment of their temples. There were many celebrated painters in Corinth, and the city became famous for the Corinthian order of architecture: an order, which, by the way, though held in high esteem by the Romans, was very little used by the Greeks themselves. It was here, too, that the dithyramb (hymn to Dionysus) was first arranged artistically to be sung by a chorus; and the Isthmian games, held every two years, were celebrated just outside the city on the isthmus near the Saronic Gulf. But the commercial and materialistic spirit prevailed later. Not a single Corinthian distinguished himself in lit. Statesmen, however, there were in abundance: Periander, Phidon, Timoleon.

Harbors are few on the Corinthian Gulf. Hence no other city could wrest the commerce of these waters from Corinth. According to Thucydides, the first ships of war were built here in 664 BC. In those early days Corinth held a leading position among the Gr cities; but in consequence of her great material prosperity she would not risk all as Athens did, and win eternal supremacy over men: she had too much to lose to jeopardize her material interests for principle, and she soon sank into the second class. But when Athens, Thebes, Sparta and Argos fell away, Corinth came to the front again as the wealthiest and most important city in Greece; and when it was destroyed by Mummius in 146 BC, the treasures of art carried to Rome were as great as those of Athens. Delos became the commercial center for a time; but when Julius Ship-Canal at Corinth.

Caesar restored Corinth a cent. later (46 BC), it grew so rapidly that the Rom colony soon became again one of the most prominent centers in Greece. When Paul visited Corinth, he found it the metropolis of the Peloponnesus. Jews flocked to this center of trade (Acts 18 1-18; Rom 16 21 ff; 1 Cor 9 20), the natural site for a great mart, and flourishing under the lavish hand of the Caesars; and this is one reason why Paul remained there so long (Acts 18 11) instead of sojourning in the old seats of aristocracy, such as Argos, Sparta and Athens. He found a strong Jewish nucleus to begin with; and it was in direct communication with Ephesus. But earthquake, malaria, and the harsh Turkish rule finally swept everything away except seven columns of one old Doric temple, the only object above ground left today to mark the site of the ancient city of wealth and luxury and immorality—the city of vice par excellence in the Rom world. Near the temple have been excavated the ruins of the famous fount of Peirene, so celebrated in Gr literature. Directly S. of the city is the high rock (over 1,800 ft.) Acrocorinthus, which formed an impenetrable fortress. Traces of the old ship-canal across the isthmus (attempted by Nero in 66-67 AD) were to be seen before excavations were begun for the present canal. At this time the city was thoroughly

Rom. Hence the many Lat names in the NT: Lucius, Tertius, Gaius, Erastus, Quartus (Rom 16 21-23), Crispus, Titus Justus (Acts 18 7,8), Fortunatus, Achaicus (1 Cor 16 17). According to the testimony of Dio Chrysostomus, Corinth had become in the 2d cent. of our era the richest city in Greece. Its monuments and public buildings and art treasures are described in detail by Pausanias.

The church in Corinth consisted principally of non-Jews (1 Cor 12 2). Paul had no intention at first of making the city a base of operations (Acts 18 1; 16 9,10); for he wished to return to Thessalonica (1 Thess 2 17,18). His plans were changed by a revelation (Acts 18 9,10). The Lord commanded him to speak boldly, and he did so, remaining in the city eighteen months. Finding strong opposition in the synagogue he left the Jews and went to the Gentiles (Acts 18 6). Nevertheless, Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue and his household were believers and baptisms were numerous (Acts 18 8); but no Corinthians were baptized by Paul himself except Crispus, Gaius and some of the household of Stephanas (1 Cor 1 14,16) "the firstfruits of Achaia" (1 Cor 16 15). One of these, Gaius, was Paul's host the next time he visited the city (Rom 16 23). Silas and Timothy, who had been left at Berea, came on to Corinth about 45 days after Paul's arrival. It was at this time that Paul wrote his first Epistle to the Thessalonians (3 6). During Gallio's administration the Jews accused Paul, but the proconsul refused to allow the case to be brought to trial. This decision must have been looked upon with favor by a large majority of the Corinthians, who had a great dislike for the Jews (Acts 18 17). Paul became acquainted also with Priscilla and Aquila (18 18,26; Rom 16 3; 2 Tim 4 19), and later they accompanied him to Ephesus. Within a few years after Paul's first visit to Corinth the Christians had increased so rapidly that they made quite a large congregation, but it was composed mainly of the lower classes: they were neither 'learned, influential, nor of noble birth' (1 Cor 1 26).

Paul probably left Corinth to attend the celebration of the feast at Jerus (Acts 18 21). Little is known of the history of the church in Corinth after his departure. Apollos came from Ephesus with a letter of recommendation to the brethren in Achaia (Acts 18 27; 2 Cor 3 1); and he exercised a powerful influence (Acts 18 27,28; 1 Cor 1 12); and Paul came down later from Macedonia.

His first letter to the Corinthians was written from Ephesus. Both Titus and Timothy were sent to Corinth from Ephesus (2 Cor 7 13,15; 1 Cor 4 17), and Timothy returned by land, meeting Paul in Macedonia (2 Cor 1 1), who visited Greece again in 56-57 or 57-58.

LITERATURE

I. The Authenticity of the Two Epistles.—1 and 2 Cor, Gal and Rom, all belong to the period of Paul's third missionary journey. They are the most remarkable of his writings, and are usually distinguished as the four great or principal epp.; a distinction which not only is a tribute to their high originality and intrinsic worth, but also indicates the extremely favorable opinion which critics of almost all schools have held regarding their authenticity. Throughout the cents. the tradition has remained practically unbroken, that they contain the very pectus Paulinum, the mind and heart of the great apostle of the Gentiles, and preserve to the church an impregnable defence of historical Christianity. What has to be said of their genuineness applies almost equally to both.

The two epp. have a conspicuous place in the most ancient lists of Pauline writings. In the Muratorian Fragment (cir 170) they stand

1. External Evidence at the head of the nine epp. addressed to churches, and are declared to have been written to forbid heretical schism (primum omnium Corinthiis schisma haeresis interdicens); and in Marcion's Apostolicon (cir 140) they stand second to Gal. They are also clearly attested in the most important writings of the sub-apostolic age, e.g. by Clement of Rome (cir 95), generally regarded as the friend of the apostle mentioned in Phil 4 3; Ignatius (Ad Ephes., ch xviii, second decade of 2d cent.); Polycarp (chs ii, vi, xi, first half of 2d cent.), a disciple of John; and Justin Martyr (b. at close of 1st cent.); while the gnostic Ophites (2d cent.) were clearly familiar with both epp. (cf Westcott, Canon, passim, and Index II; also Charteris, Canonicity, 222-24, where most of the original passages are brought together). The witness of Clement is of the highest importance. Ere the close of the 1st cent. he himself wrote a letter to the Corinthians, in which (ch xlvii, Lightfoot's ed, 144) he made a direct appeal to the authority of 1 Cor: "Take up the letter of Paul the blessed apostle; what did he write to you first in the beginning of the gospel?"

Verily he gave you spiritual direction regarding himself, Cephas, and Apollos, for even then you were dividing yourselves into parties." It would be impossible to desire more explicit external testimony.

Within themselves both epp. are replete with marks of genuineness. They are palpitating human documents, with the ring of reality

2. Internal Evidence from first to last. They admirably harmonize with the independent narrative of Acts; in the words of Schleiermacher (Einlgt., 148), "The whole fits together and completes itself perfectly, and yet each of the documents follows its own course, and the data contained in the one cannot be borrowed from those of the other." Complex and difficult as the subjects and circumstances sometimes are, and varying as the moods of the writer are in dealing with them, there is a naturalness that compels assent to his good faith. The very difficulty created for a modern reader by the incomplete and allusive character of some of the references is itself a mark of genuineness rather than the opposite; just what would most likely be the case in a free and intimate correspondence between those who understood one another in the presence of immediate facts which needed no careful particularization; but what would almost as certainly have been avoided in a fictitious composition. Indeed a modicum of literary sense suffices to forbid classification among the pseudepigrapha. To take but a few instances from many, it is impossible to read such passages as those conveying the remonstrance in 1 Cor 9, the alternations of anxiety and relief in connection with the meeting of Titus in 2 Cor 2 and 7, or the ever-memorable passage which begins at 11 24 of the same ep.: "Of the Jews five times received I," etc, without feeling that the hypothesis of fiction becomes an absurdity. No man ever wrote out of the heart if this writer did not. The truth is that the theory of pseudonymity leaves far more difficulties behind it than any it is supposed to solve. The unknown and unnamable literary prodigy of the 2d cent., who in the most daring and artistic manner gloried in the fanciful creation of those minute and life-like details which have imprinted themselves indelibly on the memory and imagination of mankind, cannot be regarded as other than a chimera. No one knows where or when he lived, or in what shape or form. But if the writings are the undoubted rescripts of fact, to whose life and personality do they fit themselves more exquisitely than to those of the man whose name stands at their head, and whose compositions they claim to be? They suit beyond compare the apostle of the missionary journeys, the tender, eager, indomitable "prisoner of the Lord," and no other. No other that has even been suggested is more than the mere shadow of a name, and no two writers have as yet seriously agreed even as to the shadow. The pertinent series of questions with which Godet (Intro to NT; Studies on the Epp., 305) concludes his remarks on the genuineness may well be repeated: "What use was it to explain at length in the 2d cent. a change in a plan of the journey, which, supposing it was real, had interest only for those whom the promised visit of the apostle personally concerned? When the author speaks of five hundred persons who had seen the risen Christ, of whom the most part were still alive at the time when he was writing, is he telling his readers a mere story that would resemble a bad joke? What was the use of discussing at length and giving detailed rules on the exercise of the glossolalia at a time when that gift no longer existed, so to say, in the church? Why make the apostle say: 'We who shall be alive [at the moment of the Parousia]' at a time when everyone knew that he was long dead? In fine, what church would have received without opposition into its archives, as an ep. of the apostle, half a cent. after his death, a letter unknown till then, and filled with reproaches most severe and humiliating to it?"

One is not surprised, therefore, that even the radical criticism of the 19th cent. cordially accepted the Corinthian epp. and their com-

3. Consent of Criticism panions in the great group. The men who founded that criticism were under no conceivable constraint in such a conclusion, save the constraint of obvious and incontrovertible fact. The Tübingen school, which doubted or denied the authenticity of all the rest of the epp., frankly acknowledged the genuineness of these. This also became the general verdict of the "critical" school which followed that of Tübingen, and which, in many branches, has included the names of the leading German scholars to this day. F. C. Baur's language (Paul, I, 246) was: "There has never been the slightest suspicion of unauthenticity cast on these four epp., and they bear so incontestably the character of Pauline originality, that there is no conceivable ground for the assertion of critical doubts in their case." Renan (St. Paul, Intro, V) was equally emphatic: "They are incontestable, and uncontested."

Reference, however, must be made to the ultra-radical attack which has gathered some adherents,

4. Ultra-Radical Attack especially among Dutch scholars, during the last 25 years. As early as 1792 Evanson, a retired Eng. clergyman, rejected Rom on the ground that, according to Acts, no church existed in Rome in Paul's day. Bruno Bauer (1850-51-52) made a more sweeping attack, relegating the whole of the four principal epp. to the close of the 2d cent. His views received little attention, until, in 1886 onward, they were taken up and extended by a series of writers in Holland, Pierson and Naber, and Loman, followed rapidly by Steck of Bern, Völter of Amsterdam, and above all by Van Manen of Leyden. According to these writers, with slight modifications of view among themselves, it is very doubtful if Paul or Christ ever really existed; if they did, legend has long since made itself master of their personalities, and in every case what borders on the supernatural is to be taken as the criterion of the legendary. The epp. were written in the 1st quarter of the 2d cent., and as Paul, so far as he was known, was believed to be a reformer of anti-Judaic sympathies, he was chosen as the patron of the movement, and the writings were published in his name. The aim of the whole series was to further the interests of a supposed circle of clever and elevated men, who, partly imbued with Heb ideals, and partly with the speculations of Gr and Alexandrian philosophy, desired the spread of a universalistic Christianity and true Gnosis. For this end they perceived it necessary that Jewish legalism should be neutralized, and that the narrow national element should be expelled from the Messianic idea. Hence the epp. The principles on which the main contentions of the critics are based may be reduced to two: (1) that there are relations in the epp. so difficult to understand that, since we cannot properly understand them, the epp. are not trustworthy; and (2) that the religious and ecclesiastical development is so great that not merely 20 or 30 years, but 70 or 80 more, are required, if we are to be able rationally to conceive it: to accept the situation at an earlier date is simply to accept what cannot possibly have been. It is manifest that on such principles it is possible to establish what one will, and that any historical lit. might be proved untrustworthy, and reshaped according to the subjective idiosyncrasies of the critic. The underlying theory of intellectual development is too rigid, and is quite oblivious of the shocks it receives from actual facts, by the advent in history from time to time of powerful, compelling, and creative personalities, who rather mould their age than are moulded by it. None have poured greater ridicule on this "pseudo-Kritik" than the representatives of the advanced school in Germany whom it rather expected to carry with it, and against whom it complains bitterly that they do not take it seriously. On the whole the vagaries of the Dutch school have rather confirmed than shaken belief in these epp.; and one may freely accept Ramsay's view (HDB, I, 484) as expressing the modern mind regarding them, namely, that they are "the unimpeached and unassailable nucleus of admitted Pauline writings." (Reference to the following will give a sufficiently adequate idea of the Dutch criticism and the replies that have been made to it: Van Manen, EB, art. "Paul," and Expos T, IX, 205, 257, 314; Knowling, Witness of the Epp.; Clemen, Einheitlichkeit der p. B.; Sanday and Headlam, Romans, ICC; Godet, Jülicher and Zahn, in their Introductions; Schmiedel and Lipsius in the Hand-Commentar.)

II. Text of 1 and 2 Cor.—The text of both epp. comes to us in the most ancient VSS, the Syr (Peshito), the Old Lat, and the Egyp. all of which were in very early use, undoubtedly by the 3d cent. It is complete in the great Gr uncials: Sin. (Σ* and Σ<sup>a</sup>, 4th cent.), Vat. (B, 4th cent.), Alex. (A, 5th cent., minus two vs, 2 Cor 4 13; 12 7), and very nearly complete in Ephraemi (C, 5th cent.), and in the Gr-Lat Claromontanus (D, 6th cent.); as well as in numerous cursives. In both cases the original has been well preserved, and no exegetical difficulties of high importance are presented. (Reference should be made to the Intro in Sanday and Headlam's Romans, ICC [1896], where §7 gives valuable information concerning the text, not only of Rom, but of the Pauline epp. generally; also to the recent ed [Oxford, 1910], NT Graecae, by Souter, where the various readings of the text used in RV [1881] are conveniently exhibited.) On the whole the text of 1 Cor flows on consistently, only at times, in a characteristic fashion, winding back upon itself, and few serious criticisms are made on its unity, although the case is different in this respect with its companion ep. Some writers, on insufficient grounds, believe that 1 Cor contains relics of a previous ep. (cf 5 9), e.g. in 7 17-24; 9 1-10 22; 15 1-55.

III. Paul's Previous Relations with Corinth.

When, in the course of his 2d missionary journey, Paul left Athens (Acts 18 1), he sailed westward to Cenchreae, and entered Corinth "in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling" (1 Cor 2 3). He was doubtless alone, although Silas and Timothy afterward joined him (Acts 18 5; 2 Cor 1 19). The ancient city of Corinth had been utterly laid in ruins when Rome subjugated Greece in the middle of the 2d cent. BC. But in the year 46 BC Caesar had caused it to be rebuilt and colonized in the Rom manner, and during the cent. that had elapsed it had prospered and grown enormously. Its population at this time has been estimated at between 600,000 and 700,000, by far the larger portion of whom were slaves. Its magnificent harbors, Cenchreae and Lechaëum, opening to the commerce of East and West, were crowded with ships, and its streets with travelers and merchants from almost every country under heaven. Even in that old pagan world the reputation of the city was bad; it has been compared (Baring-Gould, Study of St. Paul, 241) to an amalgam of Newmarket, Chicago and Paris, and probably it contained the worst features of each. At night it was made hideous by the brawls and lewd songs of drunken revelry. In the daytime its markets and squares swarmed with Jewish peddlers, foreign traders, sailors, soldiers, athletes in training, boxers, wrestlers, charioteers, racing-men, betting-men, courtesans, slaves, idlers and parasites of every description. The corrupting worship of Aphrodite, with its hordes of hierodouloi, was dominant, and all over the Gr-Rom world, "to behave as a Corinthian" was a proverbial synonym for leading a low, shameless and immoral life. Very naturally such a polluted and idolatrous environment accounts for much that has to be recorded of the semi-pagan and imperfect life of many of the early converts.

Paul was himself the founder of the church in Corinth (1 Cor 3 6.10). Entering the city with anxiety, and yet with almost audacious hopefulness, he determined to the mission of the Cross here approached its crisis. If it could abide here, it could abide anywhere. At first he confined himself to working quietly at his trade, and cultivating the friendship of Aquila and Priscilla (Acts 18 2f); then he opened his campaign in the synagogue where he persuaded both Jews and Greeks, and ultimately, when opposition became violent, carried it on in the house of Titus Justus, a proselyte. He made deep impressions, and gradually gathered round him a number who were received into the faith (Acts 18 7.8; 1 Cor 1 14-16). The converts were drawn largely but not entirely from the lower or servile classes (1 26; 7 21); they included Crispus and Sosthenes, rulers of the synagogue, Gaius, and Stephanas with his household, "the firstfruits of Achaia" (16 15). He regarded himself joyfully as the father of this community (4 14.15), every member of which seemed to him like his own child.

IV. Date of the Epistle.—After a sojourn of eighteen months (Acts 18 11) in this fruitful field, Paul departed, most probably in the year 52 (cf Turner, art. "Chron. NT," HDB, I, 422 ff), and, having visited Jerus and returned to Asia Minor (third journey), established himself for a period of between two and three years (trietia, Acts 20 31) in Ephesus (Acts 18 18 onward). It was during his stay there that his ep. was written, either in the spring (pre-Pentecost, 1 Cor 16 8) of the year in which he left, 55; or, if that does not give sufficient interval for a visit and a letter to Corinth, which there is considerable ground for believing intervened between 1 Cor and the departure from Ephesus, then in the spring of the preceding year, 54. This would give ample time for the conjectured events, and there is no insuperable reason against it. Pauline chronology is a subject by itself, but the suggested dates for the departure from Ephesus, and for the writing of 1 Cor, really fluctuate between the years 53 and 57. Harnack (Gesch. der altchrist. Litt., II; Die Chron., I) and McGiffert (Apos Age) adopt the earlier date; Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller), 56; Lightfoot (Bib. Essays) and Zahn (Einl.), 57; Turner (ut supra), 55. Many regard 57 as too late, but Robertson (HDB, I, 485-86) still adheres to it.

V. Occasion of the Epistle.—After Paul's departure from Corinth, events moved rapidly, and far from satisfactorily. He was quite cognizant of them. The distance

1. A Previous Letter from Ephesus was not great—about eight days' journey by sea—and in the constant coming and going between the cities news of what was transpiring must frequently have come to his ears. Members of the household of

Chloe are distinctly mentioned (1 11) as having brought tidings of the contentions that prevailed, and there were no doubt other informants. Paul was so concerned by what he heard that he sent Timothy on a conciliatory mission with many commendations (4 17; 16 10f), although the present ep. probably reached Corinth first. He had also felt impelled, in a letter (5 9) which is now lost, to send earnest warning against companying with the immoral. Moreover, Apollos, after excellent work in Corinth, had come to Ephesus, and was received as a brother by the apostle (3 5,6; 16 12). Equally welcome was a deputation consisting of Stephanas, Fortunatus and Achaicus (16 17), from whom the fullest information could be gained, and who were the probable bearers of a letter from the church of Corinth itself

(7 1), appealing for advice and direction on a number of points. This letter has not been preserved, but it was evidently the immediate occasion of our ep., and its tenor is clearly indicated by the nature of the apostle's reply. (The letter, professing to be this letter to Paul, and its companion, professing to be Paul's own lost letter just referred to, which deal with gnostic heresies, and were for long accepted by the Syrian and Armenian churches, are manifestly apocryphal. [Cf Stanley's Corinthians, Appendix; Harnack's Gesch. der altchrist. Litt., I, 37-39, and II, 506-8; Zahn, Einl., I, 183-249; Sanday, EB, I, 906-7.] If there be any relic in existence of Paul's previous letter, it is possibly to be found in the passage 2 Cor 6 14-7 1; at all events that passage may be regarded as reminiscent of its style and message.) So that 1 Cor is no bow drawn at a venture. It treats of a fully understood, and, on the whole, of a most unhappy situation. The church had broken into factions, and was distracted by party cries. Some of its members were living openly immoral lives, and discipline was practically in abeyance. Others had quarrels over which they dragged one another into the heathen courts. Great differences of opinion had also arisen with regard to marriage and the social relations generally; with regard to banquets and the eating of food offered to idols; with regard to the behavior of women in the assemblies, to the Lord's Supper and the love-feasts, to the use and value of spiritual gifts, and with regard to the hope of the resurrection. The apostle was filled with grief and indignation, which the too complacent tone of the Corinthians only intensified. They discussed questions in a lofty, intellectual way, without seeming to perceive their real drift, or the life and spirit which lay imperiled at their heart. Resisting the impulse to visit them "with a rod" (4 21), the apostle wrote the present ep., and dispatched it, if not by the hands of Stephanas and his comrades, most probably by the hands of Titus.

VI. Contents of the Epistle.—In its general character the ep. is a strenuous writing, masterly in its restraint in dealing with opposition,

1. General Character firm in its grasp of ethical and spiritual principles, and wise and faithful in their application. It is calm, full of reasoning, clear and balanced in judgment; very varied in its lights and shadows, in its kindness, its gravity, its irony. It moves with firm tread among the commonest themes, but also rises easily into the loftiest spheres of thought and vision, breaking again and again into passages of glowing and rhythmical eloquence. It rebukes error, exposes and condemns sin, solves doubts, upholds and encourages faith, and all in a spirit of the utmost tenderness and love, full of grace and truth. It is broad in its outlook, penetrating in its insight, unending in its interest and application.

It is also very orderly in its arrangement, so that it is not difficult to follow the writer as he advances from point to point. Weizsäcker

2. Order and Division (Apos Age, I, 324-25) suggestively distinguishes the matter into (1) subjects introduced by the letter from Corinth, and (2) those on which Paul had obtained information otherwise. He includes three main topics in the first class: marriage, meat offered to idols and spiritual gifts (there is a fourth—the logia or collection, 16 1); six in the second class: the factions, the case of incest, the lawsuits, the free customs of the women, the abuse connected with the Supper and the denial of the resurrection. It is useful, however, to adhere to the sequence of the ep. In broadly outlining the subject-matter we may make a threefold division: (1) chs 1-6; (2) chs 7-10; and (3) chs 11-12.

3. Outline (1 1-9), Paul immediately begins (1 10-13) to refer to the internal divisions among them, and to the unworthy and misguided party cries that had arisen. (Many theories have been formed as to the exact significance of the so-called "Christus-party," a party whose danger becomes more obvious in 2 Cor. Cf Meyer-Heinrici, Comm., 8th ed; Godet, Intro, 250 ff; Stanley, Cor, 29-30; Farrar, St. Paul, ch xxxi; Pfeiderer, Paulinism, II, 28-31; Weiss, Intro, I, 259-65; Weizsäcker, Apos Age, I, 325-33, and 354 ff. Weizsäcker holds that the name indicates exclusive relation to an authority, while Baur and Pfeiderer argue that it was a party watchword [virtually Petrine] taken to bring out the apostolic inferiority of Paul. On the other hand a few scholars maintain that the name does not, strictly speaking, indicate a party at all but rather designates those who were disgusted at the display of all party spirit, and with whom Paul was in hearty sympathy. See McGiffert, Apos Age, 295-97.) After denouncing this petty partisanship, Paul offers an elaborate defence of his own ministry, declaring the power and wisdom of God in the gospel of the Cross (1 14-2 16), returning in ch 3 to the spirit of faction, showing its absurdity and narrowness in face of the fulness of the Christian heritage in "all things" that belong to them as belonging to Christ; and once more defending his ministry in ch 4, making a touching appeal to his readers as his "beloved children," whom he had begotten through the gospel. In ch 5 he deals with the case of a notorious offender, guilty of incest, whom they unworthily harbor in their midst, and in the name of Christ demands that they should expel him from the church, pointing out at the same time that it is against the countenancing of immorality within the church membership that he specially warns, and had previously warned in his former ep. Ch 6 deals with the shamefulness of Christian brethren haling one another to the heathen courts, and not rather seeking the settlement of their differences within themselves; reverting once more in the closing vs to the subject of unchastity, which irrepressibly haunts him as he thinks of them.

(2) Chs 7-10: In ch 7 he begins to reply to two of the matters on which the church had expressly consulted him in its ep., and which he usually induces by the phrase peri de, "now concerning." The first of these bears (ch 7) upon celibacy and marriage, including the case of "mixed" marriage. These questions he treats quite frankly, yet with delicacy and circumspection, always careful to distinguish between what he has received as the direct word of the Lord, and what he only delivers as his own opinion, the utterance of his own sanctified common-sense, yet to which the good spirit within him gives weight. The second matter on which advice was solicited, questions regarding eidolothuta, meats offered to idols, he discusses in ch 8, recurring to it again in ch 10 to end. The scruples and casuistries involved he handles with excellent wisdom, and lays down a rule for the Christian conscience of a far-reaching kind, happily expressed: "All things are lawful; but not all things are expedient. All things are lawful; but not all things edify. Let no man seek his own, but each his neighbor's good" (10 23.24). By lifting their differences into the purer atmosphere of love and duty, he causes them to dissolve away. Ch 9 contains another notable defence of his apostleship, in which he asserts the principle that the Christian ministry has a claim for its support on those to whom it ministers, although in his own case he deliberately waived his right, that no challenge on such a matter should be possible among them. The earlier portion of ch 10 contains a reference to Jewish idolatry and sacramental abuse, in order that the evils that resulted might point a moral, and act as a solemn warning to Christians in relation to their own rites.

(3) Chs 11-16: The third section deals with certain errors and defects that had crept into the inner life and observances of the church, also with further matters on which the Corinthians sought guidance, namely, spiritual gifts and the collection for the saints. Ch 11 1-16 has regard to the deportment of women and their veiling in church, a matter which seems to have occasioned some difficulty, and which Paul deals with in a manner quite his own; passing thereafter to treat of graver and more disorderly affairs, gross abuses in the form of gluttony and drunkenness at the Lord's Supper, which leads him, after severe censure, to make his classic reference to that sacred ordinance (vs 20 to end). Ch 12 sets forth the diversity, yet true unity, of spiritual gifts, and the confusion and jealousy to which a false conception of them inevitably leads, obscuring that "most excellent way," the love which transcends them all, which never faileth, the greatest of the Christian graces, whose praise he chants in language of surpassing beauty (ch 13). He strives also, in the following chapter, to correct the disorder arising from the abuse of the gift of tongues, many desiring to speak at once, and many speaking only a vain babble which no one could understand, thinking themselves thereby highly gifted. It is not edifying: "I had rather," he declares, "speak five words with my understanding, than ten thousand words in a tongue" (14 19). Thereafter follows the immortal chapter on the resurrection, which he had learned that some denied (15 12). He anchors the faith to the resurrection of Christ as historic fact, abundantly attested (vs 3-8), shows how all-essential it is to the Christian hope (vs 13-19), and then proceeds by reasoning and analogy to brush aside certain naturalistic objections to the great doctrine, "then they that are Christ's, at his coming" (ver 23), when this mortal shall have put on immortality, and death be swallowed up in victory (ver 54). The closing chapter gives directions as to the collection for the saints in Jerus, on which his heart was deeply set, and in which he hoped the Corinthians would bear a worthy share. He promises to visit them, and even to tarry the winter with them. He then makes a series of tender personal references, and so brings the great ep. to a close.

VII. Distinguishing Features.—It will be seen that there are passages in the ep. of great doctrinal and historical importance, esp. with reference to the Person of Christ, the Holy Spirit, the Eucharist and the Resurrection; also many that illuminate the nature of the religious meetings and services of the early church (cf particularly on these, Weizsäcker, Apos Age, II, 246 ff). A lurid light is cast on many of the errors and evils that not unnaturally still clung to those who were just emerging from paganism, and much allowance has to be made for the Corinthian environment. The thoroughness with which the apostle pursues the difficulties raised into their relations and details, and the wide scope of matters which he subjects to Christian scrutiny and criterion, are also significant. Manifestly he regarded the gospel as come to fill, not a part, but the whole, of life; to supply principles that follow the believers to their homes, to the most secluded sanctum there, out again to the world, to the market-place, the place of amusement, of temptation, of service, of trial, of worship and prayer; and all in harmony with knowing nothing "save Jesus Christ, and him crucified." For Paul regards that not as a restriction, but as a large and expansive principle. He sets the cross on an eminence so high that its shadow covers the whole activities of human life.

Three broad outstanding features of a practical kind may be recognized. The first is the earnest

1. The Party Spirit warning it conveys against a factious spirit as inimical to the Christian life. The Corinthians were imbued with the party spirit of Gr democracy, and were infected also by the sporting spirit of the great games that entered so largely into their existence. They transferred these things to the church. They listened to their teachers with itching ears, not as men who wished to learn, but as partisans who sought occasion either to applaud or to condemn. Paul recognizes that, though they are not dividing on deep things of the faith, they are giving way to "schisms" of a pettier and perhaps even more perilous kind, that appeal to the lowest elements in human nature, that cause scandal in the eyes of men and inflict grievous wounds on the Body of Christ. In combating this spirit he takes occasion to go below the surface, and to reveal the foundations of true Christian unity. That must simply be "in Christ." And this is true even if the divergence should be on higher and graver things. Any unity in such a case, still possible to cherish, must be a unity in Christ. None can be unchurched who build on Him; none severed from the true and catholic faith, who confess with their lips and testify with their lives that He is Lord.

The ep. also renders a high ethical service in the rules it lays down for the guidance of the Christian conscience. In matters where the issue is clearly one of the great imperatives, the conflict need never be protracted. An earnest man will see his way. But beyond these, or not easily reducible to them, there are many matters that cause perplexity and doubt. Questions arise regarding things that do not seem to be wrong in themselves, yet whose abuse or the offence they give to others, may well cause debate. Meat offered to idols, and then brought to table, was a stumbling-block to many Corinthian Christians. They said: "If we eat, it is consenting to idolatry; we dare not partake." But there were some who rose to a higher level. They perceived that this was a groundless scruple, for an idol is nothing at all, and the meat is not affected by the superstition. Accordingly their higher and more rational view gave them liberty and left their conscience free. But was this really all that they had to consider? Some say: "Certainly"; and Paul acknowledges that this is undoubtedly the law of individual freedom. But it is not the final answer. There has not entered into it a consideration of the mind of Christ. Christian liberty must be willing to subject itself to the law of love. Granted that a neighbor is often short-sighted and over-scrupulous, and that it would be good neither for him nor for others to suffer him to become a moral dictator; yet we are not quite relieved. The brother may be weak, but the very claim of his weakness may be strong. We may not ride over his scruples roughshod. To do so would be to put ourselves wrong even more seriously. And if the matter is one that is manifestly fraught with peril to him, conscience may be roused to say, as the apostle says: "Wherefore, if meat maketh my brother to stumble, I will eat no flesh for evermore."

2. The Christian Conscience

A third notable feature of the ep. is its exaltation of the cross of Christ as the power and wisdom of God unto salvation. It was the force that began to move and unsettle, to lift and change from its base, the life of that old heathen world. It was neither Paul, nor Apollos, nor Cephas who accomplished that colossal task, but the preaching of the crucified Christ. The Christianity of Corinth and of Europe began with the gospel of Calvary and the open tomb. It can never with impunity draw away from these central facts. The river broadens and deepens as it flows, but it is never possible for it to sever itself from the living fountain from which it springs.

LITERATURE.—The following writers will be found most important and helpful:

I. Text, Authenticity and Date.—Cf what has already been said in the preceding art. In the two important 5th-cent. uncials, A (Alex.)

1. Internal Evidence and C (Ephraemi), portions of the text are lacking. As to the genuineness internal evidence very vividly attests it. The distinctive elements of Pauline theology and eschatology, expressed in familiar Pauline terms, are manifest throughout. Yet the ep. is not doctrinal or didactic, but an intensely personal document. Its absorbing interest is in events which were profoundly agitating Paul and the Corinthians at the time, straining their relations to the point of rupture, and demanding strong action on Paul's part. Our imperfect knowledge of the circumstances necessarily hinders a complete comprehension, but the references to these events and to others in the personal history of the apostle are so natural, and so manifestly made in good faith, that no doubt rises in the reader's mind but that he is in the sphere of reality, and that the voice he hears is the voice of the man whose heart and nerves were being torn by the experiences through which he was passing. However scholars may differ as to the continuity and integrity of the text, there is no serious divergence among them in the opinion that all parts of the ep. are genuine writings of the apostle.

Externally, the testimony of the sub-apostolic age, though not so frequent or precise as in the case of 1 Cor, is still sufficiently clear to establish the existence and use of the ep. in the 2d cent. Clement of Rome is silent when he might rather have been expected to use the ep. (cf Kennedy, Second and Third Cor, 142 ff); but it is quoted by Polycarp (Ad Phil., ii.4 and vi.1), and in the Epistle to Diognetus 5 12, while it is amply attested to by Irenaeus, Athenagoras, Theophilus, Tertullian and Clement of Alexandria. It was written from Macedonia (probably from Philippi) either in the autumn of the same year as that in which 1 Cor was written, 54 or 55 AD, or in the autumn of the succeeding year.

II. Résumé of Events.—Great difficulty exists as to the circumstances in which the ep. was written, and as to the whole situation between 1 and 2 Cor. In 1 Cor Paul had intimated his intention of visiting the Corinthians and wintering with them, coming to them through Macedonia (16 5-7; cf also Acts 19 21). In 2 Cor 1 15.16 he refers to a somewhat different plan, Corinth-Macedonia-Corinth-Judaea; and describes this return from Macedonia to Corinth as a second or double benefit. But if this plan, on which he and his friends had counted, had not been entirely carried out, it had been for good reason (1 17), and not due to mere fickleness or light-hearted change to suit his own convenience. It was because he would "spare" them (1 23), and not come to them "again with sorrow" (2 1). That is, he had been with them, but there had been such a profound disturbance in their relations that he dared not risk a return meantime; instead, he had written a letter to probe and test them, "out of much affliction and anguish of heart . . . with many tears" (2 4). Thank God, this severe letter had accomplished its mission. It had produced sorrow among them (2 2; 7 8.9), but it had brought their hearts back to him with the old allegiance, with great clearing of themselves, and fear and longing and zeal (7 11). There was a period, however, of waiting for knowledge of this issue, which was to him a period of intense anxiety; he had even nervously regretted that he had written as he did (7 5-8). Titus, who had gone as his representative to Corinth, was to return with a report of how this severe letter had been received, and when Titus failed to meet him at Troas (2 13), he had "no relief for his spirit," but pushed on eagerly to Macedonia to encounter him the sooner. Then came the answer, and the lifting of the intolerable burden from his mind. "He that comforteth the lowly, even God, comforted" him (7 6). The Corinthians had been swayed by a godly sorrow and repentance (7 8), and the sky had cleared again with almost unhopd-for brightness. One who had offended (2 5 and 7 12)—but whose offence is not distinctly specified—had been disciplined by the church; indeed, in the revulsion of feeling against him, and in sympathy for the apostle, he had been punished so heavily that there was a danger of passing to an extreme, and plunging him into despair (2 7). Paul accordingly pleads for leniency and forgiveness, lest further resentment should lead only to a further and sadder wrong (2 6-11). But in addition to this offender there were others, probably following in his train, who had carried on a relentless attack against the apostle both in his person and in his doctrine. He earnestly defends himself against their contemptuous charges of fleshliness and cowardice (ch 10), and crafty venality (12 16,17). Another Jesus is preached, a different spirit, a different gospel (11 4). They "commend themselves" (10 12), but are false apostles, deceitful workers, ministers of Satan, fashioning themselves into ministers of Christ (11 13,14). Their attacks are vehemently repelled in an eloquent apologia (chs 11 and 12), and he declares that when he comes the third time they will not be spared (13 2). Titus, accompanied by other well-known brethren, is again to be the representative of the apostle (8 6,17 ff). At no great interval Paul himself followed, thus making his third visit (12 14; 13 1), and so far fulfilled his original purpose that he spent the winter peacefully in Corinth (cf Acts 20 2,3; Rom 15 25-27 and 16 23).

III. The New Situation.—It is manifest that we are in the presence of a new and unexpected situation, whose development is not clearly defined, and concerning which we have elsewhere no source of information. To elucidate it, the chief points requiring attention are: (1) The references to the offender in chs 2 and 7, and to the false teachers, particularly in the later chapters of the ep.; (2) the painful visit implicitly referred to in 2 1; and (3) the letter described as written in tears and for a time regretted (2 4; 7 8).

The offender in 1 Cor 5 1-5 had been guilty of incest, and Paul was grieved that the church of Corinth did not regard with horror a crime which even the pagan world would not have tolerated. His judgment on the case was uncompromising and the severest possible—that, in solemn assembly, in the name and with the power of the Lord Jesus, the church should deliver such a one to Satan for the destruction of the flesh. On the other hand, the offender in 2 Cor 2 5 ff is one who obviously has transgressed less heinously, and in a way more personal to the apostle. The church, roused by the apostle to show whether they indeed cared for him and stood by him (2 9; 13 7), had, by a majority, brought censure to bear on this man, and Paul now urged that matters should go no farther, lest an excess of discipline should really end in a triumph of Satan. It is not possible to regard such references as applying to the crime dealt with in 1 Cor. Purposely veiled as the statements are, it would yet appear that a personal attack had been made on the apostle; and the "many" in Corinth (2 6), having at length espoused his cause, Paul then deals with the matter in the generous spirit he might have been expected to display. Even if the offender were the same person, which is most improbable, for he can scarcely have been retained in the membership, the language is not language that could have been applied to the earlier case. There has been a new offence in new circumstances. The apostle had been grievously wronged in the presence of the church, and the Corinthians had not spontaneously resented the wrong. That is what wounded the apostle most deeply, and it is to secure their change in this respect that is his gravest concern.

Esp. in the later chs of 2 Cor there are, as we have seen, descriptions of an opposition by false teachers that is far beyond anything met with in 1 Cor. There indeed we have a spirit of faction, associated with unworthy partiality toward individual preachers,

2. The False Teachers but nothing to lead us to suspect the presence of deep and radical differences undermining the gospel. The general consensus of opinion is that this opposition was of a Judaizing type, organized and fostered by implacable anti-Pauline emissaries from Pal, who now followed the track of the apostle in Achaia as they did in Galatia. As they arrogated to themselves a peculiar relation to Christ Himself ("Christ's men" and "ministers of Christ," 10 7; 11 13), it is possible that the Christus-party of 1 Cor (and possibly the Cephas-party) may have persisted and formed the nucleus round which these newcomers built up their formidable opposition. One man seems to have been conspicuous as their ring-leader (10 7,11), and to have made himself specially obnoxious to the apostle. In all probability we may take it that he was the offender of chs 2 and 7. Under his influence the opposition audaciously endeavored to destroy the gospel of grace by personal attacks upon its most distinguished exponent. Paul was denounced as an upstart and self-seeker, destitute of any apostolic authority, and derided for the contemptible appearance he made in person, in contrast with the swelling words and presumptuous claims of his epp. It is clear, therefore, that a profound religious crisis had arisen among the Corinthians, and that there was a danger of their attachment to Paul and his doctrine being destroyed.

2 Cor 12 14 and 13 1,2 speak of a third visit in immediate prospect, and the latter passage also refers to a second visit that had been already accomplished; while 2 1 distinctly implies that a visit had taken place of a character so painful that the apostle would never venture to

3. The Painful Visit endure a similar one. As this cannot possibly refer to the first visit when the church was founded, and cannot easily be regarded as indicating anything previous to 1 Cor which never alludes to such an experience, we must conclude that the reference points to the interval between 1 and 2 Cor. It was then beyond doubt that the visit "with sorrow," which humbled him (12 21) and left such deep wounds, had actually taken place. "Any exegesis," says Weizsäcker justly, "that would avoid the conclusion that Paul had already been twice in Corinth is capricious and artificial" (Apostolic Age, I, 343). Sabatier (Apostle Paul, 172 n.) records his revised opinion: "The reference here (2 1) is to a second and quite recent visit, of which he retained a very sorrowful recollection, including it among the most bitter trials of his apostolic career."

Paul not only speaks of a visit which had ended grievously, but also of a letter which he had written

4. The Severe Letter to deal with the painful circumstances, and as a kind of ultimatum to bring the whole matter to an issue (2 4; 7 8). This letter was written because he could not trust himself meantime to another visit. He was so distressed and agitated that he wrote it "with many tears"; after it was written he repented of it; and until he knew its effect he endured torture so keen that he hastened to Macedonia to meet his messenger, Titus, halfway. It is impossible by any stretch of interpretation to refer this language to 1 Cor, which on the whole is dominated by a spirit of didactic calm, and by a consciousness of friendly rapport with its recipients. Even though there be in it occasional indications of strong feeling, there is certainly nothing that we can conceive the apostle might have wished to recall. The alternative has generally been to regard this as another case of a lost ep. Just as the writer of Acts appears to have been willing that the deplorable visit itself should drop into oblivion, so doubtless neither Paul nor the Corinthians would be very anxious to preserve an ep. which echoed with the gusts and storms of such a visit. On the other hand a strong tendency has set in to regard this intermediate ep. as at least in part preserved in 2 Cor 10-13, whose tone, it is universally admitted, differs from that of the preceding chapters in a remarkable way, not easily accounted for. The majority of recent writers seem inclined to favor this view, which will naturally fall to be considered under the head of "Integrity."

IV. Historical Reconstruction.—In view of such an interpretation, we may with considerable probability trace the course of events in the interval between 1 and 2 Cor as follows: After the dispatch of 1 Cor, news reached the apostle of a disquieting character; probably both Titus and Timothy, on returning from Corinth, reported the growing menace of the opposition fostered by the Judaizing party. Paul felt impelled to pay an immediate visit, and found only too sadly that matters had not been overestimated. The opposition was strong and full of effrontery, and the whole trend of things was against him. In face of the congregation he was baffled and flouted. He returned to Ephesus, and poured out his indignation in a severe ep., which he sent on by the hands of Titus. Before Titus could return, events took a disastrous form in Ephesus, and Paul was forced to leave that city in peril of his life. He went to Troas, but, unable to wait patiently there for tidings of the issue in Corinth, he crossed to Macedonia, and met Titus, possibly in Philippi. The report was happily reassuring; the majority of the congregation returned to their old attachment, and the heavy cloud of doubt and anxiety was dispelled from the apostle's mind. He then wrote again—the present ep.—and forwarded it by Titus and other brethren, he himself following a little later, and finally wintering in Corinth as he had originally planned. If it be felt that the interval between spring and autumn of the same year is too brief for these events, the two epp. must be separated by a period of nearly 18 months, 1 Cor being referred to the spring of 54 or 55, and 2 Cor to the autumn of 55 or 56 AD. (Reference on the reconstruction should esp. be made to Weizsäcker's Apostolic Age, Eng. tr, I; to Sabatier's Note to the Eng. ed [1893] of his Apostle Paul; and to Robertson's art. in HDB.)

V. Integrity of the Epistle.—Although the genuineness of the various parts of the ep. is scarcely disputed, the homogeneity is much debated. Semler and some later writers, including Clemen (Einheitlichkeit), have thought that ch 9 should be eliminated as logically inconsistent with ch 8, and as evidently forming part of a letter to the converts of Achaia. But the connection with ch 8 is too close to permit of severance, and the logical objection, founded on the phraseology of 9 1, is generally regarded as hypercritical. There are two sections, however, whose right to remain integral parts of 2 Cor has been more forcibly challenged.

The passage 6 14 to 7 1 deals with the inconsistency and peril of intimate relations with the heathen, and is felt to be incongruous

1. Ch 6:14 with the context. No doubt it comes strangely after an appeal to the Corinthians to show the apostle the same frankness and kindness that he is showing them; whereas 7 2 follows naturally and links itself closely to such an appeal. When we remember that the particular theme of the lost letter referred to in 1 Cor 5 9 was the relation of the converts to the immoral, it is by no means unlikely that we have here preserved a stray fragment of that ep.

It is universally acknowledged that there is a remarkable change in the tone of the section 10 1—

13 10, as compared with that of the

2. Ch 10: previous chs. In the earlier chs there

1—13:10 is relief at the change which Titus has reported as having taken place in Corinth, and the spirit is one of gladness and content; but from ch 10 onward the hostility to the apostle is unexpectedly represented as still raging, and as demanding the most strenuous treatment.

The opening phrase, "Now I Paul" (10 1), is regarded as indicating a distinctive break from the previous section with which Timothy is associated (1 1), while the concluding vs, 13 11 to end, seem fittingly to close that section, but to be abruptly out of harmony with the polemic that ends at 13 10. Accordingly it is suggested that 13 11 should immediately follow 9 15, and that 10 1—13 10 be regarded as a lengthy insertion from some other ep. Those who, while acknowledging the change of tone, yet maintain the integrity of the ep., do so on the ground that the apostle was a man of many moods, and that it is characteristic of him to make unexpected and even violent transitions; that new reports of a merely scotched antagonism may come in to ruffle and disturb his comparative contentment; and that in any case he might well deem it advisable finally to deliver his whole soul on a matter over which he had brooded and suffered deeply, so that there might be no mistake about the ground being cleared when he arrived in person. The question is still a subject of keen discussion, and is not one on which it is easy to pronounce dogmatically. On the whole, however, it must be acknowledged that the preponderance of recent opinion is in favor of the theory of interpolation. Hausrath (Der Vier-Capitel-Brief des Paulus an die Korinther, 1870) gave an immense impetus to the view that this later section really represents the painful letter referred to in chs 2 and 7. As that earlier letter, however, must have contained references to the personal offender, the present section, which omits all such references, can be regarded as at most only a part of it. This theory is ably and minutely expounded by Schmiedel (Hand-Kommentar); and Pfeleiderer, Lipsius, Clemen, Krenkel, von Soden, McGiffert, Cone, Plummer, Rendall, Moffatt, Adeney, Peake, and Massie are prominent among its adherents. J. H. Kennedy (Second and Third Cor) presents perhaps the ablest and fullest argument for it that has yet appeared in English. On the other hand Sanday (EB) declares against it, and Robertson (HDB) regards it as decidedly not proven; while critics of such weight as Holtzmann, Beyschlag, Klöpfer, Weizsäcker, Sabatier, Godet, Bernard, Denney, Weiss, and Zahn are all to be reckoned as advocates of the integrity of the ep.

VI. Contents of the Epistle.—The order of matter in the ep. is quite clearly defined. There are three main divisions: (1) chs 1-7; (2) chs 8-9; and (3) chs 10-13.

The first seven chapters as a whole are taken up with a retrospect of the events that have recently transpired, joyful references to the

1. Chs 1-7 fact that the clouds of grief in connection with them have been dispelled, and that the evangelical ministry as a Divine trust and power is clearly manifested. After a cordial salutation, in which Timothy is associated, Paul starts at once to express his profound gratitude to God for the great comfort that had come to him by the good news from Corinth, rejoicing in it as a spiritual enrichment that will make his ministry still more fruitful to the church (1 3-11). He professes his sincerity in all his relations with the Corinthians, and particularly vindicates it in connection with a change in the plan which had originally promised a return ("a second benefit") to Corinth; his sole reason for refraining, and for writing a painful letter instead, being his desire to spare them and to prove them (1 12; 2 4.9). Far from harboring any resentment against the man who had caused so much trouble, he sincerely pleads that his punishment by the majority should go no farther, but that forgiveness should now reign, lest the Adversary should gain an advantage over them (2 5-11). It was indeed an agonizing experience until the moment he met Titus, but the relief was all the sweeter and more triumphant when God at length gave it, as he might have been sure He would give it to a faithful and soul-winning servant of Christ (2 12-17). He does not indeed wish to enter upon any further apologies or self-commendation. Some believe greatly in letters of commendation, but his living testimonial is in his converts. This he has, not of himself, but entirely through God, who alone has made him an efficient minister of the new and abiding covenant of the Spirit, whose glory naturally excels that of the old dispensation which faded because it really cannot bring life. Regarding this glorious ministry he must be bold and frank. It needs no veil as if to conceal its evanescence. Christ presents it unveiled to all who turn to Him, and they themselves, reflecting His glory, are spiritually transformed (3 1-18). As for those who by God's mercy have received such a gospel ministry, it is impossible for them to be faint-hearted in its exercise, although the eyes of some may be blinded to it, because the god of this world enslaves them (4 4). It is indeed wonderful that ministers of this grace should be creatures so frail, so subject to pressure and affliction, but it is not inexplicable. So much the more obvious is it that all the power and glory of salvation are from God alone (4 7.15). Yea, even if one be called to die in this ministry, that is but another light and momentary affliction. It is but passing from a frail earthly tent to abide forever in a heavenly home (5 1). Who would not long for it, that this mortal may be swallowed up in immortality? Courage, therefore, is ours to the end, for that end only means the cessation of our separation from Christ, whom it is a joy to serve absent or present. And present we shall all ultimately be before Him on the judgment throne (5 10). That itself unspeakably deepens the earnestness with which preachers of the gospel seek to persuade men. It is the love of Christ constraining them (5 14) in the ministry of reconciliation, that they should entreat men as ambassadors on Christ's behalf (5 20). So sacred and responsible a trust has subdued the apostle's own life, and is indeed the key to its manifold endurance, and to the earnestness with which he has striven to cultivate every grace, and to submit himself to every discipline (6 1-10). Would God the Corinthians might open their hearts to him as he does to them! (Let them have no fellowship with iniquity, but perfect holiness in the fear of God [6 14-7 1].) He has never wronged them; they are enshrined in his heart, living or dying; he glories in them, and is filled with comfort in all his affliction (6 11-13; 7 2-4). For what blessed comfort that was that Titus brought him in Macedonia to dispel his fears, and to show that the things he regretted and grieved to have written had done no harm after all, but had rather wrought in them the joyful change for which he longed! Now both they and he knew how dear he was to them. Titus, too, was overjoyed by the magnanimity of their reception of him. The apostle's cup is full, and "in everything he is of good courage concerning them" (7 16).

In the second section, chs 8-9, the apostle, now abundantly confident of their good-will, exhorts the

2. Chs 8-9 Corinthians on the subject of the collection for the poor saints at Jerus.

He tells them of the extraordinary liberality of the Macedonian churches, and invites them to emulate it, and by the display of this additional grace to make full proof of their love (8 1-8). Nay, they have a higher incentive than the liberality of Macedonia, even the self-sacrifice of Christ Himself (8 9). Wherefore let them go on with the good work they were so ready to initiate a year ago, giving out of a willing mind, as God hath enabled them (8 10-15). Further to encourage them he sends on Titus and other well-known and accredited brethren, whose interest in them is as great as his own, and he is hopeful that by their aid the matter will be completed, and all will rejoice when he comes, bringing with him probably some of those of Macedonia, to whom he has already been boasting of their zeal (8 16-9 5). Above all, let them remember that important issues are bound up with this grace of Christian liberality. It is impossible to reap bountifully, if we sow sparingly. Grudging and compulsory benevolence is a contradiction, but God loveth and rewardeth a cheerful giver. This grace blesseth him that gives and him that takes. Many great ends are served by it. The wants of the needy are supplied, men's hearts are drawn affectionately to one another, thanksgivings abound, and God himself is glorified (9 6-15).

The third section, chs 10-13, as has been pointed out, is a spirited and even passionate polemic, in the course of which the Judaizing party in Corinth is vigorously assailed. 3. Chs 10-13 The enemies of the apostle have charged him with being very bold and courageous when he is absent, but humble enough when he is present. He hopes the Corinthians will not compel him to show his courage (10 2). It is true, being human, he walks in the flesh, but not in the selfish and cowardly way his opponents suggest. The weapons of his warfare are not carnal, yet are they mighty before God to cast down such strongholds as theirs, such vain imaginations and disobedience. Some boast of being "Christ's," but that is no monopoly; he also is Christ's. They think his letters are mere "sound and fury, signifying nothing"; by and by they will discover their mistake. If he should glory in his authority, he is justified, for Corinth was verily part of his God-appointed province, and he at least did not there enter on other men's labors. But it would be well if men who gloried confined themselves to glorying "in the Lord." For after all it is His commendation alone that is of any permanent value (10 3-18). Will the Corinthians bear with him in a little of this foolish boasting? Truly he ventures on it out of concern for them (11 2). And as they are manifest adepts in toleration, abounding in patience toward those who have come with a different gospel, they may perhaps extend some of their indulgence to him, for though he cannot lay claim to a polished oratory comparable to that of these "super-eminent" apostles, yet at least he is not behind them in knowledge (11 4-6). Can it be that he really sinned in preaching the gospel to them without fee or reward? Was it a mark of fleshly cunning when he resolved not to be burdensome to them, while he accepted supplies from Macedonia? Ah! it was not because he did not love them, but because he decided to give no occasion to those who were too ready to blame him—those false apostles, who, like Satan himself, masqueraded as angels of light and ministers of righteousness (11 7-15). Come, then, let him to this glorying, this poor folly, which they in their superlative wisdom bear with so gladly in the case of those insolent creatures who now bully and degrade them (11 16-21). Hebrews! Israelites! So is he. Ministers of Christ! There he excels them—in labors, in perils, in persecutions; in burdens, anxieties, sympathies; in visions and revelations of the Lord; in infirmities and weaknesses that have made more manifest in him the strength of Christ (11 22-12 10). Certainly all this is folly, but they are most to blame for it who, through lack of loyalty, have forced him to it. Did he injure them by declining to be burdensome? Is it so sore a point? Let it be forgiven! Yet when he comes again he will take no other course (12 11-18). They must not imagine that in all this he is excusing himself to them. He is sincerely and affectionately concerning himself for their edifying. He trembles lest when they meet again they should be disappointed in each other; lest they should be found in unworthy strife and tumults, and lest he should be humbled of God before them, having cause to mourn over some who are hardened and impenitent in their sins (12 19-21). For they must meet again—he is coming for the third time—and this time he will not spare. Let them prove themselves whether they be in the faith; for surely they must know whether Christ be in them. He earnestly prays for their goodness and honor; not to the end that no display of his power may be called for, but simply that he will be glad to appear weak if they should appear strong. Could they but believe it, their perfecting is the aim of all his labors (13 1-10). And so, with words of grace and tenderness, exhorting them to unity and peace, and pronouncing over them the threefold benediction, he bids them farewell (13 11-14).

VII. Value of the Epistle.—The chief element of value in this ep. is the revelation it gives of the apostle himself. Through all its changing moods, Paul, in perfect abandon, shows us his very soul, suffering, rejoicing, enduring, overcoming. It has been truly said that "it enables us, as it were, to lay our hands upon his breast, and feel the very throbbings of his heart." (1) In relation to his converts, it shows us how sensitive he was, how easy it was to touch him on the quick, and to wound his feelings. The apostle was very human, and nowhere are his kindred limitations more obvious than in these present incidents. He would probably be the first to acquiesce, if it were said that even with him the creed was greater than the life. In the hastily written and nervously repented passages of that severe ep.; in the restless wandering, like a perturbed spirit, from Troas to Macedonia, to meet the news and know the issue of his acts, we see a man most lovable indeed, most like ourselves when issues hang in the balance, but a man not already perfect, not yet risen to the measure of the stature of Christ. Yet we see also the intensity with which Paul labored in his ministry—the tenacity with which he held to his mission, and the invincible courage with which he returned to the fight for his imperiled church. He loved those converts as only a great soul in Christ could love them. His keenest sorrow came in the disaster that threatened them, and he flew to their defence. He had not only won them for Christ, he was willing to die that he might keep them for Christ. (2) The ep. is charged with a magnificent consciousness on the apostle's part of his high calling in Christ Jesus. He has been called with a Divine calling to the most glorious work in which a man can engage, to be to this estranged earth an ambassador of heaven. Received as Divine, this vocation is accepted with supreme devotion. It has been a ministry of sorrow, of strain and suffering, of hair-breadth escapes with the bare life; with its thorn in the flesh, its buffeting of Satan. Yet through it all there rings the note of abounding consolation in Christ Jesus, and never was the "power of Christ," resting on frail humanity, more signally manifested.

LITERATURE.—See the references to both epp., and to 2 Cor alone, under this heading in the preceding art. To the list there given should be added Moffatt's Introduction to the Literature of the NT, 1911; valuable for its critical presentation of recent views, and for its references to the literature.

R. DYKES SHAW

CORINTHUS, kô-rin'thus: Lat form for Gr Kōrinthos in the subscription to Rom (AV). See CORINTH.

CORMORANT, kôr'mô-rant (קָרָמֹרַנְט, shālākh; καταράκτης, kataráktēs; Lat Corvus marinus): A large sea-fowl belonging to the genus Phalacrocorax and well described by the Heb word used to designate it—which means a "plunging bird." The bird appears as large as a goose when in full feather, but plucked, the body is much smaller. The adult birds are glossy black with bronze tints, touched with white on the cheeks and sides as a festal dress at mating season, and adorned with filamentary feathers on the head, and bright yellow gape. These birds if taken young and carefully trained can be sent into the water from boats and bring to their masters large quantities of good-sized fish: commonly so used in China. The flesh is dark, tough and quite unfit to eat in the elders on account of their diet of fish. The nest is built mostly of seaweed. The eggs are small for the size of the birds, having a rough, thick, but rather soft shell of a bluish white which soon becomes soiled, as well as the nest and its immediate surroundings, from the habits of the birds. The young are leathery black, then covered with soft down of brownish black above and white beneath and taking on the full black of the grown bird at about three years. If taken in the squab state the young are said to be delicious food, resembling baked hare in flavor. The old birds are mentioned among the abominations for food (Lev 11 13-19; Dt 14 12-18).

CORN, kôrn (קֹרֶן, dāghān; σίτος, sítos): A word used for cereals generally (Gen 27 28.37, etc, AV) much as our Eng. word "corn." ARV almost invariably substitutes "grain" for "corn." The latter may be taken to include (1) barley, (2) wheat, (3) fitches (vetches), (4) lentils, (5) beans, (6) millet, (7) rye—the wrong tr for vetches, (8) pulse—for all these see separate articles. Rye and oats are not cultivated in Pal. For many references to corn see AGRICULTURE; FOOD. "A corn [κόκκος, kókkos, RV "grain"] of wheat" is mentioned (Jn 12 24).

CORNELIUS, kor-nē'li-us (Κορνήλιος, Kornēlios, "of a horn"): The story of Cornelius is given in Acts 10 1—11 18. The name is Rom and belonged to distinguished families in the imperial city, such as the Scipios and Sulla. Thus he was probably an Italian of Rom blood.

Julian the Apostate reckons him as one of the few persons of distinction who became a Christian. He was evidently a man of importance in Caesarea and well known to the Jews (Acts 10 22). He was a centurion in the Italian cohort. To understand this we must note that the Rom army was divided into two broad divisions, the legions and the auxiliary forces. See ARMY, ROMAN.

Legions were never permanently quartered in Pal until the great war which ended in the destruction of Jerus, 70 AD. From the year 6 AD, when Pal was made into a province of the second rank, until 66 AD, it was garrisoned by auxiliary troops recruited amongst the Samaritans and Syrian Greeks. The headquarters were naturally at Caesarea, the residence of the procurator. But it would not have been prudent for a garrison in Pal to be composed wholly of troops locally recruited. Therefore the Rom government mingled with the garrison 600 soldiers, free Italian volunteers. With this cohort Cornelius was connected as centurion.

He is described as devout and God-fearing, i.e. at least, one of those men so numerous in that effete age of decadent heathenism who, discontented with polytheism, yearned

2. His Character for a better faith, embraced, therefore, the monotheism of the Jews, read the Scriptures, and practised more or less of the Jewish rites. He was well reported of by the Jews, and his religion showed itself in prayer at the regular hours, and in alms to the people (of Israel). Even Jewish bigotry was dumb in presence of so noble a man. Moreover, he seems to have made his house a sort of church, for his kinsfolk and friends were in sympathy with him, and among the soldiers who closely attended him were some devout ones (Acts 10 1.27).

The story of his conversion and admission into the Christian church is told with some minuteness in Acts 10. Nothing further is known

3. His Admission into the Christian Church of Cornelius, though one tradition asserts that he founded the church in Caesarea, and another legend that he became the bishop of Scamandros.

The exact importance of the incident depends upon the position of Cornelius before it occurred. Certainly he was not a proselyte of the sanctuary, circumcised, under the law,

4. Significance of the Incident a member of the Jewish communion. This is abundantly evident from Acts 10 28.34.45; 11 3.18; 15 7.14. But was he not an inferior form of proselyte, later called "proselytes of the gate"? This question has been much debated and is still under discussion.

Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, 43) says that the expression, "God-fearing," applied to him, is always used in Acts with reference to this kind of proselytes. Such were bound to observe certain regulations of purity, probably those, and which stand in close relation to the principles laid down in Lev 17-18 for the conduct of strangers dwelling among Israel. Renan, on the other hand, denies that Cornelius was a proselyte at all, but simply a devout Gentile who adopted some of the Jewish ideas and religious customs which did not involve a special profession. The importance of the whole transaction to the development of the church seems to depend on the circumstance that Cornelius was probably not a proselyte at all. Thus we regard Cornelius as lit. the first-fruits of the Gentiles. The step here taken by Peter was therefore one of tremendous importance to the whole development of the church. The significance of the incident consists exactly in this, that under Divine direction, the first Gentile, not at all belonging to the old theocracy, becomes a Spirit-filled Christian, entering through the front door of the Christian church without first going through the narrow gate of Judaism. The incident settled forever the great, fundamental question as to the relations of Jew and Gentile in the church. The difficulties in the way of the complete triumph of Peter's view of the equality of Jews and Gentiles in the Kingdom of Christ were enormous. It would have been indeed little short of miraculous if the multitude of Christian Pharisees had not raised the question again and again. Did they not dog Paul's steps after the Council? Certainly Ramsay is wrong in saying that the case of Cornelius was passed over or condoned as exceptional, for it was used as a precedent by both Peter and James (Acts 15 7.14).

As for Peter's subsequent conduct at Antioch, no one who knows Peter need be surprised at it. The very accusation that Paul hurled at him was that for the moment he was carried into inconsistency with his principles (hypókrisis). Of course, this incident of Cornelius was only the first step in a long development; but the principle was forever settled. The rest in due time and proper order was sure to follow. By this tremendous innovation it was settled that Christianity was to be freed from the swaddling bands of Judaism and that the Christian church was not to be an appendix to the synagogue. The noble character of Cornelius was just fitted to abate, as far as possible, the prejudices of the Jewish Christians against what must have seemed to them a dangerous, if not awful, innovation. G. CORNER, kôr'nēr (קַרְנֵי, mikṣō', קַרְנֵי, pē'āh, קַרְנֵי, pinnāh; ἀρχή, archē, γωνία, gōnia, ἀκρογωνιαίος, akrogoniāios): In Ex 26 24; Ezk 41 22; 46 21.22, mikṣō', "angle" is tr<sup>d</sup> "corner"; pē'āh, "side," "quarter," and pinnāh, "corner," "front," "chief," are more frequently so tr<sup>d</sup>, e.g. Ex 25 26; Lev 19 9; Jer 9 26; 25 23; and Ex 27 2; 1 K 7 34; Ps 118 22; Isa 28 16 ("corner-stone"); Jer 51 26. Other words are kānāph, "wing" (Isa 11 12; Ezk 7 2); kāthēph, "shoulder" (2 K 11 11 AV bis); pa'am, "foot" (Ex 25 12 AV); zāwīyōth, "corner-stones" (Ps 144 12; Zec 9 15 [tr<sup>d</sup> "corners"]).

For "corner" RV has "side" (Ex 36 25), "corner-stone" (Zec 10 4), also for "stay" (Isa 19 13); instead of "teacher removed into a corner" (Isa 30 20), "be hidden," "hide themselves"; for "corners" we have "feet" (Ex 25 12; 1 K 7 30); "ribs" (Ex 30 4; 37 27); for "divide into corners" (Neh 9 22), "allot after their portions"; for "into corners" (Dt 32 26), "afar"; the words to Israel (Isa 41 9) "called thee from the chief men [ʿāḥīlīm] thereof" are rendered by RV "called thee from the corners thereof" (of the earth).

In the NT we have gōnia ("angle," "corner"), "in the corners of the streets" (Mt 6 5), "the head of the corner" (21 42), "the four corners of the earth" (Rev 7 1; 20 8); archē ("a beginning") (Acts 10 11; 11 5); "chief corner stone" (Eph 2 20; 1 Pet 2 6), is a tr of akrogoniāios ("at the extreme angle"). CORNER GATE, kôr'nēr gāt. See JERUSALEM.

CORNERS OF THE EARTH. See EARTH, CORNERS OF.

CORNER-STONE, kôr'nēr 'stōn (קַרְנֵי, pinnāh, קַרְנֵי, zāwīth; ἀκρογωνιαίος, akrogoniāios): Part of the public or imposing buildings to which importance has been attached in all ages and in many nations, both on account of its actual service and its figurative meaning. Ordinarily its use in the Bible is figurative, or symbolical. No doubt the original meaning was some important stone, which was laid at the foundation of a building.

(1) With the Canaanites, who preceded Israel in the possession of Pal, corner-stone laying seems to have been a most sacred and impressive ceremonial. Under this important stone of temples, or other great structures, bodies of children or older persons would be laid, consecrating the building by such human sacrifice (see FORTIFICATION, II, 1). This was one of many hideous rites and practices which Israel was to extirpate. It may throw light on the curse pronounced upon the rebuilding of Jericho (Josh 6 26; see PEFS, January, 1904, July, 1908). See CANAAN.

(2) OT references.—The Heb word pinnāh, "corner," is found or implied in every occurrence of this idea. Derived from a root signifying "to turn," it means "turning," and therefore "edge" or "corner." Ordinarily it is used with 'ebhen, "stone" (Ps 118 22); or it may occur alone, having acquired for itself through frequent use the whole technical phrase-idea (Zec 10 4 AV). While all the passages indicate the stone at the corner, there appear to be two conceptions: (a) the foundation-stone upon which the structure rested (Job 38 6; Isa 28 16; Jer 51 26); or (b) the topmost or cap-stone, which linked the last tier together (Ps 118 22; Zec 4 7); in both cases it is an important or key-stone, and figurative of the Messiah, who is "the First and the Last." In Job 38 6 it beautifully expresses in figures the Figurative stability of the earth, which Jeh Uses created. In Zec 10 4 the leader or ruler in the Messianic age is represented by the corner-stone. The ancient tradition of the one missing stone, when the temple was in building, is reflected in or has been suggested by Ps 118 22 (Midr quoted by Pusey under Zec 4 7). It is probable that we should read in Ps 144 12 not "corner-stones," but "corner-pillars," or supports (cf Gr Caryatides) from a different Heb word, zāwīth, BDB, s.v.

(3) NT passages.—Ps 118 22 is quoted and interpreted as fulfilled in Jesus Christ in a number of passages: Mt 21 42; Mk 12 10; Lk 20 17; Acts 4 11 and 1 Pet 2 7; it is also the evident basis for Eph 2 20. Isa 28 16 is quoted twice in the NT: Rom 9 33, from LXX combined with the words of Isa 8 14, and in 1 Pet 2 6, which is quoted with some variation from LXX. The OT passages were understood by the rabbis to be Messianic, and were properly so applied by the NT writers. See also HOUSE. EDWARD MACK

CORNET, kôr'net, kor'net. See MUSIC.

CORNFLOOR, kôrn'flôr (גֶּרֶן, גֶּרֶן, gören dāghān): "Thou hast loved a reward upon every cornfloor" (Hos 9 1 AV, RV "hire upon every grainfloor"). Israel had deserted Jeh for supposed material benefits and regarded bounteous crops as the gift of the heathen gods which they worshipped. Jeh would therefore cause the corn (grain) and wine to fail (ver 2). See also THRESHING-FLOOR.

CORONATION, kor-ô-nā'shun (προτοκλία, protoklīsia): Occurs in 2 Mac 4 21 (AV, RV "enthronement") where Apollonius was sent into Egypt for the coronation of Ptolemy Philometor as king. The Gr word protoklīsia occurs nowhere else, and its meaning is uncertain. The reading in Swete is protoklēsia, and this means "the first call."

CORPSE, kôrps: This word in the AV is the tr of two Heb words, פֶּגֶר, pegher, and גִּוְיָה, g'wiyāh, while נֶבֶלֶה, n'bhelāh, and גִּוְיָה, gūphāh, which mean the same, are tr "body," with which the Eng. word "corpse" (Lat corpus) was originally synonymous. Therefore we find the now apparently unnecessary addition of the adj. "dead," in 2 K 19 35 and Isa 37 36. The Gr equivalent is πτώμα, ptōma, lit. "a fallen body," "a ruin" (from πίπτω, píptō, "to fall"), in Mk 6 29; Rev 11 8.9.

Corpses were considered as unclean and defiling in the OT, so that priests were not to touch dead bodies except those of near kinsfolk (Lev 21 1-3), the high priest and a Nazirite not even such (Lev 21 11; Nu 6 6-8). Nu 19 presents to us the ceremonial of purification from such defilement by the sprinkling with the ashes of a red heifer, cedar wood, hyssop and scarlet.

It was considered a great calamity and disgrace to have one's body left unburied, a "food unto all birds of the heavens, and unto the beasts of the earth" (Dt 28 26; 2 S 21 10; Ps 79 2; Isa 34 3; Jer 7 33, etc.). Thence is explained the merit of Rizpah (2 S 21 10), and of the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead, who protected or recovered and buried the mutilated bodies of Saul and his sons (1 S 31 11-13; 2 S 2 4-7; cf 1 Ch 10 11.12). See BURIAL.

Even the corpses of persons executed by hanging were not to remain on the tree "all night," "for he that is hanged is accursed of God; that thou defile not thy land which Jeh thy God giveth thee for an inheritance" (Dt 21 23). H. L. E. LUEBING

CORRECTION, ko-rek'shun (מִוְסָר, mūsār, usually rendered "instruction," is tr "correction" in several passages): The vb. from which the noun is derived signifies "to instruct" or "chastise." The idea of chastisement was very closely connected in the Heb mind with that of pedagogy. See CHASTISEMENT. RV and ARV have changed "correction" of AV to "instruction" in Jer 7 28, reversing the order in the margins. שֶׁבֶט, shēbhet, rendered "rod" in Job 21 9, is unnecessarily changed to "correction" in 37 13. In 2 Tim 3 16, ἐπανόρθωσις, epanóρθōsis, is tr "correction." The difference between correction, discipline and instruction was not clearly drawn in the Heb mind.

W. W. DAVIES

CORRUPTION, kô-rup'shun: The Heb words מִשְׁחָת, mishhāth, מַשְׁחָת, mashhāth, מִשְׁחָת, mishhāth, and their Gr equivalents, φθορά, phthorá, and διαφθορά, diaphthorá, with numerous derivatives and cognate vbs., imply primarily physical degeneration and decay (Job 17 14; Acts 2 27, etc.). The term שָׁחַת, shāhath, which AV translates with "corruption" in Jon 2 6, ought to be rendered "pit," as in Ps 30 9; 35 7 et passim, while shāhath b'li in Isa 38 17 means the "pit of nothingness," i.e. of destruction.

Figurative: At an early time we find the above-given words in a non-literal sense denoting moral depravity and corruption (Gen 6 11; Ex 32 7; Hos 9 9; Gal 6 8, etc.), which ends in utter moral ruin and hopelessness, the second death. The question has been raised whether the meaning of these words might be extended so as to include the idea of final destruction and annihilation of the spirit. Upon careful examination, however, this question must be denied both from the standpoint of the OT and of the NT. Apart from other considerations we see this from the metaphors used in the Scriptures to illustrate the condition of "corruption," such as the "unquenchable fire," the "worm" which "dieth not" (Mk 9 43.48; cf Isa 66 24), and "sleep" (Dnl 12 2), where a careful distinction is made between the blissful state after death of the righteous and the everlasting disgrace of the godless. The later Jewish theology is also fully agreed on this point. The meaning of the words cannot therefore extend beyond the idea of utter moral degradation and depravity.

CORRUPTION, MOUNT OF (הַר הַפְּסוּחִית, har ha-mashhūth; τὸ ὄρος τοῦ Μοσοῦθ, tó óros tou Mosóuth): The hill on the right hand of which Solomon built high places for Ashtoreth, Chemosh and Milcom (2 K 23 13). The mountain referred to is no doubt the Mount of Olives. The high places would, therefore, be on the southern height called in later Christian writings the "Mount of Offence," and now, by the Arabs, Bāten el-Hawa. Har ha-mashhūth is probably only a perversion of har ha-mishhāh, "Mount of Anointing," a later name of the Mount of Olives. W. EWING

COS, kos (Κῶς, Kōs, "summit"; AV Coos): An island off the coast of Caria, Asia Minor, one of the Sporades, mountainous in the southern half, with ridges extending to a height of 2,500 ft.; identified with the modern Stanchio. It was famous in antiquity for excellent wine, amphorae, wheat, ointments, silk and other clothing (Cōae vestes). The capital was also called Cos. It possessed a famous hospital and medical school, and was the birthplace of Hippocrates (the father of medicine), of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and of the celebrated painter Apelles. The large plane tree in the center of the town (over 2,000 years old) is called "the tree of Hippocrates" to this day. The older capital, Astypalaea, was in the western part of the island, the later (since 366 BC) in the eastern part. From almost every point can be seen beautiful landscapes and picturesque views of sea and land and mountain.

Cos was one of the six Dorian colonies. It soon became a flourishing place of commerce and industry; later, like Corinth, it was one of the Jewish centers of the Aegaeon, as well as one of the financial centers of the commercial world in the eastern Mediterranean. Among the benefactors of the people of Cos was Herod the Great. It is mentioned in connection with Paul's third missionary journey in Acts 21 1, and in its relations with the Jews in 1 Macc 15 23; Ant, XIV, vii, 2; x, 15; BJ, I, xxi, 11. For a list of works on the island see Paton-Hicks, Inscriptions of Cos, ix.

J. E. HARRY

COSAM, kō'sam (Κωσάμ, Kōsām): An ancestor of Jesus in St. Luke's genealogy in the 5th generation before Zerubbabel (Lk 3 28).

COSMOGONY, koz-mog'o-ni. See ANTHROPOLOGY; CREATION; EARTH; EVOLUTION; WORLD.

COSMOLOGY, koz-mol'o-ji. See WORLD; PROVIDENCE.

COSTLINESS, kost'li-nes (τιμιότης, timiōtēs, "preciousness," "an abundance of costly things"): Found only in Rev 18 19, "made rich by reason of her costliness."

COTES, kōts. See SHEEPCOTE.

COTTAGE, kot'āj. See HOUSE.

COTTON, kot'n (καπν, karpas, is the better tr, as in RVm, where AV and RV have "green" in Est 1 6): The Heb karpas is from the Pers kirpās and the Sanskrit karpāsa, "the cotton plant." The derived words originally meant "muslin" or "calico," but in classical times the use of words allied to karpas—in Gr and Lat—was extended to include linen. The probability is in favor of "cotton" in Est 1 6. This is the product of Gossypium herbaceum, a plant originally from India but now cultivated in many other lands.

COUCH, kouch (subst.). See BED.

Couch (vb.): רָבַץ, rābhaç, "to crouch," "lurk," as a beast in readiness to spring on its prey. "If thou doest not well, sin coucheth at the door" (Gen 4 7, AV "lieth"), waiting for it to open. Cain is warned to beware of the first temptations to evil, in his case esp. a sullen and jealous disposition (cf Dante, Inferno, I, 30). See ABEL; CAIN. The tribe of Judah is compared for its bravery to a recumbent lion or lioness (Gen 49 9; cf Nu 24 9 f); and Issachar to "a strong ass, couching down between the sheepfolds" (49 14, AV "between two burdens"; cf Jgs 5 16). "The deep that coucheth beneath" (Dt 33 13), probably the springs of water, or possibly, as Driver suggests, "the subterranean deep, pictured as a gigantic monster." See ABYSS.

M. O. EVANS

COUCHING-PLACE, kouch'ing-plās (רָבִיצָה, marbēç; once in EV [Ezk 25 5]): The same Heb word, however, which means simply "place of lying down" of animals in repose, is used also in Zeph 2 15 where the tr is "a place . . . to lie down in." The figure, a common one in Scripture (see besides, Isa 17 2; 27 10), suggests desolation.

COULTER, kol'tēr. See PLOW.

COUNCIL, koun'sil, COUNCILLOR, koun'sil-ēr (συμβούλιον, sumboullion): An assembly of advisers (Acts 25 12); a body of those taking counsel (see Schürer's Jewish People in the Time of Christ, I (1), 60). Distinguished from συνέδριον, sunēdrion, the supreme court of the Jews, by being of a less formal character, i.e. less of an institution. For "council" in the latter sense, its most frequent use, see SANHEDRIN. A councillor (Gr boulētēs) was a member of the Sanhedrin. Applied to Joseph of Arimathea (Mk 15 43; Lk 23 50). In AV "counsellor."

COUNSEL, koun'sel, COUNSELLOR, koun'sel-ēr (συμβούλιον, sumboullion): Ordinarily found as object of vb. "to take" or "to give," expressing, beside the idea of a practical end to be reached, that of consultation and deliberation among those united in a common cause (Mt 12 14; Mk 3 6). A counsellor (sumboulos) is a confidential adviser (Rom 11 34); often in the OT (Isa 9 6; Prov 24 6, etc). Confounded in AV with "councillor" (see above), the latter being an official adviser, which the former does not necessarily mean.

COUNT, kount (שָׁפַר, šāphar, מָנָה, mānāh; ψηφίζω, psēphizō): Used of arithmetical computation "to number" (Ps 139 18; Nu 23 10); also for קָנָה, kāthabh, "to reckon," to indicate classification among or identification with, "c. for a stranger" (Job 19 15); "c. for his enemy" (Job 33 10). In the NT the arithmetical computation is less prominent, except in the sense of "calculate," psēphizō, sumpsēphizō, "to reckon with pebbles," each pebble representing a unit (Lk 14 28; Acts 19 19); of moral estimate, hēgēomai and logizomai (Phil 3 7.13). The noun, fr Heb kāšath, "a count of" (Ex 12 4), viz. in the arithmetical sense.

COUNTENANCE, koun'te-nans:

(1) The noun (see also s.v. FACE) is the tr of a variety of Heb and Gr expressions, פָּנִים, pānim; πρόσωπον, prósōpon, being the most frequent. Be sides these there are found מַרְאֵה, mar'eh, "appearance," "shape," "comeliness," "visage," יָיִן, ayin, "the eye," תֹּאֵר, tō'ar, "appearance," "figure," etc. and Aram. זִיּוּ, zīw. To the Oriental the countenance mirrors, even more than to us, the character and feelings of the heart. The countenance (mar'eh) is "fair" (1 S 17 42; 2 S 14 27; Dnl 1 15); in 1 S 16 12, lit. "fair of eyes"; "comely" (Cant 2 14); "beautiful" (tō'ar, 1 S 25 3); "cheerful" (pānim, Prov 15 13); "angry" (Prov 25 23); "fierce" (Dnl 8 23); "troubled" (Ezk 27 35); "sad" (1 S 1 18; Neh 2 23; Eccl 7 3). The countenance is "sharpened," i.e. made keen (Prov 27 17); it "falls," i.e. looks despondent, disappointed (Gen 4 5.6); is "cast down" (Job 29 24); "changed" (Job 14 20; cf "altered" into glory, Lk 9 29; Dnl 5 6.9.10; 7 28, Aram. zīw). To settle one's countenance steadfastly upon a person (2 K 8 11) is synonymous with staring or gazing at a person. Not infrequently we find compound expressions such as "light of countenance," i.e. favor (Job 29 24; Ps 4 6; 44 3; 89 15; 90 8); "health of countenance" (Ps 42 11; 43 5); "help of countenance" (Ps 42 5); "rebuke of countenance" (Ps 80 16); "pride of countenance" (Heb 'aph, lit. "haughty," "lofty nose," Ps 10 4).

(2) As vb. (Heb הִדְהִיר, hādhār, "to countenance") we find the word in AV of Ex 23 3, where the Revisers translate "Neither shalt thou favor [AV "countenance"] a poor man in his cause." Here the meaning seems to be that no distinction of persons shall be made by the judge. See Lev 19 15, where, however, a different word is used. There is therefore no need of the emendation proposed by Knobel and accepted by Kautzsch, who would read גָּדֹל, gādōl, "great," for וְדָל, wadhāl, "and the poor" of the text. The LXX has πένης, pénēs, "poor."

COUNTER-CHARM, koun'tēr-charm. See AMULET; CHARM.

COUNTERFEIT, koun'tēr-fit (κίβδηλος, kíbdēlos, ἀνατυπώ, anatupōō, ὁμοίω, homoiōō): "C." occurs as the tr of kíbdēlos, "mixed with dross," "not genuine" (Wisd 15 9, "to make c. things," RV "mouldeth counterfeits," spurious things, imitations"); 2 16 RV "base metal" (cf LXX Lev 19 19; Dt 22 11, "mingled garment," and 2 Cor 13 5.6, adókimos, "reprobate" [silver]). "Counterfeit" in the older sense of a representation occurs in Wisd 14 17 (anatupōō, "to make a likeness"), "c. of his visage," RV "imagining the likeness from afar," and Ecclus 38 27 (homoiōō, "to make like"), "to c. imagery," RV "to preserve likeness in his portraiture."

COUNTERVAIL, koun-tēr-vāl' (שָׁוָה, shāwāh, "equalize"): To thwart or overcome by acting against with equal force; thus, "The enemy could not c. the king's damage" or loss (Est 7 4 ARV reads "The adversary could not have compensated for the king's damage"). "Nothing doth c. [RV "can be taken in exchange for"] a faithful friend" (Ecclus 6 15).

COUNTRY, kun'tri (אֶרֶץ, 'erec, "land," שָׂדֶה, sādhēh, "field"; ἀγρός, agrós, "field," χώρα, chōra, "region"): The foregoing are the principal words rendered "country" in EV, though we find also ἡδამάῃ, "earth" (Jon 4 2); ἴ, "island" (Jer 47 4 AV); γῆ, "land," "circuit" (Ezk 47 8 AV); ἡβhel, "rope" (Dt 3 14); μάκωm, "place" (Gen 29 26 AV); nepheth, "hill" or "height" (Josh 17 11 AV); γένος, "race" (Acts 4 36 AV); γῆ, ἡ, "earth" (Mt 9 31 AV; Acts 7 3 AV); πατρίς, patrís, "native land" (Lk 4 23; Jn 4 44; He 11 14); περὶ χώρας, perichōros, "country [ARV "region"] round about" (Mt 14 35; Lk 3 3; 4 37; 8 37). In He 11 14 ff, "heaven" is referred to as a country. Egypt and Assyria were "far countries" (Jer 8 19 AV; Zec 10 9). The hill country (of the numerous Gibeahs [gibh'ah, "a hill"]) was the mountainous region to the N. or to the S. of Jerus. The low country, sh'phēlāh (see SHEPHELAH), consisted of the foothills to the west of the hill country. The south country or NEGEB (neghebh), q.v., was the dry, extreme southern part of Pal, approximately between Beersheba and Kadesh-barnea.

ALFRED ELY DAY

COUNTRYMAN, kun'tri-man (συνφυλῆτης, sumphulētēs): "Of the same tribe" (1 Thess 2 14); also in idiomatic rendering (γένος, génos) for those of one's own race or kin (2 Cor 11 26; Gal 1 14 AV, "one's own nation"). Cf Mk 6 4; Rom 9 3; and see COUSIN; KINSMAN, etc.

COUPLE, kup'l:

(1) Used as a noun, indicates two objects of the same kind that are considered together. Thus we read of a couple of cakes (2 S 13 6, used loosely), and a couple of asses (2 S 16 1, Heb ḡamedh).

(2) Used as a vb., it means to join or fasten one thing to another. This term occurs most frequently in the description of the tabernacle (see Ex 26 6.9.11; 36 10.13.16). Couple is used in 1 Pet 3 2 to describe the joining of fear to chaste behavior (Heb hābhar).

COUPLING, kup'ling: Is the EV rendering of מַחְבֶּרֶת, mahbereth. This Heb word means joining, or the place where one thing is joined to another, as of the curtains of the tabernacle (Ex 26 4.5), and of the different parts of the ephod (Ex 28 27; 39 20).

It is also the EV rendering of מַחְבֶּרֶת, m'habbrōth, and this refers more to the thing that joins the two objects, as beams of wood (2 Ch 34 11), or hooks of iron (1 Ch 22 3).

COURAGE, kur'aj: Heb hāzāk, "to show one's self strong" (Nu 13 20; 2 S 10 12; 1 Ch 19 13; 2 Ch 15 8; Ezr 10 4; Ps 27 14; 31 24; Isa 41 6); rūḥ, "spirit," "animus" (Josh 2 11 AV); āmaç, "to be alert" (physically and mentally), "to be agile," "quick," "energetic" (Dt 31 6.7.23; Josh 1 6.9.18; 10 25; 1 Ch 22 13; 28 20); lēbhābh, "the heart," and fig.: "person," "spirit" (Dnl 11 25); Gr thársos, "cheer" (Acts 28 15). A virtue highly esteemed among all nations, one of the four chief "natural" (cardinal) virtues (Wisd 8 7), while cowardice ranks as one of the mortal sins (Ecclus 2 12.13; Rev 21 8).

COURSE, kōrs (from Lat cursus, "a running," "race," "voyage," "way"):

(1) eὐθυδρομέω, euthudromēō, "forward or onward movement," as of a ship: "We made a straight c." (Acts 16 11; cf Acts 21 1); "We had finished our c." (RV "voyage," Acts 21 7).

(2) A (prescribed or self-appointed) path, as of the sun: "Swift is the sun in his c." (1 Esd 4 34); of the stars: "The stars in their courses fought against Sisera" (Jgs 5 20 AV) (see ASTRONOMY; ASTROLOGY); of a river (or irrigating canal?): "as willows by the watercourses" (Isa 44 4); of a race (τρέχω, tréchō): "that the word of the Lord may have free c." (RV "may run") (2 Thess 3 1).

(3) A career in such a course (δρόμος, drómos): "I have finished my [RV "the"] c." (2 Tim 4 7); "as John fulfilled [RV "was fulfilling"] his c." (Acts 13 25); "that I might finish [RV "may accomplish"] my c." (Acts 20 24).

(4) A way or manner, as of life: "Every one turned to his c." (Jer 8 6); "their c. is evil" (Jer 23 10); "walked according to the c. [αἰών, aîōn, RVm "age"] of this world" (Eph 2 2).

(5) Orderly succession: "sang together by c." (ARV "sang one to another") (Ezr 3 11); "by c." (RV "in turn") (1 Cor 14 27); the courses of the priests and Levites (1 Ch 27 1-15; 1 Ch 28 1; 2 Ch 5 11; Lk 1 5.8). See PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

(6) A row or layer, as of masonry: "All the foundations of the earth are out of c." (RV "are moved"; ARV "are shaken") (Ps 82 5).

(7) [The tongue] "setteth on fire the c. [RV "wheel"] of nature" (Jas 3 6). The cycle of generation (τόν τροχόν τῆς γενέσεως) here means the physical world as constituted by the round of origin and decay, and typified by the Orphic (legendary) cycle of births and deaths through which the soul passes in metempsychosis. COURT, kōrt, OF THE SANCTUARY, sank'tū-a-ri (TABERNACLE, TEMPLE): By "court" (חֲצֵר, ḥāṣēr) is meant a clear space inclosed by curtains or walls, or surrounded by buildings. It was always an uncovered inclosure, but might have within its area one or more edifices.

The first occurrence of the word is in Ex 27 9, where it is commanded to "make the court of the tabernacle." The dimensions for this

1. The follow in the directions for the length
Tabernacle of the linen curtains which were to inclose it. From these we learn that the perimeter of the court was 300 cubits, and that it consisted of two squares, each 75 ft., lying E. and W. of one another. In the westerly square stood the tabernacle, while in that to the E. was the altar of burnt offering. This was the worshipper's square, and every Heb who passed through the entrance gate had immediate access to the altar (cf W. Robertson Smith, note on Ex 20 26, OTJC, 435). The admission to this scene of the national solemnities was by the great east gate described in Ex 27 13-16 (see EAST GATE).

The fundamental conception out of which grew the resolve to build a temple for the worship of Jeh was that the new structure was to be an enlarged duplicate in stone of the tent of meeting (see TEMPLE). The doubling in size of the holy chambers was accompanied by a doubling of the inclosed area upon which the holy house was to stand. Hitherto a rectangular oblong figure of 150 ft. in length and 75 ft. in breadth had sufficed for the needs of the people in their worship. Now an area of 300 ft. in length and 150 ft. in breadth was inclosed within heavy stone walls, making, as before, two squares, each of 150 ft. This was that "court of the priests" spoken of in 2 Ch 4 9, known to its builders as "the inner court" (1 K 6 36; cf Jer 36 10). Its walls consisted of "three courses of hewn stone, and a course of cedar beams" (1 K 6 36), into which some read the meaning of colonnades. Its two divisions may have been marked by some fence. The innermost division, accessible only to the priests, was the site of the new temple. In the easterly division stood the altar of sacrifice; into this the Heb laity had access for worship at the altar. Later incidental allusions imply the existence of "chambers" in the court, and also the accessibility of the laity (cf Jer 35 4; 36 10; Ezk 8 16).

In distinction from this "inner" court a second or "outer" court was built by Solomon, spoken of by the Chronicler as "the great court"

3. The (2 Ch 4 9). Its doors were overlaid Great with brass (bronze). Wide differ-Court ence of opinion obtains as to the relation of this outer court to the inner court just described, and to the rest of the Solo-monic buildings—particularly to "the great court" of "the house of the forest of Lebanon" of 1 K 7 9.10. Some identify the two, others separate them. Did this court, with its brass-covered gates, extend still farther to the E. than the temple "inner" court, with, however, the same breadth as the latter? Or was it, as Keil thinks, a much larger inclosure, surrounding the whole temple area, extending perhaps 150 cubits eastward in front of the priests' court (cf Keil, Bib. Archaeology, I, 171, ET)? Yet more radical is the view, adopted by many modern authorities, which regards "the great court" as a vast inclosure surrounding the temple and the whole complex of buildings described in 1 K 7 1-12 (see the plan, after Stade, in G. A. Smith's Jerusalem, II, 59). In the absence of conclusive data the question must be left undetermined.

In Ezekiel's plan of the temple yet to be built, the lines of the temple courts as he had known them in Jerus are followed. Two squares

4. Ezekiel's inclosed in stone walling, each of 150
Temple ft., lie N. and S. of one another, and bear the distinctive names, "the inner court" and "the outer court" (Ezk 8 16; 10 5).

In the Herodian temple the old nomenclature gives place to a new set of terms. The extensive inclosure known later as "the court of the Gentiles" does not appear under that name in the NT or in Jos. What we have in the tract Middōth of the Mishnah and in Jos is the mention of two courts, the "court of the priests" and "the court of Israel" (Middōth, ii.6; v.1; Jos, BJ, V, v. 6). The data in regard to both are difficult and conflicting. In Middōth they appear as long narrow strips of 11 cubits in breadth extending at right angles to the temple and the altar across the inclosure—the "court of Israel" being railed off from the "court of the priests" on the E.; the latter extending backward as far as the altar, which has a distinct measurement. The design was to prevent the too near approach of the lay Israelite to the altar. Jos makes the 11 cubits of the "court of Israel" extend round the whole "court of the priests," inclusive of altar and temple (see TEMPLE; and cf G. A. Smith, Jerusalem, II, 506-9, with the reconstruction of Waterhouse in Sacred Sites of the Gospels, 111 ff). For the "women's court," see TREASURY.

Many expressions in the Pss show how great was the attachment of the devout-minded Heb in all ages to those courts of the Lord's house where he was accustomed to worship (e.g. Ps 65 4; 84 2; 92 13; 96 8; 100 4; 116 19). The courts were the scene of many historical events in the OT and NT, and of much of the earthly ministry of Jesus. There was enacted the scene described in the parable of the Pharisee and Publican (Lk 18 10-14).

COURTS, JUDICIAL, jōō-dish'al, jū-dish'al: At the advice of Jethro, Moses appointed judges (שֹׁפְטִים, shōph'ṭim, Ex 18). In Egypt

1. Their it appears that the Hebrews did not Organiza- have their own judges, which, of tion course, was a source of many wrongs. Leaving Egypt, Moses took the judicial functions upon himself, but it was impossible that he should be equal to the task of administering justice to two and one-half million people; hence he proceeded to organize a system of jurisprudence. He appointed judges over tens, fifties, hundreds, thousands—in all 78,600 judges. This system was adequate for the occasion, and these courts respectively corresponded practically to our Justices of the Peace, Mayor's Court, District Court, Circuit Court. Finally, there was a Supreme Court under Moses and his successors. These courts, though graded, did not afford an opportunity of appeal. The lower courts turned their difficult cases over to the next higher. If the case was simple, the judge over tens would take it, but if the question was too intricate for him, he would refer it to the next higher court, and so on until it finally reached Moses. There were certain kinds of questions which the tens, fifties, and hundreds would not take at all, and the people understood it and would bring them to the higher courts for original jurisdiction. When any court decided it, that was the end of that case, for it could not be appealed (Ex 18 25, 26). On taking possession in Pal, the judges were to be appointed for every city and vicinity (Dt 16 18), thus giving to all Israel a speedy and cheap method of adjudication. Though not so prescribed by the constitution, the judges at length were generally chosen from among the Levites, as the learned class. The office was elective. Jos states this plainly, and various passages of the Scriptures express it positively by inference (see Dt 1 13). Jephthah's election by vote of the people is clearly set forth (Jgs 11 5-11).

Among the Hebrews, the law was held very sacred; for God Himself had given it. Hence those who administered the law were God's special representatives, and of their person was held correspondingly sacred. These circumstances placed upon them the duty of administering justice without respect to persons (Dt 1 17; 16 18). They were to be guided by the inalienable rights granted to every citizen by the Heb constitution: (1) No man was to be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law (Nu 35 9-34). (2) Two or three witnesses were required to convict anyone of crime (Dt 17 6; 19 2-13). (3) Punishment for crime was not to be transferred or entailed (Dt 24 16). (4) A man's home was inviolate (Dt 24 10, 11). (5) One held to bondage but having acquired liberty through his own effort should be protected (Dt 23 15, 16). (6) One's homestead was inalienable (Lev 25 23-28, 34). (7) Slavery could not be made perpetual without the person's own consent (Ex 21 2-6).

Gradually a legal profession developed among the Hebrews, the members of which were designated as "Lawyers" or "Scribes," also known as "Doctors of the Law" (Lk 2 46). Their business was threefold: (1) to study and interpret the law; (2) to instruct the Heb youth in the law; and (3) to decide questions of the law. The first two they did as scholars and teachers; the last either as judges or as advisers in some court, as, for instance, the Senate of Jerus or some inferior tribunal. No code can go into such details as to eliminate the necessity of subsequent legislation, and this usually, to a great extent, takes the form of judicial decisions founded on the code, rather than of separate enactment; and so it was among the Hebrews. The provisions of their code were for the most part quite general, thus affording large scope for casuistic interpretation. Regarding the points not explicitly covered by the written law, a substitute must be found either in the form of established custom or in the form of an inference drawn from the statute.

As a result of the industry with which this line of legal development was pursued during the cents. immediately preceding our era, Hebrew law became a most complicated science. For the disputed points, the judgments of the individual lawyers could not be taken as the standard; hence the several disciples of the law must frequently meet for a discussion, and the opinion of the majority then prevailed. These were the meetings of the "Doctors." Whenever a case arose concerning which there had been no clear legal decision, the question was referred to the nearest lawyer; by him, to the nearest company of lawyers, perhaps the Sanhedrin, and the resultant decision was henceforth authority.

Before the destruction of Jerus technical knowledge of the law was not a condition of eligibility to the office of judge. Anyone who could command the confidence of his fellow-citizens might be elected, and many of the rural courts undoubtedly were conducted, as among us, by men of sterling quality, but limited knowledge. Such men would avail themselves of the legal advice of any "doctor" who might be within reach; and in the more dignified courts of a large municipality it was a standing custom to have a company of lawyers present to discuss and decide any new law points that might arise. Of course, frequently these men were themselves elected to the office of judge, so that practically the entire system of jurisprudence was in their hands.

Though Judaea at this time was a subject commonwealth, yet the Sanhedrin, which was the body of supreme legislative and judicial authority, exercised autonomous authority to such an extent that it not only administered civil cases in accordance with Jewish law—for without such a right a Jewish court would be impossible—but it also took part to a great extent in the punishment of crime. It exercised an independent police power, hence could send out its own officers to make arrests (Mt 26 47; Mk 14 43; Acts 4 3; 5 17, 18). In cases that did not involve capital punishment, its judgments were final and untrammelled (Acts 4 2-23; 5 21-40). Only in capital punishment cases must the consent of the procurator be secured, which is not only clearly stated in Jn 18 31, but is also evident in the entire course of Christ's trial, as reported by the Synoptic Gospels. In granting or withholding his consent in such cases, the procurator could follow his pleasure absolutely, applying either the Jewish or Rom law, as his guide. In one class of cases the right to inflict capital punishment even on Rom citizens was granted the Sanhedrin, namely, when a non-Jewish person overstepped the bounds and entered the interior holy place of the temple. Even in this case the consent of the procurator must be secured, but it appears that the Rom rulers were inclined to let the law take its course against such wanton outrage of the Jews' feelings. Criminal cases not involving capital punishment need not be referred to the procurator.

The city in which the Sanhedrin met was Jerus. To determine the particular building, and the spot on which the building stood, is interesting to the archaeologist, not to the student of law. The local courts usually held their sessions on the second and fifth day (Monday and Thursday) of the week, but we do not know whether the same custom was observed by the Great Sanhedrin. On feast days no court was held, much less on the Sabbath. Since the death penalty was not to be pronounced until the day after the trial, such cases were avoided also on the day preceding a Sabbath or other sacred day. The emphasis placed on this observance may be seen from the edicts issued by Augustus, absolving the Jews from the duty of attending court on the Sabbath. See DOCTOR; LAWYER; SANHEDRIN; SCRIBE.

COUSIN, kuz'n (ἀνεψιός, anepsios): Only in Col 4 10, where Mark is said to be "cousin" (RV) to Barnabas, and not as in AV, "sister's son." The renderings "cousin" of AV for συγγενής, suggenēs, in Lk 1 36.58 were probably understood at the time of the tr, in the wider, and not in the more restricted, sense of the term, now almost universally prevalent. In view of this the renderings "kinswoman," "kinsfolk" in RV are preferable. As a title of honor and dignity, it occurs in 1 Esd 4 42, etc. See KINSMAN.

LITERATURE

I. General Meaning.—The etymological force of the Heb berith is not entirely certain. It is probable that the word is the same as the Assy biritu, which has the common meaning "fetter," but also means "covenant." The significance of the root from which this Assy word is derived is uncertain. It is probable that it is "to bind," but that is not definitely established. The meaning of biritu as covenant seems to come directly from the root, rather than as a derived meaning from fetter. If this root idea is to bind, the covenant is that which binds together the parties. This, at any rate, is in harmony with the general meaning of the word.

In the OT the word has an ordinary use, when both parties are men, and a distinctly religious use, between God and men. There can be no doubt that the religious use has come from the ordinary, in harmony with the general custom in such cases, and not the reverse. There are also two shades of meaning, somewhat distinct, of the Heb word: one in which it is properly a covenant, i.e. a solemn mutual agreement, the other in which it is more a command, i.e. instead of an obligation voluntarily assumed, it is an obligation imposed by a superior upon an inferior. This latter meaning, however, has clearly been derived from the other. It is easy to see that an agreement, including as the contracting parties those of unequal position, might readily include those agreements which tended to partake of the nature of a command; but the process could not readily be reversed.

II. Among Men.—We consider first a covenant in which both contracting parties are men. In essence a covenant is an agreement, but an agreement of a solemn and binding force. The early Sem idea of a covenant was doubtless that which prevailed among the Arabs (see esp. W. Robertson Smith, Religion of the Semites, 2d ed, passim). This was primarily blood-brotherhood, in which two men became brothers by drinking each other's blood. Ordinarily this meant that one was adopted into the clan of the other. Hence this act involved the clan of one of the contracting parties, and also brought the other party into relation with the god of this clan, by bringing him into the community life of the clan, which included its god. In this early idea, then, "primarily the covenant is not a special engagement to this or that particular effect, but bond of troth and life-fellowship to all the effects for which kinsmen are permanently bound together" (W. Robertson Smith, op. cit., 315 f). In this early ceremonial the religious idea was necessarily present, because the god was kindred to the clan; and the god had a special interest in the covenant, because he esp. protects the kindred blood, of which the stranger thus becomes a part. This religious side always persisted, although the original idea was much modified. In later usage there were various substitutes for the drinking of each other's blood, viz. drinking together the sacrificial blood, sprinkling it upon the parties, eating together the sacrificial meal, etc; but the same idea found expression in all, the community of life resulting from the covenant.

The covenant in the OT shows considerable modification from the early idea. Yet it will doubtless help in understanding the

2. Principal OT covenant to keep in mind the early Elements idea and form. Combining statements made in different accounts, the following seem to be the principal elements in a covenant between men. Some of the details, it is to be noted, are not explicitly stated in reference to these covenants, but may be inferred from those between God and men. (1) A statement of the terms agreed upon (Gen 26 29; 31 50.52). This was a modification of the earlier idea, which has been noted, in which a covenant was all-inclusive. (2) An oath by each party to observe the terms, God being witness of the oath (Gen 26 31; 31 48-53). The oath was such a characteristic feature that sometimes the term "oath" is used as the equivalent of covenant (see Ezk 17 13). (3) A curse invoked by each one upon himself in case of disregard of the agreement. In a sense this may be considered a part of the oath, adding emphasis to it. This curse is not explicitly stated in the case of human covenants, but may be inferred from the covenant with God (Dt 27 15-26). (4) The formal ratification of the covenant by some solemn external act. The different ceremonies for this purpose, such as have already been mentioned, are to be regarded as the later equivalents of the early act of drinking each other's blood. In the OT accounts it is not certain that such formal act is expressly mentioned in relation to covenants between men. It seems probable, however, that the sacrificial meal of Gen 31 54 included Laban, in which case it was a covenant sacrifice. In any case, both sacrificial meal and sprinkling of blood upon the two parties, the altar representing Jeh, are mentioned in Ex 24 4-8, with allusions elsewhere, in ratification of the covenant at Sinai between Jeh and Israel. In the covenant of God with Abraham is another ceremony, quite certainly with the same purpose. This is a peculiar observance, viz. the cutting of animals into two parts and passing between the severed portions (Gen 15 9-18), a custom also referred to in Jer 34 18. Here it is to be noted that it is a smoking furnace and a flaming torch, representing God, not Abraham, which passed between the pieces. Such an act, it would seem, should be shared by both parties, but in this case it is doubtless to be explained by the fact that the covenant is principally a promise by Jeh. He is the one who binds Himself. Concerning the significance of this act there is difference of opinion. A common view is that it is in effect a formal expression of the curse, imprecating upon oneself the same, i.e. cutting in pieces, if one breaks the terms of the covenant. But, as W. R. Smith has pointed out (op. cit., 481), this does not explain the passing between the pieces, which is the characteristic feature of the ceremony. It seems rather to be a symbol that the two parties "were taken within the mystical life of the victim." (Cf the interpretation of He 9 15-17 in COVENANT IN THE NT.) It would then be an inheritance from the early times, in which the victim was regarded as kindred with the tribe, and hence also an equivalent of the drinking of each other's blood.

The immutability of a covenant is everywhere assumed, at least theoretically.

Other features beyond those mentioned cannot be considered as fundamental. This is the case with the setting up of a stone, or raising a heap of stones (Gen 31 45,46). This is doubtless simply an ancient custom, which has no direct connection with the covenant, but comes from the ancient Sem idea of the sacredness of single stones or heaps of stones. Striking hands is a general expression of an agreement made (Ezr 10 19; Ezk 17 18, etc.).

In observing different varieties of agreements among men, we note that they may be either between individuals or between larger

3. Different units, such as tribes and nations. In Varieties a great majority of cases, however, they are between the larger units. In some cases, also, when an individual acts it is in a representative capacity, as the head of a clan, or as a king. When the covenant is between tribes it is thus a treaty or alliance. The following passages have this use of covenant: Gen 14 13; 21 27,32; 26 28; 31 44; Ex 23 32; 34 12,15; Dt 7 2; Josh 9 6,7,11,15,16; Jgs 2 2; 1 S 11 1; 1 K 5 12; 15 19 || 2 Ch 16 3; 1 K 20 34; Ps 83 5; Isa 33 8; Ezk 16 61; 17 13-19; 30 5; Dnl 11 22; Am 1 9. In other cases it is between a king and his subjects, when it is more a command or ordinance, as 2 S 3 12,13,21; 5 3 || 1 Ch 11 3; Jer 34 8-18; Dnl 9 27. In other cases it is between individuals, or between small groups, where it is an agreement or pledge (2 K 11 4 || 2 Ch 23 1; Job 31 1; 41 4; Hos 10 4). Between David and Jonathan it is more specifically an alliance of friendship (1 S 18 3; 20 8; 23 18), as also apparently in Ps 55 20. It means an alliance of marriage in Mal 2 14, but probably not in Prov 2 17, where it is better to understand the meaning as being "her covenant with God."

In all cases of covenants between men, except Jer 34 10 and Dnl 9 27, the technical phrase for making a covenant is kāraṭh b'rīth, in which kāraṭh meant originally "to cut." Everything indicates that this vb. is used with reference to the formal ceremony of ratification above mentioned, of cutting animals in pieces.

III. Between God and Men.—As already noted, the idea of covenants between God and men doubtless arose from the idea of covenants

1. Essential between men. Hence the general Idea thought is similar. It cannot in this case, however, be an agreement between contracting parties who stand on an equality, but God, the superior, always takes the initiative. To some extent, however, varying in different cases, it is regarded as a mutual agreement; God with His commands makes certain promises, and men agree to keep the commands, or, at any rate, the promises are conditioned on human obedience. In general, the covenant of God with men is a Divine ordinance, with signs and pledges on God's part, and with promises for human obedience and penalties for disobedience, which ordinance is accepted by men. In one passage (Ps 25 14), it is used in a more general way of an alliance of friendship between God and man.

A covenant of this general kind is said in the OT to have been made by God with Noah (Gen 9 9-17 and elsewhere). In this the promise

corded in A covenant is made with Abraham, the OT the thought of which includes his descendants. In this the promise of God is to multiply the descendants of Abraham, to give them the land of Canaan, and to make them a blessing to the nations. This is narrated in Gen 15 18; 17 2-21, etc. A covenant is made with the nation Israel at Sinai (Horeb) (Ex 19 5; 24 7,8; 34 10,27,28, etc.), ratified by a covenant sacrifice and sprinkling of blood (Ex 24 4-8). This constituted the nation the peculiar people of God, and was accompanied by promises for obedience and penalties for disobedience. This covenant was renewed on the plains of Moab (Dt 29 1). In these national covenants the individual had a place, but only as a member of the nation. The individual might forfeit his rights under the covenant, however, by deliberate rebellion against Jeh, sinning "with a high hand" (Nu 15 30 f), and then he was regarded as no longer a member of the nation, he was "cut off from among his people," i.e. put to death. This is the teaching of P, and is also implied elsewhere; in the mercy of God, however, the punishment was not always inflicted. A covenant with the tribe of Levi, by which that became the priestly tribe, is alluded to in Dt 33 9; Jer 33 21; Mal 2 4 ff. The covenant with Phinehas (Nu 25 12,13) established an everlasting priesthood in his line. The covenant with Joshua and Israel (Josh 24) was an agreement on their part to serve Jeh only. The covenant with David (2 S 7 || 1 Ch 17; see also Ps 89 3,28,34,39; 132 12; Jer 33 21) contained a promise that his descendants should have an everlasting kingdom, and should stand to God in the relation of sonship. The covenant with Jehoiada and the people (2 K 11 17 || 2 Ch 23 3) was an agreement on their part to be the people of Jeh. The covenant with Hezekiah and the people (2 Ch 29 10) consisted essentially of an agreement on their part to reform the worship; the covenant with Josiah and the people (2 K 23 3), of an agreement on their part to obey the Book of the Law. The covenant with Ezra and the people (Ezr 10 3) was an agreement on their part to put away foreign wives and obey the law. The prophets also speak of a new covenant, most explicitly in Jer, but with references elsewhere, which is connected with the Messianic time (see Isa 42 6; 49 8; 55 3; 59 21; 61 8; Jer 31 31,33; 32 40; 50 5; Ezk 16 60,62; 20 37; 34 25; 37 26; Hos 2 18).

Various phrases are used of the making of a covenant between God and men. The vb. ordinarily used of making covenants between men, kāraṭh, is often used here as well. The following vbs. are also used: hēkim, "to establish" or "confirm"; nāṭhan, "to give"; sīm, "to place"; ciwawāh, "to command"; ābhar, "to pass over," followed by bē, "into"; bō, "to enter," followed by bē; and the phrase nāsā' b'rīth 'al pī, "to take up a covenant upon the mouth of someone."

The history of the covenant idea in Israel, as between God and man, is not altogether easy to trace. This applies esp. to the great

4. History of covenants between God and Israel, of Covenant viz. the one with Abraham, and the Idea one made at Sinai. The earliest references to this relation of Israel to Jeh under the term "covenant" are in Hos 6 7; 8 1. The interpretation of the former passage is doubtful in details, but the reference to such a covenant seems clear. The latter is considered by many a later addition, but largely because of this mention of the covenant. No other references to such a covenant are made in the prophets before Jeremiah. Jeremiah and Ezekiel speak of it, and it is implied in Second-Isaiah. It is a curious fact, however, that most of the later prophets do not use the term, which suggests that the omission in the earlier prophets is not very significant concerning a knowledge of the idea in early times.

In this connection it should be noted that there is some variation among the Hexateuchal codes in their treatment of the covenants. Only one point, however, needs special mention. P gives no explicit account of the covenant at Sinai, and puts large emphasis upon the covenant with Abraham. There are, however, apparent allusions to the Sinaitic covenant (Lev 2 13; 24 8; 26 9.15.25.44.45). The facts indicate, therefore, principally a difference of emphasis.

In the light partly of the facts already noted, however, it is held by many that the covenant idea between God and man is comparatively late. This view is that there were no covenants with Abraham and at Sinai, but that in Israel's early conceptions of the relation to Jeh He was their tribal God, bound by natural ties, not ethical as the covenant implies. This is a larger question than at first appears. Really the whole problem of the relation of Israel to Jeh throughout OT history is involved, in particular the question at what time a comprehensive conception of the ethical character of God was developed. The subject will therefore naturally receive a fuller treatment in other articles. It is perhaps sufficient here to express the conviction that there was a very considerable conception of the ethical character of Jeh in the early history of Israel, and that consequently there is no sufficient reason for doubting the fact of the covenants with Abraham and at Sinai. The statement of W. Robertson Smith expresses the essence of the matter (op. cit., 319): "That Jeh's relation is not natural but ethical is the doctrine of the prophets, and is emphasized, in dependence on their teaching, in the Book of Dt. But the passages cited show that the idea has its foundation in pre-prophetic times; and indeed the prophets, though they give it fresh and powerful application, plainly do not regard the conception as an innovation."

A little further consideration should be given to the new covenant of the prophets. The general teaching is that the covenant was broken by the sins of the people which led to the exile. Hence during the exile the people had been cast off, the covenant was no longer in force. This is stated, using other terminology, in Hos 3 3f; 1 9; 2 2. The prophets speak, however, in anticipation, of the making of a covenant again after the return from the exile. For the most part, in the passages already cited, this covenant is spoken of as if it were the old one renewed. Special emphasis is put, however, upon its being an everlasting covenant, as the old one did not prove to be, implying that it will not be broken as was that one. Jeremiah's teaching, however, has a little different emphasis. He speaks of the old covenant as passed away (31 32). Accordingly he speaks of a new covenant (31 31.33). This new covenant in its provisions, however, is much like the old. But there is a new emphasis upon individuality in approach to God. In the old covenant, as already noted, it was the nation as a whole that entered into the relation; here it is the individual, and the law is to be written upon the individual heart.

In the later usage the specific covenant idea is sometimes less prominent, so that the term is used practically of the religion as a whole; see Isa 56 4; Ps 103 18.

COVENANT (IN THE NT): Διαθήκη, Dialthēkē, was the word chosen by the LXX translators to render the Heb b'rit, and it appears thus nearly 300 times in the Gr OT in the sense of covenant, while sunthēkē and entolai are each used once only. The choice of this word seems to have been occasioned by a recognition that the covenant which God makes with men is not fully mutual as would be implied in sunthēkē, the Gr word commonly used for covenant (although not a NT word), while at the same time the rarity of wills among the Jews made the common sense of dialthēkē relatively unfamiliar. The Apocryphal writers also frequently use the same word in the same sense and no other.

In the NT dialthēkē is used some thirty times in a way which makes it plain that its tr must be "covenant." In Gal 3 15 and He 9 15-17 it is held by many that the sense of covenant must be set aside in favor of will or testament. But in the former passage it can be taken in the sense of a disposition of affairs or arrangement made by God, a conception in substantial harmony with its regular NT use and with the sense of b'rit. In the passage in He the interpretation is more difficult, but as it is acknowledged on all hands that the passage loses all argumentative force if the meaning testament is accepted, it seems best to retain the meaning covenant if possible. To do this it is only necessary to hold that the death spoken of is the death of the animal sometimes, if not, indeed, commonly slain in connection with the making of a covenant, and that in the mind of the author this death symbolized the death of the contracting parties so far at least as to pledge them that thereafter in the matter involved they would no more change their minds than can the dead. If this view is taken, this passage falls in line with the otherwise invariable use of the word dialthēkē by Jewish Hellenists. See TESTAMENT.

COVENANT OF SALT, sôlt (בְּרִית מֶלַח, b'rit melah; ἁλς, hâlas, classical Gr ἅλς, hâls): As salt was regarded as a necessary ingredient of the daily food, and so of all sacrifices offered to Jeh (Lev 2 13), it became an easy step to the very close connection between salt and covenant-making. When men ate together they became friends. Cf the Arab. expression, "There is salt between us"; "He has eaten of my salt," which means partaking of hospitality which cemented friendship; cf "eat the salt of the palace" (Ezr 4 14). Covenants were generally confirmed by sacrificial meals and salt was always present. Since, too, salt is a preservative, it would easily become symbolic of an enduring covenant. So offerings to Jeh were to be by a statute for ever, "a covenant of salt for ever before Jeh" (Nu 18 19). David received his kingdom forever from Jeh by a "covenant of salt" (2 Ch 13 5). In the light of these conceptions the remark of Our Lord becomes the more significant: "Have salt in yourselves, and be at peace one with another" (Mk 9 50).

LITERATURE

The name given in Ex 24 7 to a code or collection of laws found in the preceding chapters, 20-23, as the terms of the covenant made with Jeh, and given for Israel's guidance until a more complete legislation should be provided. In this covenant between Jeh and Israel, Moses served as mediator; animals were sacrificed, the blood thus shed being also called "the blood of the covenant" (dam ha-b'erith, Ex 24 8).

This brief book of laws occupies a fitting and clearly marked place in the Pentateuchal collection.

1. Historical- Con- nection

Examination of the historical context shows that it is put where it belongs and belongs where it is put. A few months after the Exodus (Ex 19 1) Israel arrived at Sinai. Immediately at the command which Moses had received from Jeh in the Mount, they prepared themselves by a ceremonial of sanctification for entrance into covenant relation with Jeh. When the great day arrived for making this covenant, Moses in the midst of impressive natural phenomena went again to meet Jeh in the top of the mountain. On his return (Ex 19 25), the words of the law, or the terms of the covenant, were declared to the people, and accepted by them. The first part of these covenant-terms, viz. the Decalogue (Ex 20 2-17), was spoken by the Divine voice, or its declaration was accompanied by awe-inspiring natural convulsions (Ex 20 18). Therefore in response to the pleadings of the terrified people Moses went up again into the mountain and received from Jeh for them the rest of the "words" and "ordinances" (24 3); and these constitute the so-called Book of the Covenant (20 22-23). In this direct and unequivocal manner the narrator connected the book with the nation's consecration at Sinai. The prophets regarded the making of the Sinaitic covenant as the marriage of Israel and Jeh, and these laws were the terms mutually agreed upon in the marriage contract.

While it is not possible to arrange the materials of this document into hard-and-fast divisions, the following analysis may be suggestive

2. Analysis and serviceable: (1) directions concerning worship, specifying prohibition of images and the form of altar for animal sacrifices (20 23-26); (2) ordinances for protection of Heb slaves, including betrothal, for a price, of a daughter (21 2-11); (3) laws concerning injuries, (a) to man by man (vs 12-27), (b) to man by beast (vs 28-32), (c) to beast by man (vs 33,34), (d) to beast by beast (vs 35,36); (4) concerning theft (22 1-4); (5) concerning damage to a neighbor's property, including violence to his daughter (vs 5-17); (6) sundry laws against profaning Jeh's name, under which are included proper worship, avoidance of oppression and dutiful offering of first-fruits (vs 18-31); (7) against various forms of injustice and unbrotherliness (23 1-9); (8) festal occasions, including the Sabbatical year and the three annual feasts: unleavened bread, first-fruits and ingathering (vs 10-17); (9) warning against certain wrong practices in their sacrifices (vs 18,19); (10) in conclusion, a promise of God's continual presence with them in the person of His Angel, and the consequent triumph over enemies (vs 20-33).

In this legislation are found two forms of laws or deliverances: (1) the ordinances (mishpātīm), which deal principally with civil and moral matters, are like court decisions, and are introduced by the hypothetical "if"; (2) words, or commands (d'bhārīm), which relate chiefly to religious duties, being introduced by the imperative "thou shalt."

The critical analysis and dismemberment of the books of Moses, if accepted, renders the simple historical explanation of the introduction to this body of laws untrue and impossible. The four chapters are assigned to JE, the Decalogue to E, and the Book of the Covenant to J or E, the repetition of the Decalogue in chs 32-34 being J's account.

Ordinarily the Book of the Covenant is held to be earlier than the Decalogue, and is indeed the oldest body of Heb legislation. However, it could not have been given at one time, nor in the wilderness, since the laws are given for those in agricultural life, and seem to be decisions made at various times and finally gathered together. Furthermore, this more primitive code either contradicts the later legislation of D and P or reveals an entirely different point of view. The chief contradictions or divergences are: nature and number of altars, absence of an official priestly class, and simpler conception of the annual feasts as agricultural celebrations. JE came into united form in the 9th or 8th cent., but this body of laws existed much earlier, embodying the earliest legal developments of Heb life in Canaan. It is suggested by some, as Driver, LOT, although he does not attempt the analysis, that this code is itself a composite of various layers and ages. See CRITICISM (GRAF-WELHAUSEN HYPOTHESIS).

But in favor of the simpler interpretation of these laws as the ethical obligations of the new bond between Jeh and Israel some statements deserve to be made. If a solemn league and covenant was made at Sinai—and to this all the history, all the prophets and the Psalms give testimony—there must have been some statement of the germinal and fundamental elements of the nation's moral relation to Jeh. Such statement need not be final nor exhaustive, but rather intended to instruct and guide until later and more detailed directions might be given. This is exactly the position and claim of the Book of the Covenant; and that this was the thought of the editor of the Pent, and that this is the first and reasonable impression made by the unsuspecting and connected reading of the record, can hardly be questioned by candid minds. In answer to the criticism that the agricultural flavor of the laws presupposes settlement in Canaan—a criticism rather remarkable for its bland ignorance—it may be suggested: (1) Israel had occupied in Egypt an agricultural section, and must have been able either to form or to receive a body of laws dealing with agricultural pursuits. (2) They were on the march toward a land in which they should have permanent settlement in agricultural life; and not the presence of allusions to such life, but rather their absence, should cause surprise. (3) However, references to settled farm life are not so obtrusively frequent as those seeking signs would have us think. References to the animal life of the flock and herd of a shepherd people, such as the Israelites were at Sinai, are far more frequent (21 28,33,35; 22 1,10; 23 4, etc.). The laws are quite generic in form and conception, enforcing such duties as would devolve upon both temporary nomad and prospective tillers of the soil. R. B. Taylor therefore (art. in one-vol HDB) accepts this code as originating in the desert wanderings.

In answer to the view, best presented by Wellhausen in Proleg. and W. R. Smith in OTJC, that this code is in conflict with later legislation, it may be said that the Book of the Covenant, as an ethical and civil summary, is in its proper place in the narrative of the sojourn at Sinai, and does not preclude the expectancy of more elaborate organization of both ceremonial and civil order. But the whole question relates more properly to discussion of the later legislation or of the particular topics in dispute (q.v.). For a thorough treatment of them consult W. H. Green, Heb Feasts.

In the Book of the Covenant the moral elements strongly emphasized are: simplicity, directness and spirituality of worship; a high and equitable standard of right; highest consideration for the weak and the poor; humane treatment of dumb animals; purity in the relations of life; the spirit of brotherhood; and the simple and joyful life. Whatever development in details came with later legislation did not nullify the simple but lofty standards of the earlier laws.

The term "New" Covenant necessarily implies an "Old" Covenant, and we are reminded that God's dealings with His people in the various

1. Contrast dispensations of the world's history of "New" have been in terms of covenant. The and "Old" Holy Scriptures by their most familiar—the Term title keep this thought before us, the "Covenant" OT and the NT or Covenant; the writings produced within the Jewish "church" being the writings or Scriptures of the Old Covenant, those within the Christian church, the Scriptures of the New Covenant. The alternative name "Testament"—adopted into our Eng. description through the Lat, as the equivalent of the Heb berith, and the Gr diathēkē, which both mean a solemn disposition, compact or contract—suggests the disposition of property in a last will or testament, but although the word diathēkē may bear that meaning, the Heb berith does not, and as the Gr usage in the NT seems esp. governed by the OT usage and the thought moves in a similar plane, it is better to keep to the term "covenant." The one passage which seems to favor the "testament" idea is He 9 16.17 (the Revisers who have changed the AV "testament" into "covenant" in every other place have left it in these two vs), but it is questionable whether even here the better rendering would not be "covenant" (see below). Certainly in the immediate context "covenant" is the correct tr and, confessedly, "testament," if allowed to stand, is an application by transition from the original thought of a solemn compact to the secondary one of testamentary disposition. The theological terms "Covenant of Works" and "Covenant of Grace" do not occur in Scripture, though the ideas covered by the terms, esp. the latter, may easily be found there. The "New Covenant" here spoken of is practically equivalent to the Covenant of Grace established between God and His redeemed people, that again resting upon the eternal Covenant of Redemption made between the Father and the Son, which, though not so expressly designated, is not obscurely indicated by many passages of Scripture.

Looking at the matter more particularly, we have to note the words of Christ at the institution of the Supper. In all the three Synoptists, as also in Paul's account (Mt 26 28; Use at Last Mk 14 24; Lk 22 20; 1 Cor 11 25) Supper "covenant" occurs. Mt and Mk,

"my blood of the [new] covenant"; Lk and Paul, "the new covenant in my blood." The Revisers following the critical text, have omitted "new" in Mt and Mk, but even if it does not belong to the original MS, it is implied, and there need be little doubt that Jesus used it. The old covenant was so well known to these Jewish disciples, that to speak of the covenant in this emphatic way, referring manifestly to something other than the old Mosaic covenant, was in effect to call it a "new" covenant. The expression, in any case, looks back to the old and points the contrast; but in the contrast there are points of resemblance.

It is most significant that Christ here connects the "new" covenant with His "blood." We at once think, as doubtless the disciples would think, of the transaction described in to Ex 24 Ex 24 7, when Moses "took the book of the covenant, and read in the audience of the people" those "words," indicating God's undertaking on behalf of His people and what He required of them; "and they said, All that Jeh hath spoken will we do, and be obedient," thus taking up their part of the contract. Then comes the ratification. "Moses took the blood [half of which had already been sprinkled on the altar], and sprinkled it on the people, and said, Behold the blood of the covenant, which Jeh hath made with you concerning all these words" (ver 8). The blood was sacrificial blood, the blood of the animals sacrificed as burnt offerings and peace offerings (Ex 24 5.6). The one half of the blood sprinkled on the altar tells of the sacrifice offered to God, the other half sprinkled on the people, of the virtue of the same sacrifice applied to the people, and so the covenant relation is fully brought about. Christ, by speaking of His blood in this connection, plainly indicates that His death was a sacrifice, and that through that sacrifice His people would be brought into a new covenant relationship with God. His sacrifice is acceptable to God and the virtue of it is to be applied to believers—so all the blessings of the new covenant are secured to them; the blood "is poured out for you" (Lk 22 20). He specifically mentions one great blessing of the new covenant, the forgiveness of sins—"which is poured out for many unto remission of sins" (Mt 26 28).

This great thought is taken up in He and fully expounded. The writer draws out fully the contrast between the new covenant and the old by laying stress upon the perfection of Christ's atonement in contrast to the material and typical sacrifices (He 9 11-23). He was "a high priest of the good things to come," connected with "the greater and more perfect tabernacle." He entered the heavenly holy place "through his own blood," not that of "goats and calves," and by that perfect offering He has secured "eternal redemption" in contrast to the temporal deliverance of the old dispensation. The blood of those typical offerings procured ceremonial cleansing; much more, therefore, shall the blood of Christ avail to cleanse the conscience "from dead works to serve the living God"—that blood which is so superior in value to the blood of the temporal sacrifices, yet resembles it in being sacrificial blood. It is the blood of Him "who, through the eternal Spirit offered himself without blemish unto God." It is the fashion in certain quarters nowadays to say that it is not the blood of Christ, but His spirit of self-sacrifice for others, that invests the cross with its saving power, and this verse is sometimes cited to show that the virtue lies in the surrender of the perfect will, the shedding of the blood being a mere accident. But this is not the view of the NT writers. The blood-shedding is to them a necessity. Of course, it is not the natural, material blood, or the mere act of shedding it, that saves. The blood is the life. The blood is the symbol of life; the blood shed is the symbol of life outpoured—of the penalty borne; and while great emphasis must be laid, as in this verse it is laid, upon Christ's perfect surrender of His holy will to God, yet the essence of the matter is found in the fact that He willingly endured the dread consequences of sin, and as a veritable expiatory sacrifice shed His precious blood for the remission of sins.

4. Use in Ep. to the Hebrews

On the ground of that shed blood, as the writer goes on to assert, "He is the mediator of a new covenant, that a death having taken place for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first covenant, they that have been called may receive the promise of the eternal inheritance" (ver 15). Thus Christ fulfils the type in a twofold way: He is the sacrifice upon which the covenant is based, whose blood ratifies it, and He is also, like Moses, the Mediator of the covenant. The death of Christ not only secures the forgiveness of those who are brought under the new covenant, but it was also for the redemption of the transgressions under the first covenant, implying that all the sacrifices gained their value by being types of Christ, and the forgiveness enjoyed by the people of God in former days was bestowed in virtue of the great Sacrifice to be offered in the fulness of time.

5. The Mediator of the New Covenant

Not only does the blessing of perfect forgiveness come through the new covenant, but also the promise of the "eternal inheritance" in contrast to the earthly inheritance which, under the old covenant, Israel obtained. The mention of the inheritance is held to justify the taking of the word in the next verse as "testament," the writer passing to the thought of a testamentary disposition, which is only of force after the death of the testator. Undoubtedly there is good ground for the analogy, and all the blessings of salvation which come to the believer may be considered as bequeathed by the Saviour in His death, and accruing to us because He has died. It has, in that sense, tacitly to be assumed that the testator lives again to be His own executor and to put us in possession of the blessings. Still, we think there is much to be said in favor of keeping to the sense of "covenant" even here, and taking the clause, which, rendered lit., is: "a covenant is of force [or firm] over the dead," as meaning that the covenant is established on the ground of sacrifice, that sacrifice representing the death of the maker of the covenant. The allusion may be further explained by a reference to Gen 15 9.10.17, which has generally been considered as illustrating the ancient Sem method of making a covenant: the sacrificial animals being divided, and the parties passing between the pieces, implying that they deserved death if they broke the engagement. The technical Heb phrase for making a covenant is "to cut a covenant."

There is an interesting passage in Herodotus III.8, concerning an Arabian custom which seems akin to the old Heb practice. "The Arabians observe pledges as religiously as any people; and they make them in the following manner: when any wish to pledge their faith, a third person standing between the two parties makes an incision with a sharp stone in the palm of the hand, nearest the longest fingers of both the contractors; then taking some of the nap from the garments of each, he smears seven stones placed between him and the blood; and as he does this he invokes Bacchus and Urania. When this ceremony is completed, the person who pledges his faith binds his friends as surties to the stranger, or the citizen, if the contract is made with a citizen, and the friends also hold themselves obliged to observe the engagement"—Cary's tr.

Whatever the particular application of the word in ver 17, the central idea in the passage is that death, blood-shedding, is necessary to the establishment of the covenant, and so he affirms that the first covenant was not dedicated without blood, and in proof quotes the passage already cited from Ex 24, and concludes that "apart from shedding of blood there is no remission" (ver 22). See COVENANT IN NT.

This new covenant established by Christ was foretold by the prophet Jeremiah, who uses the very word "new covenant" in describing it, and very likely Christ had that description in mind when He used the term, and meant His disciples to understand that the prophetic interpretation would in Him be realized. There is no doubt that the author of He had the passage in mind, for he has led up to the previous statement by definitely quoting the whole statement of Jer 31 31-34. He had in ch 7 spoken of the contrast between Christ's priesthood "after the order of Melchizedek" (ver 11) and the imperfect Aaronic priesthood, and he designates Jesus as "the surety of a better covenant" (ver 22). Then in ch 8, emphasizing the thought of the superiority of Christ's heavenly high-priesthood, he declares that Christ is the "mediator of a better covenant, which hath been enacted upon better promises" (ver 6). The first covenant, he says, was not faultless, otherwise there would have been no need for a second; but the fault was not in the covenant but in the people who failed to keep it, though perhaps there is also the suggestion that the external imposition of laws could not suffice to secure true obedience. "For finding fault with them he saith, Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah." The whole passage (chs 8-12) would repay careful study, but we need only note that not only is there prominence given to the great blessings of the covenant, perfect forgiveness and fulness of knowledge, but, as the very essence of the covenant—that which serves to distinguish it from the old covenant and at once to show its superiority and guarantee its permanence—there is this wonderful provision: "I will put my laws into their mind, and on their heart also will I write them: and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people." This at once shows the spirituality of the new covenant. Its requirements are not simply given in the form of external rules, but the living Spirit possesses the heart; the law becomes an internal dominating principle, and so true obedience is secured.

Ezekiel had spoken to the same effect, though the word "new covenant" is not used in the passage, ch 36 27: "I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep mine ordinances, and do them." In ch 37 Ezekiel again speaks of the great blessings to be enjoyed by the people of God, including cleansing, walking in God's statutes, recognition as God's people, etc, and he distinctly says of this era of blessing: "I will make a covenant of peace with them; it shall be an everlasting covenant with them" (ver 26). Other important foreshadowings of the new covenant are found in Isa 54 10; 55 3; 59 21; 61 8; Hos 2 18-23; Mal 3 1-4. We may well marvel at the spiritual insight of these prophets, and it is impossible to attribute their forecasts to natural genius; they can only be accounted for by Divine inspiration.

The writer to the Hebrews recurs again and again to this theme of the "New Covenant"; in 10 16.17 he cites the words of Jeremiah already quoted about writing the law on their minds, and remembering their sins no more. In 12 24, he speaks of "Jesus the mediator of a new covenant," and "the blood of sprinkling," again connecting the "blood" with the "covenant," and finally, in 13 20, he prays for the perfection of the saints through the "blood of an eternal covenant."

In 2 Cor 3 Paul has an interesting and instructive contrast between the old covenant and the new. He begins it by saying that "our sufficiency is from God; who also made us sufficient as ministers of a new covenant; not of the letter, but of the spirit: for the letter killeth, but the 9. Contrast Spirit giveth life (vs 5.6). The of Old and "letter" is the letter of the law, of the New in 2 old covenant which could only bring Cor 3 condemnation, but the spirit which characterizes the new covenant gives life, writes the law upon the heart. He goes on to speak of the old as that "ministration of death" which nevertheless "came with glory" (ver 7), and he refers esp. to the law, but the new covenant is "the ministration of the spirit," the "ministration of righteousness" (vs 8.9), and has a far greater glory than the old. The message of this "new covenant" is "the gospel of Christ." The glory of the new covenant is focused in Christ; rays forth from Him. The glory of the old dispensation was reflected upon the face of Moses, but that glory was transitory and so was the physical manifestation (ver 13). The sight of the shining face of Moses awed the people of Israel and they revered him as a leader specially favored of God (vs 7-13). When he had delivered his message he veiled his face and thus the people could not see that the glow did not last; every time that he went into the Divine presence he took off the veil and afresh his face was lit up with the glory, and coming out with the traces of that glory lingering on his countenance he delivered his message to the people and again veiled his face (cf Ex 34 29-35), and thus the transitoriness and obscurity of the old dispensation were symbolized. In glorious contrast to that symbolical obscurity, the ministers of the gospel, of the new covenant, use great boldness of speech; the veil is done away in Christ (vs 12 ff). The glory which comes through Him is perpetual, and fears no vanishing away.

Figurative: "Abaddon hath no covering" (k'sūth) from God (Job 26 6); "He will destroy . . . the face of the covering [ha-lōf] that covereth all peoples" (Isa 25 7). The removal of the veil, often worn as a token of mourning (cf 2 S 19 4), signified the destruction of death.

COVERED WAY, kuv'ērd wā (כִּפְיָהּ, mēšākh, "a covered walk"): Mentioned in 2 K 16 18 (AV "covert") as a gallery belonging to the temple, concerning the purpose of which opinions differ. Some consider it to have been the place where the king stood or sat during the Sabbath services; others, a public place for teaching; others, the way by which the priest entered the sanctuary on the Sabbath.

COVERING, kuv'ēr-ing, FOR THE HEAD (περιβόλαιον, peribólaiōn): Mentioned in the NT only in 1 Cor 11 15: "For her hair is given her for a covering," lit. "something cast round," probably equivalent to "veil" (q.v.). Read in the light of the context: "Every woman praying or prophesying with her head unveiled dishonoreth her head" (ver 5). The meaning would seem to be that Nature itself, in providing women with a natural veil, has taught the lesson underlying the prevailing custom, that woman should not be unveiled in the public assemblies.

GEO. B. EAGER

COVERT, kuv'ert: Now seldom used, except for game, and then generally spelt "cover." "A covered way" (2 K 16 18 AV); also a shelter of any kind (Isa 4 6); "a hiding place," "a lair," "a hut" (Job 38 40); "a place of secrecy," "a secret way" (1 S 25 20; Job 40 21; Ps 61 4; Isa 16 4; 32 2); "a den," "a lair" (Jer 25 38).

COVET, kuv'et (ῥῆξ, 'āwāh; ἡλῶω, zēlōō, "to desire earnestly," "to set the heart and mind upon anything"): Used in two senses: good, simply to desire earnestly but legitimately, e.g. AV 1 Cor 12 31; 14 39; bad, to desire unlawfully, or to secure illegitimately (ῥῆξ, bācā'; ἐπιθυμέω, epithumēō, Rom 7 7; 13 9, etc); hence called "lust" (Mt 5 28; 1 Cor 10 6), "concupiscence" (AV Rom 7 8; Col 3 5).

COVETOUSNESS, kuv'et-us-nes: Has a variety of shades of meaning determined largely by the nature of the particular word used, or the context, or both. Following are some of the uses: (1) To gain dishonestly (ῥῆξ, bācā'), e.g. AV Ex 18 21; Ezk 33 31. (2) The wish to have more than one possesses, inordinately, of course (πλεονεξία, pleonexia), e.g. Lk 12 15; 1 Thess 2 5. (3) An inordinate love of money (φιλάργυρος, philárgyros, AV Lk 16 14; 2 Tim 3 2; philarguria, 1 Tim 6 10); negative in He 13 5 AV.

Covetousness is a very grave sin; indeed, so heinous is it that the Scriptures class it among the very gravest and grossest crimes (Eph 5 3). In Col 3 5 it is "idolatry," while in 1 Cor 6 10 it is set forth as excluding a man from heaven. Its heinousness, doubtless, is accounted for by its being in a very real sense the root of so many other forms of sin, e.g. departure from the faith (1 Tim 6 9.10); lying (2 K 5 22-25); theft (Josh 7 21); domestic trouble (Prov 15 27); murder (Ezk 22 12); indeed, it leads to "many foolish and hurtful lusts" (1 Tim 6 9). Covetousness has always been a very serious menace to mankind, whether in the OT or NT period. It was one of the first sins that broke out after Israel had entered into the promised land (Achan, Josh 7); and also in the early Christian church immediately after its founding (Ananias and Sapphira, Acts 5); hence so many warnings against it. A careful reading of the OT will reveal the fact that a very great part of the Jewish law—such as its enactments and regulations regarding duties toward the poor, toward servants; concerning gleanings, usury, pledges, gold and silver taken during war—was introduced and intended to counteract the spirit of covetousness.

Eerdmans maintains (Expos, July, 1909) that the commandment, "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house" (Ex 20 17), meant to the Israelite that he should not take anything of his neighbor's possessions that were momentarily unprotected by their owner. Cf Ex 34 23 ff. Thus, it refers to a category of acts that is not covered by the commandment, "Thou shalt not steal." It is an oriental habit of mind from of old that when anyone sees abandoned goods which he thinks desirable, there is not the least objection to taking them, and Ex 20 17b is probably an explanation of what is to be understood by "house" in ver 17a.

Examples of covetousness: Achan (Josh 7); Saul (1 S 15 9.19); Judas (Mt 26 14.15); Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5 1-11); Balaam (2 Pet 2 15 with Jude ver 11).

COW, kou, KINE, kīn (קֶרֶךְ, bākār [cf Arab. baḵar, "cow"]; עֵגְלַת קֶרֶךְ, 'eghlath bākār [Isa 7 21]; פָּרָה, pārāh [cf Arab. furār, "young of a sheep, goat, or cow"]; פָּרוֹת עֵלּוֹת, pārōth 'alōth [1 S 6 7.10], "milch kine," from עָלָה, 'al, "to suckle"; אֵלֶּפֶת, 'elepeth: In Am 4 1, the term, "kine of Bashan," is applied to the voluptuous women of Samaria. In Gen 41 1-36 is the narration of Pharaoh's dream of the seven fat and seven lean kine. In Isaiah's vision (Isa 11 7) we have: "And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together." Cows do not seem to have been sacrificed. The sacrifice of the kine that brought the ark back from the Philis (1 S 6 14) was due to the exceptional circumstances. See CALF; CATTLE.

ALFRED ELY DAY

COZ, koz (קֹץ, kōṣ, "thorn"): A man of Judah (1 Ch 4 8). ARV has added the art., making the name Hakkoz without sufficient reason. The name occurs with the art. (Ha-kōṣ) in Ezr 2 61; Neh 3 4.21; 7 63, and 1 Ch 24 10, but not with reference to the same person. Coz was of the tribe of Judah, while Hakkoz belonged to the family of Aaron.

COZBI, koz'bī (כֹּזְבִי, kōzbī, "deceitful"): A Midianitish woman, distinguished as the daughter of Zur, "head of the people of a fathers' house in Midian." She was slain by Phinehas at Shittim in company with "Zimri, the son of Salu, a prince of a fathers' house among the Simeonites" (Nu 25 6-18).

COZEBA, ko-zē'ba (1 Ch 4 22). See ACHZIB.

CRACKNEL, krak'nel: Occurs in 1 K 14 3, where Jeroboam bids his wife go to Abijah to inquire concerning their son: "And take with thee ten loaves and cracknels" (AVM "cakes," ERV "cracknels," ARV "cakes"). The Heb word is נִקְדָּדִים, nikkuddim, from nāḳadh, "to prick" or "mark"; most probably cakes with holes pricked in them like our biscuits.

CRAFT, kraft, CRAFTINESS, kraf'ti-nes (πανουργία, panourgia), CRAFTY, kraf'ti (πανούργος, panourgos): The original meaning is that of "ability to do anything," universally applied in a bad sense to unscrupulous wickedness, that stops short of no measure, however reprehensible, in order to attain its purposes; then, in a modified form, to resourcefulness in wrong, cunning (Dnl 8 25; 2 Macc 12 24; RVm "jugglery"). In Lk 20 23, Jesus perceives "the craftiness" of His adversaries, i.e. the complicated network which they have laid to ensnare Him. The art with which a plot is concealed, and its direction to the ruin of others, are elements that enter into the meaning. Heinrici on 1 Cor 3 19 illustrates from Plato the distinction between craftiness and wisdom. There is a touch of humor in 2 Cor 12 16, when Paul speaks of his conduct toward the Corinthians as having been "crafty."

III. CRAFTSMEN LITERATURE

I. Sources of Our Knowledge.—Our knowledge of the arts and crafts of Bible times has come to us through two principal ways. First, 1. Written Records from Bib., Assy., Bab and Egypt are the most illuminating. Second, Discoveries of Craftsmanship from examples of ancient handicraft which have been buried and preserved through many cents. and brought to light again by modern discoveries.

(1) Jewish craftsmanship.—The chief written documents from which we may learn about Heb handicraft are the Bible records. A study of what few references there are leads us to believe that before the Israelites came in contact with the people of Canaan and Phoenicia they had not developed any considerable technical skill (1 K 5 6; 1 Ch 14 1; 2 Ch 2 7.14; Ezr 3 7). Some of the simpler operations, such as the spinning and weaving of the common fabrics and the shaping of domestic utensils, were performed in the household (Ex 35 25.26) but the weaving and dyeing of fine fabrics, carving, inlaying, metal-working, etc., was the work of foreigners, or was learned by the Jews after the Exodus, from the dwellers in Pal.

The Jews, however, gradually developed skill in many of these crafts. It is believed that as early as Nehemiah's time, Jewish craftsmen had organized into guilds (Neh 3 8.31.32). In post-Bib. times the Jews obtained monopolies in some of the industries, as for example, glass-making and dyeing. These trades remained the secrets of certain families for generations. It is because of this secrecy and the mystery that surrounded these trades, and is still maintained in many places, that we know so little as to how they were conducted. Until recently the principal indigo dyers in Damascus were Jews, and the Jews shared with Moslem craftsmen the right to make glass. In some of the Syrian cities Jewish craftsmen are now outnumbering other native workmen in certain trades.

Few examples of Heb handicraft have been discovered by the archaeologists which shed much light upon early Heb work. Aside from the pottery of the Israelitish period, and a few seals and coins, no traces of Heb workmanship remain. It is even doubtful how many of the above objects are really the work of this people.

(2) Canaanitish and Phoenician craftsmanship.—It is generally conceded that what technical skill the Hebrews acquired resulted from their contact with the Canaanites and Phoenicians. Frequent mention of the workmanship of these peoples is made in the Bible, but their own records are silent. Ezekiel's account of the glories of Tyre (Ezk 27) gives some idea of the reputation of that city for craftsmanship: "Thy builders have perfected thy beauty" (ver 4); "Syria was thy merchant . . . Damascus was thy merchant for the multitude of thy handiworks" (vs 16.18). Adad-nirari III (812-783 BC), the Assy king, enumerates the tribute which he exacted from the king of Damascus. "Variegated cloth, linen, an ivory bed, a seat of inlaid ivory, a table" were among the captured articles. These were probably Phoen work.

Many examples of Phoen craftsmanship have been discovered. These are characterized, from the standpoint of art, by a crudeness which distinguishes them from the more delicately and artistically wrought work of their teachers, the Babylonians and Egyptians. The credit remains, however, to the Phoenicians of introducing skilled workmanship into Pal. The Phoenicians, too, furnished the means of intercourse between the Babylonians and Egyptians. From the very earliest times there was an interchange of commodities and ideas between the people of the Nile and those of the Tigris and Euphrates.

(3) Assyrian and Babylonian craftsmanship.—The Babylonians and Assyrians made few references to their own handicraft in their records, but the explorers of recent years have revealed many examples of the remarkable workmanship of the early inhabitants of Mesopotamia. In referring to a silver vase found in that country (Telloh), dating from the 4th millennium BC, Clay (see "Literature") says "the whole is exceedingly well rendered and indicates remarkable skill, which in no respect is less striking than that of Egypt contemporaries in this handicraft." Jewelry, weapons, votive images, various utensils, tools of many kinds, statues in the hardest stones, delicately wrought, gems, dating from the times of Abraham and earlier, lead us to ask when these people acquired their skill.

(4) Egyptian craftsmanship.—The written records of Egypt are doubly important, because they not only refer to the various crafts, but also illustrate the processes by drawings which can leave no doubt as to how the workmen accomplished their ends. The extensive explorations in Egypt have given to the world many priceless relics of craftsmanship, some of them dating from the very dawn of civilization. Among the ruins of early Syrian and Palestinian cities are found numerous objects witnessing to the skill of the Egyptians. These objects and the evidences of the influence of their work on the Phoen arts show the part that the Egyptians played in moulding the ideas of the workmen who were chosen to build the temple at Jerus. In the following brief summary of the crafts mentioned in the Bible, it will be noticeable how well they may be illustrated by the monuments of the Nile country. To confirm the knowledge derived from the above sources, post-Bib. writings and some of the present-day customs in Bible lands are valuable. These will be mentioned in discussing the various crafts.

II. Crafts Directly or Indirectly Mentioned in the Bible.—(For a more detailed treatment of the crafts see under separate arts.) This

1. Brick-making industry probably originated in Babylonia, but the knowledge of the process was early carried to Egypt, where later the Hebrews, along with other captives, were driven to making the bricks of the Egypt kings. The making of sun-dried bricks called for little skill, but the firing and glazing of bricks required trained workmen. See BRICK.

Wood was extensively used by ancient builders. With the exception of the Egypt antiquities, little remains but the records to indicate this fact. Numerous references are made to the carpenter work in building the temple and subsequent repairing of this structure (1 K 5 6; 2 Ch 2 3; 2 K 12 11; 2 Ch 24 12; 2 K 22 6; Ezr 3 7; 4 1). David's house and that of Solomon and his favorite wife were made partly of wood. In the story of the building of the tabernacle, wood-working is mentioned (Ex 25). The people of Tyre built ships of cypress, with masts of cedar wood and oars of oak (Ezk 27 5 6). Idols were carved from wood (Dt 29 17; 2 K 19 18; Isa 37 19; 45 20). The Philis built a wooden cart to carry the ark (1 S 6 7). Threshing instruments and yokes were made of wood (2 S 24 22). Ezra read the law from a pulpit of wood (Neh 8 4). Solomon's chariots were made of wood (Cant 3 9). Inlaid work, still a favorite form of decoration in Syria, was used by the Phoenicians (Ezk 27 6). How the ancient carpenters did their work can be assumed from the Egypt monuments. Some of the operations there pictured are still performed in the same ways. See TOOLS; CARPENTER.

The terms "carving" and "engraving" are used interchangeably in translating OT passages. The first mention made of engraved objects is the signet of Judah (Gen 38 18). 3. Carving (Engraving) The art of engraving on various hard objects, such as clay, bone, ivory, metals and precious stones, probably came from Mesopotamia. The Hebrews learned engraving from the Canaanites. The nature of this engraving is shown by the Assy cylinders and Egypt scarabs. It is doubtful how many of the signets found in Pal are Heb work, as the engraved devices are mostly Phoen or Egypt. From the earliest times it has been the custom in the Orient for men of affairs to carry constantly with them their signets. The seal was set in a ring, or, as was the case with Judah, and as the Arabs do today, it was worn on a cord suspended about the neck. One of the present-day sights in a Syrian city street is the engraver of signets, seated at his low bench ready to cut on one of his blank seals the buyer's name or sign.

The second form of carving is suggested by the Decalogue (Ex 20 4). The commandment explains why sculpturing remained undeveloped among the Jews, as it has to this day among the Moslems. In spite of the commandment, however, cherubim were carved on the wooden fittings of the temple interior (1 K 6 23).

Among the peoples with whom the Jews came in contact, stone-cutting had reached a high degree of perfection. No stone proved too hard for their tools. In Egypt and Phoen tombs the carving was often done on plastered surfaces. See CARVING.

Both the Egyptians and Babylonians were skilled in molding and baking objects of clay. The early Bab records consist of burnt clay tablets. Glazed bricks formed an important decorative feature. In Egypt, idols, scarabs and amulets were often made of fired clay, glazed or unglazed. By far the most important branch of ceramic art was the making of jars for holding water or other liquids. These jars have been used throughout the East from earliest times. The Jews learned what they knew about this art from the Phoenicians. See POTTERY.

Dyeing is one of the oldest of the crafts. The only references to the act of dyeing in the Bible are (a) in connection with the dyed skins of animals (Ex 25 5; 26 14), and (b) Jgs 5 30. That it was a highly developed trade is implied in the many other references to dyed stuffs both in the Bible and in profane lit. Cleansing was done by the fuller, who was probably a dyer also. See COLOR; DYE; FULLER.

Very little is known of the work of embroidering, further than that it was the working-in of color designs on cloth. In Ezk 27 7 we learn that it was one of the exports of Egypt. See EMBROIDERING.

In Dt 33 19 "hidden treasures of the sand" is interpreted by some to mean the making of glass objects from the sand. There can be no question about the Hebrews being acquainted with glass-making, as its history extends back to very early times.

7. Glass-Making The Egyptians and Phoenicians made bottles, glass beads, idols, etc. These objects are among those usually found in the tombs. Glass beads of very early manufacture were found in the mound at Gezer. Some of the pigments used for painting were made of powdered colored glass. In the NT we read of the "sea of glass like unto crystal" (Rev 4 6). See GLASS.

Grinding was a domestic task and can hardly be classed as one of the crafts. When flour was needed, the housewife, or more likely the servant,

8. Grinding ant, rubbed the wheat or barley between two millstones (see MILLSTONE) or, with a rounded river stone, crushed the wheat on a large flat stone. It is still a common custom in Syria and Pal for two women to work together as indicated in Mt 24 41 and Lk 17 35. Grinding of meal was a menial task, considered the employment of a concubine; hence setting Samson to grinding at the mill was intended as a disgrace.

The rhythmic sound of the stone cutter at his work never ceases in the prosperous oriental city. It is more common today, however, than in the earlier cents. when only high officials could afford stone houses.

9. Mason Work Frequently only the temple or shrines or tombs of a city were made of stone. As such buildings were very common, and much attention was paid to every detail of their construction, there was developed an efficient corps of masons, especially in Egypt and Syria. When the Israelites abandoned their nomadic life, among the first things that they planned were permanent places of worship. As these developed into structures more pretentious than mere piles of stones, the builders naturally resorted to the skill of the master builders of the country. A visitor to Jerus may still see the work of the ancient masons. The so-called Solomon's quarries under the city, the great drafted stones of the temple area, belong to an early date. The very shape of the masons' tools may be determined from the marks on the stones. See MASON.

Among the oldest objects that have been preserved are those of silver, gold and bronze. These are proof that the ancients understood the various processes of mining, smelting, refining and working of metals.

10. Metal-Working (Mining) See MINING; METAL-WORKING.

The oil referred to in the Bible is olive oil. Pliny mentions many other oils which were extracted in Egypt. The oils were usually extracted by first crushing the fruit and then pressing the crushed mass. At Gezer, Tell es Sâfi and other ancient ruins old oil presses have been discovered. See OIL.

One who has visited the tombs and temples of Egypt will never forget the use which the ancient Egypt painters made of colors. The otherwise somber effect produced by expansive plain walls was overcome by sculpturing, either in relief or intaglio, on a coating of stucco, and then coloring these engravings in reds, yellows, greens and blues. Architectural details were also painted. The capitals of columns and the columns themselves received special attention from the painter. Colors were similarly used by the Greeks and Phoenicians. In the Sidon tombs, at Palmyra and similar ruins, traces of painting are still evident. See PAINTING.

12. Painting The word "paper" occurs twice, once in the OT (Isa 19 7 AV) and once in NT (2 Jn ver 12). In Isa 19 7 the RV renders "paper reeds,"

"meadows." PAPYRUS (q.v.) occurs in Isa 18 2 and RVM of Ex 2 3. The nearest approach to our paper which the ancients possessed

13. Paper-Making was that made from a species of papyrus. The process consisted in spreading out, side by side, long strips of the inner lining of the papyrus reed, then over these other strips at right angles to the first, afterward soaking with some adhesive material and finally pressing and drying. Sheets made in this way were fastened together with glue into a long scroll. The Gr for papyrus plant is "biblos," from which the Eng. word "Bible" is derived. Parchment, leather and leaves were also used as paper. The natives of Syria and Pal still call a sheet of paper a "leaf" (Arab. waraket).

The art of perfume-making dates back to the ancient Egyptians. In Ex 30 35 we have the first mention of scented anointing oils.

14. Perfume-Making The perfumers' (AV "confectioner" or "apothecary") products were used (a) for religious rites as offerings and to anoint the idols and (b) for personal use on the body or clothes. Some perfumes were powders (incense); others were scented oils or fats (ointments). See PERFUME.

The trade of plastering dates back to the beginning of the history of building. There were two reasons for using plastering or stucco:

15. Plastering (AV "Plastering") (a) to render the buildings more resisting to the weather and (b) to make the surfaces more suitable for decoration by engraving or painting. See PLASTER.

The arts of spinning and weaving were early practised in the household (Ex 35 25). Many different fibers were spun and woven

16. Spinning and Weaving into cloth. Fabrics of wool, cotton, flax, silk, wood fiber have been preserved from Bible times. In the more progressive communities, the weaving of the fabrics was taken over by the weavers who made it their profession. In 1 Ch 4 21 it is stated that many of the families of the house of Asbea were workers in fine linen. The modern invasion of European manufacturers has not yet driven out the weavers who toil at looms much like those described by the ancient Egypt drawings. See SPINNING; WEAVING.

Although it is known that tanning was practised, the only reference to this trade mentioned in the Bible is to Simon the tanner (Acts 9 17. Tanning 43; 10 6.32). Leather girdles are mentioned in 2 K 1 8; Mt 3 4. Relics taken from the tombs show that the ancients understood the various methods for preserving skins which are used in present-day practice. See TANNER.

We think of Paul as the tent-maker. The tents which he made however were probably not like those so frequently referred to in the OT. Tents in Paul's time were made from Cilician cloth. Paul's work was probably the sewing together of the proper lengths of cloth and the attaching of ropes and loops. In OT times the tents were made of strips of coarse goat's hair cloth or of the skins of animals. See TENT.

This art. is being written within sound of festivities about the winepresses of Mt. Lebanon where men and women are gathered for the annual production of wine and molasses (Arab. dibs). Their process is so like that of Bible times that one is transported in thought to similar festivities that must have attended the wine-making even so far back as the early Egypt kings. That these workers understood the precautions necessary for procuring a desirable product is evidenced by early writings. The choice of proper soil for the vineyards, the adding of preservatives to keep the wine, boiling the juice to kill undesirable ferments, guarding against putting new wine into old bottles, are examples of their knowledge of wine-making. See WINE PRESS.

19. Wine-Making

18. Tent-Making

III. Craftsmen.—Craftsmen were early segregated into groups. A trade usually remained in a family. This is true to some extent in the East today. In such cities as Beirût, Damascus, or Aleppo the shops of the craftsmen of a given trade will be found grouped together. There is a silver and goldsmiths' market (Arab. sûk), an iron market, a dyeing quarter, etc. Jewish craftsmen in early times sat separately in the synagogues. Some crafts were looked upon with disfavor, esp. those which brought men in contact with women, as for example, the trade of goldsmith, carder, weaver, fuller or tanner. There was a fellow-feeling among craftsmen referred to by Isaiah (Isa 41 6.7). This same feeling is observed among Syrian workmen today. The Arab has many phrases of encouragement for a man at his work, such as, "Peace to your hands," "May God give you strength." A crowd of men pulling at a pulley rope, for example, shout or sing together as they pull.

Crag, krag (כַּרְגַּ, shên [1 S 7 12; 14 4; Job 39 28 AV and ERV]): In a mountainous country composed of sedimentary rocks, like the cretaceous rocks of Pal, cliffs are formed on a slope where hard strata are underlaid by softer strata. The soft strata wear away more rapidly, undermining the hard strata above them, which for a time project, but finally break off by vertical joint planes, the fragments rolling down to form the talus slope at the foot of the cliff. As the breaking off of the undermined hard strata proceeds irregularly, there are left projecting crags, sometimes at the top of the cliff, and sometimes lower down. Two such crags (shên ha-shela', "sharp rock," RV "rocky crag"), which were given particular names, Bozez and Seneh, marked the scene of the exploit of Jonathan described in 1 S 14. Conder failed to identify the crags, and it has been proposed to alter the text rather extensively to make it read: "wall of rock" instead of "crag" (EB s.v. "Michmash"). Such rocks form safe resting-places for birds of prey, as it is said of the eagle in Job 39 28 ERV:

"She dwelleth on the rock and hath her lodging there, Upon the crag of the rock, and the stronghold."

ALFRED ELY DAY

CRANE, krân (קַרְנַּיִם, 'aghûr; γέρανος, géranos; Lat Grus cinerea): A bird of the family gruidae. The crane is mentioned twice in the Bible: once on account of its voice (Isa 38 14: "Like a swallow or a crane, so did I chatter"); again because of the unforgettable picture these birds made in migration (Jer 8 7): "Yea, the stork in the heavens knoweth her appointed times; and the turtle-dove and the swallow and the crane observe the time of their coming; but my people know not the law of Jeh." Some commentators have adduced reasons for dropping the crane from the ornithology of the Bible, but this never should be permitted. They were close relatives of stork, heron and ibis; almost as numerous as any of these, and residents of Pal, except in migration. The two quotations concerning them fit with their history, and point out the two features that made them as noticeable as any birds of Pal. Next to the ostrich and pelican they were the largest birds, having a wing sweep of 8 ft. from tip to tip and standing 4 ft. in height. In migration such immense flocks passed over Pal as to darken the sky, and when they crossed the Red Sea they appeared to sweep from shore to shore, and so became the most noticeable migratory bird, for which reason, no doubt, they were included in Isaiah's reference to spring migration with the beloved doves, used in sacrifice and for caged pets, and with the swallows that were held almost sacred because they homed in temples. Not so many of them settled in Pal as of the storks, but large flocks lived in the wilderness S. of Jerus, and a few pairs homed near water as far north as Merom. The grayish-brown cranes were the largest, and there were also a crested, and a white crane. They nested on the ground or in trees and laid two large eggs, differing with species. The eggs of the brown bird were a light drab with brown speckles, and those of the white, rough, pale-blue with brown splotches. They were not so affectionate in pairs or to their young as storks, but were average parents. It is altogether probable that they were the birds intended by Isaiah, because they best suited his purpose, the crane and the swallow being almost incessant talkers among birds. The word "chatter," used in the Bible, exactly suits the notes of a swallow, but is much too feeble to be used in describing the vocalizing of the crane. They migrated in large wedge-shaped companies and cried constantly on wing. They talked incessantly while at the business of living, and even during the watches of the night they scarcely ceased passing along word that all was well, or sending abroad danger signals. The Arabs called the cry of the cranes "bellowing." We usually express it by whooping or trumpeting. Any of these words is sufficiently expressive to denote an unusual voice, used in an unusual manner, so that it appealed to the prophet as suitable for use in a strong comparison. CRASHING, krash'ing (שִׁבְחָה, shebher): This word, meaning "a breach," fig. "destruction," is trd "crashing" in Zeph 1 10: "a great crashing from the hills," representing the doom to fall on evil-doers in Jerus, as the enemy advanced against the city from the north.

CRATES, krā'tēz (Κράτης, Krátēs), governor of the Cyprians, left as deputy of Sostratus when the latter, who was governor of Jerus, was summoned to Antioch by Antiochus Epiphanes, in consequence of a dispute with Menelaus (2 Macc 4 29). As Cyprus was not at the time in the possession of Antiochus, the words have been generally taken to mean Krates "who had formerly been, or afterward was, governor of the Cyprians." The Vulg translates the Gr into "Sostratus autem praelatus est Cypriis."

LITERATURE

Much negative ground has been cleared away for any modern discussion of the doctrine of creation.

No idea of creation can now be taken as complete which does not include, as Abiding besides the world as at first constituted, all that to this day is in and of creation. For God creates not being that can exist independently of Him, His preserving agency being inseparably connected with His creative power. We have long ceased to think of God's creation as a machine left, completely made, to its own automatic working. With such a doctrine of creation, a theistic evolution would be quite incompatible.

Just as little do we think of God's creative agency, as merely that of a First Cause, linked to the universe from the outside by

2. Mistaken Ideas innumerable sequences of causes and effects. Nature in her entirety is as much His creation today as she ever was. The dynamic ubiquity of God, as efficient energy, is to be affirmed. God is still All and in All, but this in a way sharply distinguished from pantheistic views, whether of the universe as God, or of God as the universe. Of His own freedom He creates, so that gnostic theories of natural and necessary emanation are left far behind. Not only have the "carpenter" and the "gardener" theories—with, of course, the architect or world-builder theory of Plato—been dismissed; not only has the conception of evolution been proved harmonious with creative end, plan, purpose, ordering, guidance; but evolutionary science may itself be said to have given the thought of theistic evolution its best base or grounding. The theistic conception is, that the world—that all cosmic existences, substances, events—depend upon God.

The doctrine of creation—of the origin and persistence, of all finite existences—as the work of God, is a necessary postulation of the religious consciousness. Such consciousness is marked by deeper insight than belongs to science. The underlying truth is the anti-patheistic one, that the energy and wisdom—by which that, which was not, became—were, in kind, other than its own. For science can but trace the continuity of sequences in all Nature, while in creation, in its primary sense, this law of continuity must be transcended, and the world viewed solely as product of Divine Intelligence, immanent in its evolution. For God is the Absolute Reason, always immanent in the developing universe. Apart from the cosmogonic attempts at the beginning of Genesis, which are clearly religious and ethical in scope and character, the OT furnishes no theoretic account of the manner and order in which creative process is carried on.

The early chs of Genesis were, of course, not given to reveal the truths of physical science, but they recognize creation as marked by 4. The Genesis Cosmogony order, continuity, law, plastic power of productiveness in the different kingdoms, unity of the world and progressive advance. The Genesis cosmogony teaches a process of becoming, as well as a creation (see EVOLUTION). That cosmogony has been recognized by Haeckel as meritoriously marked by the two great ideas of separation or differentiation, and of progressive development or perfecting of the originally simple matter. The OT presents the conception of time-worlds or successive ages, but its real emphasis is on the energy of the Divine Word, bringing into being things that did not exist.

The OT and the NT, in their doctrine of creation, recognize no eternal matter before creation. We cannot say that the origin of matter

5. Matter is excluded from the Genesis account not Eternal of creation, and this quite apart from the use of bārā', as admitting of material and means in creation. But it seems unwise to build upon Genesis passages that afford no more than a basis which has proved exegetically insecure. The NT seems to favor the derivation of matter from the non-existent—that is to say, the time-worlds were due to the effluent Divine Word or originaive Will, rather than to being built out of God's own invisible essence. So the best exegesis interprets He 11 3.

In OT books, as the Pss, Prov, and Jer, the creation is expressly declared to be the work of Wisdom—a Wisdom not disjoined from Goodness, as is yet more fully brought out in the Book of Job. The heavens declare the glory of God, the world manifests or reveals Him to our experience, as taken up and interpreted by the religious consciousness. The primary fact of the beginning of the time-worlds—the basal fact that the worlds came into being by the Word of God—is something apprehensible only by the power of religious faith, as the only principle applicable to the case (He 11 3). Such intuitive faith is really an application of first principles in the highest—and a truly rational one (see LOGOS). In creation, God is but expressing or acting out the conscious Godhood that is in Him. In it the thought of His absolute Wisdom is realized by the action of His perfect Love. It is philosophically necessary to maintain that God, as the Absolute Being, must find the end of creation in Himself. If the end were external to, and independent of, Him, then would He be conditioned thereby.

What the religious consciousness is concerned to maintain is, the absolute freedom of God in the production of the universe, and the fact that He is so much greater than the universe that existence has been by Him bestowed on all things that do exist. The Scriptures are, from first to last, shot through with this truth. Neither Kant nor Spencer, from data of self-consciousness or sense-perception, can rise to the conception of creation, for they both fail to reach the idea of Divine Personality. The inconceivability of creation has been pressed by Spencer, the idea of a self-existent Creator, through whose agency it has been made, being to him unthinkable. As if it were not a transparent sophism, which Spencer's own scientific practice refuted, that a hypothesis may not have philosophical or scientific value, because it is

7. A Free, Personal Act fact that He is so much greater than the universe that existence has been by Him bestowed on all things that do exist. As if it were not a transparent sophism, which Spencer's own scientific practice refuted, that a hypothesis may not have philosophical or scientific value, because it is what we call unthinkable or inconceivable. As if a true and sufficient cause were not enough, or a Divine act of will were not a vera causa. Dependent existence inevitably leads thought to demand existence that is not dependent.

Creation is certainly not disproved by evolution, which does not explain the origin of the homogeneous stuff itself, and does not account

8. Creation and Evolution

Of the original creative action, lying beyond mortal ken or human observation, science—as concerned only with the manner of the process—is obviously in no position to speak. Creation may, in an important sense, be said not to have taken place in time, since time cannot be posited prior to the existence of the world. The difficulties of the ordinary hypothesis of a creation in time can never be surmounted, so long as we continue to make eternity mean simply indefinitely prolonged time. Augustine was, no doubt, right when, from the human standpoint, he declared that the world was not made in time, but with time. Time is itself a creation simultaneous with, and conditioned by, world-creation and movement. To say, in the ordinary fashion, that God created in time, is apt to make time appear independent of God, or God dependent upon time. Yet the time-forms enter into all our psychological experience, and a concrete beginning is unthinkable to us.

The time-conditions can be transcended only by some deeper intuition than mere logical insight can supply—by such intuitive endeavor, in fact, as is realized in the necessary belief in the self-existent God. If

9. Is Creation Eternal?

He may be said to act or create in eternity; and it is legitimate enough, in such wise, to speak of His creative act as eternal. This seems preferable to the position of Origen, who speculatively assumed an eternal or unbeginning activity for God as Creator, because the Divine Nature must be eternally self-determined to create in order to the manifestation of its perfections. Clearly did Aquinas perceive that we cannot affirm an eternal creation impossible, the creative act not falling within our categories of time and space. The question is purely one of God's free volition, in which—and not in "nothing"—the Source of the world is found.

This brings us to notice the frequently pressed objection that creation cannot be out of nothing, since out of nothing comes nothing.

10. Creation "ex nihilo"

This would mean that matter is eternal. But the eternity of matter, as something other than God, means its independence of God, and its power to limit or condition Him. We have, of course, no direct knowledge of the origin of matter, and the conception of its necessary self-existence is fraught with hopeless difficulties and absurdities. The axiom, that out of nothing nothing comes, is not contradicted in the case of creation. The universe comes from God; it does not come from nothing. But the axiom does not really apply to the world's creation, but only to the succession of its phenomena. Entity does not spring from non-entity. But there is an opposite and positive truth, that something presupposes something, in this case rather some One—aliquis rather than aliquid.

It is enough to know that God has in Himself the powers and resources adequate for creating, without being able to define the ways in which creation is effected by Him.

11. From God's Will

It is a sheer necessity of rational faith or spiritual reason that the something which conditions the world is neither ὕλη, hylē, nor elemental matter, but personal Spirit or originative

Will. We have no right to suppose the world made out of nothing, and then to identify, as Erigena did, this "nothing" with God's own essence. What we have a right to maintain is, that what God creates or calls into being owes its existence to nothing save His will alone, Ground of all actualities. Pre-existent Personality is the ground and the condition of the world's beginning.

In this sense, its beginning may be said to be relative rather than absolute. God is always antecedent to the universe—its prius.

12. Error of Cause and Creator. Pantheism

It remains an effect, and sustains a relation of causal dependence upon Him. If we say, like Cousin, that God of necessity creates eternally, we run risk of falling into Spinozistic pantheism, identifying God, in excluding from Him absolute freedom in creation, with the impersonal and unconscious substance of the universe. Or if, with Schelling, we posit in God something which is not God—a dark, irrational background, which original ground is also the ground of the Divine Existence—we may try to find a basis for the matter of the universe, but we are in danger of being merged—by conceptions tinged with corporeity—in that form of pantheism to which God is but the soul of the universe.

The universe, we feel sure, has been caused; its existence must have some ground; even if we held a philosophy so idealistic as to make the scheme of created things one grand illusion, an illusion so vast would still call for some explanatory Cause. Even if we are not content with the conception of a First Cause, acting on the world from without and antecedently in time, we are not yet freed from the necessity of asserting a Cause. An underlying and determining Cause of the universe would still need to be postulated as its Ground.

Even a universe held to be eternal would need to be accounted for—we should still have to ask how such a universe came to be. Its endless movement must have direction and character imparted to it from some immanent ground or underlying cause. Such a self-existent and eternal World-Ground or First Cause is, by an inexorable law of thought, the necessary correlate of the finitude, or contingent character of the world. God and the world are not to be taken simply as cause and effect, for modern metaphysical thought is not content with such a mere ens extra-mundatum for the Ground of all possible experience. God, self-existent Cause of the ever-present world and its phenomena, is the ultimate Ground of the possibility of all that is.

13. First Cause a Necessary Presupposition

Such a Deity, as causa sui, creatively bringing forth the world out of His own potency, cannot be allowed to be an arbitrary resting-place, but a truly rational Ground, of thought. Nor can His Creation be allowed to be an aimless and mechanical universe: it is shot through with end or purpose that tends to reflect the glory of the eternal and personal God, who is its Creator in a full and real sense. But the Divine action is not dramatic: of His working we can truly say, with Isa 45 15, "Verily thou art a God that hidest thyself." As creation becomes progressively disclosed to us, its glory, as revealing God, ought to excite within us an always deeper sense of the sentiment of Ps 8 1,9, "O Jeh our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth!" CREATOR, krē-ā'tēr (κτιστής, ktistēs, 1 Pet 4 19): The distinctive characteristic of Deity, as the Creator, is that He is the Cause of the existent universe—Cause of its being, not merely of its evolution or present arrangements. The doctrine of His being the Creator implies, that is to say, that He is the real and the exclusive Agent in the production of the world. For, as Herder remarked, the thought of the Creator is the most fruitful of all our ideas. As Creator, He is the Unconditioned, and the All-conditioning, Being. The universe is thus dependent upon Him, as its causative antecedent. He calls it, as Aquinas said, "according to its whole substance," into being, without any presupposed basis. His power, as Creator, is different in kind from finite power. But the creative process is not a case of sheer almightiness, creating something out of nothing, but an expression of God, as the Absolute Reason, under the forms of time and space, causality and finite personality. In all His work, as Creator, there is no incitement from without, but it rather remains an eternal activity of self-manifestation on the part of a God who is Love.

God's free creative action is destined to realize archetypal ends and ideals, which are peculiar to Himself. For thought cannot be con-

2. Purpose tent with the causal category under in Creation which He called the world into being, but must run on to the teleological category, wherein He is assumed to have created with a purpose, which His directive agency will see at last fulfilled. As Creator, He is distinct from the universe, which is the product of the free action of His will. This theistic postulation of His freedom, as Creator, rules out all theories of necessary emanation. His creative action was in no way necessarily eternal—not even necessary to His own blessedness or perfection, which must be held as already complete in Himself. To speak, as Professor James does, of "the stagnant felicity of the Absolute's own perfection" is to misconceive the infinite plenitude of His existence, and to place Him in a position of abject and unworthy dependence upon an eternal activity of world-making.

God's action, as Creator, does not lower our conception of His changelessness, for it is a gratuitous assumption to suppose either that

3. Relation the will to create was a sudden or to Time accidental thing, or that He could not will a change, without, in any proper sense, changing His will. Again, grave difficulties cluster around the conception of His creative thought or purpose as externalized in time, the chief source of the trouble being, as is often imperfectly realized, that, in attempting to view things as they were when time began, we are really trying to get out of, and beyond, experience, to the thinking of which time is an indispensable condition. God's work as Creator must have taken place in time, since the world must be held as no necessary element in the Absolute Life.

The self-determined action of the Divine Will, then, is to be taken as the ultimate principle of the cosmos. Not to any causal or meta-

4. Christ in physical necessity, but to Divine or Creation Absolute Personality, must the created world be referred. "Of him, and through him, and unto him, are all things" (Rom 11 36). This creative action of God is mediated by Christ—by whom "were all things created, in the heavens and upon the earth, things visible and things invisible, whether thrones or dominions or principalities or powers; all things have been created through him, and unto him" (Col 1 16). See CREATION.

JAMES LINDSAY

CREATURE, krē'tūr: The word "creature," as it occurs in the NT, is the tr and also the exact Eng. equivalent of the Gr κτίσις, ktisis, or κτίσμα, ktisma, from κρίω, ktizō, "to create." In the OT, on the other hand, it stands for words which have in the original no reference to creation, but which come from other roots. Nephesh, "living creature" (lit. "a breathing thing"), occurs in the accounts of the Creation and the Flood and at the close of the lists of clean and unclean animals in Lev 11 46. Hay, "living creature" (lit. "a living thing"), occurs 13 times in Ezk 1, 3 and 10 (see CREATURE, LIVING). Shereṣ, "moving creature" (lit. "a swarming thing," generally rendered "creeping thing," q.v.), occurs once in Gen 1 20. Ōhīm, "doleful creatures," occurs once only in Isa 13 21. It appears to be an onomatopoeic word referring to the mournful sounds emitted by the animals in question. From the context it is fair to suppose that owls may be the animals referred to. See OWL; CREATION.

ALFRED ELY DAY

CREATURE, LIVING (חַיָּה, hayyāh; ζῷον, zōon): "Living creature" (hayyāh) is the designation of each of the composite figures in Ezekiel's visions (1 5.13 ff; 3 13; 10 15.17.20) and, RV, of the similar beings in the visions of the Apocalypse, instead of the extremely unfortunate tr of zōon in AV by "beasts" (Rev 4 6 ff; 5 6 ff; 6 1 ff; 7 11; 14 3; 15 7; 19 4), which, however, went back to Wiclif, in whose time the word had not the low meaning which "beast," "beastly" have with us; hence he translates 1 Cor 15 44, "It is sown a bestli body," meaning simply animal (see Trench's Select Glossary); in Rev "the beasts of the earth," the "beasts" that came up, the notable "beast" that men worshipped, represent the Gr thērion, "a wild beast."

The "living creatures" in Ezekiel's vision (1 5 ff) were four in number, "with the general appearance of a man, but each with four faces and four wings, and straight legs with the feet of an ox. Under their wings are human hands, and these wings are so joined that they never require to turn. The front face is that of a man; right and left of this are the faces of a lion and [of] an ox, and behind, that of an eagle . . . out of the midst of them gleam fire, torches, lightnings, and connected with them are four wheels that can turn in every direction, called whirling wheels (10 12.13). Like the creatures, these are alive, covered with eyes, the sign of intelligence; the spirit of the living creatures is in them. They are afterward discovered by the prophet to be cherubim" (Schultz, OT Theology, II, 233). See CHERUBIM. In Ezekiel's vision they seem to be the bearers of the throne and glory of God; the bearers of His presence and of His revelation (9 3; 10 3). They also sound forth His praise (3 12; 10 2). (See Schultz as above.)

The four living creatures in Rev (4 6) are not under the throne but "in the midst of the throne" (ARV m "before"; see 7 17; cf 5 6) and "round about the throne." They are also cherubim, and seem to represent the four beings that stand at the head of the four divisions of the creation; among the untamed animals the lion; among cattle the calf or ox; among birds the eagle; among all created beings the man. It gives "a perfect picture of true service, which should be as brave as the lion, patient as the ox, aspiring as the eagle, intelligent as man" (Milligan in loc.). They represent the powers of Nature—the creation, “full of eyes” as denoting its permeation with the Divine Reason, the wings signifying its constant, ready service, and the unceasing praise the constant doing of God’s will. The imagery is founded on Ezekiel as that had been modified in apocalyptic writings and as it was exalted in the mind of the Seer of Patmos.

CREDIT, kred’it (πιστεύειν, pisteúein; 1 Macc 10 46 AV, RV “gave no credence”; Wisd 18 6 AV, RV “trusted”; 1 Macc 1 30 AV, RV “credence”): In the modern commercial sense the noun “credit” does not occur in the canonical Scriptures or in the Apoc.

CREDITOR, kred’i-tēr ([a] נָשֶׂה, nōsheh, participle of נָשָׂה, nāshāh: Ex 22 24 [ET 25]; 2 K 4 1; Isa 50 1; tr<sup>d</sup> “extortioner,” Ps 109 11; “taker of usury,” Isa 24 2 AV; [b] מַלְוֶה, malweh, participle of לָוָה, lāwāh, Isa 24 2 RV, AV “lender”; [c] בַּשֶּׁה יָדָהוּ, ba’sal mashshēh yādhō: “lord of the loan of his hand,” Dt 15 2; [d] δανιστής, danistēs: Lk 7 41, “creditor” AV, “lender” RV; cf further danistós, Sir 29 28, “lender” AV, “money-lender” RV): In the ideal social system of the OT, debts are incurred only because of poverty, and the law protected the poor debtor from his creditor, who in Ex 22 25 is forbidden to demand interest, and in Dt 15 2 to exact payment in view of the nearness of the year of release. 2 K 4 1 shows that the actual practice was not so considerate, and in consequence the creditor fell into bad repute. In Ps 109 11 he is the extortioner; in Prov 29 13 the oppressor is evidently the creditor, though a different word is used; cf also Prov 22 7. In Sir 29 28 the importunity of the creditor is one of the hardships of the poor man of understanding. The actual practice of the Jews may be gathered from Neh 5 1 ff; Jer 34 8 ff; and Sir 29 1–11. LITERATURE

By “creed” we understand the systematic statement of religious faith; and by the creeds of the Christian church we mean the formal expression of “the faith which was delivered unto the saints.” The word is derived from the first word of the Lat VSS of the Apostles’ Creed, and the name is usually applied to those formulae known as the Apostles’, the Nicene and the Athanasian creeds.

In this art. we shall first indicate the Scriptural foundation and rudimentary Bib. statements upon which the distinctive dogmas of the church are based; and, secondly, briefly describe the origin and nature of the three most important symbols of belief which have dominated Christian thought.

I. Scriptural Basis.—There are three forms in which the religious instinct naturally expresses itself—in a ritual, a creed and a life. Men first seek to propitiate the Deity by some outward act and express their devotion in some external ceremony. Next they endeavor to explain their worship and to find a rationale of it in certain facts which they formulate into a confession; and lastly, not content with the outward act or the verbal interpretation of it, they attempt to express their religion in life.

Pagan religion first appears in the form of a rite. The worshipper was content with the proper performance of a ceremony and was not, in the earliest stage at least, concerned with an interpretation of his act. The myths, which to some extent were an attempt to rationalize ritual, may be regarded as the earliest approach to a formulated statement of belief. But inasmuch as the myths of early pagan religion are not obligatory upon the reason or the faith of the worshipper, they can scarcely be regarded as creeds. Pagan religion, strictly speaking, has no theology and having no real historical basis of facts does not possess the elements of a creed. In this respect it is distinguished from revealed religion. This latter rests upon facts, the meaning and interpretation of which are felt to be necessary to give to revelation its values and authority.

Even in the OT there are not wanting the germs of a creed. In the Decalogue we have the beginnings of the formulation of belief, and in the proclamation, “Hear, O Israel: Jeh our God is one Jeh” (Dt 6 4), we have what may be regarded as the symbol of the OT faith and the earliest attempt to enunciate a doctrine.

It is to the NT, however, we must turn to find the real indications of such a statement of belief as may be designated a creed. We must remember that Christ lived and taught for a time before any attempt was made to portray His life or to record His sayings. The earliest writings are not the Gospels, but some of the Epistles, and it is to them we must look for any definite explanation of the facts which center in the appearance of Christ upon the earth. At the same time in the sequence of events the personality and teaching of Jesus come first, and in the relation to Him of His disciples and converts and in their personal confessions and utterances of faith we have the earliest suggestions of an expression of belief. The confession of Nathanael (Jn 1 49), “Rabbi, thou art the Son of God,” and still more the utterance of St. Peter (Mt 16 16), “Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God,” and the exclamation of Thomas (Jn 20 28), contain the germ of a creed. It is to be noted that all these expressions of belief have Christ as their object and give utterance with more or less explicitness to a conviction of His Divine nature and authority.

But while these sayings in the Gospels were no doubt taken up and incorporated in later interpretations, it is to the Epistles that delivered to the saints should be formulated for a body whose members were pledged to each other and united for common action, and whose bond of union was the acknowledgment of "one Lord, one faith." Paul recognizes it as vital to the very spirit of religion that some definite profession of belief in Christ should be made: "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth Jesus as Lord, and shalt believe in thy heart that God raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved" (Rom 10 9). These words would seem to imply that a confession of the Deity, the atoning death, and resurrection of Jesus was the earliest form of Christian creed.

3. In the Epistles we must first go, for an explanation of the facts of Christ’s person and His relation to God and man. Paul’s Epistles are really of the nature of a confession and manifesto of Christian belief. Communities of believers already existed when the apostle directed to them his earliest letters. In their oral addresses the apostles must have been accustomed not only to state facts which were familiar to their hearers, but also to draw inferences from them as to the meaning of Christ and the great truths centering in His person—His incarnation, His death and resurrection (as we may see from the recorded sermons of Peter and Paul in Acts). It is to these facts that the Epistles appeal. It was at once natural and necessary that some expression of the faith once

It must also be observed that from the very first the confession of faith seems to have been connected with the administration of baptism. Already in the story of the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts 8 37 AV) (a passage indeed of doubtful genuineness but attested by Irenaeus and therefore of great antiquity) we find that as a condition of baptism the convert is asked to declare his belief in Jesus Christ as the Son of God. The passage in 1 Tim (6 12; cf He 10 23), "Lay hold on the life eternal, whereunto thou wast called, and didst confess the good confession in the sight of many witnesses," may refer to a confession required only of those who were being ordained; but the context leads us to infer that it was a baptismal vow asked of members not less than of ministers of the church. The probability is that the earliest form of creed reflected little more than Christ's final command to baptize all men "into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit" (Mt 28 19), or perhaps simply "into the name of the Lord Jesus" (Acts 19 5). The ver in 8 37 AV, though disputed by some, is instructive in this connection. Faith in Jesus Christ was regarded as the cardinal point of the New Revelation and may have been taken to imply a relation to the Father as well as a promise of the Holy Spirit.

It is evident that the creeds that have come down to us are mainly an expression of the doctrine of the Trinity as embodied in the original baptismal formula derived from Our Lord's commission. Already indeed in some places of the OT this doctrine is foreshadowed; but it is first clearly incorporated in the Lord's command just mentioned and in the benediction of St. Paul (2 Cor 13 14), and subsequently in the Christian doxologies. Some scholars have preferred to find traces in the later writings of the NT of a more definite summary of belief: as in the allusion to the form of sound words (2 Tim 1 13), the "deposit" or "good deposit" which was to be kept (1 Tim 6 20 RVm; 2 Tim 1 14 RVm); also in "the faithful words" enumerated in these epistles (1 Tim 1 15; 3 1; 4 8,9; 2 Tim 2 11); and in the remarkable passage in the beginning of He 6 in which the elementary doctrines of the Christian religion are enumerated; first on the subjective side, repentance and faith, and then objectively, the resurrection and the judgment. There are also brief summaries in several of the Pauline Epistles of what the apostle must have considered to be essential tenets. Thus for example we have the death, burial and resurrection of Christ mentioned in 1 Cor 15 3 f; Rom 1 3 f. Such summaries or confessions of personal faith as in 2 Thess 2 13 f are frequent in Paul's writings and may correspond to statements of truth which the apostle found serviceable for catechetical purposes as he moved from one Christian community to another. See CATECHIST.

It is not indeed till a much later age—the age of Irenaeus and Tertullian (175–200)—that we meet with any definite summary of belief. But it cannot be doubted that these Scriptural passages to which we have referred not only served as the first forms of confession but also contributed the materials out of which the articles of the church's faith were formulated. As soon as Christian preaching and teaching were exercised there would be a felt need for explicit statement of the truths revealed in and through Jesus Christ. It may be said that all the main facts which were subsequently embodied in the creeds have their roots in the NT Scripture and esp. in the Pauline Epistles. The only exception which might be made is in the case of the virgin birth. It does not lie within the scope of this art. to comment upon the silence of the epistles on this subject. This, however, we may say, that the omissions of Paul's reference to it does not prove it untrue. It only proves at most that it was not a part of the ground upon which the Christ was commended to the first acceptance of faith. But though no direct allusion to the virgin birth occurs in Paul's writings the truth which gives spiritual value to the fact of the virgin conception, viz., God's new creation of humanity in Christ, is a vital and fundamental element in the faith both of St. Paul and of the whole early church. The Christian life is essentially a new creation (2 Cor 5 17; Gal 6 15; Rom 6 4) in Jesus Christ, the second Adam (Rom 5 12–21), who is from heaven (1 Cor 15 47). Into this spiritual context the facts recorded by Matthew and Luke introduce no alien or incompatible element (cf W. Richmond, The Creed in the Epistles of Paul; Orr, The Virgin Birth of Christ). And therefore the story of Christ's birth as we have it in the Synoptics finds a natural place in the creed of those who accept the Pauline idea of a new creation in Christ. See VIRGIN BIRTH.

It is beyond the scope of this art. to discuss the evidences of development in the main doctrines of the gospel, but however the later ages may have elaborated them, the leading tenets of the subsequent faith of the church—the doctrine of the Trinity; Our Lord's divinity and real humanity; His atoning death and resurrection; the doctrine of the Holy Spirit and of the catholicity and unity of the church—stand clear and distinct in these earliest Scriptural sources.

II. Historical Forms.—Faith implies a creed as a confession and testimony. Such a confession and testimony answers to a natural impulse of the soul. Hence a profession of faith is at once a personal, a social and a historical testimony. A formal creed witnesses to the universality of faith, binds believers together, and unites the successive ages of the church. It is the spontaneous expression of the life and experience of the Christian society. As the purpose of this art. is chiefly to indicate the Scriptural sources of the creeds rather than to discuss their origin and history, we can only briefly describe the main historical forms which have prevailed in the Christian church.

The Apostles' Creed, anciently called the Roman Creed, though popularly regarded as the earliest, was probably not the first in chronological order.

1. The Apostles' Creed
Its origin and growth are involved in considerable obscurity (see separate art., APOSTLES' CREED; and cf Heurtley, Harmonia Symbolica).

The Nicene Creed, called sometimes "the Creed of the 318" from the number of bishops reputed to have been present, was authorized at the Council of Nice in 325 AD, and completed by the Council of Constantinople in 381, when the clauses which follow the mention of the Holy Ghost were added.

2. The Nicene Creed
The opinions of Arius at the beginning of the 4th cent. created such unrest as to call forth not only the admonition of bishops but also the intervention of the emperor Constantine, who, as a professed Christian, had become the patron of the church. The efforts of the emperor, however, had no effect in allaying the dissensions of the church at Alexandria, which, upon the banishment of Arius, spread throughout eastern Christendom. It was decided, therefore, to convoke a general council of bishops in which the Catholic doctrine should be once and for all formally declared. This, the first œcumenical council, met at Nicaea in Bithynia in 325 AD. There is no detailed record of the proceedings. "We do not know whether it lasted weeks or days" (Stanley, Lects on East Ch.). Arius, being only a presbyter, had no seat in the conclave, but was allowed to express his opinions. His chief opponent was Athanasius.

The controversy turned upon the nature of the Son and His relation to the Father. The word homoiōsios ("of one substance with"), used in the course of the argument with a view of controverting the extreme orthodox position, became the battleground between the parties. The Arians violently condemned. The Sabellians or Semi-Arians to evade its full force contended for the term homoiōsios ("of like substance"). But the majority finally adopted the former expression as the term best suited to discriminate their view of the relation of the Father and Son from the Arian view. The assent of the emperor was gained and the words "being of one substance with the Father" were incorporated into the creed. The clauses descriptive of the Holy Spirit were added or confirmed at a later council (382), and were designed to refute the Macedonian heresy which denied His equality with the Father and Son, and reduced the Holy Spirit to a level with the angels.

The phrase "proceedeth from the Father and the Son" is also of historical importance. The last three words are a later addition to the creed by western churches, formally adopted by the Council of Toledo in 589. But when the matter was referred in the 9th cent. to Leo III he pronounced against them as unauthorized. This interpolation, known as the Filioque, marks the difference still between the Lat and Gr churches. From the 9th cent. no change has been made in the Nicene Creed. It has remained, without the Filioque clause, the œcumenical symbol of the Eastern Church; and with the addition of that word it has taken its place among the three great creeds of the Western Church.

The Athanasian Creed, or the Symbolum Quicunque, as it is called, from its opening words, differs entirely in its origin and history from those we have just considered. It is not a gradual growth like the Apostles' Creed, nor is it the outcome of synodical authority like the Nicene Creed. "When the composition appears for the first time as a document of authority it is cited in its completeness and as the work of the Father whose name it has since, in the most part, borne, although it was not brought to light for many cents. after his death" (Lumby, Hist of the Creeds). Without going into the full and intricate evidence which has been brought forward by scholars to prove that it is incorrectly attributed to Athanasius, it is sufficient to observe that both authorship and date are uncertain. Dr. Swainson proves in the most conclusive manner that the existence of this creed cannot be traced before the age of Charlemagne, and that its origin may probably be ascribed to the then existing demand for a more detailed exposition of the faith than was to be found in the Apostles' Creed. It is nowhere mentioned at synods before the end of the 8th cent., whose special business it was to discuss the very matters which were afterward embodied within it in such detail.

The question of imposture has been raised with regard to this creed, and it has been maintained by some that it was originally a forgery of the same nature as the "false decretals," and the equally famous "Donation of Constantine" (Swainson). But it may be said that the word "imposture" is incorrectly applied to "a natural and inevitable result of the working of the mind of the Western Church toward a more elaborate and detailed confession of its Trinitarian faith" (Tulloch, Enc Brii). The imposture, if there was any, consisted not in the origin of the creed but in the ascription of it to a name and a date with which it had no connection. This was done no doubt to secure for it credit and authority, and was supposed to be justified by its special doctrinal import.

This symbol, though too compendious and elaborate to serve the purposes of a creed, itself standing in need of exposition and explanation, has its value as representing a further stage of doctrinal development. If the Apostles' Creed determined the nature of God and the Nicene Creed defined the character and relation of the Son and the Holy Spirit, the Athanasian Creed may be regarded as establishing the great doctrine of the Trinity. Its distinguishing features are the monitory clauses and its uncompromising statement of the value of the Christian faith. The other creeds set forth the mercies of Revelation; this adds the danger of rejecting them. The others declare the faith; this insists also on its necessity. This, also, alone insists upon the necessity of good works (Yonge, An Exposition of the Apostles' Creed). The closing warning is based on Christ's own words: "Depart from me," etc (Mt 25 41, 46). If this creed is solemn in its admonitions, we must remember that so also are the Gospels. On the whole it is a comprehensive summary of truth, laying down the rule of faith as a foundation, following out its issues of good or evil. True belief is closely connected with right action.

With the adoption of the "Athanasian" symbol, the creed-making of the early and mediæval church ceases. Of the three mentioned one only in the broadest sense, the Nicene, is Catholic. Neither the Apostles' nor the Athanasian Creed is known to the Gr or oriental church which remained faithful to the faith settled by the holy Fathers at Nicaea. The two others adopted by the West are really gradual growths or consequences from it, without any definite parentage or synodical authority. But the faith as defined at Nicaea and ratified by subsequent councils is the only true Catholic symbol of the universal church.

With the Reformation a new era of creed-formation began. It will not, however, be necessary to do more than mention some of the confessions of the Reformed churches which consist mainly of elaborations of the original creeds with the addition of special arts, designed to emphasize and safeguard the distinctive doctrines and ecclesiastical positions of particular branches of the church. Of this nature are the Confessions of the Lutheran church—the Augsburg Confession of 1530; the Genevese or Calvinistic of 1549 consisting of 26 arts., defining particularly the nature of the Sacraments; confessions of the Dutch church confirmed at the Synod of Dort in 1619 and known as the "Decrees of Dort"; and the famous Heidelberg Catechism. To this series of Protestant confessions must be added the 39 Articles of the Church of England and the Westminster Confession of Faith, which is the doctrinal standard not only of the churches of Scotland, but of the principal Presbyterian churches of Britain and America.

CREEK, krēk, colloq. krik (κόλπος, kólpos [Acts 27 39], RV "bay"): The spot has been identified as the traditional Bay of St. Paul about 8 miles N.W. of the town of Valetta in the island of Malta. See MELITA.

CREEPING, krēp'ing, THING (רֶמֶשׁ, remes, רֶמֶץ, shereq; ἑρπετόν, herpetón): Remes and shereq, with the root vbs. rāmas and shāraq, are used without any sharp distinction for insects and other small creatures. Rāmas means clearly "to creep," and is used even of the beasts of the forest (Ps 104 20), while shāraç is rather "to swarm." But in at least one passage (Lev 11 44), we have the noun, shereç, with the vb. rāmas; "with any manner of creeping thing that moveth upon the earth." The principal passages where these words occur are the accounts of the Creation and the Flood and the references to unclean animals in Lev and in the vision of Peter. In the last we have the word herpeton as the Gr equivalent of the Heb words (Acts 10 12). Winged creeping things (shereç hā-ōph, Lev 11 20 ff), as well as the wingless, are unclean, but an exception is made in favor of the locusts, "which have legs above their feet, wherewith to leap upon the earth." See INSECTS; LOCUST.

CREMATION, krē-mā'shun (cf שָׂרַף, sārāph, Josh 7 15, etc, "shall be burnt with fire"; kalō, kalō, 1 Cor 13 3, "If I give my body to be burned," etc): Cremation, while the customary practice of the ancient Greeks, and not unknown among the Romans, was certainly not the ordinary mode of disposing of the dead among the Hebrews or other oriental peoples. Even among the Greeks, bodies were often buried without being burned (Thuc. i. 134.6; Plato Phaedo 115 E; Plut. Lyc. xxvii). Cicero thought that burial was the more ancient practice, though among the Romans both methods were in use in his day (De leg. ii.22.56). Lucian (De luctu xxi) expressly says that, while the Greeks burned their dead, the Persians buried them (see BURIAL, and cf 2 S 21 12-14). In the case supposed by Amos (6 10), when it is predicted that Jeh, in abhorrence of "the excellency of Jacob," shall "deliver up the city," and, "if there remain ten men in one house, that they shall die," and "a man's kinsman [ARV] shall take him up, even he that burneth him," etc, the suggestion seems to be that of pestilence with accompanying infection, and that this, or the special judgment of Jeh, is why burning is preferred. When Paul (1 Cor 13 3) speaks of giving his body to be burned, he is simply accommodating his language to the customs of Corinth. (But see Plutarch on Zarmanochegas, and C. Beard, The Universal Christ.)

How far religious, or sanitary, or practical reasons were influential in deciding between the different methods, it is impossible to say. That bodies were burned in times of pestilence in the Valley of Hinnom at Jerus is without support (see Ezk 39 11-16). The "very great burning" at the burial of Asa (2 Ch 16 14) is not a case of cremation, but of burning spices and furniture in the king's honor (cf Jer 34 5). Nor is 1 K 13 2 a case in point; it is simply a prophecy of a king who shall take the bones of men previously buried, and the priests of the high places that burn incense in false worship, and cause them to be burned on the defiled altar to further pollute it and render it abominable.

There is in the NT no instance of cremation, Jewish, heathen or Christian, and clearly the early Christians followed the Jewish practice of burying the dead (see Tert., Apol. xlii; Minuc. Felix, Octav., xxxix; Aug., De civ. Dei, i.12,13). Indeed, cremation has never been popular among Christians, owing largely, doubtless, to the natural influence of the example of the Jews, the indisputable fact that Christ was buried, the vivid hope of the resurrection and the more or less material views concerning it prevalent here and there at this time or that. While there is nothing anti-Christian in it, and much in sanitary considerations to call for it in an age of science, it is not likely that it will ever become the prevailing practice of Christendom.

CRESCENS, kres'enz (Κρησκῆς, Krēskēs, "increasing"): An assistant of Paul, mentioned in 2 Tim 4 10 as having gone to Galatia. That he was one of the Seventy, and that he founded the church in Vienna in Gaul, are traditions without any trustworthy basis.

CRESCENTS, kres'ents (שָׁהָרִים, sahārōnīm): Moon-shaped necklaces (Jgs 8 21.26; Isa 3 18).

CRETE, krēt (Κρήτη, Krēlē, ethnic Krētes, Krētes, Acts 2 11; Tit 1 12): An island bounding the Aegean Sea on the S. It stretches from 34° 50' to 35° 40' N. lat. and from 23° 30' to 26° 20' E. long. With Cythera on the N.W. and Carpathos and Rhodos on the N.E., it forms a continuous bridge between Greece and Asia Minor. The center of the island is formed by a mountain chain rising to a height of 8,193 ft. in Mt. Ida, and fringed with low valleys beside the coast. There are no considerable rivers; the largest, the Metropole, on the S., is a tiny stream, fordable anywhere. An island of considerable extent (156 miles long, and from 7 to 30 miles broad), in several districts very fertile and possessing one or two good harbors, it seems marked out by its position for an important rôle in the history of the eastern Mediterranean. But never since an age which was already legendary when Gr history began has Crete occupied a dominating position among the powers of the surrounding continents. Internal dissensions, due in ancient times to the diversity of races inhabiting its soil (Eteocretans—the original inhabitants—Pelasgians, Achaeans, Cydonians and Dorians), and in modern times to the fact that a large minority of the population has accepted the Ottoman religion along with Ottomano government, have kept Crete in a position of political inferiority throughout the historical period.

Mt. Ida in Crete was famous in Gr legend as the birthplace of Zeus. The half-legendary, half-historical King Minos was said to be the son of Zeus, and to have derived from his father the wisdom to which, by a type of myth common in Gr lands, the constitution of the Cretan cities was ascribed. Minos was accepted as a historical personage by Thucydides and Aristotle, who say that he was the first dynast in Greece to establish dominion on the sea. One of his exploits was the suppression of piracy in Cretan waters, a feat which had to be repeated by the Rom Pompeius at a later period. Aristotle compares the Cretan institutions with those of Sparta; the island was said to have been colonized by Dorians from Peloponnesus (Politics ii.10). The most important cities in Crete were Knossos (whose palace has been excavated with fruitful results by Mr. Arthur Evans), Gortyna, near the Gulf of Messara, and Cydonia, with its river Iardanus. The excavations of Mr. Evans at Knossos and of the Italians at Phaestos (near Fair Havens) prove that Crete was a center of Mediterranean civilization in an early age. In the Homeric poems, Crete is said to have contained an hundred cities; at that period the Cretans were still famed as daring sailors. In the classical age of Gr history they never held a leading position. They are mentioned chiefly as traders and mercenary soldiers, skilled esp. in archery. During the Hellenistic period Crete remained free. Demetrius Nicator made the island his base of operations before his defeat at Azotus in 148.

In 141, the Cretan Jews were influential enough to secure the patronage of Rome. They were being oppressed by the people of Gortyna, and appealed to Rome, which granted them protection. In strengthening the position of the Jews, the Romans were copying the Seleucid policy in Asia Minor; both the Seleucids and the Romans found the Jews among their most devoted supporters in their subject states. This interference of Rome in the interest of her future partisans paved the way for her annexation of the island in the following cent. From this date, there was a strong and prosperous body of Jews in Crete, and Cretans are mentioned among the strangers present at the Feast of Pentecost in Acts 2 11. Its alliance with Mithradates the Great, and the help it gave to the Cilician pirates gave Rome the pretext she desired for making war on Crete, and the island was annexed by Metellus in 67 BC. With Cyrene on the N. coast of Africa, it was formed into a Rom province. When Augustus divided the Empire between the Senate and himself, Crete and Cyrene were sufficiently peaceful to be given to the Senate.

They formed one province till the time of Constantine, who made Crete a separate province.

The Saracens annexed Crete in 823 AD, but it was recaptured for the Byzantine Empire by Nicephorus Phokas in the following cent. From the 13th till the 17th cent. it was held by the Venetian Republic: from this period dates its modern name "Kandia," which the Venetians gave to the Saracen capital Khandax, and afterward to the whole island. After a desperate resistance, lasting from 1645 to 1669 AD, Crete fell into the hands of the Turks, who still exercise a nominal suzerainty over the island.

In 1 S 30 14; Ezk 25 16, and Zeph 2 5, the Philis are described as Cherethites, which is usually taken to mean Cretans. The name is connected with Capthor and the OT Capthorim (Dt 2 23; Jer 47 4; Am 9 7). The similarity between the river-names Jordan and Iardanos (Homer Odyssey iii. 292) "about whose streams the Kydones dwelt," has suggested that Capthor is to be identified with Cydonia; or possibly it was the name of the whole island. Tacitus believed in an ancient connection between Crete and Pal; the Jews, he said, were fugitives from Crete, and derived their name Iudaei from Mt. Ida (Hist. v.2). Crete is mentioned in connection with the campaign of Demetrius Nicator, referred to above, in 1 Macc 10 67. See CAPHTOR; CHERETHITES.

Crete owes its connection with Pauline history to the accident of a gale which forced the ship carrying Paul to Rome to take shelter on the S. coast of the island. In the harbor of Myra, on the coast of Lycia, the centurion in charge of Paul transferred him from the Adramyttian ship which had brought them from Caesarea, to a ship from Alexandria in Egypt, bound for Ostia with a cargo of grain. The fact that the centurion was in virtual command of the ship (Acts 27 11) proves that it was one of the vessels in the imperial transport service. Leaving Myra they came opposite Cnidus with difficulty, against a head-wind. The ordinary course from Cnidus in good weather was to steer straight for Cythera, but on this occasion the W. or N.W. winds made this route impracticable, and they sailed under the lee of Crete, whose S. coast would shelter them from a N.W. gale, and afford occasional protection from a W. gale. They passed Salmone, the N.E. corner of Crete, with difficulty, and worked round the coast to Fair Havens, a harbor somewhat to the E. of Cape Matala. The great Feast fell while they were at Fair Havens; in 59 AD it was on October 5, in the middle of the season when the equinoxes made sailing impossible. Paul advised the centurion to winter in Fair Havens, but the captain wished to reach Phoenix, a harbor farther to the W., where ships from Egypt were accustomed to put in during the stormy season. It was decided to follow the captain's advice; but on its way to Phoenix the ship was struck by a N.E. wind called Euragilo, which rushed down from Mt. Ida. The ship was carried out to sea; it managed to run under the lee of Cauda, an island 23 miles W. of Cape Matala, where the crew hauled in the boat, undergirded the ship, and slackened sail. On the fourteenth night they were driven on the coast of Malta, and wrecked.

The narrative does not state that Paul landed in Crete, but as the ship lay for some time at Fair Havens (Acts 27 8.9) he had plenty of opportunity to land, but not to travel inland. The centurion gave him permission to land at Sidon. Paul left Titus in Crete (Tit 1 5); tradition made the latter its first bishop, and patron saint.

Cretans were present, as noted above, at the Feast of Pentecost (Acts 2 11). Paul's estimate of the Cretan character (Tit 1 10-16) was the one current in antiquity. Paul quotes (1 12) a well-known line of the Cretan poet Epimenides (who lived about 600 BC) on the mendacity of the Cretans. The sentiment was repeated by Callimachus (Hymn to Zeus 8). Other ancient witnesses to the detestation in which the Cretan character was held are Livy xlv.45, and Plutarch Aemilius § 23.

CRIB (אָבִיר, 'ēbhūs): "Crib" translates the Heb word 'ēbhūs exactly, as it denotes "a barred receptacle for fodder used in cowsheds and foldyards; also in fields, for beasts lying out in the winter." The Heb is from a word meaning to feed (אָבַח, 'ābhaš), and is used in the precise sense of the Eng. word in Job 39 9 of the "crib" of the wild ox, in Prov 14 4, "Where no oxen are, the crib is clean," and in Isa 1 3, "The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib."

CRICKET, krik'et (חֲרָגֹל, ḥargōl): This occurs in Lev 11 22 (AV "beetle"), and doubtless refers to some kind of locust or grasshopper. See BEETLE; LOCUST; INSECT.

CRIER, kri'ēr (קָרָא, kāra'; cf βωῶν, boōō):

(1) Neither is this exact word found in EV, nor a word exactly corresponding to it in the Heb Bible, but the character it stands for appears as "one who cries aloud," i.e., proclaims mandates or gives public messages. In Prov 1 21 it is said, "She [Wisdom] crieth in the chief place of concourse." John the Baptist calls himself "the voice of one crying in the wilderness" (Jn 1 23)—like a herald going before the king.

(2) In the East today every village even has its public crier, selected for his loud or penetrating voice, and appointed to give notice of the fresh orders or mandates of the mudir ("governor") or other authorities. The muezzin of the Moslems, who at the five appointed times of prayer mounts the minaret and calls the faithful to prayer, is another striking example. Something like the ancient "heralds" of the king were the "heralds" of the Middle Ages in Europe who, preceded by trumpeters, made official proclamations.

CRIME, krīm, CRIMES, krīmz: This term is used in Eng. as the equivalent of the Heb מִשְׁפָּט, mishpāt, "judgment," "verdict" (Ezk 7 23); זִמְמָה, zimmāh, "a heinous crime" (Job 31 11); אָשָׁם, 'āshām="a fault," "sin" (Gen 26 10, EV "guiltiness"); and Gr αἰτία, aitia, "case," "cause" (Acts 25 27, RV "charges"). In AV Jn 18 38; 19 4,6, the rendition is "fault."

ἔγκλημα, éngklēma, "indictment," "charge" (Acts 25 16 AV) is changed in RV to "matter." A crime is a transgression against the public right; serious offence against the law; a base weakness or iniquity, all of which are regarded by the Bible as offences against (1) God, or (2) man, or (3) both. An injury to the creature is regarded as obnoxious to the Creator. Specific forms of crime are the following:

Adultery.—See separate art.

Assassination.—This term does not occur in the EV, but, of course, is included in the more general "to kill," or "to slay" (הָרַג, hārāgh="to smite with deadly intent," "destroy," "kill," "murder," "put to death"). The law distinguished between unpremeditated and premeditated slaying, pronouncing a curse upon the latter (Dt 27 25). David expresses the deepest abhorrence of such an act (2 S 4 9-12). Instances are found recorded in Jgs 3 15-22; 2 S 3 27; 4 5-7; 13 28,29; 20 9,10; 2 K 12 20; 19 37; Isa 37 38. See also separate art.

Bestiality.—According to Webster: "unnatural connection with a beast." This form of vice was treated by the Mosaic law as something exceedingly loathsome and abhorrent, calling for extreme language in its description and rigorous measures in its punishment. Both the beast and the guilty human were to be put to death (Ex 22 19; Lev 18 23; 20 15,16; Dt 27 21), in order, as the Talm says, to obliterate all memory of the crime.

Blasphemy.—See separate art.

Breach of Covenant (פָּרַר אֶת-הַבְּרִית, pārār 'et ha-b'rith).—According to Poucher (HDB, art. "Crimes"), this term included: (1) failure to observe the Day of Atonement (Lev 23 29); work on that day (Lev 23 28); (2) sacrifice of children to Molech (Lev 20 3); (3) neglect of circumcision (Gen 17 14; Ex 4 26); (4) unauthorized manufacture of the holy oil (Ex 30 33); (5) anointing an alien therewith (Ex 30 33); (6) neglect of the Passover (Nu 9 13). Note also the following: Gen 17 14; Lev 26 15-44; Dt 29 25; 31 16,20. Paul (Rom 1 31) speaks of ἀσύνθετοι, asynthetoi="covenant-breakers."

Breach of Ritual.—A term not found in the Scriptures, but designed to cover a number of acts prohibited by the ceremonial law. They have been exhaustively enumerated by Poucher (HDB, art. "Crimes"): (1) eating blood, whether of fowl or beast (Lev 7 27; 17 14); (2) eating fat of the beast of sacrifice (Lev 7 25); (3) eating leavened bread during the Passover (Ex 12 15,19); (4) failure to bring an offering when an animal is slaughtered for food (Lev 17 4); (5) offering sacrifice while the worshipper is under the ban of uncleanness (Lev 7 20,21; 22 3,4,9); (6) making holy ointment for private use (Ex 30 32,33); (7) using the same for perfume (Ex 30 38); (8) neglect of purification in general (Nu 19 13,20); (9) slaughtering an animal for food away from the door of the tabernacle (Lev 17 4,9); even the alien must comply, so that the introduction of worship at other places might be avoided; (10) touching holy things illegally (Nu 4 16,20 RV "the sanctuary"). The punishment for the non-observance of these prohibitions was the "cutting off" from the transgressor's people (נִקְרָא מִקְרֶבֶת, nikhrath mik'rebēh="cut off from among," i.e. excommunicated).

Breach of Trust.—See TRUST, BREACH OF.

Bribery.—See separate art.

Burglary.—This term does not occur. The corresponding act is defined as "thievery accompanied by breaking," and it places the offender beyond protection from violence (Ex 22 2). The crime might be committed in various degrees, and to burglarize the "devoted things" was punishable by death (Josh 7 25), as was also man-stealing (Ex 21 16; Dt 24 7).

Debt.—See separate art.

Deception.—See separate art.

Disobedience.—See separate art.

Divination.—See separate art.

Drunkenness.—See separate art.

Evil Speaking (Slander).—See Speaking Evil.

Falsehood.—Occurs as the rendition of מַדְלַל, ma'al="treachery," "sin," "trespass" (Job 21 34); and of שָׁקֶר, sheker="a sham," "deceit," "lying" (2 S 18 13; Ps 7 14; 119 118; 144 8,11; Isa 28 15; 57 4; 59 13; Jer 10 14; 13 25; Hos 7 1; Mic 2 11). In every case wilful perversion of the truth or preference for the untruth is at least pre-supposed, hence falsehood always marks an evil disposition, enmity against truth, and hence against God; consequently is criminal in the fullest sense.

False Swearing.—"Swearing to a lie or falsehood" (שָׁקֶר, sheker) is mentioned in Lev 6 3,5; 19 12; Jer 5 2; 7 9; Hos 10 4; Zec 5 4. From these passages and their context, it appears that this crime was considered in the twofold sense of a wrong against (1) the neighbor, and (2) against God, for the oath was an appeal to God as a witness to the truthfulness of the statement; hence to swear falsely was to represent God as supporting a false statement.

Fornication.—Heb, זָנָה, zānāh="to commit adultery," esp. of the female, and less frequently of mere fornication, seldom of involuntary ravishment; also used figuratively in the sense of idolatry, the Jewish people being regarded as the spouse of Jeh (2 Ch 21 11; Isa 23 17; Ezk 16 26). Once we find the derivative noun זִנְיֹוֹת, zānūth (Ezk 16 29). In the NT, with both the literal and the figurative application, we find πορνεία, porneia, and πορνεύω, porneūō (Mt 5 32; 15 19; Jn 8 41; Acts 15 20; 1 Cor 5 1; 6 13,18; 7 2; 10 8; 2 Cor 12 21; Gal 5 19; Eph 5 3; Col 3 5; 1 Thess 4 3; Rev 2 14,20,21; 9 21; 14 8; 17 2,4). The intensive ἐκπορνεύω, ekporneūō="to be utterly unchaste" is found in Jude ver 7. Every form of unchastity is included in the term "fornication."

Forswear.—Found only in Mt 5 33 in the sense of committing perjury (ἐπιρκέω, epiorkéō).

Harlotry.—The avocational or at least habitual, notorious practice of unchastity. In most instances the ordinary term for unchaste living, זָנָה, zānāh, is employed (Gen 34 31; 38 15,24; Lev 21 14; Josh 2 1 [Rahab]; Jgs 11 1; 16 1; 1 K 3 16; Prov 7 10; 29 3; Jer 5 7; Am 7 17). For the publicly known woman of the street and the professional devotee in the pagan temple-worship, the term קְדֻשָּׁה, kedheshāh, was employed (Gen 38 21,22 AV; Hos 4 14). The Gr πόρνη, pornē, occurs in Mt 21 31 f; Lk 15 30; 1 Cor 6 15,16; He 11 31; Jas 2 25). Figurative: Often used metaphorically of idolatry or any defection from the Divine covenant, and applied particularly to Jerus (Isa 1 21); the Jewish nation (Jer 2 20; 3 1,6 ff; often in Ezk 16 and 23; Mic 1 7); Israel (Hos 4 15); Nineveh (Nah 3 4); Tyre, with reference to the various arts employed to renew her commerce (Isa 23 16) and to her restored traffic (ver 17); and to anti-Christian "Babylon" (Rev 17 5,15; 19 2). See also Fornication.

Homicide="manslayer" (רָצַח, rāṣāh, "to dash in pieces," "to kill," "to murder"; Gr ἀνδροφόνος, androphónos, with the same meaning); Mentioned in Nu 35 6.12; 1 Tim 1 9. The Heb law distinguished between the premeditated and the unpremeditated slaying. See separate art.

Idolatry.—See separate art.

Ill-treatment of Parents (Ex 21 15.17; Lev 20 9; Dt 21 18 ff).—See below.

Injuries to the Person (Ex 21 18 ff; Lev 24 19 f; Dt 25 11).

Irreverence.—Lack of respect for God or His natural representatives, the parents or governmental officers. See also Parents, Crimes against; Blasphemy.

Incest.—Designated in Heb by זִמְמָה, zimmāh, "vice," "wickedness," "refined immorality" (Lev 18 17; 20 14); also "unnatural vice," תִּבְהֵל, tebhel, the same word that is used to designate the unnatural commingling with beasts. Amnon's deed is designated as חֶסֶדֶה, hesedh, indicating the degradation of the tenderness natural between brothers and sisters into a tenderness of an immoral character (2 S 13). The crime of sexual relation of persons within the degrees of relationship forbidden by the Levitical law, as for instance, that of Lot's daughters with their father (Gen 19 33); the son with his father's concubines, as for instance, Reuben (Gen 35 22), and Absalom (2 S 16 22; cf 1 Cor 5 1); that of the father-in-law with his daughter-in-law (Gen 38 15 ff; cf Ezk 22 11); of the brother with the sister or half-sister, as for instance, Amnon (2 S 13 14); of the brother-in-law with the sister-in-law (Mt 14 3); with the wife's mother, or the wife's daughter while living in apparent marriage with the mother (Lev 20 14; 18 17). Illicit relation with the brother's widow is designated (Lev 20 21) as a disgraceful deed, lit. "uncleanness" (excepting the levirate marriage). Such acts were forbidden on the ground that the Jews were to avoid the evil practices of the Canaanites and the Egyptians in regard to marriage within the specified limits, because this would naturally result in breaking down the sanctity of the bonds connecting near relatives, and in throwing open the flood gates of immorality among them. It is the Divine plan that the unions based on mutual choice and love, mingled with carnality, shall become clarified more and more into the purer love of close consanguineal relations; not vice versa. Then, too, such provisions would secure higher results in training and in the production of mentally and physically healthy children, the balancing and evening up of contrasts of Nature, and the production of new and improved types. The principle on which the prohibitions are imposed seems to be this: Marriage is forbidden between any person and a direct ancestor or a direct descendant or any close relative, such as brother or sister of either himself or any of his ancestors or any of his immediate descendants.

Infanticide.—This crime, in the form in which it has been and is prevalent among barbarous nations, seems to have been quite foreign to the minds of the Hebrews, for they had too lofty a conception of the value of human life, and children were considered a blessing; their absence in the home, a curse (cf Ex 1 17.21; Ps 127, 128). For this reason, there appeared to be no reason to prohibit it by law, excepting as the Israelites might be influenced to sacrifice their children to Molech when following the religious customs of the Canaanites. See MOLECH.

Kidnapping (Man-Stealing).—ἀνδραποδιότης, andrapodistēs = "man-stealer," "slave-dealer" (1 Tim 1 10). This was a mortal offence; but it seems that it, like some other forms of iniquity, was unknown to the Hebrews, excepting as they came in contact with it through their intercourse with other nations, such as the Romans and the Greeks, whose mythology frequently alludes to such acts.

Lying, Malice, Manslaughter, Murder, Oath.—See separate arts.

Parents, Crimes against.—The law enjoined upon the infant all the reverence toward his parents, esp. the father, that he could bestow on a merely human being. The reason for this lay in the fact that the heads of families were expected to transmit the Divine law to their household, and thus to stand in the place of God. That the mother was to share this reverence practically on equal terms with the father is shown by the fact that each is mentioned separately whenever obedience and reverence are enjoined upon the child (Dt 5 16). As the specific crime against Jeh consisted in blasphemy and open rebellion against the law, so the crime against parents consisted in deliberate disobedience and stubbornness (Dt 21 18). And here again both the father and the mother are directed to lay hands upon him and bring him unto the elders for punishment. How greatly such conduct was held in horror is seen in many of the Proverbs, esp. 30 17. It would be hard to specify all the acts which, in view of the above, would be considered crimes against the parents, but it is evident that everything which would lower their dignity and influence or violate their sense of just recognition must be carefully avoided, as witness the curse visited upon Ham (Gen 9 20-27).

Perjury.—See False Swearing; Forswear above; also art. OATH.

Prophesying, False.—By reason of his position as the recognized mouthpiece of Jeh, the prophet's word was weighty in influence; hence to prophesy falsely was equivalent to practicing fraud publicly. Jeremiah described the condition as "wonderful and horrible," which made such things possible (5 30.31). See also Jer 23 32; 29 8.9; Ezk 21 23; Zec 10 2; Mt 7 15; 24 11.24; Mk 13 22; Lk 6 26; Acts 13 6 (Bar-Jesus); 2 Pet 2 1; 1 Jn 4 1; Rev 16 13; 19 20; 20 10. See also separate art.

Prostitution.—Heb and Christian morality never condoned this practice, though the Bible recognizes its existence as a fact even among God's people. The Heb father was forbidden (Lev 19 29) to give his daughter over to a life of shame (לִלְוָה, hālāl, "to profane a person, place or thing," "to pollute"). See also Fornication, Harlotry, and Whoredom below.

Rape.—חָזַק, hāzak = "to seize," "bind," "restrain," "conquer," "force," "ravish." The punishment for this crime was greater when the act was committed against a betrothed woman (Dt 22 25-29). See also Seduction.

Removing Landmarks (Dt 19 14). See LANDMARKS.

Reviling (Ex 22 28). See Irreverence above and art. REVILE.

Robbery.—גָּזַל, gāzal = "to pluck off," "strip," "rob," "take away by force or violence"; forbidden in the law and frequently referred to as despicable (Lev 19 13; 26 22; 1 S 23 1; Prov 22 22; Isa 10 2.13; 17 14; Ezk 33 15; 39 10; Mal 3 8.9).

Sabbath-Breaking.—As the Heb Sabbath was regarded as a day of rest, all acts absolutely unnecessary were considered a violation, a "breaking" of the Sabbath, which appears sufficiently from the commandment (Ex 20 8-11); and the head of the household was held responsible for the keeping of this commandment on the part of all sojourners under his roof.

No other law gave the sophistical legalists of later Judaism so much opportunity for hair-splitting distinctions as did this. In answer to the question what labors were forbidden, they mentioned 39 specific forms of work, and then proceeded to define what constituted each particular form. But as even these definitions would not cover all possible questions, special precepts were invented. In order that one might not be caught in the midst of unfinished labors, when the Sabbath began (at sunset), certain forms of work must not be undertaken on Friday. Thus it was forbidden to fry meat, onions or eggs, if there was not sufficient time for them to be fully cooked before evening. No bread, no cakes, must be put into the oven, if there was not sufficient time remaining for their surface to brown before night. See SABBATH.

Seduction.—לָחַץ, tā'ah, "to dissemble," "seduce," and לָאָה, lā'ah, with the same meaning; ἀποπλανᾶω, apoplanāō, "to lead astray"; πλανᾶω, planāō, "to go astray," "deceive," "err," "seduce"; and γόης, gōēs, "a wizard," "an impostor," "seducer." In all the passages in which the idea of seduction is expressed in the Eng. the term is used not in the modern sense of a trespass against a woman's person, but in the more general and figurative sense of leading into sin generally (2 K 21 9; Prov 12 26 AV; Isa 19 13 AV; Ezk 13 10; Mk 13 22 AV; 2 Tim 3 13 AV; 1 Jn 2 26 AV; Rev 2 20). However, the modern Eng. idea of the word is expressed in the law found in Ex 22 16-17.

Slander.—See separate art.

Sodomy.—See Unnatural Vice.

Speaking Evil.—"to bring an evil [רָעָה, rā'ah] name upon" (Dt 19 15; 1 K 22 23; Ps 34 13; 41 5; 50 19; 109 20; 140 11; Prov 15 28; 16 30). Evil speaking is considered a crime because it is simply the expression of the evil intents of the heart. This is brought out more clearly in the NT (Mt 7 17-18; 12 34-35; Mk 9 39; Lk 6 45). As such, evil speaking (βλασφημία, blasphēmía) is represented as entirely unworthy a Christian character (Eph 4 31; 1 Pet 4 4, 14; 2 Pet 2 2; 10, 12; Jas 4 11; Jude ver 10); and καταλάlew, katalalēō="babble against," "gossip." It will be noticed from the above that evil speaking against those in authority is designated with the same word ("blasphemy") as railery against God, they being considered God's representatives on earth. See also EVIL SPEAKING; SLANDER.

Stealing.—Heb גָּנַב, gānabh="to thief" (lit. or fig.); by implication, "to deceive," "carry away," "secretly bring," "steal away" (Gen 44 8; Ex 20 15; 21 16; 22 1; Prov 6 30; Zec 5 3; Gen 31 20. 26 f; 2 S 15 6; 19 3; Job 27 20; Prov 9 17 ["Stolen waters are sweet"; the forbidden is attractive; cf Rom 7 7]). Gr κλέπτω, kléptō="to filch," "steal" (Mt 6 19-20; 19 18; Jn 10 10; Rom 2 21; 13 9; Eph 4 28). See Theft.

Suicide.—No special law is found against this crime, for it is included in the prohibition against killing. Contrary to the practice and the philosophy of paganism, the act was held in deep abhorrence by the Hebrews because of the high value placed on human life. It was held inexcusable that any but the most degraded and satanic should lay hands on their own lives. Only the remorse of the damned could drive one to it, as witness Saul (1 S 31 4) and Judas (Mt 27 5).

Theft.—Heb גָּנַב, genēbhāh "stealing" (concrete), "something stolen," "theft" (Ex 22 3, 4); mentioned in connection with other wickedness (κλοπή, klopē) in Mt 15 19; Mk 7 21; and (κλέμμα, klēmma) in Rev 9 21. All three words are used abstractly for the act and concretely for the thing stolen. See THIEF.

Uncastity.—No other form of sin is mentioned with disapproval and threats more frequently than the various forms of carnal vice, for no other sin is more natural or widespread. See CHASTITY; LEWDNESS; MARRIAGE.

Unnatural Vice (Sodomy).—Alluded to with delicacy, but positively condemned as an abomination (Gen 13 13; 19 5, 7; Lev 18 22; 20 13). It was the specific form of wickedness through which Sodom became notorious, so that "sodomite" is the regular tr of קָדֵשׁ, kādhēsh, "a [quasi] sacred person," i.e. (technically) "a [male or female] devotee to licentious idolatry" (Dt 23 17; 1 K 14 24; 15 12; 22 46; 2 K 23 7; Job 36 14m). Though permitted and even encouraged in heathen cult, it was never to be tolerated in the worship of Jeh.

Usury.—See separate art.

Witnessing, False.—The Heb idiom is שָׁקַר, śēqar, "to lie," "to tell a falsehood," "to lie" (Ex 20 16; Dt 19 16, 18; Prov 6 19; 14 5, 25; 19 5, 9); Gr ψευδομαρτυρέω, pseudomartureō, "to bring false testimony"; -μαρτυρία, -marturia, "bearing of false testimony" (Mk 10 19; 14 56, 57). It goes without saying that the law was emphatic in its denunciation of this practice, and in order that the innocent might be protected against the lying accuser, a criminal was to be convicted only on the testimony of at least two or three witnesses, testifying to the same facts (Nu 35 30). If one be found testifying falsely, he was to be punished by suffering the penalty which would have been inflicted on him against whom he testified, had he been convicted (Dt 19 16-19).

Whoredom.—Heb זָנָה, zānāh="to commit adultery," "fornication or illicit incontinence of any kind"; and its derivative זָנִיחַ, zānūth="fornication," "harlotry," "whoredom"; Gr πορνεία, porneia (vb.), and πορνεία, porneia (noun), of the same meaning. The following passages will reveal the estimate in which such uncleanness was held, and the fact that men and women given to it were held in equal abhorrence and designated by the same terms: Gen 38 24; Lev 19 29; Nu 14 33; 25 1; Ezk 16; 23 3, 7, 8, 11, 27, 29, 43; 43 7, 9; Hos 1 2; 2 4; 4 11, 12; 6 10; Nah 3 4; Mt 5 32; Rom 1 26 f; 1 Cor 5 1; 7 2; 10 8; Jude ver 7; Rev 2 14, 20 f; 18 9; 19 2.

Figurative. Because of the infidelity to the life-mate and to right living involved in such acts, the practice became symbolical of infidelity to God and His law, and thus served as a frequent figure of speech for Israel's error and apostasy. See HARLOT.

FRANK E. HIRSCH

CRIMSON, krīm'z'n. See COLORS.

CRIPPLE, krīp'l (χωλός, chōlós): Only occurs in Acts 14 8, denoting the congenitally lame man at Lystra. In AV (1611) the word is spelled "creep." It originally meant one whose body is bent together as in the attitude of creeping. This was probably a case of infantile paralysis.

CRISPING, krīs'ping, PINS: Pins for crimping, or curling, the hair. Thus the AV renders Heb חֲרִיטִים, hārīṭīm (Isa 3 22; cf Vulg). RV substitutes more correctly "satchels" (so Kimhi [cf 2 K 5 23]; cf Arab.). Others think of girdles; still others of veils or head-bands.

CRISPUS, krīs'pus (Κρίσπος, Krispos, "curled"): One of the small number baptized by Paul among the Corinthian Christians (1 Cor 1 14). He had been ruler of the Jewish synagogue, but he "believed in the Lord with all his house"; and, following Paul, withdrew from the synagogue (Acts 18 7, 8). He seems to have been succeeded by Sosthenes (ver 17). According to tradition he became bishop of Aegina.

LITERATURE

So much has been said and written in recent years on "Criticism" that it is desirable that the reader should have an exact idea of what criticism is, of the methods it employs, and of the results it reaches, or believes itself to have reached, in its application to Scripture. Such a survey will show the legitimacy and indispensableness of a truly scientific criticism, at the same time that it warns against the hasty acceptance of speculative and hypothetical constructions. Criticism is more than a description of phenomena; it implies a process of sifting, testing, proving, sometimes with the result of establishing, often with that of modifying or reversing, traditional opinions. Criticism goes wrong when used recklessly, or under the influence of some dominant theory or prepossession. A chief cause of error in its application to the record of a supernatural revelation is the assumption that nothing supernatural can happen. This is the vitiating element in much of the newer criticism, both of the OT and of the NT.

I. Divisions.—Criticism of Scripture ("Bib. criticism") is usually divided into what is called "lower or textual criticism" and "higher criticism"—the latter a phrase round which many misleading associations gather.

1. Lower or Textual Criticism "Lower criticism" deals strictly with the text of Scripture, endeavoring to ascertain what the real text of each book was as it came from the hands of its author; "higher criticism" concerns itself with the resultant problems of age, authorship, sources, simple or composite character, historical worth, relation to period of origin, etc. The former—"textual criticism"—has a well-defined field in which it is possible to apply exact canons of judgment: the latter—"higher criticism"—while invaluable as an aid in the domain of Bib. introduction (date, authorship, genuineness, contents, destination, etc), manifestly tends to widen out illimitably into regions where exact science cannot follow it, where, often, the critic's imagination is his only law.

It was only gradually that these two branches of criticism became differentiated. "Textual criticism" for long took the lead, in association with a sober form of Bib. "introduction." The relations now tend to be reversed. "Higher criticism," having largely absorbed "introduction" into itself, extends its operations into the textual field, endeavoring to get behind the text of the existing sources, and to show how this "grew" from simpler beginnings to what it now is. Here, also, there is wide opening for arbitrariness. It would be wrong, however, to deny the legitimate place of "higher criticism," or belittle the great services it is capable of rendering, because of the abuses to which it is frequently liable.

It is now necessary that these two forms of criticism should be looked at more particularly.

II. Lower or Textual Criticism.—We take first lower or textual criticism. There has never been a time when criticism of Scripture—lower

1. Origin of the Science and higher—has been altogether absent. The Jews applied a certain criticism to their sacred writings, alike in the selection of the books, and in the settlement of the text. Examples are seen in the marginal notes to the Heb Scriptures (K<sup>re</sup> and K<sup>thibh</sup>). The Fathers of the early church compared MSS of the NT books, noting their differences, and judging of the books themselves. The Reformers, it is well known, did not accept blindly the judgments of antiquity, but availed themselves of the best light which the new learning afforded. The materials at the disposal of scholars in that age, however, were scanty, and such as existed were not used with much thoroughness or critical discernment. As aids multiplied with progress of discovery, comparison of MSS and VSS one with another and with patristic quotations, revealed manifold divergencies and it became apparent that, in both OT and NT, the text in current use in the church was far from perfect. "Various readings" accumulated. Not a few of these, indeed, were obvious blunders; many had little or no support in the more ancient authorities; for others, again, authority was fairly equally divided. Some were interpolations which had no right to be in the text at all. How, in these circumstances, was the true text to be ascertained? The work was one of great delicacy, and could only be accomplished by the most painstaking induction of facts, and the strictest application of sound methods. Thus arose a science of textual criticism, which, ramifying in many directions, has attained vast dimensions, and yielded an immense body of secure knowledge in its special department.

The materials with which textual criticism works (apparatus criticus) are, as just said, chiefly MSS, VSS (translations into other tongues),

2. Methods Employed quotations and allusions in patristic writings, with lectionaries (church service-books), and similar aids. The first step is the collection and collation of the material, to which fresh discovery is constantly adding; the noting of its peculiarities, and testing of its age and value; the grouping and designation of it for reference. A next important task is the complete collection of the "various readings" and other diversities of text (omissions, interpolations, etc), brought to light through comparison of the material, and the endeavor to assign these to their respective causes.

3. Causes of Error More frequently than not errors in MSS are unintentional, and the causes giving rise to them are sufficiently obvious. Such are the carelessness of scribes, lapses of memory, similarity of sounds (in dictation), or in shape of letters (in copying), wrong dividing of words, omission of a line or clause owing to successive lines or clauses ending with the same word. Intentional changes, again, arise from insertion in the text of marginal notes or glosses, from motives of harmonizing, from the substitution of smoother for harsher or more abrupt expressions—more rarely, from dogmatic reasons.

Mistakes of the above kinds can generally be detected by careful scrutiny of sources, but a large number of cases remain in which the correct reading is still doubtful. These, next, have to be dealt with by the impartial weighing and

4. Weighing balancing of authorities; a task involving new and delicate inquiries, and the application of fresh rules. It does not suffice to reckon numbers; MSS and VSS have themselves to be tested as respects reliability and value. Through the presence of peculiarities pointing to a common origin MSS come to be grouped into classes and families, and their individual testimony is correspondingly discounted. Older authorities, naturally, are preferred to younger but the possibility has to be reckoned with that a later MS may preserve a reading which the older MSS have lost. Such rules obtain as that, of two readings, preference is to be given to the more difficult, as less likely to be the result of corruption. But even this has its limits, for a reading may be difficult even to the point of unintelligibility, yet may arise from a simple blunder. As a last resort, in cases of perplexity, conjectural emendation may be admitted; only, however, as yielding probability, not certainty.

In the application of these principles an important distinction has to be made between the OT and the NT, arising from the relative paucity of material for critical purposes in the one case, and the abundance in the other. The subject is treated here generally; for details see arts. on LANGUAGE OF THE OT; LANGUAGE OF THE NT; TEXT AND MSS OF THE NT.

(1) In the OT, textual criticism labors under the peculiar disadvantage that, with one minute exception (a papyrus fragment of the 2d cent., giving a version of the Decalogue), all known Heb MSS are late (the oldest not going beyond the 9th cent. AD); further, that the MSS seem all to be based on one single archetype, selected by the rabbis at an early date, and thereafter adhered to by copyists with scrupulous care (cf G. A. Smith, OTJC, 69 ff; Driver, Text of Sam, xxxvii ff; Strack, however, dissents). The variations which these MSS present, accordingly, are slight and unimportant. For a knowledge of the state of the text prior to the adoption of this standard, criticism is dependent on comparison with the VSS—esp. the SEPTUAGINT (q.v.), with the SAM PENT (q.v.), and with passages in the OT itself (e.g. in S, K, Ch). Frequent obscurities in the Heb text, with undeniable discrepancies in names and numbers, show that before the fixing of the text extensive corruption had already entered. A simple instance of mistake is in Isa 9 3, where the AV reads: "Thou hast multiplied the nation, and not increased the joy." The context shows that the "not" is out of place: the RV therefore rightly reads (with the Heb K<sup>r</sup>e: the sounds are similar), "thou hast increased their joy." In the LXX the divergences are often very great in order, arrangement, and readings; there are extensive interpolations and omissions (in Jer, Graf reckons that 2,700 words of the Massoretic text are omitted); evidences, where the alterations are not of design, that the Heb MSS employed by the translators often differed widely from those approved in Pal. The Sam recension likewise exhibits considerable differences.

It does not follow that, where difference exists, these rival texts are to be preferred to the Massoretic. Few, since the exhaustive examination of Gesenius, would affirm the superiority of the Sam to the Heb; even in regard to the LXX the trend of opinion seems increasingly in favor of the text of the Massoretic (cf Skinner, "Genesis," ICC, xxxv-xxxvi). There is no need, however, to maintain the general superiority of the above texts to the Massoretic to be convinced that, in many instances, the LXX, in some cases, probably, even the Sam, has retained readings from which the MT has departed. OT criticism has, therefore, a clear field for its labors, and there can be little doubt that, in its cautious application, it has reached many sound results. Less reliance can be placed on the conjectural criticism now so largely in vogue. Dr. G. A. Smith has justly animadverted on the new textual criticism of the poetical and prophetic books, "through which it drives like a great ploughshare, turning up the whole surface, and menacing not only the minor landmarks, but, in the case of the prophets, the main outlines of the field as well" (Quarterly Rev., January, 1907). This, however, trenches on the domain of the higher criticism.

(2) In the NT the materials of criticism are vastly more abundant than in the OT; but, with the abundance, while a much larger area of certainty is attainable, more intricate and difficult problems also arise. The wealth of MSS of the whole or parts of the Gr NT far exceeds that existing for any other ancient writings (Nestle mentions 3,829: 127 uncials and 3,702 cursives: Intro to the Textual Criticism of the Gr NT, ET, 34-35, 81); the MSS of VSS (excluding the Vulg, reckoned by thousands), are likewise very numerous.

(a) MSS and VSS: Gr MSS are usually divided into uncials and cursives (or minuscules) from the character of the writing; the oldest uncials go back to the 4th and 5th cents. The five chief, that alone need be named, are the Codex Sinaiticus (S, 4th cent.), the Codex Vaticanus (B, 4th cent.), the Codex Alexandrinus (A, 5th cent.), the Codex Ephraemi (C, 5th cent.), the Codex Bezae (D, Gospels and Acts, Gr and Lat, 6th cent.). These MSS again are grouped according to affinities (Bengel, Griesbach, Lachmann, are here chief precursors; Westcott and Hort, chief modern authority), S and B going together as representing one type of text, in the opinion of WH the best (the so-called "Neutral"); D representing a "Western" text, with marked peculiarities; A and C exhibiting mixed texts. The VSS, in turn, Syr, Old Lat, Egyp (originating with 2d and 3d cents.), present interesting problems in their relations to one another and to the Gr MSS S, B, and D. With the Syr VSS (Sinaitic, Curetonian, Peshitta), Tatian's Diatessaron, or Harmony of the Gospels, ought to be mentioned. Formerly the Pesh was taken to be the oldest Syr VS (2d cent.); now, esp. since the discovery of the Lewis (Sinaitic) palimpsest, it tends to be regarded as a later revision of the older Syr texts (probably by Rabula of Edessa, beginning of the 5th cent.). The old Lat, also the old Syr, MSS show marked affinities with the text of D—the "Western" type.

(b) The Western text: The question chiefly exercising scholars at the present time is, accordingly, the relation of the WH text based on S and B to the Western text represented by D, but now finding early support from the Old Lat and Syr, as well as from quotations in the 2d and 3d Fathers. The Western text is discounted by WH for its paraphrastic character, and "astonishing freedom" in changing, inserting and omitting (WH, 122 ff); yet, on internal grounds, certain important omissions in this text of the last three chs of Lk are accepted by these authorities as representing the purer text, the rejected readings being termed "non-Western interpolations." A newer school, however, is disposed to accept the Western readings, as, to a much larger extent than was formerly supposed, the more original; while some writers, as Blass, Nestle, in part Zahn (cf Nestle, op. cit., 324 ff), seek a solution of the difference of texts in the theory of two editions (Blass, Lk and Acts; Zahn, Acts alone). This theory has not met with much acceptance, and the problems of the Western text must still be regarded as unsolved. The question is not, indeed, vital, as no important doctrine of the NT is affected; but it touches the genuineness of several passages to which high value is attached. E.g. the words at the Supper, "which is given for you," etc (Lk 22 19.20, not in D), are excluded by WH as a non-Western interpolation; while the passage on the angel and the bloody sweat (Lk 22 43.44 in both  $\aleph$  and D), and the first word on the cross, "Father, forgive them," etc (Lk 23 34, in  $\aleph$ , omitted by D and Sin Syr), are rejected as Western interpolations. The RV retains these passages with marginal note.

(c) Results: As respects results, it may be said generally that the labors of a long line of scholars have given us a NT text on which, in nearly all essential respects, we can safely rely. Others, it is to be owned, take a less sanguine view (cf Nestle, op. cit., 227 ff). The correct reading seems undeniably settled in a large majority of cases. The RV embodies most of the assured results; doubtful cases are noted in the margin. Among passages long known to be interpolations, now altogether removed, is that on the three witnesses in 1 Jn 5 8. The two longest passages noted as not belonging to the original text are the last 12 vs of Mk (16 9-20), and the story of the woman taken in adultery (Jn 7 53-8 11).

III. Higher Criticism.—The scope of the higher criticism has already been indicated. Many of the inquiries it undertakes were formerly covered by what was called Bib. introduction; the flight of the newer science, however, is bolder, and the problems it seeks to solve are more complicated and far-reaching. An important part of its work is the analysis of books, with the view of determining their component parts (e.g. the J,E,P,D, of the Pent), the age, origin, and characteristics of each, their connection with external conditions and the state of belief and life of the time. The nature of its task will be better understood from a rapid survey of its procedure.

Higher criticism began, mainly, with the OT. Already in the 2d cent., Gnostics assailed the OT as the work of an inferior deity (the 1. The OT Demiurge), and heretical Ebionites (Clementine Recognitions and Homilies) declared it to be corrupted with false prophecy. In the 17th cent. Spinoza prepared the way in his Tractatus (1670) for future rationalistic attacks.

(1) Astruc and successors.—The beginning of higher criticism in the stricter sense is commonly associated with the French physician Astruc, who, in his Conjectures, in 1753, drew attention to the fact that, in some sections of Gen, the Divine name employed is "Elohim" (God), in others, "Jehovah." This he accounted for by the use of distinct documents by Moses in the composition of the book. Eichhorn (1779), to whom the name "higher criticism" is due, supplemented Astruc's theory by the correct observation that this distinction in the use of the names was accompanied by other literary peculiarities. It soon became further evident that, though the distinction in the names mostly ceased after the revelation of Jeh to Moses (Ex 3 6), the literary peculiarities extended much farther than Gen, indeed till the end of Josh (Bleek, 1822; Ewald, 1831; Stähelin, 1835). Instead of a "Pentateuch," recognized as of composite authorship, there was now postulated a "Hexateuch" (see PENTATEUCH; HEXATEUCH). Meanwhile De Wette (1805-6), on grounds of style and contents, had claimed for Dt an origin not earlier than the reign of Josiah. "Fragmentary" theories, like Vater's, which contributed little to the general development, may be left unnoticed. A conservative school, headed by Hengstenberg (1831) and Hävernick (1837), contested these conclusions of the critics, and contended for the unity and Mosaic authorship of the Pent. Bolder spirits, as Vatke (1835), anticipated the conclusions of the newer critical school in declaring that the Levitical laws were latest of all in origin. Their voices were as yet unheeded.

(2) Hupfeld.—A distinct advance on preceding theories was made by Hupfeld (1853; in part anticipated by Ilgen, 1789). Hitherto the prevailing assumption had been that there was one fundamental document—the so-called Elohist, dated usually in the age of the Judges, or the time of Saul or David—and that the Jehovistic parts were "supplementary" to this (not a separate document). It was the merit of Hupfeld to perceive that not a few of the sections in the "Elohist" document did not bear the usual literary marks of that writing, but closely resembled the "Jehovistic" sections in everything but the use of the Divine name. These portions he singled out and erected into a document by themselves (though they bear no signs of being such), while the Jehovistic parts were relieved of their "supplementary" character, and regarded as belonging to a distinct document also. There were thus now 3 documents, attributed to as many authors—the original Elohist, the 2d or Younger Elohist and the Jehovist. Dt, as a distinct book, was added to these, making 4 documents in all.

(3) Graf and Wellhausen.—Thus matters stood till the appearance of Graf's work, The Historical Books of the OT, in 1866, through which something like a revolution in the critical outlook was effected. Following in the track of Vatke, earlier, Reuss, of Strassburg, had taken up the idea that the Levitical legislation could not, as was commonly presumed, be earlier than Dt, but was, on the contrary, later—in fact, a product of the age of the exile. Graf adopted and developed this theory. He still for a time, while putting the laws late, maintained an earlier date for the Elohist narratives. He was soon led, however, to see that laws and history must go together; so the whole Elohist writing was removed from its former place, and brought down bodily to the end of the religious development. Graf, at the same time, did not regard it as an independent document. At first the theory was scouted, but gradually, through the able advocacy of Kuenen and Wellhausen—esp. the latter—it secured ascendancy, and is now regarded as the critical view par excellence. Order and nomenclature of the assumed documents were now changed. The Elohist, instead of standing first, was put last under the designation P or PC (Priestly Code). Wellhausen's symbol for this writing was Q. Its date was taken to be post-exilic. The Jehovist becomes J; the Elohist E. These are placed in the 9th or 8th cents. BC (cir 850-750), but are supposed to have been combined a cent. or so later (JE). Dt, identified with the law-book found in the temple in the reign of Josiah (2 K 22), is thought to have been written shortly before that time. The order is therefore no longer 1st Elohist-Jehovist and 2d Elohist-Dt, but J and E-Dt-P. The whole, it is held, was finally united into the great law-book (Pent) brought by Ezra to Jerus from Babylon (458 BC; Ezr 7 6-10), and read by him before the people 14 years later (444 BC; Neh 8).

(4) Literary and historical grounds of theory.—A sketch like the above gives, of course, no proper idea of the grounds on which, apart from the distinction in the Divine names, the critical theory just described is based. The grounds are partly literary—the discrimination of documents, e.g. resting on differences of style and conception, duplicates, etc (see PENTATEUCH)—but partly also historical, in accordance with the critic's conception of the development of religion and institutions in Israel. A main reliance is placed on the fact that the history, with its many sanctuaries up to the time of Dt, is in conflict with the law of that book, which recognizes only one sanctuary as legitimate (ch 12), and equally with the PC, which throughout assumes this centralizing law. The laws of Dt and PC, therefore, cannot be early. The prophets, it is held, knew nothing of a Levitical legislation, and refused to regard the sacrificial system as Divine (Jer 7 22 ff).

(5) The code under which older Israel lived was that formulated in the Book of the Covenant (Ex 20-23), which permitted many altars (Ex 20 24 f). The law of Dt was the product of a centralizing movement on the part of the prophets, issuing in the reformation of Josiah. The PC was the work of fertile brains and pens of post-exilic priests and scribes, incorporating older usage, devising new laws, and throwing the whole into the fictitious form of Mosaic wilderness legislation.

(6) Effects on history, etc.—The revolution wrought by these newer constructions, however, is not adequately realized till regard is had to their effects on the picture given in the OT itself of Israel's history, religion and literature. It is not too much to say that this picture is nearly completely subverted. By the leaders of the school (Graf, Kuenen, Wellhausen, Duhm, Stade, etc) the supernatural element in the history and religion is totally eliminated; even by those who do not go so far, little is left standing. The history of the Pent—indeed the history down to the time of the kings—is largely given up. Gen is legend, Ex hardly more trustworthy, Josh a romance. The histories of Samuel and David are "written up" by a theocratic narrator. None of the laws—even the Decalogue—are allowed to be certainly Mosaic. Monotheism is believed to have come in with Amos and Hosea; earlier, Jeh was a "tribal" God. Ark, tabernacle, priesthood, feasts, as depicted in the PC, are post-exilic fiction. The treatment accorded to the Pent necessarily reacts on the other historical books; the prophetic lit. suffers in an almost equal degree through disintegration and mutilation. It is not Isaiah alone—where the question has long been mooted of the post-exilic origin of chs 40-66 (see ISAIAS); the critical knife is applied with scarcely less freedom to the remaining prophetic books. Few, if any, of the psalms are allowed to be pre-exilic. Dnl is a work of the Maccabean age.

(7) General results.—As a general summary of the results of the movement, which it is thought "the future is not likely to reverse," the following may be quoted from Professor A. S. Peake: "The analysis of the Pent into four main documents, the identification of the law on which Josiah's reformation was based with some form of the Deuteronomic Code, the compilation of that code in the reign of Manasseh at the earliest, the fixing of the Priestly Code to a date later than Ezekiel, the highly composite character of some parts of the prophetic lit., esp. the Book of Isa, the post-exilic origin of most of the Pss, and large parts of the Book of Prov, the composition of Job not earlier than the exile and probably later, the Maccabean date of Dnl, and the slightly earlier date of Eccl" ("Present Movement of Biblical Science," in Manchester, Inaugural Lects, 32).

(8) Criticism of theory.—The criticism of this elaborate theory belongs to the arts, which deal with the several points involved, and is not here attempted at length (cf the present writer's POT). The gains that have accrued from it on the literary side in a more exact and scholarly knowledge of the phenomena to be explained (e.g. distinction in the Divine names; distinction of P element in the Pent from that known as JE) are not to be questioned; on the historical and religious sides also much has been done to quicken interest, enlarge knowledge and correct older ideas which have proved untenable—in general, to place the whole facts of the OT in a clearer and more assured light. On the other hand, much even in the literary criticism is subjective, arbitrary and conjectural, while the main hypothesis of the posteriority of the Levitical law to Ezekiel, with the general view taken of the historical and religious development in Israel, is open to the most serious exception. The OT has its own account to give of the origin of its religion in the monotheism of Abraham, the covenants with the patriarchs, the legislation through Moses, which is not thus readily to be set aside in the interests of a theory resting largely on naturalistic presuppositions (see BIBLE). There is not a word in the history in Neh 8 to suggest that the law introduced by Ezra was a new one; it was received without demur by a deeply divided community as the ancient law of Moses. So with the law of Dt in the time of Josiah (2 K 22). Its genuineness was doubted by no one. The position of the theory, generally, is by no means so secure as many of its adherents suppose. Internally, it is being pushed to extremes which tend to discredit it to sober minds, and otherwise is undergoing extensive modifications. Documents are multiplied, dates lowered, authors are converted into "schools." Archaeologists, in large majority, declare against it. The facts they adduce tend to confirm the history in parts where it had been most impugned. The new Bab school in Germany (that of Winckler) assails it in its foundations. Recently, the successor of Kuenen in Leyden, Professor B. D. Eerdmans, formerly a supporter, has broken with the theory in its entirety, and subjects the documentary hypothesis to a damaging criticism. It is too early yet to forecast results, but the opinion may be hazarded that, as in the case of the Tübingen NT critical school in last cent. referred to below, the prevailing critical theory of the OT will experience fundamental alteration in a direction nearer to older ideas, though it is too much to expect that traditional views will ever be resuscitated in their completeness.

Higher criticism of the NT may be said to begin, in a Deistic spirit, with Reimarus (Fragments, published by Lessing, 1778), and, on 2. The NT Hegelian lines, with Strauss (Life of Jesus, 1835). In the interests of his mythical theory, Strauss subjected every part of the gospel history to a destructive criticism.

(1) The school of Baur.—In a more systematic way, F. Baur (1826-60), founder of the famous Tübingen school, likewise proceeding from Hegel, applied a drastic criticism to all the documents of the NT. Strauss started with the Gospels. Baur sought firmer ground in the phenomena of the Apostolic Age. The key to Baur's theory lies in the alleged existence of Pauline and Petrine parties in the early church, in conflict with one another. The true state of matters is mirrored, he holds, not in the Book of Acts, a composition of the 2d cent., written to gloze over the differences between the original apostles and Paul, but in the four contemporary and undoubtedly genuine epistles of Paul, Gal, 1 and 2 Cor, and Rom, and in the Book of Rev. In these documents the church is seen rent by a schism that threatened its very existence. By and by attempts were made at conciliation, the stages of which are reflected in the Gospels and remaining writings of the NT. The Fourth Gospel, about 170 AD, brings up the rear. This theory, which found influential support in the scholarship of the time (Schwegler, Zeller, etc.), could not stand the test of impartial investigation, and is now on all sides discredited. Professor Bacon, in a recent work, pronounces its theory of the Johannine writings to be "as obsolete as the Ptolemaic geography" (Fourth Gospel, 20). Its influence on later criticism has, however, been considerable.

(2) Synoptic criticism.—Meanwhile more sober scholarship was concerning itself with the intricate problem of the relations of the Synoptic Gospels. The problem is a very real one (see GOSPELS). The three gospels of Mt, Mk and Lk are seen in inspection to exhibit an amount of agreement in subject-matter, order, often in language, which cannot be accounted for except on the theory of some common source. Suppose the Gospels divided into sections, in 52 of these the narratives coincide, 12 more are common to Mt and Mk, 5 to Mk and Lk, and 14 to Mt and Lk, while 5 are peculiar to Mt, 2 to Mk and 9 to Lk. The verbal agreement is greater in the recital of the words of others, particularly of words of Jesus, than in the narrative portions.

How is this to be explained? Three forms of theory were early propounded—the oral, the documentary, and the hypothesis of dependence of one gospel upon another. Of these theories, the oldest is the 3d (Augustine already held that Mk was an abridgment of Mt and Lk), and to it, in combination with the 2d, though in reversed order (Mk being put first), it will be seen below that criticism has largely reverted. The oral theory, proposed by Gieseler (1818), has, till recently, been the favorite one in England (Westcott, Alford, etc., with Godet, Pressensé, Ebrard, etc., on the Continent). In its resemblances in the three Gospels are explained by an oral tradition assumed to have attained a relatively fixed form while the apostles were yet teaching together in Jerus. The documentary theory took its origin with Eichhorn (1794), but in the hands of Marsh (1801), finally in Eichhorn's own (1804), received so elaborate a development as completely to discredit it. The dependence theory, in turn, went through every possible shape. Gradually, with sifting, certain combinations were eliminated (those which put Lk first, or Mt last, or made Mk a middle term), till only two remained—Mt, Lk, Mk (Griesbach 1789-90, Baur, etc.), and Mk, Mt, Lk (Weisse, 1838, Wilke, 1838, etc.). The prestige of the Baur school obtained a temporary ascendancy for the former view—that which put Mk last; this, however, has now quite given way in favor of Mk's priority. There remained a division of opinion as to whether the Mk employed by the other evangelists was the canonical Mk (Weisse, Meyer, B. Weiss, etc.), or an ur-Markus (Holtzmann, Reuss, etc.), but the difficulties of the latter hypothesis proved so insurmountable that Holtzmann finally gave it up.

It is obvious, however, that the use of Mk by the other evangelists, even if granted, does not yet completely solve the synoptical problem. There is still to be considered that large mass of matter—chiefly discourses—common to Mt and Lk, not to speak of the material peculiar to Lk itself. For the explanation of these sections it becomes necessary to postulate a second source, usually identified with the much-canvassed Logia of Papias, and designated by recent scholars (Wellhausen, etc.) Q. It is regarded as a collection of discourses, possibly by Matthew, with or without an admixture of narrative matter (B. Weiss, etc.). This yields the "two-source" theory at present prevailing in synoptical criticism (for a different view, cf Zahn's Introduction). Mt and Lk, on this view, are not independent Gospels, but are drawn up on the basis of (1) Mk and (2) Q=the Logia, with original material on the part of Luke (see GOSPELS). A theory which commands the assent of so many scholars has necessarily great weight. It cannot, however, be regarded as finally established. Many grave difficulties remain; there is, besides, a prima facie improbability in a Gospel like Mark's being treated in the manner supposed or included among the "attempts" which Luke's own Gospel was designed to supersede (Lk 1 1-4; cf Wright, St. Luke's Gospel in Gr, xiv, xv).

With criticism of the sources of the Gospels there goes, of course, the question of authorship. A powerful vindication of the Lucan authorship of the 3d Gospel and the Book of Acts has recently come from the pen of Professor A. Harnack, who maintains that in this, as in most other points regarding early Christian lit., "tradition is right" (cf his Luke, the Physician, ET). Outside the Synoptics, the burning question still is the authorship of the Johannine writings. Here also, however, the extreme positions of the Baur school are entirely given up ("It is perfectly apparent," says Professor Bacon, "that Baur mistook the period of dissemination for that of origin," op. cit., 21), and powerful defences of Johannine authorship have of late appeared (notably Sanday's Criticism of the Fourth Gospel, and ex-Principal Drummond's Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel). See GOSPEL OF JOHN.

(3) Modern "historical-critical" school.—On the other hand, a new and intensely aggressive radical school has recently come to the front, the so-called "historical-critical," which treats the text and history of the Gospels generally with a recklessness to which no limits can be put. It is even doubted if Jesus claimed to be the Messiah (Wrede). Sayings are accepted, rejected, or mutilated at pleasure. The latest phase of this school is the "Apocalyptic," which finds the essence of Christ's message in His insistence on the approaching end of the world (cf Schweitzer, Von Reimarus zu Wrede; ET The Quest of the Historical Jesus). These excesses may be depended on to cure themselves.

(4) Remaining writings of the NT.—For the rest of the writings on the NT, the trend of criticism has been in the main in a conservative direction. One by one the Pauline Epistles have been given back to the apostle—doubt chiefly still resting in certain minds on the Pastorals. The Book of Rev is restored by most to the age of Domitian, where tradition places it. Its relation to the Fourth Gospel and to St. John is still in dispute, and some moderns would see in it a groundwork of Jewish apocalypse. These and kindred questions are discussed in the arts. devoted to them.

LITERATURE

I. Preliminary.—In Jer 7 22.23 we read: "For I spake not unto your fathers, nor commanded them in the day that I brought them out of the land of Egypt, concerning burnt-offerings or sacrifices: but this thing I commanded them, saying, Hearken unto my voice, and I will be your God, and ye shall be my people." It is the contention of the present art. that this statement of the prophet is correct (cf II, 5).

More specifically, it is contended that evidence can be produced from the OT to show that Israel's religion can be seen in a long period of growth; and in this growth a fixed sacrificial law, with a minutely regulated ritual obligatory on all Israelites, the culmination and not the beginning of the process. It is contended, moreover, that this conception of the development of the institutional side of the religion of the OT is attained by the strictest evaluation of all the OT evidence and by no a priori considerations.

To be sure, one is met at once in the OT by what seem to be complete denials of this point of view.

2. Historical Perspective—In the Pentateuch we find statement after statement that a given law was due not to some late author but to Moses himself, and there are numerous passages in the historical books (most notably in Ch) that speak of these laws as in effect from the earliest times. Such evidence must be paid all possible respect and must be overruled only on the most imperative considerations.

However, if for the moment the books of the OT be viewed only as historical documents, it will be admitted that the possibility of overruling such evidence may well arise. And it may very well arise without calling in question in the slightest degree the good faith of the writers of questioned passages; for an acquisition of historical perspective comes very late in intellectual evolution, particularly—though not only—in the realm of religious history. Even the trained scholar has to be on his guard lest he read back the concepts of his own time into some past generation, while the non-specialist never succeeds in avoiding this error completely. For the uncultured mind, especially for the Oriental, the problem scarcely exists. That which is generally accepted and which is not obviously novel tends to be classified as that which "always has been." A law so old that its actual source is forgotten is referred as a matter of course to some great lawgiver of the past. A custom that in a writer's own day is universally observed by the pious must always have been observed by the pious. Even documentary evidence to the contrary is not convincing to such a writer, for that documents may be wrong is not a modern discovery. To be sure, the older document may be copied mechanically or the discrepancy may not even be noticed. But it is never surprising when we find a writer simply accrediting the pious men of old with the customs of his own day, since even documentary evidence to the contrary he felt could not be right. This is not forgery, as we understand the word, nor need there be the faintest moral reproach connected with such conduct. Quite on the contrary, such a writer may well be acting in the only sense that the conscience of any man of his generation could conceive right.

However, the OT is not a mere collection of human documents, and another question arises. Does the acceptance of inspiration compel us to assume that in every case a writer's ordinary historical methods were entirely overruled? The question is a rather broad one and does not relate merely

3. Inspira- to the correct transmission of historic facts. To be asked, rather, is this: Did God present to His instruments a mechanically accurate set of past facts which would give a conception of history that no one of the sacred writer's generation could understand? Or did He suffer His revelation to find expression in terms of the current conceptions of history, much as we are accustomed to say it found expression in terms of the current conceptions of science? A full discussion of the various theological arguments involved would be quite outside the province of an art. of this Encyclopaedia, but reference must be made to two important Bib. arguments: (1) In a question which thus affects the amount covered by the inspiration of the Bible, quotations from the Bible itself beg the question when adduced to show entire infallibility. So appeals to the NT are hardly helpful. Moreover, they prove too much. In Jude vs 14.15 there is a quotation from the Book of En (1 9), which is made in the most formal manner possible. But will anyone maintain that this compels us to believe that our Book of En was actually written by Enoch, the seventh from Adam? Yet if the quotation had been taken from an OT work, precisely this would have been maintained. (2) Far more important is the use of the OT by Christ, for here a quite different authority comes in. But the question must be asked: Just how far did Our Lord's use of a passage involve ratification of all the current ideas about that passage? A good answer is supplied by Acts 1 6.7. When He is asked, "Dost thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?" we know that the pedantically "correct" answer would have been, "The kingdom never will be restored to Israel in any such sense as ye conceive of it." Yet this is precisely what Christ does not say. "It is not for you to know times or seasons." No hint was given at all that the kingdom was universal, for the disciples would find that out for themselves in good time. In order that they should be able to do God's work there was no need to bewilder them with a truth as yet altogether revolutionary. And any close student of the "Kingdom of God" passages soon realizes how often Christ uses current terminology without comment, even when it seems almost materialistic. A literal exegesis of Lk 22 18 would necessitate believing that grapes will grow in the world to come and that Christ will drink wine made from them, and almost certainly the disciples gathered just this idea from the words. But no one today finds them in the least a difficulty. The exact extent of the kingdom and the exact nature of the happiness in it were irrelevant to what the disciples had to do. And so it cannot be thought an injustice to treat Christ's use of the OT by exactly the same rules, all the more as nowhere, not even in Mk 12 36, does the argument turn on the original human author or the date of writing. What Christ Himself, in His inner consciousness, knew on the subject is something beyond our immediate data. But His use of the OT lends no support to a Kenotic theory, not even on the wildest OT critical hypotheses. See KENOSIS.

II. The Legislation.—As is well known, among the laws of the Pentateuch there exist several well-marked groups, of which the most

1. Groups formal is Dt 12-26. Another such group is Lev 17-26 or the Holiness Code (H), and still another is Ex 20 22-23 19 or the Covenant Code (CC). With this last is closely connected the Decalogue and the little compend Ex 34 17-26. Now it will be convenient for present purposes to designate the remaining mass of Pentateuchal legislation under the non-committal symbol X.

In the first place, attention may be directed to CC as a whole. Whatever it was meant to be, it was not meant as a mere interim-prescriptions. One piece of evidence alone is enough to show the contrary: in the laws touching settlements of disputes it is presupposed that Moses himself is not accessible. And the life assumed is agricultural. Men are living in fields with settled boundaries (22 5.6). The vine and the olive are both under cultivation (22 5.29; 23 11), under such settled circumstances that the rest of the Sabbatical year can be observed. And of the feasts, Weeks and Tabernacles are connected with the harvests (23 16). Of course, Moses may very well have given commands that looked to the future, but the present contention is simply that it was the remote and not the immediate future that is in point on this assumption. The life is Canaan and not the wilderness. But, now, the life is very primitive life. Flocks are of great importance, as is shown by the proportion of space given to laws about them. Rulers are mentioned only in 22 28 (nāsī'), and judges, as settled officers, are not mentioned at all, for the very rare word in 21 22 (pālil, Dt 32 31; Job 31 11 only) should be tr'd "umpire." Indeed in 23 1-9 the duties of citizens, witness and judge are so intermingled as to suggest that judgment was administered by a general gathering of the people. It is taken for granted that a master has marital rights over his maidservants (21 7-11). Coined money is mentioned only in 21 32, if there. There is no attempt to define proportions exactly; cf 22 5 ("best of his own field") and 22 29 (the amount of the gift—a tenth?—not stated). Similarly there is no precise dating of the feasts of Weeks and Tabernacles in 23 16, while the exact day in Abib (ver 15) is at least not specified. Now, if this code could be isolated from the rest of the legislation, would not one refer it naturally on the above grounds alone to a time not very far either way from that of Saul?

Now, in what follows, the prescriptions of the various codes will be compared with each other in regard to the various institutions of Israel's religion and also studied in the wider evidence of the historical books. The evidence of Ch, however, will be omitted for the most part, as a separate section is devoted to it (III, 1).

(1) The firstling is to be with its dam seven days, but on the eighth (not later!) it is to be given to God. The offerings from the harvest and from the presses (wine and olives) are to be offered without delay (Ex 22 29.30). Consequently the place of offering must have been readily accessible. By what has been said above and by the mention of "presses" here, ready accessibility in Palestine is presupposed. But this implies a multiplicity of sanctuaries. And in Samuel-Kings this multiplicity of sanctuaries is exactly what is found. Samuel sacrifices in Mizpah (1 S 7 9), in Ramah (9 12 ff), in Gilgal (11 15) and in Bethlehem (16 5). David's family held a yearly sacrifice in Bethlehem, which David attended regularly (20 6). Solomon received a special revelation from God at Gibeon (1 K 3 4 ff—for the account in Ch see III, 1). Although the heart of Asa was perfect and the way of Jehoshaphat right, yet the many altars were suffered to remain (15 14; 22 43—again for Ch see III, 1). The destruction of the altars of God was to Elijah a terrible calamity (19 10). While Amos and Hosea abound in denunciations of sacrifices as substitutes for righteousness, yet they never even intimate a duty to offer sacrifices in some other place (Am 1 2; Hos 3 5 are irrelevant). Not even do Mic 4 2 and Isa 2 2 imply that Jerus was to have the sole right to the cultus.

(2) Ezekiel is the first prophet who makes the place of sacrifice a matter of paramount importance, and this importance of the place is, in the Pentateuch, emphasized primarily in Dt. It is needless to collect the familiar evidence from Dt, but an illuminating comparison with CC is given by the laws for firstlings. No longer is the firstling given on the eighth day. It must be kept, but not worked or shorn, until the time when "year by year" it may be eaten in the chosen place (Dt 15 19.20). So now the fruits of the field and the "presses" are not offered "without delay" but again "year by year," with a provision for turning them into money if the way be too long to the sanctuary (14 22-27). Dt and CC evidently have distinct conceptions—and again attention may be called to the fact that CC contains laws for Pal, not for the wilderness. H is as explicit as Dt—sacrifice anywhere except at the Tent is a capital offence (Lev 17 8.9). And the evidence of X need not be collected, but, passing out of the Pentateuch for the moment, Josh 22 10-34 represents Israel as understanding from the first entrance into Canaan that sacrifice at any altar but the one was the worst of crimes.

(3) How is the offering of sacrifices in various places by such men as Samuel to be explained? That the worship was disorganized and the proper sanctuary could not be reached is hardly an explanation. For no disorganization of the country could be great enough to justify the offering of sacrifices in places not only unauthorized but flatly forbidden in Lev 17 8.9. On the theory of Mosaic origin for the whole of the Pentateuchal legislation, Samuel knew as much about the clear statements of the Law as does any Jew of today, but it is clearly enough recognized by all Jews that no disorganization of the county or Divine reprobation of the Temple justifies sacrifice in any other place. A key, however, seems to be found in Dt 12 8-11, where sacrifice in various places is actually authorized until such a time as the land should be pacified and the Divine choice given to a place—a time represented in the history of Israel as about the time of David, or perhaps Solomon. This certainly does explain the situation as it is found in Samuel-Kings. Only, it is in flat contradiction with H and X.

This point is important. Dt 12 8-11 not only represents sacrifice in various places as permitted until some later time, but it represents Moses and the Israelites as practising the same things in the wilderness—"the things that we do here this day, every man whatsoever is right in his own eyes; for ye are not as yet come," etc; i.e. Dt's conception was that in the wilderness Moses and the Israelites offered sacrifice wherever they thought good. This was to continue until God gave them rest from their enemies round about. Then the sacrifices were to be brought to the chosen place and to be offered nowhere else. Now, the conception in H and X is wholly different. On the mount Moses received directions for the building of the Tabernacle, with its altar. From the beginning it was a capital offence to offer sacrifices on any other altar than this (Lev 17 8.9), which was carried everywhere on the wanderings and brought into Canaan. In the very days of Phinehas, the offering of sacrifices on a different altar was enough to make civil war justifiable (Josh 22 12). For further discussion see III, 2.

(4) The difficulties of these data are obvious but are completely satisfied by the assumption that different conceptions of past history are present. Dt belongs to a period when the unity of the sanctuary had become an established fact, but still before the memory of the many altars as comparatively legitimate was extinguished. H and X, however, belong to a considerably later day, when the unity of the sanctuary had been so long taken for granted that no pious Israelite could conceive that anything else had ever existed. The reference of the commands to Moses is altogether in oriental manner.

NOTE.—Ex 20 24 has not been used in the above argument, but with the evidence presented there seems to be no obstacle to the tr<sup>a</sup> of the EV. The familiar evidence of Jgs is of course merely cumulative.

Lev 1-7 contains a list of the various kinds of sacrifices: (a) the sin offering and the trespass offering, very elaborately treated
4. Kinds of and obviously of the highest importance; (b) the whole burnt offering and the peace offering; and, standing a little by itself, the meal offering. The latter is of no especial significance for the present discussion and may be neglected. Now a curious fact may be noted. In the prophetic writings before Ezk there is not one single reference to class (a). This is not simply the argument from silence, for sacrifices with their special names are mentioned freely and sacrificial rites described—invariably of class (b), even when presented for penitential purposes. If the offering is not burnt whole, the worshipper eats of it—it is a peace offering. Jer 7 21 is a particularly significant example, but cf Am 4 4,5; 5 22,25; Hos 8 13; 9 4; Isa 1 11; 22 12-14; 28 7,8; Jer 6 20. Turning to Samuel-Kings we find this borne out. The names of the sin and trespass offerings appear in 2 K 12 16, but it is money that is referred to (the EV should be checked with the Heb here), just as the golden mice appear as a trespass offering in 1 S 6 3 ff. And in the codes, neither CC nor Dt mentions class (a) and even in H they appear only in Lev 19 21,22; i.e. what in later times appear as the greatest sacrifices of Israel—by Lev 8 Israel's first sacrifice was a sin offering—are found only in X and are mentioned in the prophets for the first time in Ezk 40 39, while the other classes are mentioned frequently. It seems difficult to escape the inference that class (a) appeared relatively late in Israel's history, a point discussed more fully in IV.

The problem presented by Jer 7 22 is a very serious one. Obviously, to say that the command to offer sacrifice was not given on the day of the Exodus but on Sinai, is in General quite unsatisfactory, for this would make Jeremiah quibble. He denies categorically that a command to offer sacrifice was part of the Divine Law at all. Now, if it be noted that the offering of firstlings and first-fruits was altogether distinct from the regular sacrifices, it will be seen that Jer can very well presuppose CC or even Dt, both of which contain only regulative prescriptions for sacrifice. (Whether Jer actually did conceive CC and Dt as binding is another question.) But by what exegesis of the passage can Jer presuppose X? The natural inference is that the regulations of X became obligatory on Israel after Jeremiah's day.

What follows is in itself an infinitesimal matter but the evidence is significant. The prohibition of steps for the altar in Ex 20 26 is based on the fact that the ministrants were very scantily clad (cf the light clothing of pilgrims at Mecca). This is corroborated in 2 S 6 14,20-22, where Michal reproves David for exposing himself. But in X the priests wear rather elaborate vestments, over linen breeches (Ex 28 42). And, to call in Ch for the moment, this is the conception found there of David's religious zeal at the bringing in of the ark. Besides the ephod he wears a long linen robe and Michal despises him, not for exposing himself, but only for dancing (1 Ch 15 27-29).

(1) CC has no regulations regarding the priesthood, but of course it does not follow that this silence has any significance. However, Samuel-Kings furnish us with certain evidence. Samuel, and Levites although an Ephraimite (1 S 1 1), offers sacrifice repeatedly (see 3, above). In 2 S 20 25,26 the Hebrew says that Zadok was kōhēn unto David. Exactly the same word is used for Zadok and Ira in practically the same sentence, and no one without prior conceptions would have dreamed of giving it entirely distinct tr<sup>a</sup> under the circumstances, as do the AV and the RVV texts (not margins). Again in 2 S 8 18 it is said that David's sons were kōhānim and in 1 K 4 5 that Zabud was kōhēn. Now if kōhēn does not mean "priest" in these passages, they are the only cases out of a total of 750 occurrences. That the Chronicler understood the word to mean priest is shown by the fact that in his parallel to 2 S 8 18 (1 Ch 18 17) he uses a different word altogether. The natural inference from these passages is that the restriction of priestly ministration to a certain line came about after Solomon's time (cf Jgs 17 12,13, a Levite is desirable but not essential).

(2) In Dt the priesthood appears as limited to the sons of Levi, but it is at least safe to say that no explicit distinction is made within the tribe. In 21 5 the priests are the "sons of Levi," just as in 17 9; 18 1; 24 8 the term is "the priests the Levites." In 10 8 the right to bless and in 33 8-11 the right to offer incense and sacrifice are in no ways said to be restricted to a very small proportion of the tribe. Cf Jer 33 21,22 (here questions of authenticity are irrelevant). A clear distinction within the tribe of Levi appears in the prophetic writings for the first time in Ezk 44 10-31, where two kinds of Levites are spoken of, "the priests the Levites, the sons of Zadok" (ver 15) and the Levites, simply (ver 10). No third class is recognized (cf 40 45,46, where the distinction is between two classes of priests). Now, the distinction between the Zadokian and non-Zadokian Levites is based by Ezekiel on one thing only, in the past the former had been faithful and the latter had not (vs 10-15). Because the former had ministered before idols, therefore should they not come to execute the office of a priest, but perform only inferior ministrations. Now this can mean only that the non-Zadokians are excluded from priestly privileges that they once possessed. The non-Zadokians, if they had not sinned, would still have been legitimate priests in Ezekiel's eyes, for otherwise the exclusion from the altar would be eviscerated of all meaning as a punishment; i.e. Ezekiel knows of only two kinds of Levites, both kinds originally legitimate priests, but one class now to be forbidden access to the altar because of sin. A third class of Levite, non-Aaronites, who never had had access to the altar, but who, because of their righteousness, had been blessed with the privilege to perform minor ministerial acts, is conspicuous in Ezk by its absence. And this absence, in the face of the immense amount of minute detail contained in Ezk 40-48, can be explained on no other hypothesis than that Ezk did not know of such a class. When the immense importance of the non-Aaronite Levites in Ch, Ezr, etc. is thought of, what other explanation can be given for their omission in Ezk's elaborate regulations for the cultus? To whom did Ezk consider the more menial work in the Temple would have fallen if the non-Zadokians had not sinned? Probably he never raised the question at all, but there is no objection to supposing that he would have assigned it to the priesthood as a whole.

(3) It is needless to collect the evidence of X. The non-Aaronite Levites appear there as ministers of the greatest importance, elaborately set apart, and with their duties and privileges accurately defined (Nu 8, esp.). Now, it is submitted that this evidence points in its most natural interpretation to a gradual narrowing of the priestly privileges in Israel through a period of many cents. It is natural, though by no means necessary, to identify the non-Zadokians of Ezk with the non-Aaronites of X. At all events it is argued that in course of time, long after the priesthood had become restricted to Levites only, a considerable proportion of the latter lost their priestly privilege. Ezk stood near enough to the change (that he was the actual innovator is improbable) to state the fact of the degradation and its cause. X regarded the distinction as of such long standing that it must be accredited to Moses himself. It is highly probable that evidence of the change is to be found in Dt 18 6-8, but this will not be pressed here.

(1) In CC first-fruits are to be offered in Ex 23 19 and a portion (perhaps a tenth, but not specified as such) of the whole harvest in 22 29.
8. Dues Nothing is said about their disposition. In Dt, the first-fruits of grain, wine and oil (with fleece) belong to the "priests the Levites" (18 4). And the basket of "fruit" in the beautiful rite of 26 1-11 probably had the same destination. Of the general harvest the tithe is to be dedicated, as explained at length in 14 22-29. The worshipper is to eat it himself, but shall take care to see that the Levite receives a portion. Every third year, however, the tithe is to be spent for the benefit of all who need charity, including the Levite. Note that in either case the Levite receives only a part of the tithe. In X the first-fruits are again assigned to the clergy (but now specifically to the priests—Nu 18 12.13). But it appears that the tithe is to be given wholly to the Levites in Nu 18 21-24. The contradiction with Dt 14 22-29 is real. That two tithes were to be paid by the worshipper may safely be assumed as impossible, as a tax of one-fifth would have been unendurable. (It may be noted, though, that in later days the very pious took this interpretation—cf Tob 1 7—but it is certain that no such ruling ever maintained generally.) An alternative explanation offered is that it could be assumed that the Levite would invite the worshipper to join in a feast on the tithe. Frankly, it is difficult to treat this as quite candid. In Dt the worshipper is anything rather than a mere guest at another man's banquet. When the tithe has been brought as money, the worshipper is to spend it on anything that best pleases him, and of the Levite it is said only "thou shalt not forsake him." Moreover, the tithe is to be consumed at the sanctuary and nowhere else (Dt 14 23; cf 12 11). In Nu 18, however, the tithe becomes the exclusive property of the Levite and it is assigned him as his source of income (vs 25-32) and so exclusively is it his that it in turn is tithed. And, far from being turned into a feast at which the worshipper shares, it need not be consumed at the sanctuary at all but may be eaten in "every place," wherever the Levite and his family may happen to live (ver 31). It would be hard to conceive of two rules more mutually exclusive than the tithe directions in Dt and Nu. That the livelihood provided for the Levite in Dt is pitiful is hardly in point and at all events he received more than did the widow and the orphan. But of IV.

(2) Firstlings in CC must be offered on the eighth day (Ex 22 30), but in Dt 15 19-22 they were preserved, without being worked or shorn, until "year by year" they could be taken up to the sanctuary. (Apparently by 14 23-25 it might be converted into money in case of great distance.) Here the worshipper was to offer it and eat of it (a peace offering). But in Nu 18 15-18 the firstling becomes the personal property of the priest and he receives the flesh of the animal, if it can be sacrificed (i.e. it is his peace offering, not the worshipper's). There is no question of giving back a portion to the worshipper, again. Note, moreover, that in Dt 15 21-23, an animal not fit for sacrifice was eaten at home by the worshipper and so did not come in contact with the priest at all; contrast Nu 18 15.

(3) A minor matter is found in the portion of the peace offering that went to the priest. In Dt 18 3 it is specified as the shoulder, two cheeks and maw. In X (Ex 29 26-28, etc) this has become the breast and the right thigh—a considerably more advantageous portion.

(4) In Dt it is laid down that a Levite has no inheritance among his brethren (10 9; 12 12; 18 1) and hence is recommended as an object of charity, like the widow and the orphan. And, like the widow and the orphan, he lives "within thy gates" (12 12, etc), i.e. in the same cities as the rest of the Israelites. Now in X the adjurations to charity disappear, because he receives a fixed income (from the tithe), but it is said that this tithe is given the Levites in lieu of an inheritance, "Among the children of Israel they shall have no inheritance"

(Nu 18 21-24). In another part of X, however, there is still a different conception—the Levites receive no less than forty-eight cities with ample "suburbs," expressly said to be given them "from the inheritance" of Israel (Nu 35 1-8). So in Lev 25 32-34 the houses of the Levites are "their possession among the children of Israel," and the fields "their perpetual possession" and inalienable. Is there any natural explanation of these passages except that they represent increasing efforts to provide properly for the Levites as time went on? That the different rules represent advances within Moses' own period cannot be taken seriously, esp. as on this hypothesis the Dt laws would have been the latest. See, in addition, III.

(1) CC and Dt have little mention of coined money and little attempt to define fractions exactly. Contrast the elaborate regulations of, e.g. Lev 27.

9. Miscellaneous It is not contended that the Israelites could not have had enough culture in Moses' day to calculate so accurately, but attention must be drawn to the extreme contrast.

(2) In CC (Ex 23 16) the year begins in the fall, in H (Lev 23 5) and X (Ex 12 2; Nu 9 5; 28 16) it begins in the spring.

(3) Dt (16 3) explains the use of unleavened bread at the Passover as due to the haste with which the Israelites left Egypt (as in Ex 12 39), while Ex 12 15-20 makes this use depend on the positive command of God before the first-born were slain. And note that, in Ex 12, vs 18-20 are a simple repetition of vs 15-17 with a more precise dating added. For this matter of dating compare the rough statements of CC with the exactness of Lev 23.

(4) In CC marital rights of the master over his maidservants are taken for granted (Ex 21 7-11); in Dt (15 17) the maidservant has the same privilege of release as the manservant, with the evident assumption that slavery does not confer marital rights on the master. (It is of course gratuitous to assume that two different kinds of maidservants are meant, particularly as in both cases the maidservant is contrasted in general with the manservant in general.) Note, moreover, that in Ex 20 17 "wife" follows "house" in the prohibition against coveting, while in Dt 5 21 "wife" precedes "house" and a different vb. is used. The inference is natural that between CC and Dt woman, both as slave and as wife, had risen to a higher position.

(5) In both CC (Ex 21 6) and Dt (15 17) life-long slavery is permitted, if the slave desires it, otherwise the slave is free at the end of the sixth year. In H (Lev 25 39-43), the slave serves until the Jubilee year and then goes free absolutely.

Now, it is not claimed that all the discrepancies in the above lists are incapable of reconciliation, although the examples chosen are among those where reconciliation is extremely difficult. The claim is made, however, that all of this evidence is cumulative and that each successive item points more and more forcibly toward a single conclusion—that in the legislation of the Pentateuch, esp. when considered in connection with the Prophets and with Samuel-Kings, there have been incorporated laws belonging to very different periods. And, for the most part, a development from the simple to the highly organized can be traced. And this conclusion explains all the facts.

The above examples have been chosen as those where no changes in the text need be made. Of the other instances, only one need be considered—Lev 17. On its surface, this ch appears to refer solely to life in the wilderness. But in vs 8.10.12.13.15 it appears that living in the midst of the Israelites are settled non-Israelites. And the "open field" of ver 5 is a contrast to city, not to tent, life. Now in vs 3-5 the question is not at all idolatry but eating of blood at an ordinary meal. An exact commentary is found on this in 1 S 14 32-35, where the Israelites sin in eating the blood of animals "slain on the ground"; i.e. in both Lev 17 and 1 S 14, at every slaying of an animal for food, some formal disposition of the blood had to be made. In Lev 17 4 this is sacrificial, and the appearance of the altar in 1 S 14 35 points in the 10. Summary among those where reconciliation is extremely difficult. The claim is made, however, that all of this evidence is cumulative and that each successive item points more and more forcibly toward a single conclusion—that in the legislation of the Pentateuch, esp. when considered in connection with the Prophets and with Samuel-Kings, there have been incorporated laws belonging to very different periods. And, for the most part, a development from the simple to the highly organized can be traced. And this conclusion explains all the facts.

The above examples have been chosen as those where no changes in the text need be made. Of the other instances, only one need be considered—Lev 17. On its surface, this ch appears to refer solely to life in the wilderness. But in vs 8.10.12.13.15 it appears that living in the midst of the Israelites are settled non-Israelites. And the "open field" of ver 5 is a contrast to city, not to tent, life. Now in vs 3-5 the question is not at all idolatry but eating of blood at an ordinary meal. An exact commentary is found on this in 1 S 14 32-35, where the Israelites sin in eating the blood of animals "slain on the ground"; i.e. in both Lev 17 and 1 S 14, at every slaying of an animal for food, some formal disposition of the blood had to be made. In Lev 17 4 this is sacrificial, and the appearance of the altar in 1 S 14 35 points in the same direction. Now this investing of every slaying of an animal with a sacrificial character, explains the permission of Dt 12 20-25 to eat flesh "after all the desire of thy soul," a permission inexplicable unless there had been an earlier contrary practice. It is to be noted, moreover, that in Dt 12 16 the blood is to be disposed of by pouring it on the earth, the practice condemned in 1 S 14 32. The conclusion is that before the legislation of Dt the Israelite offered the blood of every slain sacrificial animal at the local sanctuary. Dt's rigid enforcement of the one sanctuary made this impossible, and so permission was given to eat flesh at home, provided the blood was not eaten, and provided that it was disposed of in a non-sacrificial way. Now in Lev 17 3-5 it becomes clear what has happened. The passage read originally something like this: 'What man soever there be of the house of Israel, that killeth an ox, or lamb, or goat, and hath not brought it to offer it as an oblation unto Jeh, blood shall be imputed unto that man. . . . This offering was to take place at the local sanctuary. But when the passage was incorporated into the whole body of the legislation, the editor was working at a time when the legitimacy of the local sanctuaries had long been forgotten. And so references to the "camp" and "the tent of meeting" were inserted, in accordance with the only laws that the editor conceived could ever have prevailed. The discrepancies with vs 5,8, etc, were probably not observed.

It is to be understood that this passage is not used as presenting a basic argument for the Graf-Wellhausen hypothesis. But it is cited as an example of other passages where the text is to be considered. And, also, because the assertion is made that this particular passage is a death-blow to the "critical" hypothesis. Naturally, it is nothing of the sort.

III. The History.—It may be said at the outset that many of the attacks on the historic value of

Ch have been very gravely exaggerated. But, none the less, a close comparison with Samuel-Kings shows that the Chronicler has most certainly read back into history the religious institutions of his own late day—it need not be said, with perfect innocence and sincerity. For instance, in comparing 2 K 11 4 with 2 Ch 23 2-6, we find the statement of K that Jehoiada brought captains of the Carites and of the guard into the house of Jeh quite altered. In Ch Jehoiada summons Levites and heads of houses, with the express provision that only Levites shall enter into the house of Jeh. So holy a priest as Jehoiada could not have acted as K says he did act. Similarly, the statement in 1 K 15 14 that Asa did not remove the high places is changed into the statement that he did remove the high places (2 Ch 14 3-5), and only those in (northern) Israel were left (15 17). So did Jehoshaphat (17 6), although in 20 33 the explicit statement to the contrary is copied (unnoticed?) from 1 K 22 43. Such righteous kings must have enforced the single sanctuary. The almost trivial matter of David's garb when the ark was brought into Jerus (contrast 2 S 6 20-22 with 1 Ch 15 27-29) has been noticed already in II, 6. The important matter in Ch, however, is the history of the Tabernacle. In 1 Ch 16 39-42 the Tabernacle is at Gibeon, with the full ministry surrounding it, with the exception of a detail left before the Ark in Jerus (cf 9 17-32). And in 2 Ch 5 5 it is brought up to Jerus, although the disposition made of it is not explained. Otherwise it is mentioned in 1 Ch 6 48; 21 29; 2 Ch 1 3. But the narrative presents some serious difficulties. Why did David build a special tent for the Ark in Jerus (1 Ch 16 1), if the one Divinely appointed covering for the Ark was still standing—not to be brought to Jerus until its utility was past (2 Ch 5 5)? That it was too fragile to be moved can hardly be taken seriously. In the first place, this explanation is without the least support in the text. And, in the second place, it is incredible for such a solid structure of wood, silver and brass, however much repair the curtains might have needed. Moreover, this explanation will not do at all for Bezalel's brazen altar, which was still quite usable in 2 Ch 1 5, making the construction of a new altar (4 1) altogether inexplicable. The impression is created at once that the Chronicler has injected the Tabernacle into a narrative that knew nothing of it. This is corroborated by 1 Ch 21 29,30; the altar at the floor of Ornan is explained by the difficulty of reaching the Tabernacle. But the Ark, the natural means for an inquiry of God, was in Jerus, with an altar by it (16 1)—why this third altar on the threshing-floor? The inaccessibility of the Tabernacle is invoked here only to solve what was a difficulty to the Chronicler. Now if 2 Ch 1 3 be compared with 1 K 3 2-4, the key of the whole is discovered. K not only does not mention the presence of the Tabernacle at Gibeon, but excludes it. Solomon's sacrificing at Gibeon is explained by saying that such was the custom of all Israel, who sacrificed in high places before the Temple was built; Solomon also sacrificed in high places and Gibeon was a great high-place. This is an apology for Solomon's conduct—why should the editor of K have apologized for sacrifice offered at the Divinely appointed Tabernacle? The Chronicler, however, could not believe that God blessed Solomon when offering sacrifice in a way forbidden by the law of Ch's times, and hence he solves the difficulty by bringing in something that is unknown to the narrative in K.

Indeed, K mentions the Tabernacle only in 1 K 8 4. S mentions the Tabernacle as such only in 1 S 2 22. Jgs does not mention the Tabernacle at all (18 31 is the only possibility and the word there is "house"). Now 1 S 2 22 is not found in the Vatican LXX, and the description of the Tabernacle as a tent contradicts 1 9; 3 15, where it appears as a temple or house. So it must be dropped as a gloss. Nor will it be denied that 1 K 8 4 looks suspiciously like a gloss as well, particularly in view of the presence of Levites there, who are practically unmentioned elsewhere in Samuel-Kings. At all events, there are only these two possible mentions of what should have been the center of Israel's worship in all of Jgs-Samuel-Kings. This is not the ordinary argument from silence, it is silent about what should have been the most vital matter of all. Dt knows nothing of the Tabernacle, and, as has already been shown in II, states as clearly as language only can that in the wilderness the centralization of worship was not observed. The argument from silence alone would be conclusive here, for how could the author of Dt in his passionate advocacy of the single sanctuary fail to appeal to the single sanctuary already established by God's decree, if he knew anything about it? But not only is there no such mention in Dt but a positive exclusion of such a sanctuary in express terms. The case would seem to be complete. The Tabernacle of X and Ch is an ideal structure projected back into the past, just as the temple of Ezk is an ideal structure projected into the future. And it is needless to appeal to the familiar argument that the Tabernacle of Ex 26 would have been blown to pieces by the first storm. It had no provision for tent poles deeply sunk, which alone could resist the blasts of the desert.

It is impossible in the space of the present art. to enter into all the corroborative evidence, but a very few important arguments may be mentioned. Simple people tend most naturally to think of heroes of the past as more and more glorious as time passes. Now Jgs 1 describes the conquest of Canaan as a slow and laborious process after Joshua's death. But in Josh 10 40-43; 11 16-19—Canaan was completely swept of its inhabitants by Joshua in a series of annihilatory campaigns, making Jgs 1 quite impossible. Evidently the Josh passages cited belong to a very much later conception of the past history. The fate of Hebron is especially interesting. In Jgs 1 20 Caleb takes Hebron after Joshua's death. But in Josh 15 Caleb takes Hebron during Joshua's lifetime and at the latter's direction. In Josh 10 36-37, however, Joshua takes Hebron personally and annihilates its inhabitants. Here are three distinct conceptions of Hebron's fate, again. But still a fourth is found in Josh 21 11-12: it was not Caleb who received the city but the Levites. This evidently belongs to the time when the Levitical right to cities had become a commonplace, and was therefore referred to the earliest days. The accounts of the annihilation of the Canaanites arose naturally enough. According to Jgs the conquest was gradual and merciful. But the Canaanites seduced Israel to idolatry repeatedly. Therefore they should have been routed out (Dt 20 16-18). But Joshua was righteous and had all power. Therefore he must have rooted them out. How they suddenly reappeared again was a question that was not raised. But perhaps it may be thought a relief to understand that the ruthless campaigns of the Israelites are due to reflection and not to descriptions of what actually happened.

3. The Conquest

Simple people think of God quite naturally and reverently as a greater man. So in Ex 24 9-11 we read that Moses and many others met God in the mount, they all saw Him, and ate and drank before Him. A slightly more refined point of view is in Ex 33 11, where Moses (but no one else) sees God face to face, and Nu 12 8, where again he (alone) sees the form of God. But in Ex 33 20 no man, not even Moses, can see God face to face. In Dt 4 11-15 it is laid down that only darkness was seen—"ye saw no form." Perhaps Moses was thought of as an exception, but the contradiction of the concept that conceived over seventy Israelites besides Moses to have seen God is complete.

The reading back of an official priesthood into the time of Moses can be seen in certain passages where Aaron appears predominantly. Contrast, e.g. Ex 8 20-24; 15 23-26; 17 1-7 with 7 1-19; 16 9-10; Nu 20 2-13. Yet despite the importance of Aaron in the latter passages, in Ex 33 11 the minister of Moses in the Tent is Joshua, who is not a priest at all. Contrast similarly Dt 31 14-15 with Nu 27 18-21, noting how Eleazar appears in the latter passage, although the former excludes him. At the time of Ex it was not thought possible that Moses could have acted without the official mediation of the official priest.

Reasons of space preclude a further discussion of the other arguments here, such as the linguistic.

6. Summary

As a matter of fact, the sections that contain the more developed concepts contain also a different vocabulary. To be repeated, however, is the fact that the argument is cumulative and that a single explanation of the differences is offered in the hypothesis of very varying dates for the various portions. Of course an exact analysis of every verb and a rigorous reconstruction of every source is not claimed to be possible. Many scholars have been carried by their enthusiasm for analysis into making preposterous dissections. But the principal lines of division are sufficiently clear. And it may be hoped the reader will not think that the acceptance of them has been dictated by any motive except that of facing the truth—least of all by any motive of a weakened faith in the power of God or a suspicion of the miraculous.

IV. Reconstruction.—Israel came into Canaan, after having received through the mediation of Moses a covenant relation with God and (almost certainly) some accompanying legislation. But this legislation seems not to have prescribed the ritual form that the worship of God was to take. In part, old forms were simply continued and in part new forms were gradually developed or appropriated, the emphasis of the Law at that time being on the moral and the ritual being left quite free. In especial, sacrifices were offered wherever Israelites happened to live, doubtless frequently at former Canaanite sanctuaries, now rededicated to Jeh. The local sanctuary was the center of the life. Men went thither to learn God's will and to give a religious character to what we should call purely secular transactions (contracts, etc). Firstlings were offered there on the eighth day, first-fruits at once, every meal of flesh food was given a sacrificial character (peace offering), and, for more solemn purposes, the whole burnt offering was offered. So the local sanctuary corresponded to our "village church"; it was the religious home of the people. Certain of these sanctuaries had an especial dignity, above all Shiloh, where the Ark was. Later, when a united Israel had been realized, David brought the Ark to Jerus that the national capital might become the center of the national religious life as well, and Solomon enshrined the Ark in the Temple. So to Jerus there resorted naturally the best of Israel's religious leaders, and there the worship of God would be found in its purest form, normally speaking.

1. Covenant Code

As time went on, the progress of culture and the freer contact with other nations had bad effects as well as good. New and degrading religious practices flowed into the country and they revived old but equally degrading religious practices that had survived from the Canaanites. The priesthood at Jerus did not escape a taint, but the place where such rites gained the readiest foothold was of course the obscure local sanctuaries. Not the best-minded king or the most zealous prophet could watch all the services at them all, and attempts at purging them of idolatry or idolatrous rites (Elijah, Jehu, etc) could not effect permanent improvement. And it could not have been very long after David's own day that the idea must have begun to grow that complete prohibition of country sacrifices and the rigid centralization of everything at Jerus was the only measure possible. This would soon become a fixed conviction of the better class of the Jerus priesthood and in a few generations would be a tradition. Detailed precepts to carry this tradition into effect arose necessarily and in turn became a tradition and in course of time were regarded as Moses' work and committed to writing. In this way the legislation of Dt took form and at the time of its discovery under Josiah there is not the slightest occasion to attribute fraud to anyone engaged in the transaction. The document agreed fairly well with what was the tradition of Jerus, and no one at that day could distinguish between a writing a cent. old or even less and a writing of Moses' own time. The country priests and the mass of the people were not consulted as to enforcing it, and they would not have known if they had been consulted. On any reading of the history, the reforms proceeded from a very small group, and any general "tradition of the Jews" was non-existent.

(1) The reforms added to the theoretical tradition the additional influence of practical experience and the idea of course dominated the minds of the more earnest among the exiles. Ezekiel, in particular, realized that only at a single sanctuary could the worship of God be kept pure—the single sanctuary was God's will. And Ezekiel's influence was immense. Now it is to be noted that at the return only those came back who had a real enthusiasm for Jerus, as Babylonia was, materially speaking, a far more attractive place than the Pal of that day. That the single sanctuary could have been questioned by any of these Jews or that they could have conceived of Moses as instituting anything of less dignity is impossible.

(2) Other reforms also had been at work. Even in Dt the more primitive note of joyousness was maintained in the sacrifices. But joyousness in simple life is often dissipation in cultured life and the peace offering could be made a debauch (Isa 22 12-14; Prov 7 14). A sense of personal guilt had become far better developed and the incongruity of penitential worship with a festal meal was recognized. A very slight change was made: the portion was to be eaten by the priest instead of the worshipper—and the sin and trespass offerings emerged. The abuses were cut away by this one stroke and the peace offering proper retired into the background. And sacrifices were made the proper center of the official worship. In accord with the growing culture, proportions of gifts, dates of feasts, etc, were specified more and more exactly, the worship was surrounded with a more impressive ritual, and, in particular, the officiating priests substituted vestments suited to the better taste of the time for the old loin-cloth. Traces are left in the OT of difficulties regarding the rights of the various classes of priests to minister but the matter was settled eventually in a manner that satisfied all. Priests formerly guilty of idolatry and their descendants were admitted to share in the worship and the priestly revenues, but the actual offering of sacrifice was restricted to those who had been faithful. The proper support of the clergy so formed required, in accordance with their dignity, more elaborate provisions than had been needed in the simpler times of old, but was accomplished in a manner again entirely satisfactory. The religion of no other nation could have survived the Bab exile intact. But Israel returned, with the elements formerly necessary but now outgrown changed into a form adapted to the new task the nation had before it—the preparation of itself and the world for the advent of Christ.

This growth toward the higher, involving as it did the meeting of all kinds of obstacles, the solving of all kinds of problems, the learning when to abandon elements that had been transcended, is unique in the history of religions. And the explanation of its uniqueness can be found only in the guidance of God. And in the history as reconstructed God is seen truly as the Father, who trained His children little by little, giving them only what they were able to receive but bringing them surely to Himself. And in the documents that contain the precepts for each stage of progress God's hand can be seen no less clearly. To be sure, in the secular science of history (as in physics or astronomy) His revelation was expressed in forms that His people could understand. This alteration—and this alteration only—in our view of what is covered by Bib. inspiration is the sacrifice demanded by the Graf-Wellhausen hypothesis.

4. Evaluation

LITERATURE.—This is overwhelming and reference must be made to the separate arts. The standard analysis is that of The Oxford Hexateuch (1900), more briefly in The Composition of the Hexateuch by Carpenter and Harford (Battersby) (1902). Merx, Die Bücher Moses und Josua (1907), is the best brief introduction. Gunkel's Genesis (1910) in the Nowack series, his more popular Die Urgeschichte und die Patriarchen (1911), and his

"Die israelitische Literatur" in Die Kultur der Gegenwart, I, 7 (1906), should on no account be neglected. The best treatment of the inspiration question from the standpoint of pure dogmatics is F. J. Hall's Authority: Ecclesiastical and Biblical (1908).

In the above discussion it has been assumed that our text of the OT is at least relatively trustworthy. The reader interested in what can be done by textual reconstruction will find the opposite poles represented in the works of Wiener and of Cheyne.

[EDITORIAL NOTE.—The promoters of the Encyclopaedia are not to be understood as endorsing all the views set forth in Dr. Easton's art. (see CRITICISM OF THE BIBLE). CROCODILE, krok'ō-dil. See LEVIATHAN; DRAGON.

CROCODILE, LAND. See CHAMELEON.

CROOK-BACKED, krōōk'bakt (קִבְּנִי, gibbēni; κροτός, krotós): A disqualification for the priesthood (Lev 21 20); was probably an angular curvature of the spine, usually the result of tubercular caries of the vertebrae. It was by no means uncommon in ancient Egypt, where I have found a considerable number of spines affected with this disease. Some Talmudic authorities explain it as meaning "very dark colored," but this is unlikely.

The woman bound by the spirit of infirmity and unable to lift herself (Lk 13 11-17) was affected with senile kyphosis, a chronic bone disease often found among aged men (and more frequently women) whose lives have been spent in agricultural labor. In these the vertebrae become altered in shape so that it is impossible to straighten the back. Some rabbinical authorities believed all deformities to be due to Satan, and to this Our Lord seems to have alluded in his rebuke to those who caviled at His healing on the Sabbath. I have found this condition in some Egypt skeletons, and have seen it in a Palestinian fellah. A skeleton affected with a similar curvature was found buried under the threshold of a house at Gezer, where she had evidently been offered as a foundation sacrifice.

CROOKED, krōōk'ed (קָוָה, āwāh, קָשָׁה, ākash, קָלָקָל, ākalkāl, קָלָתוֹן, ākallāthōn, קָתָלִית, p'thaliōt; σκολιός, skoliós): Primarily designates something that is bent, twisted or deformed (Isa 27 1; 45 2 AV).

Figurative: (1) It designates a course of action that deviates from rectitude, esp. deceit, guile, hypocrisy (Dt 32 5; Prov 2 15; Eccl 1 15; Lk 3 5; cf Phil 2 15); (2) trials (sent by God, Eccl 7 13; Lam 3 9); (3) difficulties (removed by God, Isa 42 16).

CROOKED SERPENT, krōōk'ed sūr'pent. See ASTRONOMY.

CROP:

(1) As noun the translation of קִרְיָה, mur'āh (Lev 1 16), which is the craw of a bird, esp. of doves and pigeons, which had to be removed by the priest before he offered the birds as a burnt sacrifice.

(2) As a vb. it is (Ezk 17 4.22) the tr of קָטַף, kāṭaph, which has the meaning of "cutting off," "cutting down," "plucking."

CROSS (σταυρός, staurós, "a cross," "the crucifixion"; σκόλοψ, skólōps, "a stake," "a pole"): The name is not found in the OT. It is derived from the Lat word crux. In the Gr language it is staurós, but sometimes we find the word skólōps used as its Gr equivalent. The historical writers, who transferred the events of Rom history into the Gr language, make use of these two words. No word in human language has become more universally known than this word, and that because all of the history of the world since the death of Christ has been measured by the distance which separates events from it. The symbol and principal content of the Christian religion and of Christian civilization is found in this one word.

The cross occurs in at least four different forms:

(1) the form usually seen in pictures, the crux immissa, in which the upright beam is projected above the shorter crosspiece; the Cross this is most likely the type of cross on which the Saviour died, as may be inferred from the inscription which was nailed above His head; (2) the crux commissa, or St. Anthony's cross, which has the shape of the letter T; (3) the Gr cross of later date, in which the pieces are equally long; (4) the crux decussata, or St. Andrew's cross, which has the shape of the letter X.

The early church historians Socrates (1,17), Sozomen (2,1), Rufinus (1,7) and Theodoret (1,18) all make mention of this tradition. The most significant thing is that Eusebius (Vit. Const., iii.26-28), who carries more weight than they all together, wholly omits it.

According to it, Helena, the mother of Constantine the Great, in 325 AD, when she was 79 years old, discovered the true cross of Jesus by an excavation she caused to be made on the traditional spot of His grave. With the cross of the Saviour were found the two crosses of the malefactors who were crucified with Him. A miracle of healing, wrought by touching the true cross, revealed its identity. When found it was intact, even the holy nails of the crucifixion being discovered. The main part of the cross was deposited by Helena in a church erected over the spot. Of the remainder, a portion was inserted into the head of the statue of Constantine, and the balance was placed in a new church, specially erected for it at Rome and named after it Santa Croce. Small fragments of the wood of the true cross were sold, encrusted with gold and jewels, and since many among the wealthy believers were desirous of possessing such priceless relics, the miracle of the "multiplication of the cross" was devised, so that the relic suffered no diminution "et quasi intacta maneret" (Paulinus ep 11 ad Sev.). Fragments of the true cross are thus to be found in many Roman Catholic churches of many countries, all over Christendom. It is said that the East celebrated the staurosimos hēmera (Crucifixion Day) on September 14, since the 4th cent. The evidence for this fact is late and untrustworthy. It is certain that the West celebrated the Invention of the Cross, on May 3, since the time of Gregory the Great in the 6th cent. The finding and publication of the apocryphal "Doctrina Addaei" has made it evident that the entire legend of the discovery of the cross by Helena is but a version of the old Edessa legend, which tells of an identical discovery of the cross, under the very same circumstances, by the wife of the emperor Claudius, who had been converted to Christianity by the preaching of Peter.

(1) Extra-scriptural.—The sign of the cross was well known in the symbolics of various ancient nations. Among the Egyptians it is

3. Symbolical Uses of the Cross said to have been the symbol of divinity and eternal life, and to have been found in the temple of Serapis.

It is known either in the form of the Gr cross or in the form of the letter T. The Spaniards found it to be well known, as a symbol, by the Mexicans and Peruvians, perhaps signifying the four elements, or the four seasons, or the four points of the compass.

(2) Scriptural.—The suffering implied in crucifixion naturally made the cross a symbol of pain, distress and burden-bearing. Thus Jesus used it Himself (Mt 10 38; 16 24). In Pauline lit. the cross stands for the preaching of the doctrine of the Atonement (1 Cor 1 18; Gal 6 14; Phil 3 18; Col 1 20). It expresses the bond of unity between the Jew and the Gentile (Eph 2 16), and between the believer and Christ, and also symbolizes sanctification (Gal 5 24). The cross is the center and circumference of the preaching of the apostles and of the life of the NT church.

As an instrument of death the cross was detested by the Jews. "Cursed is everyone that hangeth on a tree" (Gal 3 13; cf Dt 21 23),

4. Crucifixion hence it became a stumbling-block to them, for how could one accursed of God be their Messiah? Nor was the cross differently considered by the Romans. "Let the very name of the cross be far away not only from the body of a Roman citizen, but even from his thoughts, his eyes, his ears" (Cicero Pro Rabi-rio 5). The earliest mode of crucifixion seems to have been by impalement, the transfixion of the body lengthwise and crosswise by sharpened stakes, a mode of death-punishment still well known among the Mongol race. The usual mode of crucifixion was familiar to the Greeks, the Romans, the Egyptians, Persians and Babylonians (Thuc. 1, 110; Herod. iii.125, 159). Alexander the Great executed two thousand Tyrian captives in this way, after the fall of the city. The Jews received this form of punishment from the Syrians and Romans (Ant. XII, v, 4; XX, vi, 2; BJ, I, iv, 6). The Rom citizen was exempt from this form of death, it being considered the death of a slave (Cicero In Verrem i. 5, 66; Quint. viii.4). The punishment was meted out for such crimes as treason, desertion in the face of the enemy, robbery, piracy, assassination, sedition, etc. It continued in vogue in the Rom empire till the day of Constantine, when it was abolished as an insult to Christianity. Among the Romans crucifixion was preceded by scourging, undoubtedly to hasten impending death. The victim then bore his own cross, or at least the upright beam, to the place of execution. This in itself proves that the structure was less ponderous than is commonly supposed. When he was tied to the cross nothing further was done and he was left to die from starvation. If he was nailed to the cross, at least in Judaea, a stupefying drink was given him to deaden the agony. The number of nails used seems to have been indeterminate. A tablet, on which the feet rested or on which the body was partly supported, seems to have been a part of the cross to keep the wounds from tearing through the trans-fixed members (Iren., Adv. haer., ii.42). The suffering of death by crucifixion was intense, esp. in hot climates. Severe local inflammation, coupled with an insignificant bleeding of the jagged wounds, produced traumatic fever, which was aggravated by the exposure to the heat of the sun, the strained position of the body and insufferable thirst. The wounds swelled about the rough nails and the torn and lacerated tendons and nerves caused excruciating agony. The arteries of the head and stomach were surcharged with blood and a terrific throbbing headache ensued. The mind was confused and filled with anxiety and dread foreboding. The victim of crucifixion literally died a thousand deaths. Tetanus not rarely supervened and the rigors of the attending convulsions would tear at the wounds and add to the burden of pain, till at last the bodily forces were exhausted and the victim sank to unconsciousness and death. The sufferings were so frightful that "even among the raging passions of war pity was sometimes excited" (BJ, V, xi, 1). The length of this agony was wholly determined by the constitution of the victim, but death rarely ensued before thirty-six hours had elapsed. Instances are on record of victims of the cross who survived their terrible injuries when taken down from the cross after many hours of suspension (Jos, Vita, 75). Death was sometimes hastened by breaking the legs of the victims and by a hard blow delivered under the armpit before crucifixion. Crura fracta was a well-known Rom term (Cicero Phil. xiii.12). The sudden death of Christ evidently was a matter of astonishment (Mk 15 44). The peculiar symptoms mentioned by John (19 34) would seem to point to a rupture of the heart, of which the Saviour died, independent of the cross itself, or perhaps hastened by its agony. See BLOOD AND WATER. HENRY E. DOSKER

CROSSWAY, kros'wā (קָרַע, perēk, lit. "division"): A forking or dividing of the way. Obadiah warns Edom, "And stand thou not in the crossway, to cut off those of his that escape" (Ob ver 14). In LXX, "a mountain pass."

CROWN, kroun: The word crown in the OT is a tr of five different Heb words, and in the NT of two Gr words. These express the several meanings, and must be examined to ascertain the same.

The five Heb words are as follows: (1) קָדָשׁ, qōdḥqōdh, from קָדַח, qādhadh; (2) זֶר, zēr, from זָר, zārar; (3) נֶזֶר, nezer, or נָזַר, nāzar, both from נָזַר, nāzar; (4) צִנְטָרָה, ṣintārāh, from צָנַר, ṣānar; (5) כֶּתֶר, kether, from כָּתַר, kāthar.

(1) Qōdḥqōdh means "the crown of the head," and is also rendered in AV "top of the head," "scalp," "pate." It comes from qādhadh, meaning "to shrivel up," "contract," or bend the body or neck through courtesy. Both RV and ARV, in Dt 28 35 and 33 16, tr it "crown" instead of "top" as in AV. Jacob in his prophecy concerning his sons says: "The blessings of thy father . . . shall be on the head of Joseph, and on the crown of the head of him that is prince among his brethren" (Gen 49 26 ARVm). Other references are: Dt 33 20; 2 S 14 25; Job 2 7; Isa 3 17; Jer 2 16; 48 45. Tr<sup>d</sup> "scalp" in Ps 68 21 and "pate" in Ps 7 16.

(2) Zēr means a "chaplet," something spread around the top as a molding about the border, and because of its wreath-like appearance called a crown. "That which presses, binds" (BDB). Comes from zārar, meaning "to diffuse" or "scatter." It is used in Ex 25 11.24.25; 30 3.4; 37 2.11.12.26.27.

(3) Nezer means something "set apart"; i.e. a dedication to the priesthood or the dedication of a Nazarite, hence a chaplet or fillet as a symbol of such consecration. The word in AV is rendered "crown," "consecration," "separation," "hair." Comes from nāzar, meaning "to hold aloof" from impurity, even from drink and food, more definitely, "to set apart" for sacred purposes, i.e. "to separate," "devote," "consecrate." It is found in Ex 29 6; 39 30; Lev 8 9; 21 12; 2 S 1 10; 2 K 11 12; 2 Ch 23 11; Ps 89 39; 132 18; Prov 27 24; Zec 9 16.

(4) Ṭintārāh means a crown in the usual sense. Comes from ṣānar, meaning "to encircle," as in war for offence or defence; also actually and figuratively "to crown." Rendered sometimes "to compass." It is used in 2 S 12 30; 1 Ch 20 2; Est 8 15; Job 19 9; 31 36; Ps 21 3; Prov 4 9; 12 4; 14 24; 16 31; 17 6; Cant 3 11; Isa 28 1.3.5; 62 3; Jer 13 18; Lam 5 16; Ezk 16 12; 21 26; 23 42; Zec 6 11.14; "crowned," Cant 3 11; "crownest," Ps 65 11; "crowneth," Ps 103

4. RV tr<sup>s</sup> "crowned," of Ps 8 5 "hast crowned." ARV prefers to tr "crowning," in Isa 23 8, "the bestower of crowns."

(5) Kether means a "circlet" or "a diadem." From kāthar, meaning "to inclose": as a friend, "to crown"; as an enemy, "to besiege." Various tr<sup>d</sup> "beset round," "inclose round," "suffer," "compass about." Found in Est 1 11; 2 17; 6 8; "crowned," in Prov 14 18.

Ancient Asiatic Crowns.

The two Gr words of the NT tr<sup>d</sup> crown are: (1) στέφανος, stēphanos, from stēphō, and (2) διάδημα, diādēma, from diadēō, "to bind round."

(1) Stēphanos means a chaplet (wreath) made of leaves or leaf-like gold, used for marriage and festive occasions, and expressing public recognition of victory in races, games and war; also figuratively as a reward for efficient Christian life and service (see GAMES). This symbol was more noticeable and intricate than the plain fillet. Only in the Rev of John is stēphanos called "golden." The "crown of thorns" which Jesus wore was a stēphanos (woven wreath) of thorns; the kind is not known (Mt 27 29; Mk 15 17; Jn 19 2.5). Lk makes no mention of it. Whether intended to represent royalty or victory, it was a caricature crown. Stēphanos is found in 1 Cor 9 25; Phil 4 1; 1 Thess 2 19; 2 Tim 4 8; Jas 1 12; 1 Pet 5 4; Rev 2 10; 3 11; 6 2; 12 1; 14 14; plur. in Rev 4 10; 9 7; "crowned" in 2 Tim 2 5; He 2 9; "crownedst" in He 2 7.

(2) Diādēma is the word for "diadem," from dia (about) and deō (bound), i.e. something bound about the head. In the three places where it occurs (Rev 12 3; 13 1 and 19 12) both RV and ARV tr it not "crowns" but "diadems," thus making the proper distinction between stēphanos and diādēma, such as is not done either in AV or the LXX (see Trench, Synonyms of the NT). According to Thayer the distinction was not observed in Hellenic Gr. "Diadems" are on the dragon (Rev 12 3), the beast (Rev 13 1) and on the Rider of the White Horse, "the Faithful and True" (Rev 19 12). In each case the "diadems" are symbolic of power to rule.

There are five uses of the crown as seen in the Scripture references studied, viz. decoration, consecration, coronation, exaltation, and

3. Use and remuneration.
Significance (1) Decoration.—The zēr of Ex, as far as it was a crown at all, was for ornamentation, its position not seeming to indicate any utility purpose. These wavelet, gold moldings, used in the furnishings of the tabernacle of Moses, were placed about (a) the table of shewbread (Ex 25 24; 37 11); (b) the ark of the covenant (Ex 25 11; 37 2); (c) the altar of incense (Ex 30 3,4; 37 26,27). The position of these crowns is a debated question among archaeologists. Their purpose other than decoration is not known. The encircling gold might signify gratitude, purity and enduring worth.

(2) Consecration.—The nezer had a twofold use as the crown of consecration: (a) It was placed as a frontlet on the miter of the high priest, being tied with a blue lace (Ex 39 30). The priestly crown was a flat piece of pure gold, bearing the inscription, "Holy to Jeh," signifying the consecration of the priest as the representative of the people (Ex 29 6; Lev 8 9). (b) Likewise the Heb king (2 K 11 12) was set apart by God in wearing on his head a royal nezer, whether of silk or gold we do not know. It was set with jewels (Zec 9 16) and was light enough to be taken into battle (2 S 1 10).

(3) Coronation.—The ordinary use of the crown. There were three kinds of kingly crowns used in coronation services: (a) The nezer or consecration crown, above referred to, was the only one used in crowning Heb kings. What seems to be an exception is in the case of Joshua, who represented both priest and king (Zec 6 11 ARVm). (b) The ātarāh, and (c) the kether were used in crowning foreign monarchs. No king but a Heb could wear a nezer—a "Holy to Jeh" crown. It is recorded that David presumed to put on his own head the ātarāh of King Maltam (2 S 12 30 ARVm). The kether or jeweled turban was the crown of the Pers king and queen (Est 1 11; 2 17; 6 8).

(4) Exaltation.—The ātarāh, the stephanos and the diadēma were used as crowns of exaltation. Stephanos was the usual crown of exaltation for victors of games, achievement in war and places of honor at feasts. The ātarāh was worn at banquets (Cant 3 11; Isa 28 1,3), probably taking the form of a wreath of flowers; also as a crown of honor and victory (Ezk 16 12; 21 26; 23 42). Stephanos is the crown of exaltation bestowed upon Christ (Rev 6 2; 14 14; He 2 9). "Exaltation was the logical result of Christ's humiliation" (Vincent). The Apocalyptic woman and locusts receive this emblem of exaltation (Rev 12 1; 9 7). The symbolic dragon and beast are elevated, wearing diadēma (Rev 12 3; 13 1). The conquering Christ has "upon his head . . . many diadems" (Rev 19 12). See further Tertullian, De corona.

(5) Remuneration.—Paul, witnessing the races and games, caught the vision of wreath-crowned victors flush with the reward of earnest endeavor. See GAMES. He also saw the persistent, faithful Christian at the end of his hard-won race wearing the symbolic stephanos of rejoicing (1 Thess 2 19 AV), of righteousness (2 Tim 4 8), of glory (1 Pet 5 4), of life (Jas 1 12; Rev 2 10). Paul's fellow-Christians were his joy and stephanos (Phil 4 1), "of which Paul might justly make his boast" (Ellicott). Long before Paul, his Heb ancestors saw the ātarāh of glory (Prov 4 9) and the ātarāh of a good wife, children's children, riches and a peaceful old age (Prov 12 4; 14 24; 16 31; 17 6). For Apoc references see 1 Macc 10 29; 11 35; 13 39.

CROWN OF THORNS, thörnz (ἀκάνθινος στέφανος, akánthinos stéphanos): Three of the four evangelists mention the crown of thorns, wherewith the rude Rom soldiers derided the captive Christ (Mt 27 29; Mk 15 17; Jn 19 2). All speak of the akanthine (Acanthus) crown, but there is no certainty about the peculiar plant, from the branches of which this crown of cruel mockery was plaited. The rabbinical books mention no less than twenty-two words in the Bible signifying thorny plants, and the word akantha in the NT Gr is a generic and not a specific term. And this word or its adj. is used in the three Gospels, quoted above. It is therefore impossible definitely to determine what was the exact plant or tree, whose thorny branches were selected for this purpose. Tobler (Denkbl., 113, 179) inclines to the Spina Christi, as did Hasselquist. Its botanical name is Zizyphus Spina Christi. It is very common in the East. Its spines are small and sharp, its branches soft, round and pliable, and the leaves look like ivy, with a dark, shiny green color, making them therefore very adaptable to the purpose of the soldiers. Others have designated the Paliurus aculeatus or the Lycium horridum. Both Geikie (Life of Christ, 549) and Farrar (Life of Christ, note 625) point to the Nubk (Zizyphus lotus). Says the latter, "The Nubk struck me, as it has all travelers in Pal, as being most suitable both for mockery and pain, since its leaves are bright and its thorns singularly strong. But though the Nubk is very common on the shores of Galilee, I saw none of it near Jerus." The settlement of the question is manifestly impossible.

CRUCIFIXION, krōo-si-fik'shun. See CROSS; PUNISHMENTS.

CRUEL, krōo'el, CRUELTY, krōo'el-ti (רָעָה, 'akhzār, "harsh," "fierce," חֲמָסָה, hāmās, "violence"): There are various uses of the word "cruel" in the OT: (a) "the cruel [deadly] venom of asps" (Dt 32 33); (b) spoken of men of relentless hate: "They hate me with cruel hatred" (Ps 25 19; cf Prov 5 9; 11 17; 12 10; Jer 6 23; 50 42); (c) Job speaks of God's dealings with him as "cruel" and arbitrary: "Thou art turned to be cruel to me" (Job 30 21); conscious of his virtue, yet holding God to be the author of his sufferings, Job is driven to the conclusion that God has become his enemy and is bent upon destroying him; (d) the "day of Jeh"—a prophetic phrase to denote the time of God's manifestation in judgment—is described as coming, "cruel, with wrath and fierce anger" (Isa 13 9). The word "cruelty" has nearly disappeared from the Bible. In RV it occurs only in Ps 27 12. AV has it in Gen 49 5; Ps 74 20 (RV "violence"); Ezk 34 4 (רָעָה, perekh, "crushing," RV "rigor").

The OT records many acts on the part of chosen individuals and the elect nation which are marked by gross cruelty, particularly when measured by the standards of our own age. Some of these acts are sanctioned by Scripture or even presented as commanded by God, as, for example, the sacrifice of Isaac, the extermination of the Canaanites, the authorization of the avenger of blood and of human slavery, and of retaliation for evil. Some of the deeds performed by Divinely appointed leaders of Israel are characterized by inhumanity. Samuel "hewed Agag in pieces" (1 S 15 33). David massacred the Ammonites with great barbarity (2 S 12 31). Elijah slew the prophets of Baal (1 K 18 40; cf 2 K 1 10; 10 25). Some of the utterances of the Psalmists breathe the spirit of hate and revenge, as in the so-called imprecatory psalms (Ps 137 8,9; 139 21 f). This has often been a matter of great perplexity to the devout student of the Bible. He has found it difficult to reconcile such practices, which bear the stamp of Divine approval, with the highest standards of Christian morality. It is sometimes urged in justification that these deeds are permitted, but not commanded by God. But this answer hardly meets the facts of

CRYSTAL, kris'tal: In EV the word is probably intended to signify rock-crystal, crystallized quartz. This the Greeks called κρύσταλλος, kristallos, "ice," believing it to have been formed from water by intense cold. Thus in Rev 4 6; 21 11; 22 1, either "crystal" (EV) or "ice" (Gr kristallos) suits the context. The word rendered "crystal" in Ezk 1 22 (קֶרֶף, kerah) is ambiguous in precisely the same way (RVm "ice"). In Job 28 17 the context favors AV "crystal," rather than RV "glass" (זִכְרִית, z'khukhūth). Finally, in Job 28 18 RV reads "crystal" for AV "pearls" (Heb qābhish; the weight of evidence favors RV in spite of the parallelism suggested by AV). See also STONES, PRECIOUS.

F. K. FARR

CUB, kub (כֹּבֶד, kūbh; AV Chub): The word occurs only in Ezk 30 5. There it is almost certainly a corruption, and we should read, as in LXX, "Lub," i.e. Libya. Libya, in the earlier part of the same ver (AV), is a mistr of "Put," thus correctly rendered in RV.

CUBIT, kū'bit (אֶמְלָא, 'ammāh; πῆχυς, pēchus): The standard for measures of length among the Hebrews. They derived it from the Babylonians, but a similar measure was used in Egypt with which they must have been familiar. The length of the cubit is variously estimated, since there seems to have been a double standard in both countries, and because we have no undisputed example of the cubit remaining to the present time. The original cubit was the length of the forearm, from the elbow to the end of the middle finger, as is implied from the derivation of the word in Heb and in Lat (cubitum). It seems to be referred to also in Dt 3 11: "after the cubit of a man." But this was too indefinite for a scientific standard, and the Babylonians early adopted a more accurate method of measurement which passed to the nations of the West. They had a double standard, the so-called royal cubit and the ordinary one. From the remains of buildings in Assyria and Babylonia, the former is made out to be about 20.6 in., and a cubit of similar length was used in Egypt and must have been known to the Hebrews. This was probably the cubit mentioned by Ezk 40 5 and perhaps that of Solomon's temple, "cubits after the first measure" (2 Ch 3 3), i.e. the ancient cubit. The ordinary cubit of commerce was shorter, and has been variously estimated at between 16 and 18 or more inches, but the evidence of the Siloam inscription and of the tombs in Pal seems to indicate 17.6 in. as the average length. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES. This was the cubit of six palms, while the longer one was of seven (Ezk 40 5). The cubit mentioned in Jgs 3 16 is from a different word in Heb (גֹּמֶד, gōmedh) and was probably shorter, for Ehud girded it on his thigh under his clothing.

The NT references are Mt 6 27; Lk 12 25, "Which of you . . . can add a c. unto the measure of his life?"; Jn 21 8, "about two hundred cubits off"; Rev 21 17, "the wall thereof, a hundred and forty and four cubits." H. PORTER

CUCKOW, kūk'ōō, kuk'ōō (קֹכַב, shāhaph; λάρος, láros; Lat Cuculus canorus): The Heb root from which the word shāhaph is derived means "to be lean" and "slender," and in older VSS of the Bible was tr<sup>d</sup> cuckoo (cuckoo). It was mentioned twice in the Bible (Lev 11 16, and practically the same in Dt 14 15 AV "cuckoo"), in the list of unclean birds. The Lat term by which we designate the bird is very similar to the Arab., and all names for it in different countries are so nearly the same that they prove themselves based on its double cry, "cuck-oo," or the single note "kowk" or "gouk." The bird is as old as history, and interesting because the European species placed its eggs in the nests of other birds, which gave rise to much fiction concerning its habits. The European bird is a brownish gray with white bars underneath, and larger than ours, which are a beautiful olive gray, with tail feathers of irregular length touched with white, knee tufts, black or yellow bill, according to species, and beautiful sleek head and shining eyes. Our birds build their own nests, attend their young with care and are much loved for their beauty. Their food is not repulsive in any species; there never was any reason why they should have been classed among the abominations, and for these reasons scientists in search of a "lean, slender" bird of offensive diet and habit have selected the "sea-mew" (q.v.) which is substituted for cuckoo in the RV with good natural-history reason to sustain the change.

CUCUMBER, kū'kum-bēr (קִישְׁשׁוּ'יִם, kishshu'im; σίκυος, síkuos): One of the articles of food for which Israel in the wilderness looked back with longing to Egypt (Nu 11 5). Cucumbers are great favorites with all the people of Pal. Two varieties occur, Cucumis sativus (Arab. Khyār), originally a product of N.W. India, which is smooth-skinned, whitish and of delicate flavor, and requires much water in its cultivation, and Cucumis chate (Arab. faqqūs), which is long and slender but less juicy than the former. Probably the Bib. reference is to this latter as it is a plant much grown in Egypt where it is said to attain unusual excellence.

A "garden of cucumbers," or more literally a "place of cucumbers" (mikshāh), is mentioned in Isa 1 8; Bar 6 70. "A lodge in a garden of cucumbers" (Isa 1 8) is the rough wooden booth erected by the owner from which he keeps guard over his ripening vegetables. It is commonly raised upon poles and, when abandoned for the season, it falls into decay and presents a dreary spectacle of tottering poles and dead leaves.

CUD. See CHEW.

CULTURE, kul'tūr: Found only in 2 Esd 8 6 AV and RV, "give . . . culture to our understanding," i.e. to nourish it as seed in the ground.

CUMBER, kum'bēr, CUMBERED (καταργέω, katargēō, "to make idle," περιπαύομαι, perispáomai, "to be drawn about," in mind "to be distracted"): Spoken of the barren fig tree in the parable: "Cut it down; why doth it also cumber [block up, make unproductive] the ground?" (Lk 13 7). Cumbered means to be over-occupied with cares or business, distracted: "But Martha was cumbered about much serving" (Lk 10 40). The word cumbrance occurs only in Dt 1 12: "How can I myself alone bear your cumbrance?" (טָרָה, tōrah, "an encumbrance," "a burden"). Cf Isa 1 14, where RVm has "cumbrance," RV "trouble."

CUMI, kū'ōmē, kū'mī. See TALITHA.

CUMMIN, kum'in (קָמְמִין, kammōn; κύμινον, kúminon): The seed of the herb Cuminum cyminum (N.O. Umbelliferae). It has carminative properties and is used for flavoring various dishes, esp. during fasts. In flavor and appearance it resembles caraway, though it is less agreeable to western palates. As an illustration of Jeh's wisdom it is said (Isa 28 25,27) that cummin is scattered in sowing and beaten out with a rod in threshing. These facts are true in Pal today. The Jews paid tithes of cummin (Mt 23 23) (see cut on following page).

CUN, kun (כִּנָּן, kūn; A, ἐκ τῶν ἐκλεκτῶν πόλεων, ek tōn eklektōn póleōn, "from the chosen cities"): One of the cities of Hadarezer, king of Syria, spoiled by David (1 Ch 18 8, AV "Chun"). In the || passage (2 S 8 8) its place is taken by ΒΕΡΟΘΑΙ, which see.

CUNNING, kun'ing (חָכְמָה, hākhām, חָשָׁב, hāshabh): In Bible-English "cunning" means always "wise" or "skilful"; the word does not occur in the bad sense, and it is found in the OT only. The chief Heb words are hākhām, "wise," "skilful" (2 Ch 2 7 AV "a man cunning to work in gold"; ver 13; Isa 3 3 AV, etc); hāshabh, "to think," "devise," "desire" (Ex 26 1.31; 28 6.15 AV, etc). We have also da'ath, "knowledge" (1 K 7 14 AV); bin, "to be intelligent" (1 Ch 25 7 AV); ma-hāshebheheth, "thought," "device," "design" (Ex 31 4; 35 33.35 AV); āmān, "artificer" (Cant 7 1 AV); yādha, "to know," once tr<sup>d</sup> "cunning" (Dnl 1 4 AV). For "cunning" ARV gives "skilful" (Ex 31 4, etc; Isa 3 3 "expert"); for "cunning work" the work of the "skilful workman" (Ex 26 1.31, etc, ERV "cunning workman"); for "curious," "skilfully woven," ERV "cunningly woven" (Ex 28 8, etc).

Cummin.

CUP (most frequently, כִּיֹּס, kōs; four other words in one passage each; ποτήριον, potērion): A vessel for drinking from, of a variety of material (gold, silver, earthenware), patterns (Est 1 7) and elaboration.

Figurative: By ordinary fig. of speech, put sometimes for the contents of the cup, viz. for that which is drunk (Mt 26 39). In both OT and NT applied fig. to that which is portioned out, and of which one is to partake; most frequently used of what is sorrowful, as God's judgments, His wrath, afflictions, etc (Ps 11 6; 75 8; Isa 51 17; Rev 14 10). In a similar sense, used by Christ concerning the sufferings endured by Him (Mt 26 39), and the calamities attending the confession of His name (Mt 20 23). In the OT applied also to the blessedness and joy of the children of God, and the full provision made for their wants (Ps 16 5; 23 5; 116 13; cf Jer 16 7; Prov 31 6). All these passages refer not only to the experience of an allotted joy and sorrow, but to the fact that all others share in this experience. Within a community of those having the same interests or lot, each received his apportioned measure, just as at a feast, each cup is filled for the individual to drain at the same time that his fellow-guests are occupied in the same way.

The Holy Supper is called "the cup of the Lord" (1 Cor 10 21), since it is the Lord who makes the feast, and tenders the cup, just as "the cup of demons" with which it is contrasted, refers to what they offer and communicate. In 1 Cor 11 25, the cup is called "the new covenant in my blood," i.e. it is a pledge and seal and means of imparting the blessings of the new covenant (He 10 16 f)—a covenant established by the shedding of the blood of Christ. The use of the word "cup" for the sacrament shows how prominent was the part which the cup had in the Lord's Supper in apostolic times.

Not only were all commanded to drink of the wine (Mt 26 27), but the very irregularities in the Corinthian church point to its universal use (1 Cor 11 27). Nor does the Rom church attempt to justify its withholding the cup from the laity (the communion in one form) upon conformity with apostolic practice, or upon direct Scriptural authority. This variation from the original institution is an outgrowth of the doctrines of transubstantiation and sacramental concomitance, of the attempt to transform the sacrament of the Eucharist into the sacrifice of the Mass, and of the wide separation between clergy and laity resulting from raising the ministry to the rank of a sacerdotal order. The practice was condemned by Popes Leo I (d. 461) and Gelasius (d. 496); but gained a firm hold in the 12th cent., and was enacted into a church regulation by the Council of Constance in 1415. See also BLESSING, CUP OF.

As to the use of cups for divination (Gen 44 5), the reference is to superstitious practice derived from the Gentiles. For various modes of divining what is unknown by the pouring of water into bowls, and making observations accordingly, see Geikie, Hours with the Bible, I, 492 f, and art. DIVINATION.

H. E. JACOBS

CUPBEARER, kup'bār-ēr (מַשְׁכֵּה, mashkeh, "one giving drink"; οἰνοχόος, oinochóos): An officer of high rank at ancient oriental courts, whose duty it was to serve the wine at the king's table. On account of the constant fear of plots and intrigues, a person must be regarded as thoroughly trustworthy to hold this position. He must guard against poison in the king's cup, and was sometimes required to swallow some of the wine before serving it. His confidential relations with the king often endeared him to his sovereign and also gave him a position of great influence. This officer is first mentioned in Scripture in Gen 40 1 f, where the Heb word elsewhere tr<sup>d</sup> "cupbearer" is rendered "butler." The phrase "chief of the butlers" (ver 2) accords with the fact that there were often a number of such officials under one as chief (cf Xen. Hellen. vii.1, 38). Nehemiah (cf 1 11) was cupbearer to Artaxerxes Longimanus, and was held in high esteem by him, as the record shows. His financial ability (Neh 5 8.10.14.17) would indicate that the office was a lucrative one. Cupbearers are mentioned further in 1 K 10 5; 2 Ch 9 4, where they, among other evidences of royal splendor, are stated to have impressed the queen of Sheba with Solomon's glory. The title Rabshakeh (Isa 36 2), once thought to mean "chief of the cupbearers," is now given a different derivation and explained as "chief of the officers," or "princes" (BDB s.v.). See further on cupbearers Herod. iii.34; Xen. Cyrop. i.3, 8, 9; Jos, Ant. XVI, viii, 1; Tob 1 22.

BENJAMIN RENO DOWNER

CUPBOARD, kub'ērd (κυλίκιον, kulikion, 1 Macc 15 32): A kind of sideboard in or on which Simon's gold and silver vessels were displayed, and which, among other evidences of his glory, amazed the Syrian envoy Athenobius. Cf the Rom abacus, said to have been introduced into Rome from Asia.

CURDLE, kūr'd'l (קָפָה, kāphā, "to congeal," "harden," "curdle"): Occurs in Job 10 10, "Hast thou not . . . curdled me like cheese?" i.e. made him take solid form. "The formation of the embryo is a mystery on which the Heb dwells with a deep and reverential awe: cf Ps 139 13-16." These similes are often met with in the Koran and oriental poetry. See Speaker's Comm. in loc.

CURE, kūr, CURES: Represents the words קָרָה, gāhāh, קָרַפְּה, marpē, רָפָה, rāphāh; θεραπεύω, therapeuō, laōis, iasis. Gāhāh in Prov 17 22 tr<sup>d</sup>

"medicine" means properly the removal of a bandage from a healed wound, and is used figuratively in Hos 5 13; marpe, "healing," is used in the sense of deliverance of the city in Jer 33 6; with a negative particle in 2 Ch 21 18 it is used to describe the bowel disease of Jehoram as incurable. The Gr words are used of physical cures (iasis in Lk 13 32) as contradistinguished from the casting out of demons as Mt 17 16; Lk 7 21; Jn 5 10. Cure is only used in the NT in the sense of physical healing; in the OT usually in the sense of spiritual or national deliverance from danger.

ALEX. MACALISTER

CURRENT MONEY. See MONEY, CURRENT.

CURSE, kûrs (אָלָה, ālāh [Nu 5 21.23.27, etc], מְאָרָה, mē'ērāh [Prov 3 33; Mal 2 2, etc], קְלָלָה, k'lālāh [Gen 27 12.13]; κατάρα, katára [Gal 3 10.13]): This word as noun and vb. renders different Heb words, some of them being more or less synonymous, differing only in degree of strength. It is often used in contrast with "bless" or "blessing" (Dt 11 29). When a curse is pronounced against any person, we are not to understand this as a mere wish, however violent, that disaster should overtake the person in question, any more than we are to understand that a corresponding "blessing" conveys simply a wish that prosperity should be the lot of the person on whom the blessing is invoked. A curse was considered to possess an inherent power of carrying itself into effect. Prayer has been defined as a wish referred to God. Curses (or blessings) were imprecations referred to supernatural beings in whose existence and power to do good or inflict harm primitive man believed. The use of magic and spells of all kinds is based on the belief that it is possible to enlist the support of the superhuman beings with whom the universe abounds, and to persuade them to carry out the suppliant's wishes. It has been suggested that spells were written on pieces of parchment and cast to the winds in the belief that they would find their way to their proper destination—that some demoniac being would act as postman and deliver them at the proper address. In Zec (5 1-3) the "flying roll," with curses inscribed on it "goeth forth over the face of the whole land." It would find its way into the house of every thief and perjurer. But it was not always possible to commit curses to writing, it was enough to utter them aloud. Generally the name of some deity would be coupled with such imprecations, as Goliath cursed David by his gods (1 S 17 43). Such curses once uttered possessed the power of self-realization. It was customary for heads of families in their declining years to bless their children, such a blessing being, not simply a paternal wish that their children should prosper in life, but a potent factor in determining their welfare (Gen 9 25). In this case Jacob seeks his father's blessing, which was more than his father's good wishes for his future career. Such blessings and curses were independent of moral considerations. Before moral distinctions played any part in molding theological conceptions it was not necessary, before a spell could be effectual, that the individual against whom the spell was pronounced should be deserving, on moral grounds, of the fate which was invoked on him. It was sufficient that he should be the foe of the author of the curse. We may assume that such curses signalized the commencement of a battle. But in process of time such indiscriminate imprecations would not satisfy enlightened moral judgment. In the dramatic situation depicted in Dt (11 29; 27 12 f) the curse was placed on Mt. Ebal and the blessing on Mt. Gerizim. But the curse was the penalty for disobedience, as the blessing was the reward for obedience. The Book of Prov (26 2) summarily dismisses the traditional belief—"the curse that is causeless alighteth not." "In the discourses of Jesus we find blessings and curses. They are however simply authoritative declarations of the eternal connection between right doing and happiness, wrong doing and misery" (Cheyne).

Whereas curses by ordinary persons were considered more or less efficacious—some god being always only too glad to speed them on their way to their destination—yet special persons—"holy" persons—in virtue of their special relation to Divine beings possessed special powers of pronouncing effectual curses on account of their powers of enlisting supernatural aid. Balaam, according to the narrative in Nu (22 f), was an expert in the art. Balak was convinced that Balaam's curse would bring about the defeat of the Israelites (see Gray, "Numbers," ICC).

The term—and the thing signified—plays an important part in Paul's interpretation of the cross. In the light of the law all men are guilty. There is no acquittal through appeal to a law that commands and never forgives—prohibits and never relents. The violator of the law is under a curse. His doom has been pronounced. Escape is impossible. But on the cross Jesus Christ endured the curse—for "cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree" (Gal 3 10.13)—and a curse that has overtaken its victim is a spent force. See PUNISHMENTS.

Jesus commands His disciples, "Bless them that curse you" (Lk 6 28; cf Rom 12 14). He Himself cursed the fruitless fig tree (Mk 11 21)—a symbol of the doom of a fruitless people.

Curse as the rendering of חָרַם, ḥērem, implies a totally different idea (see ACCURSED). T. LEWIS

CURTAIN, kūr't'n, -ten, -tin: The word ordinarily used for curtain is יָרִיכָה, y'rī'āh. Thus in Ex 26 1 f; 36 8 f of the curtains of the tabernacle (see TABERNACLE); in 2 S 7 2; Ps 104 2; Cant 1 5; Isa 54 2; Jer 4 20; 10 20; 49 29; Hab 3 7.

Figurative: In Isa 40 22 (like Ps 104 2, of the heavens), the word used is דֹּק, dōk, lit. "gauze."

CUSH, kush (כּוּשׁ, kūsh):

(1) The first of the sons of Ham, from whom sprang Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah and Sabteah. He was also the father of

1. The Ancestor of Many Nations Nimrod, who founded Babel (Babylon) and the other great states of Shinar or Babylonia (Gen 10 6-8). The meaning of the name is uncertain.

(2) The name of the country around which the Gihon flowed (Gen 2 13), rendered "Ethiopia" in the AV, but in view of the distance of that country from the other rivers mentioned, this seems to be an unlikely identification. Fried-

Delitzsch has suggested (Wo lag das Paradies? 74 ff) that the watercourse in question is the canal Gu-handê or Arahtu, which, coming from the S., entered Babylon a little to the E. of the Euphrates, and, flowing alongside the Festival-Street, entered the Euphrates to the N. of Nebuchadrezzar's palace. Koldewey (Tempel von Babylon und Borsippa, 38) regards the Gu-handê as the section of the Euphrates itself at this point. There is no indication, however, that the district which it inclosed was ever called Kâšu or Cush, and the suppression of the final syllable of Gu-handê would remain unexplained. Moreover, the identification of Cush with a possible Caš, for Kasdu, "Chaldea," seems likewise improbable, esp. as that name could only have been applied, in early times, to the district bordering on the Persian Gulf (see CHALDEA). Another theory is, that the Cush of Gen 2 13 is the Kusu of certain Assy letters, where it seems to designate a district in the neighborhood of Cappadocia. This identification apparently leads us back to an ancient tradition at one time current in the East, but later forgotten, which caused the Pyramus river to assume the name of Jihân (i.e. Gihon). This stream rises in the mountains N.E. of the Gulf of Alexandretta, and, taking a southwesterly course, flows into the Mediterranean near Karatash. Though nearer than the Ethiopian Cush, this is still too far W., and therefore unsatisfactory as an identification—all the streams or waterways of the Garden of Eden ought to flow through the same district.

(3) The well-known country of Cush or Ethiopia, from Syene (Ezk 29 10) southward—Egypt Kôš, Bab Kâšu, Assy Kâsu. This name sometimes denotes the land (Isa 11 11; 18 1; Zeph 3 10; Ezk 29 10; Job 28 19; Est 1 1; 8 9); sometimes the people (Isa 20 4; Jer 46 9; Ezk 38 5); but is in many passages uncertain. Notwithstanding that the descendants of Ham are always regarded as non-Semites, the Ethiopians, Ge'ez, as they called themselves, spoke a Sem language of special interest on account of its likeness to Himyaritic, and its illustration of certain forms in Assyro-Babylonian. These Cushites were in all probability migrants from another (more northerly) district, and akin to the Canaanites—like them, dark, but by no means black, and certainly not Negroes. W. Max Müller (Asien und Europa, 113 n.) states that it cannot be proved whether the Egyptians had quite black neighbors (on the S.). In earlier times they are represented as brown, and later as brown mingled with black, implying that negroes only came to their knowledge as a distinct and extensive race in comparatively late times. Moses' (first?) wife (Nu 12 1) was certainly therefore not a Negress, but simply a Cushite woman, probably speaking a Sem language—prehistoric Ge'ez or Ethiopian (see CUSHITE WOMAN). In all probability Sem tribes were classed as Hamitic simply because they acknowledged the supremacy of the Hamitic Egyptians, just as the non-Sem Elamites were set down as Semites (Gen 10 22) on account of their acknowledging Bab supremacy. It is doubtful whether the Hebrews, in ancient times, knew of the Negro race—they probably became acquainted with them long after the Egyptians.

In the opinion of W. Max Müller (A. und E., 112), the Egyptians, when they became acquainted with the Negroes, having no word to express this race, classed them with the nehesh, which thereafter included the Negroes. If the Heb name Phine-has (Pî-nêhâš) be really Egypt, and mean "the black," there is still no need to suppose that this meant "the Negro," for no Israelite

5. Negroes would have borne a name with such a Probably signification. The treasurer of Candace not In- queen of Meroë (Acts 8 27-39)—the cluded Ethiopian eunuch—was an Abyssinian, not a Negro; and being an educated man, was able to read the Heb Scriptures in the Gr (Sept) version. Cush (mât Kusi, pr. Kushi) is frequently mentioned in the Assy inscriptions in company with Meluhha (Meroḥḥa) to indicate Ethiopia and Meroë. See EDEN; ETHIOPIA; TABLE OF NATIONS. T. G. PINCHES

CUSH, kush (כּוּשׁ, kūsh; LXX Χουσι, Chou-sei, Ps 7 title): A Benjamite, perhaps he that "was without cause" the "adversary" of David (cf Ps 7 4). See CUSHI.

CUSHAN, kū'shan: In the Ps of Habakkuk (Hab 3 7) "the tents of C." are mentioned in an individualizing description of the effects of a theophany. Parallel is the phrase "the curtains of the land of Midian." LXX renders C., כּוּשָׁן, kūshān, by Αἰθίοπων, Aithiōpōn, reading perhaps כּוּשִׁים, kūshīm, or כּוּשִׁין, kūshīn (כּוּשִׁין, kūshīn). The context indicates that the same land or people is intended as the OT elsewhere calls Cush, yet vaguely and not in any strict geographical usage that would limit it to Africa.

CUSHAN-RISHATHAIM, kū'shan-rish-a-thā'im (כּוּשָׁן רִשְׁאֲתַיִם, kūshan rish'āthayim, tr<sup>d</sup>, or rather interpreted, as "man from Cush, he of the twofold crime"; LXX Χουσαρθάιμ, Chousarsatháim, AV Chushan-rishathaim): Mentioned in Jgs 3 8-10 as a king of Mesopotamia who was chosen by God as his tool to chastise the Israelites for their idolatry. After Joshua's death the children of Israel soon began to affiliate themselves with the heathen peoples among whom they dwelt. This was the fertile source of all their troubles. God delivered ("sold") them into the hands of the heathen. C.-r. is the first whose name is given in this connection. Barring this short passage in Jgs nothing is known of the man. Eight years the Israelites were under his dominion, when the Lord raised up a deliverer to them, Othniel, the son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother—the first of the judges. WILLIAM BAUR

CUSHI, kū'shī: This name represents כּוּשִׁי, kūshī, in the original (LXX Χουσι, Chousei, Choust), either with or without the art. With the art. (so in 2 S 18 21-32 seven out of eight times, all readings supported by LXX) it simply indicates that the person so designated was of the Cushite people, as in Jer 38 7 ff. Its use without the art. has doubtless developed out of the foregoing according to a familiar process. For the Cush of Ps 7, title read "Cushi" with LXX.

(1) The messenger (RV "the Cushite") sent by Joab to acquaint David with the victory over Absalom. That this man was in fact a foreigner is indicated by his ignorance of a shorter path which Ahimaaz took, by his being unrecognized by the watchman who recognizes Ahimaaz, and by his ignorance, as compared with Ahimaaz, of the sentiments of David, whom he knows only as a king and not as a man. 2 S 18 21 (twice, the second time without the art.), 22.23.31 (twice), 32 (twice).

(2) The great-grandfather of Jehudi, a contemporary of Jeremiah (Jer 36 14). The name Jehudi itself ("a man of Judah") is sufficient refutation of the opinion that the use of C. as or in lieu of a proper name "seems to show that there were but few Cushites among the Israelites."

(3) The father of Zephaniah the prophet (Zeph 1 1). J. OSCAR BOYD

CUSHION, kōōsh'un (προσκεφάλαιον, proskephalaion): In NT, only in Mk 4 38 RV. The word means lit. a cushion for the head (AV "pillow") but was also used of one for sitting or reclining upon, e.g. of a rower's cushion. The art. used with it in this passage suggests that it was one of the customary furnishings of the boat, and it was probably similar to the cushion placed for the comfort of passengers in the stern of modern boats on the Sea of Galilee. "Silken cushions" of Am 3 12 RV is a rendering of the Heb d'meshek from its supposed connection with damask. These cushions formed the divan, often the only article of furniture in an oriental reception room. "Cushions" occurs further in the somewhat doubtful RVm rendering of Prov 7 16; 31 22. BENJAMIN RENO DOWNER

CUSHITE, kush'it: Whereas כּוּשִׁי, kūshī, is elsewhere rendered Ethiopian, in 2 S 18 21-32 it is rendered Cushite in the RV (see CUSHI and cf CUSHITE WOMAN). Its pl., which occurs in Zeph, Dnl and 2 Ch, also in the form כּוּשִׁיִּים, kūshīyīm, in Am, is uniformly tr'd Ethiopians, following LXX. The other OT books use simply כּוּשׁ, kūsh, for people as well as land.

CUSHITE, kush'it (ETHIOPIAN) WOMAN: In Nu 12 1 Moses is condemned by his sister Miriam and his brother Aaron "because of the Cushite woman" (הַאִשָּׁה הַכּוּשִׁיָּה, hā-'ishshāh ha-kūshīth) whom he had married; and the narrator immediately adds by way of needed explanation, "for he had married a Cushite woman" (אִשָּׁה כּוּשִׁיָּה, 'ishshāh kūshīth). Views regarding this person have been of two general classes: (1) She is to be identified with Zipporah (Ex 2 21 and elsewhere), Moses' Midianitish wife, who is here called "the Cushite," either in scorn of her dark complexion (cf Jer 13 23) and foreign origin (so most older exegetes), or as a consequence of an erroneous notion of the late age when this apocryphal addition, "because of the Cushite," etc, was inserted in the narrative (so Wellhausen). (2) She is a woman whom Moses took to wife after the death of Zipporah, really a Cushite (Ethiopian) by race, whether the princess of Meroë of whom Jos (Ant, II, x, 2) romances (so Targum of Jonathan), or one of the "mixed multitude" (Ex 12 38; cf Nu 11 4) that accompanied the Hebrews on their wanderings (so Ewald and most). Dillmann suggests a compromise between the two classes of views, viz. that this woman is a mere "variation in the saga" from the wife elsewhere represented as Midianitish, yet because of this variation she was understood by the author as distinct from Zipporah. The implication of the passage, in any case, is clearly that this connection of Moses tended to injure his prestige in the eyes of race-proud Hebrews, and, equally, that in the author's opinion such a view of the matter was obnoxious to God. J. OSCAR BOYD

CUSTODY, kus'tō-di (רִקְדָּה, yādh, פְּקֻדָּה, pēkud-dāh): In Est 2 3.8 bis.14, yādh, "the hand," is tr'd "custody"; pēkuddāh, "numbering," "charge," occurs in Nu 3 36 RV "the appointed charge," m, Heb, "the office of the charge."

CUSTOM, kus'tum (tax): (a) הָלָאָה, hālākh, Ezr 4 13.20; 7 24 AV; (b) בָּלוֹ, bālō, Ezr 4 13, etc; (c) τελώνιον, telōnion, Mt 9 9; Mk 2 14; Lk 5 27, "receipt of custom" AV, RV "place of toll," the collectors' office; (d) τέλος, tēlos, Mt 17 25 (RV "toll"); Rom 13 7; 1 Macc 11 35 (RV "tolls"; cf 1 Macc 10 31). The tax designated by hālākh in Ezr 4 13, etc, is usually taken to mean a road tax, a toll, from root hālākh, but cf AOF, II, 463, which derives from root ilku, a command, a decree, hence an imposed tax. Bālō from root yābhal is supposed to be a tax on merchandise or produce (as distinguished from "tribute," or the tax on houses, lands and persons), usually paid in kind and levied for the support of the native or provincial government. See Ryle, Cambridge Bible, Ezr-Neh, loc. cit. Telos in NT and Macc is an indirect tax farmed out to the publicans.

WALTER R. BETTERIDGE

CUSTOM, kus'tum (usage): In the OT, except Gen 31 35 where RV renders, better, "manner" (דֶּרֶךְ, derekh, "way"), the words tr'd "custom" are הֹכֶל, hukkāh, "statute," and מִשְׁפָּט, mishpāt, "judgment." Such passages as Jgs 11 39; Jer 32 11, and esp. Ezr 3 4 (AV "custom," RV "ordinance"), illustrate the difficulty of deciding upon the proper tr in cases where "custom" might become "statute," "usage" establish itself as "law." In Lev 18 30; Jer 10 3 the reference is to heathen religious practices.

In the NT Lk 1 9; 2 42; Acts 6 14; 15 1 (AV "manner"); 16 21; 21 21; 26 3; 28 17 (ἔθος, ēthos), and Lk 2 27 from the same Gr root, refer likewise to definitely established religious practices; in every case except Acts 16 21, those of the Jewish law. The RV makes the tr of ethos uniform, reading "custom" in Lk 22 39 (AV "wont") and in Jn 19 40; Acts 25 16; He 10 25 (AV "manner"). Gr. εἰθός, eiōthós, from the same root, is rendered "custom" in Lk 4 16 by EV, and by RV also in Acts 17 2, its only other occurrence in the NT. In Jn 18 39; 1 Cor 11 16 "custom" is the tr of Gr sunētheia, in the sense of "usage" rather than of "law." F. K. FARR

CUT, CUTTING (כָּרַת, kārath, גָּדַח, gādhā, קָטַח, kāḥadh, נָחַח, nāḥah; ἀποκόπτω, apokóptō, ἐκκόπτω, ekkóptō): Many Heb words are tr'd "cut." Of these kārath, "to cut down, out, off," is the most frequent. As "cut off" it is used in the sense of laying or destroying (Gen 9 11; Dt 12 29; 1 K 11 16; Ps 101 8, etc), also for cutting off transgressors from the community of Jeh, which meant probably separation, or exclusion, rather than death or destruction (Gen 17 14; Ex 12 15. 19). Other words are dāmam, "to be silent," "cease" (Jer 25 37 AV; 48 2); gāmāth, "to destroy" (Ps 54 5 AV; 94 23, etc); gādhadh, "to cut one's self," is used of the cutting of one's flesh before heathen gods and in mourning for the dead, which was forbidden to the Israelites (Dt 14 1; 1 K 18 28; Jer 16 6; 41 5; 47 5); seret, sāreteth, "incision," are also used of those "cuttings of the flesh" (Lev 19 28; cf 21 5). See CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH. The cutting of the hair of head and beard in mourning for the dead is referred to in Isa 15 2; "Every beard is cut off" (gādhā), and Jer 7 29, gazaz, "Cut off thy hair [RVm "thy crown"], O Jerusalem" (cf Isa 22 12; Jer 16 6; Ezk 7 18; Am 8 10). This early and widespread practice was also forbidden to the Israelites as being unworthy of them in their relation to Jeh (Lev 19 27; Dt 14 1).

Hārōsheth, "carving," "engraving," is used for the "cutting of stones" (Ex 31 5; 35 33).

In the NT we have apokoptō, "to cut away" (Mk 9 43.45; Gal 5 12 AV; see CONCISION); diapriō, "to saw through" (Acts 5 33, "they were cut to the heart"); dichotomēō, "to cut in two" (Mt 24 51); suntēmnō, "to cut together" (Rom 9 28), "finishing it and cutting it short," i.e. "making it conclusive and brief."

Among the changes of RV are "brought to silence" for "cut down" (Jer 25 37), also for "cut off" (Jer 49 26; 50 30); "sore wounded" for "cut in pieces" (Zec 12 3); for "cut off," "pass through" (Job 11 10), "gone" (Ps 90 10); "rolled up" (Isa 38 12); "cut off" for "destroy" (Ps 18 40; 69 4; 118 10.11.12); for "cut them in the head" (Am 9 1), "break them in pieces on the head of"; for "in the cutting off of my days" (Isa 38 10; Heb d'mī, "silence," "rest"), "noontide," m "Or, tranquillity" (Gesenius, Delitzsch, etc., "in the quiet of my days"); instead of, "I would that they were even cut off which trouble you" (Gal 5 12), ERV has "cut themselves off," m "mutilate themselves," ARV "go beyond circumcision," m "Gr mutilate themselves." W. L. WALKER

CUTH, kuth, CUTHAH, kū'tha (כּוּתָּה, kūthā, כּוּתָּה, kūthāh; Χούά, Chouá, Χουθά, Chounthá): The longer writing is the better of the two, and gives the Heb form of the name of one of the cities from which Sargon of Assyria brought colonists to fill the places of the Israelites which he deported from Samaria in 772 BC (2 K 17 24.30). Probably in consequence of their predominating numbers, the inhabitants of Samaria in general were then called kūthiyim, or Cutheans.

From contract-tablets found at Tel-Ibrahim by the late Hormuzd Rassam, on which the ancient name of the place is given as Gudua or Kutá, it would seem that that is the site which has to be identified with the Bib. Cuthah. It lies to the N.E. of Babylon, and was one of the most important cities of the Bab empire. The explorer describes the ruins as being about 3,000 ft. in circumference and 280 ft. high, and adjoining them on the W. lies a smaller mound, crowned with a sanctuary dedicated to Ibrahim (Abraham). From the nature of the ruins, Rassam came to the conclusion that the city was much more densely populated after the fall of Babylon than in earlier times. A portion of the ruins were in a very perfect state, and suggested an unfinished building.

The great temple of the city was called Ē-meš-lam, and was dedicated to Nergal (cf 2 K 17 30), one of whose names was Mešlam-ta-ēa.

2. The Temple Both city and temple would seem to have been old Sumerian foundations, as the name Gudua and its later Sem form, Kutá, imply.

CUTHA, kū'tha (Κουθά, Kouthá; 1 Esd 5 32, AV Coutha): Head of a family of temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon; not mentioned in the canonical lists.

CUTHAH. See CUTH, CUTHAH.

CUTTING OFF. See CONCISION; PUNISHMENTS.

CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH (שָׂרֵת, seret, שָׂרֵת, sāre'teth): For relatives or friends to cut or beat themselves even to free blood-flowing, especially in the violence of grief in mourning for their dead (see BURIAL; MOURNING), was a widely prevalent custom among ancient peoples, and is well-nigh universal among uncivilized races today (see Spencer, Prin. of Soc., 3d ed, I, 163 ff). The fact is abundantly attested for most of the nations of antiquity, but there are two notable exceptions, the Egyptians (Herod. ii.61, 85; Wilk., Anc. Egypt, II, 374), and the Hebrews (Dt 14 1; Lev 21 5). According to Plutarch (Sol. 21) Solon forbade the women of Athens to beat themselves to the effusion of blood, and the laws of the Twelve Tables, quoted by Cic. (De leg. ii.23) contained a like injunction. Among the ancient Arabs the forbidden practice was associated, as among the Hebrews, with the cutting off of the hair (Wellhausen, Skizzen, III, 160 f).

That the prohibition among the Hebrews was urgently called for is made clear by the way it is dealt with by the Law and the prophets. The Law of Holiness reads: "Ye are the children of Jeh your God: ye shall not cut yourselves" (Dt 14 1), or "make any incision" (שָׂרֵת, seret; Lev 19 28, שָׂרֵת, sāre'teth; LXX éntomís) in the flesh "for the dead." Probably the earliest reference to the custom as actually prevalent among the Hebrews is in Hos 7 14 (ERVm). It was widely prevalent in the time of Jeremiah among his countrymen, even as among the Philis (Jer 47 5) and the Moabites (48 37; cf Am 8 10; Isa 3 24; 15 2; 22 12; Mic 1 16; Ezk 7 18).

In seeking for the reason or purpose underlying all such prohibitions, we may note, first, that the "cuttings" and "baldness" forbidden are alike said to be "for the dead." Not less explicitly are they said to be incompatible with Israel's unique relation to Jeh—a relation at once of sonship (Dt 14 1) and of consecration (14 2). Moreover such mutilations of the body are always dealt with as forming part of the religious rites of the heathen (as of the Canaanitish Baal [1 K 18 28] note "after their manner," see art. in HDB, s.v.). Both such shedding of blood and the dedication of the hair are found in almost all countries of that day in intimate connection with the rituals of burial and the prevailing belief in the necessity of propitiating the spirit of the deceased. The conclusion, then, seems clearly warranted that such tokens of grief were prohibited because they carried with them inevitably ideas and associations distinctly heathen in character and so incompatible with the pure religion of Jeh, and unworthy of those who had attained to the dignity of the sons ("children") of Jeh. CYAMON, sī'a-mon (Κυαμών, Kuamōn, Jth 7 3): Probably identical with JOKNEAM (q.v.).

CYMBAL, sim'bal. See MUSIC.

CYPRESS, sī'pres. See HOLM TREE.

CYPRIANS, sip'ri-ans (Κύπριοι, Kūprioi): Occurs in 2 Macc 4 29. Menelaus who was high priest at Jerus, and Sostratus who was governor of the citadel, were summoned by King Antiochus to appear before him. "Menelaus left his own brother Lysimachus for his deputy in the high-priesthood; and Sostratus left Crates, who was over the Cyprians." The Cyprians were the inhabitants of the island of Cyprus. Barnabas, who was Paul's associate on his first missionary journey, was a Cyprian (Kuprios; see Acts 4 36). RV designates him as a man of Cyprus. The governor of the island was called a Cypriarch (see 2 Macc 12 2, and of ASIARCH). A. W. FORTUNE

CYPRUS, σίπρος (Κύπρος, Kýpros): An island situated near the N.E. corner of the Levant, in an angle formed by the coasts of Cilicia and Syria. In the OT it is called Kit-tim, after the name of its Phoen capital Kition. The identification is expressly made by Jos (Ant, I, vi, 1) and by the Cyprian bishop Epiphanius (Haer., xxx.25). In the tablets from Tell el-Amarna it is referred to as Alashia (E. Meyer, Gesch. des Alterthums, I<sup>2</sup>, §499), in Egypt records as Asi, while in the Assyrian cuneiform inscriptions it is named Yavnan.

The island is the largest in the Mediterranean with the exception of Sardinia and Sicily, its area being about 3,584 sq. miles. It lies in 34° 30'–35° 41' N. latitude and 32° 15'–34° 36' E. longitude, only 46 miles distant from the nearest point of the Cilician coast and 60 miles from the Syrian. Thus from the northern shore of the island the mainland of Asia Minor is clearly visible and Mt. Lebanon can be seen from Eastern Cyprus. This close proximity to the Cilician and Syrian coasts, as well as its position on the route between Asia Minor and Egypt, proved of great importance for the history and civilization of the island. Its greatest length, including the N.E. promontory, is about 140 miles, its greatest breadth 60 miles. The S.W. portion of Cyprus is formed by a mountain complex, culminating in the peaks of Troödos (6,406 ft.), Mádharí (5,305 ft.), Papóutsa (5,124 ft.) and Máchaira (4,674 ft.). To the N.E. of this lies the great plain of the Mesoréa, nearly 60 miles in length and 10 to 20 in breadth, in which lies the modern capital Nicosia (Lefkosia). It is watered chiefly by the Pedíaeus (mod. Pedías), and is bounded on the N. by a mountain range, which is continued to the E.N.E. in the long, narrow promontory of the Karpas, terminating in Cape Andrea, the ancient Dinaretum. Its highest peaks are Buffavénto (3,135 ft.) and Hagios Elias (3,106 ft.). The shore-plain to the N. of these hills is narrow, but remarkably fertile.

Cyprus is richly endowed by nature. Its fruits and flowers were famous in antiquity. Strabo, writing under Augustus, speaks of it as producing wine and oil in abundance and corn sufficient for the needs of its inhabitants (XIV, 684). The elder Pliny refers to Cyprian salt, alum, gypsum, mica, unguents, laudanum, storax, resin and precious stones, including agate, jasper, amethyst, lapis lazuli and several species of rock-crystal. His list includes the diamond (xxxvii.58) and the emerald (xxxvii.6, 66), but there is reason to believe that under these names a variety of rock-crystal and the beryl are intended. The chief source of the island's wealth, however, lay in its mines and forests. Silver is mentioned by Strabo (loc. cit.) among its products; copper, which was called by the Greeks after the name of the island, was extensively mined there from the earliest period down to the Middle Ages; iron too was found in considerable quantities from the 9th cent. until Rom times. Scarcely less important were the forests, which at an early date are said to have covered almost the whole island. The cypress seems to have been the principal tree, but Pliny tells of a giant cedar, 130 Rom feet in height, felled in Cyprus (xvi.203), and the island supplied timber for shipbuilding to many successive powers.

The original inhabitants of Cyprus appear to have been a race akin to the peoples of Asia Minor.

Its vast resources in copper and timber gained for it a considerable importance and wide commercial relations at a very remote period. Its wealth attracted the attention of Babylonia and Egypt, and there is reason to believe that it was conquered by Sargon I, king of Accad, and about a millennium later by Thothmes III, of the XVIIIth Egyptian Dynasty (1501–1447 BC). But the influences which molded its civilization came from other quarters also. Excavation has shown that in Cyprus were several seats of the Minoan culture, and there can be little doubt that it was deeply influenced by Crete. The Minoan writing may well be the source of the curious Cyprian syllabic script, which continued in use for the representation of the Gr language down to the 4th cent. BC (A. J. Evans, Scripta Minoa, I). But the Minoan origin of the Cyprian syllabary is still doubtful, for it may have been derived from the Hittite hieroglyphs. Phoen influences too were at work, and the Phoen settlements—Citium, Amathus, Paphos and others—go back to a very early date. The break-up of the Minoan civilization was followed by a "Dark Age," but later the island received a number of Gr settlers from Arcadia and other Hellenic states, as we judge not only from Gr tradition but from the evidence of the Cyprian dialect, which is closely akin to the Arcadian. In 709 BC Sargon II of Assyria made himself master of Cyprus, and tribute was paid by its seven princes to him and to his grandson, Esarhaddon (681–667 BC). The overthrow of the Assyrian Empire probably brought with it the independence of Cyprus, but it was conquered afresh by Aahmes (Amasis) of Egypt (Herod. ii. 182) who retained it till his death in 526 BC; but in the following year the defeat of his son and successor Psamtek III (Psammetichus) by Cambyses brought the island under Pers dominion (Herod. iii.19, 91).

In 501 the Gr inhabitants led by Onesilus, brother of the reigning prince of Salamis, rose in revolt against the Persians, but were decisively beaten (Herod. v.104 ff), and in 480 we find 150 Cyprian ships in the navy with which Xerxes attacked Greece (Herod. vii.90). The attempts of Pausanias and of Cimon to win Cyprus for the Hellenic cause met with but poor success, and the withdrawal of the Athenian forces from the Levant after their great naval victory off Salamis in 449 was followed by a strong anti-Hellenic movement throughout the island led by Abdemon, prince of Citium. In 411 Euagoras ascended the throne of Salamis and set to work to assert Hellenic influence and to champion Hellenic civilization. He joined with Pharnabazus the Pers satrap and Conon the Athenian to overthrow the naval power of Sparta at the battle of Cnidus in 394, and in 387 revolted from the Persians. He was followed by his son Nicoteles, to whom Isocrates addressed the famous panegyric of Euagoras and who formed the subject of an enthusiastic eulogy by the same writer. Cyprus seems later to have fallen once again under Pers rule, but after the battle of Issus (333 BC) it voluntarily gave in its submission to Alexander the Great and rendered him valuable aid at the siege of Tyre. On his death (323) it fell to the share of Ptolemy of Egypt. It was, however, seized by Demetrius Poliorcetes, who defeated Ptolemy in a hotly contested battle off Salamis in 306. But eleven years later it came into the hands of the Ptolemies and remained a province of Egypt or a separate but dependent kingdom until the intervention of Rome (cf 2 Macc 10 13). We hear of a body of Cyprians, under the command of a certain Crates, serving among the troops of Antiochus Epiphanes of Syria and forming part of the garrison of Jerus about 172 BC (2 Macc 4 29). This interpretation of the passage seems preferable to that according to which Crates had been governor of Cyprus under the Ptolemies before entering the service of Antiochus.

In 58 BC the Romans resolved to incorporate Cyprus in their empire and Marcus Porcius Cato was intrusted with the task of its annexation. The reigning prince, a brother of Ptolemy Auletes of Egypt, received the offer of an honorable retirement as high priest of Aphrodite at Paphos, but he preferred to end his life by poison, and treasures amounting to some 7,000 talents passed into Rom hands, together with the island, which was attached to the province of Cilicia. In the partition of the Rom empire between Senate and Emperor, Cyprus was at first (27–22 BC) an imperial province (Dio Cassius liii.12), administered by a legatus Augusti pro praetore or by the imperial legate of Cilicia. In 22 BC, however, it was handed over to the Senate together with southern Gaul in exchange for Dalmatia (Dio Cassius liii.12; liv.4) and was subsequently governed by ex-praetors bearing the honorary title of proconsul and residing at Paphos. The names of about a score of these governors are known to us from ancient authors, inscriptions and coins and will be found in D. G. Hogarth, Devia Cypria, App. Among them is Sergius Paulus, who was proconsul at the time of Paul's visit to Paphos in 46 or 47 AD, and we may notice that the title applied to him by the writer of the Acts (13 7) is strictly accurate.

The proximity of Cyprus to the Syrian coast rendered it easy of access from Pal, and Jews had probably begun to settle there even before the time of Alexander the Great.

7. Cyprus and the Jews

Certainly the number of Jewish residents under the Ptolemies was considerable (1 Macc 15 23; 2 Macc 12 2) and it must have been increased later when the copper mines of the island were farmed to Herod the Great (Jos, Ant., XVI, iv, 5; XIX, xxvi, 28; cf CIG, 2628). We shall not be surprised, therefore, to find that at Salamis there was more than one synagogue at the time of Paul's visit (Acts 13 5). In 116 AD the Jews of Cyprus rose in revolt and massacred no fewer than 240,000 Gentiles. Hadrian crushed the rising with great severity and drove all the Jews from the island. Henceforth no Jew might set foot upon it, even under stress of shipwreck, on pain of death (Dio Cassius lxxviii.32).

In the life of the early church Cyprus played an important part. Among the Christians who fled from Judaea in consequence of the persecution which followed Stephen's death were some who "travelled as far as Phoenicia, and Cyprus" (Acts 11 19) preaching to the Jews only. Certain natives of Cyprus and Cyrene took a further momentous step in preaching at Antioch to the Greeks also (Acts 11 20). Even before this time Joseph Barnabas, a Levite born in Cyprus (Acts 4 36), was prominent in the early Christian community at Jerus, and it was in his native island that he and Paul, accompanied by Barnabas' nephew, John Mark, began their first missionary journey (Acts 13 4). After landing at Salamis they passed "through the whole island" to Paphos (Acts 13 6), probably visiting the Jewish synagogues in its cities. The Peutinger Table tells us of two roads from Salamis to Paphos in Rom times, one of which ran inland by way of Tremithus, Tamassus and Soli, a journey of about 4 days, while the other and easier route, occupying some 3 days, ran along the south coast by way of Citium, Amathus and Curium. Whether the "early disciple," Mnason of Cyprus, was one of the converts made at this time or had previously embraced Christianity we cannot determine (Acts 21 16). Barnabas and Mark revisited Cyprus later (Acts 15 39), but Paul did not again land on the island, though he sighted it when, on his last journey to Jerus, he sailed south of it on his way from Patara in Lycia to Tyre (Acts 21 3), and again when on his journey to Rome he sailed "under the lee of Cyprus," that is, along its northern coast, on the way from Sidon to Myra in Lycia (Acts 27 4). In 401 AD the Council of Cyprus was convened, chiefly in consequence of the efforts of Theophilus of Alexandria, the inveterate opponent of Origenism, and took measures to check the reading of Origen's works. The island, which was divided into 13 bishoprics, was declared autonomous in the 5th cent., after the alleged discovery of Matthew's Gospel in the tomb of Barnabas at Salamis. The bishop of Salamis was made metropolitan by the emperor Zeno with the title "archbishop of all Cyprus," and his successor, who now occupies the see of Nicosia, still enjoys the privilege of signing his name in red ink and is primate over the three other bishops of the island, those of Paphos, Kition and Kyrenia, all of whom are of metropolitan rank.

8. The Church in Cyprus

Cyprus remained in the possession of the Rom and then of the Byzantine emperors, though twice overrun and temporarily occupied by the Saracens, until 1184, when its ruler, Isaac Comnenus, broke away from Constantinople and declared himself an independent emperor.

From him it was wrested in 1191 by the Crusaders under Richard I of England, who bestowed it on Guy de Lusignan, the titular king of Jerus, and his descendants. In 1489 it was ceded to the Venetians by Catherine Cornaro, widow of James II, the last of the Lusignan kings, and remained in their hands until it was captured by the Ottoman Turks under Sultan Selim II, who invaded and subjugated the island in 1570 and laid siege to Famagusta, which, after a heroic defence, capitulated on August 1, 1571. Since that time Cyprus has formed part of the Turkish empire, in spite of serious revolts in 1764 and 1823; since 1878, however, it has been occupied and administered by the British government, subject to an annual payment to the Sublime Porte of £92,800 and a large quantity of salt. The High Commissioner, who resides at Nicosia, is assisted by a Legislative Council of 18 members. The estimated population in 1907 was 249,250, of whom rather more than a fifth were Moslems and the remainder chiefly members of the Gr Orthodox church.

CYRÉNE, si-rē'nē (Κυρήνη, Kurēnē, "wall"): Cyrene was a city of Libya in North Africa, lat. 32° 40' N., long. 22° 15' E. It lay W. of

1. Location ancient Egypt, from which it was separated by a portion of the Libyan desert, and occupied the territory now belonging to Barca and Tripoli. It was situated upon an elevated plateau about 2,000 ft. above the sea, from which it was distant some 10 miles. A high range of mountains lies to the S., about 90 miles inland. This shelters the coast land from the scorching heat of the Sahara. The range drops down toward the N. in a series of terrace-like elevations, thus giving to the region a great variety of climate and vegetation. The soil is fertile.

Cyrene was originally a Gr colony founded by Battus in 630 BC. Because of the fertility of the soil, the great variety in climate and vegetation, together with its commercial advantages in location, the city soon rose to great wealth and importance. Greater fame, however, came to it through its distinguished citizens. It was the home of Callimachus the poet, Carneades the founder of the New Academy at Athens, and Eratosthenes the mathematician. To these must be added, from later times, the elegant ancient Christian writer Synesius. So important did this Gr colony become that, in little more than half a century, Amasis II of Egypt formed an alliance with Cyrene, marrying a Gr lady of noble, perhaps royal, birth (Herod. ii.181). Ptolemy III (Euergetes I), 231 BC, incorporated Cyrene with Egypt. The city continued, though with much restlessness, a part of the Egypt empire until Apion, the last of the Ptolemies, willed it to Rome. It henceforth belonged to a Rom province.

In the middle of the 7th cent., the conquering Saracens took possession of Cyrene, and from that time to this it has been the habitation of wandering tribes of Arabs.

Cyrene comes into importance in Bib. history through the dispersion of the Jews. Ptolemy I, son of Lagus, transported Jews to this and other cities of Libya (Jos, CAP, Importance II, 4) and from this time on Jews were very numerous there. By the return of the Jews of the Dispersion to the feasts at Jerus, Cyrenians came to have a conspicuous place in the NT history. "A man of Cyrene, Simon by name," was caught by the Rom soldiers and compelled to bear the cross of Jesus (Mt 27 32; cf Mk 15 21; Lk 23 26). See CYRENIAN. Jews from Cyrene were among those present on the day of Pentecost. Their city appears as one of the important points in the wide circle of the Dispersion described by Peter in his sermon on that occasion (Acts 2 10). Cyrenian Jews were of sufficient importance in those days to have their name associated with a synagogue at Jerus (6 9). And when the persecution arose about Stephen, some of these Jews of Cyrene who had been converted at Jerus, were scattered abroad and came with others to Antioch and preached the word "unto the Jews only" (11 19, 20 AV), and one of them, Lucius, became a prophet in the early church there. In this case, as in so many others, the wise providence of God in the dispersion of the Jews in preparation for the spread of the gospel of the Messiah is seen.

In the ruins of Cyrene are to be seen the remains of some beautiful buildings, and a few sculptures have been removed. The most interesting remains of the wondrous civilization of this Gr colony are in a great system of tombs, some built, but the finest cut in the solid rock of the cliff. Doric architure and brilliant decorative painting adorn these tombs.

CYRENIAN, sī-rē'ni-an, CYRENIANS (Κυρήναιος, Kurēnaios, "a native or inhabitant of Cyrene"): Two Jews of Cyrene are mentioned in the NT, viz. Simon (Mk 15 21 and Lk 23 26 AV) who was impressed to bear the Lord's cross (Mk 15 21 RVm), and Lucius, a Christian teacher at Antioch (Acts 13 1). See CYRENE; LUCIUS; SIMON. For Cyrenians see CYRENE.

CYRENIUS, sī-rē'ni-us (Κυρήνιος, Kurēnios, "of Cyrene"). See QUIRINIUS.

CYRIA, sir'i-a (Κυρία, Kuria): The word means "lady," feminine of lord, and it is so tr<sup>d</sup> in AV and the text of RV (2 Jn ver 5 RVm). But it is possible that the word is a proper name, and this possibility is recognized by placing Cyria, the usual transliteration of the word, in the margin by RV.

The son of the earlier Cambyses, of the royal race of the Achemenians. His genealogy, as given by himself, is as follows: "I am Cyrus, king of the host, the great king, the mighty king, king of Tindir [Babylon], king of the land of Sumeru and Akkadū, king of the four regions, son of Cambyses, the great king, king of the city Anšan, grand-son of Cyrus, the great king, king of the city Anšan, great-grandson of Šišpiš [Teispes], the great king, king of the city Anšan, the all-enduring royal seed whose sovereignty Bel and Nebo love," etc (WAI, V, pl. 35, 20-22).

As, in the Bab inscriptions, Aššan (Anšan, Anzan) is explained as Elam—the city was, in fact, the capital of that country—it is probable that Cyrus' name was Elamite; but the meaning is doubtful. The old Gr etymology connecting it with Anzan khōr, "the sun," in Persian, may therefore be rejected. According to Strabo, he was at first called Agradatēs, the name by which he was universally known being taken from that of the river Cyrus. This, however, is more likely to have been the reason why his grandfather (after whom he was probably named) was called Cyrus.

Several versions of his birth and rise to power are recorded. Herodotus (i.95) mentions three. In that which he quotes (i.107 ff), it is said that Mandane was the daughter of the Median king Astyages, who, in connection (Herodotus) sequence of a dream which he had had, foretelling the ultimate triumph of her son over his dynasty, gave her in marriage to a Persian named Cambyses, who was not one of his peers. A second dream caused him to watch for her expected offspring, and when Cyrus came into the world Astyages delivered the child to his relative, Harpagus, with orders to destroy it. Being unwilling to do this, he handed the infant to a shepherd named Mitrdates, who, his wife having brought forth a still-born child, consented to spare the life of the infant Cyrus. Later on, in consequence of his imperious acts, Cyrus was recognized by Astyages, who came to learn the whole story, and spared him because, having once been made king by his companions in play, the Magians held the predictions concerning his ultimate royal state to have been fulfilled. The vengeance taken by Astyages upon Harpagus for his apparent disobedience to orders is well known: his son was slain, and a portion, disguised, given him to eat. Though filled with grief, Harpagus concealed his feelings, and departed with the remains of his son's body; and Cyrus, in due course, was sent to stay with his parents, Cambyses and Mandane. Later on, Harpagus persuaded Cyrus to induce the Persians to revolt, and Astyages having blindly appointed Harpagus commander-in-chief of the Median army, the last-named went over to the side of Cyrus. The result was an easy victory for the latter, but Astyages took care to impale the Magians who had advised him to spare his grandson. Having gathered another, but smaller, army, he took the field in person, but was defeated and captured. Cyrus, however, who became king of Media as well as of Persia, treated him honorably and well.

According to Xenophon, Cyropaedia i. §2, Cambyses, the father of Cyrus, was king of Persia.<sup>1</sup>

4. His Origin (Xenophon) Until his 12th year, Cyrus was educated in Persia, when he was sent for, with his mother, by Astyages, to whom he at once manifested much affection.

Astyages is said to have been succeeded by his son Cyaxares, and Cyrus then became his commander-in-chief, subduing, among others, the Lydians. He twice defeated the Assyrians (= Babylonians), his final conquest of the country being while the Median king was still alive. As, however, the Cyropaedia is a romance, the historical details are not of any great value.

Nicolaus of Damascus describes Cyrus as the son of a Mardian bandit named Atradata, his mother's name being Argostê. While

5. Nicolaus of Damascus he was adopted by Artembares, a cupbearer, and thus obtained prominence.

Cyrus now made his bandit-father satrap of Persia, and, with base ingratitude, plotted against his king and benefactor. The preparations for a revolt having been made, he and his general Oibaras were victorious at Hyrba, but were defeated at Parsagadae, where his father Atradata was captured and later on died. Cyrus now took refuge in his mountain home, but the taunts of the women sent him and his helpers forth again, this time to victory and dominion.

Ctesias also states that there was no relationship between Cyrus and Astyages (Astyigas), who,

6. His Origin (Ctesias) when Cyrus conquered Media, fled to Ecbatana, and was there hidden by his daughter Amytis, and Spitamas her husband. Had not Astyages yielded,

Cyrus, it is said, would have tortured them, with their children. Cyrus afterward liberated Astyages, and married his daughter Amytis, whose husband he had put to death for telling a falsehood. The Bactrians are said to have been so satisfied at the reconciliation of Cyrus with Astyages and his daughter, that they voluntarily submitted. Cyrus is said by Ctesias to have been taken prisoner by the Sacae, but he was ransomed. He died from a wound received in battle with the Derbices, assisted by the Indians.

In the midst of so much uncertainty, it is a relief to turn to the contemporary documents of the Babylonians, which, though they do not speak of Cyrus' youth in detail, and refer only to other periods of his career in which they were more immediately interested, may nevertheless, being contemporary, be held to have an altogether special authority. According to the inscriptions, the conflict with Astyages took place in 549 BC.

From the cylinder of Nabonidus we learn that the Medes had been very successful in their warlike operations, and had gone even as far afield as Haran, which they had besieged. The Babylonian King Nabonidus desired to carry out the instructions of Merodach, revealed in a dream, to restore the temple of Sin, the Moon-god, in that city. This, however, in consequence of the siege, he could not do, and it was revealed to him in a dream that the power of Astyages would be overthrown at the end of three years, which happened as predicted. "They [the gods Sin and Merodach] then caused Cyrus, king of Anzan, his [Merodach's] young servant, with his little army, to rise up against him [the Median]; he destroyed the wide-spreading Umman-manda [Medes], Ištuwegu [Astyages], king of the Medes, he captured, and took [him] prisoner to his [own] land." The account of this engagement in the Babylonian Chronicle (which is, perhaps, Cyrus' own), is as follows: "[Astyages] gathered his army, and went against Cyrus, king of Anzan, to capture him, and [as for] Astyages, his army revolted against him and took him, and gave him to Cyrus. Cyrus went to the land of Ecbatana, his royal city. He carried off from Ecbatana silver, gold, furniture, merchandise, and took to the land of Anzan the furniture and merchandise which he had captured."

8. The Babylonian Chronicle The above is the entry for the 6th year of Nabonidus, which corresponds with 549 BC; and it will be noticed that he is here called "king of Anzan." The next reference to Cyrus in the Bab Chronicle is the entry for Nabonidus' 9th year (546 BC), where it is stated that "Cyrus, king of the land of Parsu [Persia], gathered his army, and crossed the Tigris below Arbela," and in the following month (Iyyar) entered the land of Iš- . . . , where someone seems to have taken a bribe, garrisoned the place, and afterward a king ruled there. The passage, however, is imperfect, and therefore obscure, but we may, perhaps, see therein some preparatory move on the part of Cyrus to obtain possession of the tract over which Nabonidus claimed dominion.

The next year (545 BC) there seems to have been another move on the part of the Persians, for the Elamite governor (?) is referred to, and had apparently some dealings with the governor of Erech. All this time things seem to have been the same in Babylonia, the king's son (he is not named, but apparently Belshazzar is meant) and the soldiers remaining in Akkad (possibly used in the old sense of the word, to indicate the district around Sippar), where it was seemingly expected that the main attack would be delivered. The reference to the governor of Erech might imply that some conspiracy was on foot more to the south—a movement of which the native authorities possibly remained in ignorance.

After a gap which leaves four years unaccounted for, we have traces of four lines which mention the goddess Ištar of Erech, and the gods of the land of Par . . . (?Persia) are referred to. After this comes the long entry, which, though the date is broken away, must refer to the 17th

9. The year of Nabonidus. A royal visit to a temple is referred to, and there is mention of a revolt. Certain religious ceremonies were then performed, and others omitted. In the month Tammuz, Cyrus seems to have fought a battle in Opis, and succeeded in attacking the army of Akkad situated on the Tigris. On the 14th of the month, Sippar was taken without fighting, and Nabonidus fled. On the 16th Ugbaru (Gobryas) governor of Media, entered Babylon, with the army of Cyrus, without fighting, and there Nabonidus was captured with his followers. At this time E-saggil and the temples of the land seem to have been closed, possibly to prevent the followers of Nabonidus from taking sanctuary there, or else to prevent plotters from coming forth; and on the 3d of Marcheswan (October), Cyrus entered Babylon. "Crowds collected before him, proposing peace for the city; Cyrus, command the peace of Babylon, all of it." Gobryas, his vice-regent, then appointed governors in Babylon, and the gods whom Nabonidus had taken down to Babylon, were returned to their shrines. On the night of the 11th of Marcheswan, Ugbaru went against (some part of Babylon), and the son of the king died; and there was mourning for him from the 27th of Adar to the 3d of Nisan (six days). There is some doubt as to whether the text speaks of the king or the son of the king, but as there is a record that Nabonidus was exiled to Carmania, it would seem most likely that the death of Belshazzar "in the night" is here referred to. The day after the completion of the mourning (the 4th of Nisan), Cambyses, son of Cyrus, performed ceremonies in the temple E-nig-had-kalama, probably in connection with the new year's festival, for which Cyrus had probably timed his arrival at Babylon. According to Herodotus (i.191), Babylon was taken during a festival, agreeing with Dnl 5 1 ff.

The other inscription of Cyrus, discovered by Mr. H. Rassam at Babylon, is a kind of proclamation justifying his seizure of the crown. 10. The Cylinder of Cyrus He states that the gods (of the various cities of Babylonia) forsook their dwellings in anger that he (Nabonidus) had made them enter within Šu-anna (Babylon). Merodach, the chief divinity of Babylon, sought also a just king, the desire of his heart, whose hand he might hold—Cyrus, king of Anšan, he called his title—to all the kingdoms together (his) name was proclaimed.

The glory of Cyrus' conquests probably appealed to the Babylonians, for Cyrus next states that Merodach placed the whole of the troops of Qutû (Media) under his feet, and the whole of the troops of the Manda (barbarians and mercenaries). He also caused his hands to hold the people of the dark head (Asiatics, including the Babylonians)—in righteousness and justice he cared for them. He commanded that he should go to his city Babylon, and walked by his side like a friend and a companion—without fighting and battle Merodach caused him to enter Šu-anna. By his high command, the kings of every region from the upper sea to the lower sea (the Mediterranean to the Persian Gulf), the kings of the Amorites, and the dwellers in tents, brought their valuable tribute and kissed his feet within Šu-anna (Babylon). From Nineveh(?), the city Aššur, Susa, Agadé, the land of Ešnunak, Zamban, Mē-Turnu, and Dêru, to the borders of Media, the gods inhabiting them were returned to their shrines, and all the people were collected and sent back to their dwellings. He finishes by soliciting the prayers of the gods to Bel and Nebo for length of days and happiness, asking them also to appeal to Merodach on behalf of Cyrus "his worshipper," and his son Cambyses.

It was probably between the defeat of Astyages and the capture of Babylon that Cyrus defeated Croesus and conquered Lydia. After

11. Cyrus' History from Asia Minor, he returned to Ecbatana, taking Croesus with him. The states which had formed the Lydian empire, however, at once revolted, and had again to be reduced to submission, this time by Harpagus, his faithful general, after a determined resistance. It was at this period that Cyrus subdued the nations of Upper Asia, his next objective being Babylonia (§9 and the two preceding paragraphs). In this connection it is noteworthy that, in the Bab official account, there is no mention of his engineering works preparatory to the taking of Babylon—the turning of the waters of the Gyndes into a number of channels in order to cross (Herod. i.189); the siege of Babylon, long and difficult, and the final capture of the city by changing the course of the Euphrates, enabling his army to enter by the bed of the river (Herod. i.190-91). There may be some foundation for this statement, but if so, the king did not boast of it—perhaps because it did not entail any real labor, for the irrigation works already in existence may have been nearly sufficient for the purpose. It seems likely that the conquest of Babylon opened the way for other military exploits. Herodotus states that he next attacked the Massagetae, who were located beyond the Araxes. One-third of their army was defeated, and the son of Tomyris, the queen, captured by a stratagem; but on being freed from his bonds, he committed suicide. In another exceedingly fierce battle which followed, the Pers army was destroyed, and Cyrus himself brought his life to an end there, after a reign of 29 years. (He had ruled over Media for 11, and over Babylonia [and Assyria] for 9 years.) According to the Bab contract-tablets, Cambyses, his son, was associated with him on the throne during the first portion of his 1st year of rule in Babylon.

According to Ctesias, Cyrus made war with the Bactrians and the Sacae, but was taken prisoner by the latter, and was afterward

13. The Sacae, Ber- bices, etc Diodorus agrees, in the main, with Herodotus, but relates that Cyrus was captured by the Scythian queen (apparently Tomyris), who crucified or impaled him.

It is strange that, in the case of such a celebrated ruler as Cyrus, nothing certain is known as to the manner of his death. The accounts

14. Doubt as to the Manner of His Death which have come down to us seem to make it certain that he was killed in battle with some enemy, but the statements concerning his end are conflicting. This absence of any account of his death from a trustworthy source implies that Herodotus is right in indicating a terrible disaster to the Pers arms, and it is therefore probable that he fell on the field of battle—perhaps in conflict with the Massagetae, as Herodotus states. Supposing that only a few of the Pers army escaped, it may be that not one of those who saw him fall lived to tell the tale, and the world was dependent on the more or less trustworthy statements which the Massagetae made.

That he was considered to be a personage of noble character is clear from all that has come down to us concerning him, the most noteworthy being Xenophon's Cyropaedia and Institution of Cyrus. The

Bab inscriptions do not reproduce Bab opinion, but the fact that on the occasion of the siege of Babylon the people trusted to his

15. Cyrus' Reputation honor and came forth asking peace for the city (apparently with every confidence that their request would be granted); and that the Babylonians, as a whole, were contented under his rule, may be regarded as tacit confirmation. Nabonidus, before the invasion of his territory by the Pers forces, was evidently well disposed toward him, and looked upon him, as we have seen, as "the young servant of Merodach," the patron deity of Babylon. It is not altogether clear, however, why the Babylonians submitted to him with so little resistance—their inscriptions contain no indication that they had real reason to be dissatisfied with the rule of Nabonidus—he seems to have been simply regarded as

16. Why Did the Babylonians Accept Him? somewhat unorthodox in his worship of the gods; but could they expect an alien, of a different religion, to be better in that respect? Dissatisfaction on the part of the Babylonian priesthood was undoubtedly at the bottom of their discontent, however, and may be held to supply a sufficient reason, though it does not redound to the credit of Bab patriotism. It has been said that the success of Cyrus was in part due to the aid given him by the Jews, who, recognizing him as a monotheist like themselves, gave him more than mere sympathy; but it is probable that he could never have conquered Babylonia had not the priests, as indicated by their own records, spread discontent among the people. It is doubtful whether we may attribute a higher motive to the priesthood, though that is not altogether impossible. The inner teaching of the Bab polytheistic faith was, as is now well known, monotheistic, and there may have been, among the priests, a desire to have a ruler holding that to be the true faith, and also not so inclined as Nabonidus to run counter to the people's (and the priests') prejudices. Jewish influence would, in some measure, account for this.

If the Jews thought that they would be more sympathetically treated under Cyrus' rule, they were not disappointed. It was he who gave orders for the rebuilding of the Temple at Jerus (2 Ch

17. Cyrus and the Jews 36 23; Ezr 1 2; 5 13; 6 3), restored the vessels of the House of the Lord which Nebuchadnezzar had taken away (Ezr 1 7), and provided funds to bring cedar trees from Lebanon (3 7). But he also restored the temples of the Babylonians, and brought back the images of the gods to their shrines. Nevertheless the Jews evidently felt that the favors he granted them showed sympathy for them, and this it probably was which caused Isaiah (44 28) to see in him a "shepherd" of the Lord, and an anointed king (Messiah, τῷ χριστῷ μου, τὸ Χριστὸ μου, Isa 45 1)—a title suggesting to later writers that he was a type of Christ (Hieron., Comm. on Isa 44 1).

From Persia we do not get any help as to his character, nor as to the estimation in which he was held. His only inscription extant

18. Cyrus in Persia—His Bas-relief is above his idealized bas-relief at Murghâb, where he simply writes: "I am Cyrus, the Achemenian." The stone shows Cyrus standing, looking to the right, draped in a fringed garment resembling those worn by the ancient Babylonians, reaching to the feet. His hair is combed back in the Pers style, and upon his head is an elaborate Egypt crown, two horns extending to front and back, with a uraeus serpent rising from each end, and between the serpents three vase-like objects, with discs at their bases and summits, and serrated leaves between. There is no doubt that this crown is symbolical of his dominion over Egypt, the three vase-like objects being modifications of the triple helmet-crown of the Egypt deities. The king is represented as four-winged in the Assyro-Babylonian style, probably as a claim to divinity in their hierarchy as well as to dominion in the lands of Merodach and Aššur. In his right hand, which is raised to the level of his shoulder, he holds a kind of scepter seemingly terminating in a bird's head—in all probability also a symbol of Bab dominion, though the emblem of the Bab cities of the South was most commonly a bird with wings displayed.

DABAREH, dab'a-re. See DABERATH.

DABBESHETH, dab'e-sheth, (דַּבְּשֶׁת, dabbesheth; Δαβασθαί, Dabasthai; AV Dabbasheth, dab'a-sheth): A town on the western boundary of Zebulun (Josh 19 11). It is probably identical with the modern Dabsheh, a ruined site to the E. of Acre.

DABERATH, dab'ê-rath (דַּבְּרָת, ha-dābh'rath, "pasture"; Δαβεῖρώθ, Dabeirōth): A city in the territory of Issachar, on the boundary between that tribe and Zebulun (Josh 19 12). It was assigned to the Gershonite Levites (Josh 21 28; 1 Ch 6 72). The most probable identification is with Dabūriyeh, a village on the lower western slopes of Tabor.

DABRIA, dā'bri-a: One of the five who wrote down the visions of Esdras, described (2 Esd 14 24) as "ready to write swiftly."

DACUBI, da-kū'bi, AV Dacobi, dā-kō'bi: Head of a family of gate-keepers (1 Esd 5 28). See AKKUB; DAKUBI.

DADDEUS, da-dē'us, RV LODDEUS (Δοδδαῖος, Loddaios), which see.

DAGGER, dag'ēr. See ARMOR, ARMS.

DAGON, dā'gon (דָּגוֹן, dāghōn; apparently derived from דָּג, dāgh, "fish"): Name of the god of the Philis (according to Jerome on Isa 46 1 of the Philis generally); in the Bible Dagon is associated with Gaza (Jgs 16) but elsewhere with Ashdod (cf 1 S 5 and 1 Macc 10 83f; 11 4); in 1 Ch 10 10 there is probably an error (cf the || passage 1 S 31 10). The god had his temple ("the house of Dagon") and his priests. When the ark was captured by the Philis, it was conducted to Ashdod where it was placed in the house of Dagon by the side of the idol. But on the morrow it was found that the idol lay prostrate before the ark of the Lord. It was restored to its place; but on the following day Dagon again lay on the ground before the ark, this time with the head and both hands severed from the body and lying upon the miphtān (the word is commonly interpreted to mean "threshold"; according to Winckler, it means "pedestal"); the body alone remained intact. The Heb says: "Dagon alone remained." Whether we resort to an emendation (דָּגוֹן, dāghō, "his fish-part") or not, commentators appear to be right in inferring that the idol was half man, half fish. Classic authors give this form to Derceto. The sacred writer adds that from that time on the priests of Dagon and all those that entered the house of Dagon refrained from stepping upon the miph-tān of Dagon. See 1 S 5 1-5. The prophet Zephaniah (1 9) speaks of an idolatrous practice which consisted in leaping over the miph-tān. The Septuagint in 1 S indeed adds the clause: "but they were wont to leap." Leaping over the threshold was probably a feature of the Phili ritual which the Hebrews explained in their way. A god Dagon seems to have been worshipped by the Canaanites; see BETH-DAGON.

DAILY, dā'li: This word, coming as it does from the Heb דָּיִל, yōm, "day," and the Gr ἡμέρα, hē-mēra, suggests either day by day (Ex 5 13), that which is prepared for one daily (Neh 5 18), as e.g. our "daily bread," meaning bread sufficient for that day (Mt 6 11); or day by day continuously, one day after another in succession, as "the daily burnt offering" (Nu 29 6 AV), "daily ministration" (Acts 6 1), and "daily in the temple" (Acts 5 42 AV). The meaning of the word "daily" as used in the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6 11) seems to indicate sufficient for our need, whether we consider that need as a day at a time, or day after day as we are permitted to live. "Give us bread sufficient for our sustenance."

DAILY OFFERING, or SACRIFICE. See SACRIFICE.

DAINTIES, dān'tis, DAINTY (MEATS)

(מְטַעֲמִים, maṭ'ammoth, "things full of taste," מְטַעֲמִים, maṭ'ammoth, מֶזֶן, ma'ādhān; λιπαρός, liparós, "fat," "shining"): Jacob is represented as predicting of Asher, "He shall yield royal d." (Gen 49 20; cf || clause, "His bread shall be fat," and Dt 33 24, "Let him dip his foot in oil"). David, praying to be delivered from the ways of "men that work iniquity," cries, "Let me not eat of their d." (Ps 141 4). The man who sitteth "to eat with a ruler" (Prov 23 1-3) is counseled, "If thou be a man given to appetite, be not desirous of his d.; seeing they are deceitful food" (cf John's words in the woes upon Babylon [Rev 18 14], "All things that were d. and sumptuous are perished from thee," and Homer's Iliad [Popel, xviii.456]. "Dainties," then, are luxuries, costly, delicate and rare. This idea is common to all the words thus rendered; naturally associated with kings' tables, and with the lives of those who are lovers of pleasure and luxury. By their associations and their softening effects they are to be abstained from or indulged in moderately as "deceitful food" by those who would live the simple and righteous life which wisdom sanctions. They are also "offered not from genuine hospitality, but with some by-ends." He should also shun the dainties of the niggard (Prov 23 6), who counts the cost (ver 7 RVm) of every morsel that his guest eats. See DELICATE; FOOD, etc.

GEO. B. EAGER

DAISAN, dā'san, dā'i-san (Δαϊσάν, Daisán): Head of a family of temple servants (1 Esd 5 31) called Rezin in Ezr 2 48; Neh 7 50, the interchange of D and R in Heb being not uncommon.

DAKUBI, da-kū'bi, da-kōō'bi (Δακούβ, Dakoub, Δακουβί, Dakoubi; AV Dacobi): Head of a family of gate-keepers (1 Esd 5 28) called "Akkub" in the canonical lists.

DALAI AH, da-lā'a, da-lā-i'a. See DELATAH.

DALAN, dā'lan (Δαλάν, Dalán; AV Ladan): Head of a family that returned to Jerus, but which "could shew neither their families, nor their stock, how they were of Israel" (1 Esd 5 37); corresponds to Delaiah (Ezr 2 60). Another reading is "Asan."

DALE, dāl, KING'S (דָּלֶךְ קִנְיָן, 'emek ha-melekh):

(1) "Absalom in his lifetime had taken and reared up for himself the pillar, which is in the king's dale" (2 S 18 18). According to Jos (Ant, VII, x, 3) this was a marble pillar, which he calls "Absalom's hand" and it was two furlongs from Jerus. Warren suggests that this dale was identical with the KING'S GARDEN (q.v.), which he places at the open valley formed at the junction of the Tyropæon with the Kidron (see JERUSALEM). The so-called Absalom's Pillar, which the Jews still pelt with stones in reprobation of Absalom's disobedience, and which a comparatively recent tradition associates with 2 S 18 18, is a very much later structure, belonging to the Græco-Rom period, but showing Egypt influence.

(2) King's Vale (Gen 14 17; AV dale). See KING'S VALE; VALE. E. W. G. MASTERMAN

DALETH, dā'leth (דָּ, דֵּ): The 4th letter of the Heb alphabet, and as such used in Ps 119 to designate the 4th section; transliterated in this Encyclopaedia with the dagesh as d, and, without, as dh (= th in the). It came also to be used for the number four (4), and with the dieresis for 4,000. With the apostrophe it is sometimes used as abbreviation for the tetragrammaton. For name, etc, see ALPHABET.

DALLY, dal'i: Occurs in Wisd 12 26: "But they that would not be reformed by that correction wherein he dallied with them" (παυροῖς ἐπιτιμήσεως, paigrois epitimēseōs, "child play of correction"), the reference being to the earlier and lighter plagues of Egypt; RV renders "by a mocking correction as of children," "by a correction which was as children's play," Gr (as above). He first tried them by those lighter inflictions before sending on them the heavier. In later usage "dally" implies delay.

DALMANUTHA, dal-ma-nū'tha. See MAGADAN. Cf Mk 8 10; Mt 15 39.

DALMATIA, dal-mā'shi-a (Δαλματία, Dalmatia, "deceitful"): A district of the Rom empire lying on the eastern shore of the Adriatic. Writing from Rome to Timothy during his second imprisonment (in 66 or 67 AD, according to Ramsay's chronology), Paul records the departure of Titus to Dalmatia (2 Tim 4 10). No mention is made of his special mission, and we cannot tell whether his object was to traverse regions hitherto unevangelized or to visit churches already formed. Nor can we determine with certainty the meaning of the word Dalmatia as here used. Originally it denoted the land of the barbarous Dalmatae or Delmatae, a warlike Illyrian tribe subjugated by the Romans after a long and stubborn resistance; it was then applied to the southern portion of the Rom province of Illyricum, lying between the river Titius (mod. Kerka) and the Macedonian frontier; later the name was extended to the entire province. On the whole it seems most probable that the apostle uses it in this last sense. See further s.v. ILLYRICUM.

MARCUS N. TOD

DALPHON, dal'fon (דַּלְפֹּן, dalphōn, "crafty"): The second of the ten sons of Haman, slain by the Jews (Est 9 7).

DAM (דָּם, 'ēm, ordinary Heb word for "mother"): Heb law prohibited the destruction of the "dam" and the young of birds at the same time, commanding that if the young be taken from a nest the dam be allowed to escape (Dt 22 6,7). In the same spirit it enjoined the taking of an animal for slaughter before it had been seven days with its "dam" (Ex 22 30; Lev 22 27; cf Ex 23 19).

DAMAGE, dam'āj (נֹזֶק, hābhālā): This word expresses any inflicted loss of value or permanent injury to persons or things. "Why should damage grow to the hurt of the kings?" (Ezr 4 22). In Prov 26 6 "damage" means "wrong," "injury" (Heb נֹזֶק, hāmās). The tr of Est 7 4 is doubtful: "Although the adversary could not have compensated for the king's damage" (RVm "For our affliction is not to be compared with the king's damage"; AV "could not countervail the king's damage"); but Heb נֹזֶק, nēzek (Est 7 4) and Aram. נֹזֶק, nāzik (Dnl 6 2) have the meaning of "molestation" or "annoyance" (see Ges.-Buhl Dict. [15th ed] 489, 806, 908). We therefore ought to read 'for that oppression would not have been worthy of the molestation of the king' (Est 7 4) and 'that the king should have no molestation' (Dnl 6 2). The Gr ζημία, zēmía, "loss" and ζημιόω, zēmiōō, "to cause loss"; RV therefore translates Acts 27 10 "will be with injury and much loss" (AV "damage"), and 2 Cor 7 9 "that ye might suffer loss by us in nothing" (AV "damage"). A. L. BRESLICH

DAMARIS, dam'a-ris (Δάμαρις, Dámaris, possibly a corruption of δαμάλις, dámalis, "a heifer"): The name of a female Christian of Athens, converted by Paul's preaching (Acts 17 34). The fact that she is mentioned in this passage together with Dionysius the Areopagite has led some, most probably in error, to regard her as his wife. The singling out of her name with that of Dionysius may indicate some personal or social distinction. Cf Acts 17 12.

DAMASCENES, dam-a-sēnz', dam'a-sēnz (τῆν πόλιν Δαμασκηνῶν, tēn pólin Damaskēnōn, "the city of the Damascenes"): The inhabitants of Damascus under Aretas the Arabian are so called (2 Cor 11 32).

DAMASCUS, da-mas'kus:

1. Name
2. Situation and Natural Features
3. The City Itself
4. Its History
  - (1) The Early Period (to cir 950 BC)
  - (2) The Aramaean Kingdom (cir 950-732 BC)
  - (3) The Middle Period (732 BC-650 AD)
  - (4) Under Islam

The Eng. name is the same as the Gr Δαμασκόσ, Damaskós. The Heb name is דַּמָּשֶׁק, Dammeseq, but the Aram. form דַּמְשֶׁק, Darmeseq, occurs in 1 Ch 18 5; 2 Ch 28 5. The name appears in Egyp inscriptions as Ti-mas-ku (16th cent. BC), and Sa-ra-mas-ki (13th cent. BC), which W. M. Müller, Asien u. Europa, 227, regards as representing Ti-ra-mas-ki, concluding from the "ra" in this form that Damascus had by that time passed under Aram. influence. In the Am Tab the forms Ti-ma-aš-gi and Di-maš-ka occur. The Arab. name is Dimashk esh-Sham ("Damascus of Syria") usually contrasted to Esh-Sham simply. The meaning of the name Damascus is unknown. Esh-Sham (Syria) means "the left," in contrast to the Yemen (Arabia) = "the right."

Damascus is situated (33° 30' N. lat., 36° 18' E. long.) in the N.W. corner of the Ghuta, a fertile plain about 2,300 ft. above sea level.

2. Situation W. of Mt. Hermon. The part of and Natural the Ghuta E. of the city is called el-Features Merj, the "meadow-land" of Damascus.

The river Barada (see ABANA) flows through Damascus and waters the plain, through which the Nahr el-Awaj (see PHARPAR) also flows, a few miles S. of the city. Surrounded on three sides by bare hills, and bordered on the E., its open side, by the desert, its well-watered and fertile Ghuta, with its streams and fountains, its fields and orchards, makes a vivid impression on the Arab of the desert. Arab. lit. is rich in praises of Damascus, which is described as an earthly paradise. The European or American traveler is apt to feel that these praises are exaggerated, and it is perhaps only in early summer that the beauty of the innumerable fruit trees—apricots, pomegranates, walnuts and many others—justifies enthusiasm. To see Damascus as the Arab sees it, we must approach it, as he does, from the desert. The Barada (Abana) is the life blood of Damascus. Confined in a narrow gorge until close to the city, where it spreads itself in many channels over the plain, only to lose itself a few miles away in the marshes that fringe the desert, its whole strength is expended in making a small area between the hills and the desert really fertile. That is why a city on this site is inevitable and permanent. Damascus, almost defenceless from a military point of view, is the natural mart and factory of inland Syria. In the course of its long history it has more than once enjoyed and lost political supremacy, but in all the vicissitudes of political fortune it has remained the natural harbor of the Syrian desert.

Damascus lies along the main stream of the Barada, almost entirely on its south bank. The city is about a mile long (E. to W.) and about for the most part of a single street, called the Meidan, stretches for a mile beyond the line of the city wall, terminating at the Bawwabel Allah, the "Gate of God," the starting-point of the Haj, the annual pilgrimage to Mecca. The city has thus roughly the shape of a broad-headed spoon, of which the Meidan is the handle. In the Gr period, a long, colonnaded street ran through the city, doubtless the "street which is called Straight" (Acts 9 11). This street, along the course of which remains of columns have been discovered, runs westward from the Babesh-Sherki, the "East Gate." Part of it is still called Derb el-Mustakim ("Straight Street"), but it is not certain that it has borne the name through all the intervening cents. It runs between the Jewish and Christian quarters (on the left and right, respectively, going west), and terminates in the Suk el-Midhadiyah, a bazaar built by Midhat Pasha, on the north of which is the main Moslem quarter, in which are the citadel and the Great Mosque. The houses are flat-roofed, and are usually built round a courtyard, in which is a fountain. The streets, with the exception of Straight Street, are mostly narrow and tortuous, but on the west side of the city there are some good covered bazaars. Damascus is not rich in antiquities. The Omayyad Mosque, or Great Mosque, replaced a Christian church, which in its time had taken the place of a pagan temple. The site was doubtless occupied from time immemorial by the chief religious edifice of the city. A small part of the ancient Christian church is still extant. Part of the city wall has been preserved, with a foundation going back to Rom times, surmounted by Arab work. The traditional site of Paul's escape (Acts 9 25;

3. The City half a mile broad (N. to S.). On the Itself south side a long suburb, consisting

2 Cor 11 33) and of the House of Naaman (2 K 5) are pointed out to the traveler, but the traditions are valueless. The charm of Damascus lies in the life of the bazaars, in the variety of types which may be seen there—the Druse, the Kurd, the Bedouin and many others—and in its historical associations. It has always been a manufacturing city. Our word “damask” bears witness to the fame of its textile industry, and the “Damascus blades” of the Crusading period were equally famous; and though Timur (Tamerlane) destroyed the trade in arms in 1399 by carrying away the armorers to Samarcand, Damascus is still a city of busy craftsmen in cloth and wood. Its antiquity casts a spell of romance upon it. After a traceable history of thirty-five cents, it is still a populous and flourishing city, and, in spite of the advent of the railway and even the electric street car, it still preserves the flavor of the East.

kingdom in Damascus. Rezon, son of Eliada, an officer in the army of Hadadezer, king of Zobah, escaped in the hour of defeat, and became a captain of banditti. Later he established himself in Damascus, and became its king (1 K 11 23 ff). He cherished a not unnatural animosity against Israel, and the rise of a powerful and hostile kingdom in the Israelitish frontier was a constant source of anxiety to Solomon (1 K 11 25).

(2) The Aramaean kingdom (cir 950–732 BC).—Whether Rezon was himself the founder of a dynasty is not clear. He has been identified with Hezion, father of Tab-rimmon, and grandfather of Ben-hadad (1 K 15 18), but the identification, though a natural one, is insecure. Ben-hadad (Bireidri) is the first king of Damascus, after Rezon, of whom we have any detailed knowledge. The disruption of the Heb kingdom afforded the Aramaeans an opportunity of playing off the rival Heb

ABANA RIVER.

(1) The early period (to cir 950 BC).—The origin of Damascus is unknown. Mention has already been made (§ 1) of the references to the city in Egypt inscriptions and in the Am History Tab. It appears once—possibly twice—in the history of Abraham. In Gen 14 15 we read that Abraham pursued the four kings as far as Hobah, “which is on the left hand [i.e. the north] of Damascus.” But this is simply a geographical note which shows only that Damascus was well known at the time when Gen 14 was written. Greater interest attaches to Gen 15 2, where Abraham complains that he is childless and that his heir is “Dammesek Eliezer” (ERV), for which the Syr version reads “Eliezer the Damaschul.” The clause, however, is hopelessly obscure, and it is doubtful whether it contains any reference to Damascus at all. In the time of David Damascus was an Aramaean city, which assisted the neighboring Aramaean states in their unsuccessful wars against David (2 S 8 5 f). These campaigns resulted indirectly in the establishment of a powerful Aramaean states against each other, and of bestowing their favors now on one, and now on the other. Ben-hadad was induced by Asa of Judah to accept a large bribe, or tribute, from the Temple treasures, and relieve Asa by attacking the Northern Kingdom (1 K 15 18 ff). Some years later (cir 880 BC) Ben-hadad (or his successor?) defeated Omri of Israel, annexed several Israelitish cities, and secured the right of having Syrian “streets” (i.e. probably a bazaar for Syrian merchants) in Samaria (1 K 20 34). Ben-hadad II (according to Winckler the two Ben-hadads are really identical, but this view, though just possible chronologically, conflicts with 1 K 20 34) was the great antagonist of Ahab. His campaigns against Israel are narrated in 1 K 20 22. At first successful, he was subsequently twice defeated by Ahab, and after the rout at Aphek was at the mercy of the conqueror, who treated him with generous leniency, claiming only the restoration of the lost Israelitish towns, and the right of establishing an Israelitish bazaar in Damascus. On the renewal of hostilities three years later Ahab fell before Ramoth-gilead, and his death relieved Ben-hadad of the only neighboring monarch who could ever challenge the superiority of Damascus. Further light is thrown upon the history of Damascus at this time by the Assyrian inscriptions. In 854 BC the Assyrians defeated a coalition of Syrian and Palestine states (including Israel) under the leadership of Ben-hadad at Karkar. In 849 and 846 BC renewed attacks were made upon Damascus by the Assyrians, who, however, did not effect any considerable conquest. From this date until the fall of the city in 732 BC the power of the Aramaean kingdom depended upon the activity or quiescence of Assyria. Hazael, who murdered Ben-hadad and usurped his throne cir 844 BC, was attacked in 842 and 839, but during the next thirty years Assyria made no further advance westward. Hazael was able to devote all his energies to his western neighbors, and Israel suffered severely at his hands. In 803 Mari' of Damascus, who is probably identical with the Ben-hadad of 2 K 13 3, Hazael's son, was made tributary to Ramman-nirari III of Assyria. This blow weakened Aram, and afforded Jeroboam II of Israel an opportunity of avenging the defeats inflicted upon his country by Hazael. In 773 Assyria again invaded the territory of Damascus. Tiglath-pileser III (745-727 BC) pushed vigorously westward, and in 738 Rezin of Damascus paid tribute. A year or two later he revolted, and attempted in concert with Pekah of Israel, to coerce Judah into joining an anti-Assyrian league (2 K 15 37; 16 5; Isa 7). His punishment was swift and decisive. In 734 the Assyrians advanced and laid siege to Damascus, which fell in 732. Rezin was executed, his kingdom was overthrown, and the city suffered the fate which a few years later befell Samaria.

(4) The middle period (cir 732 BC-650 AD).—Damascus had now lost its political importance, and for more than two cents. we have only one or two inconsiderable references to it. It is mentioned in an inscription of Sargon (722-705 BC) as having taken part in an unsuccessful insurrection along with Hamath and Arpad. There are incidental references to it in Jer 49 23 ff and Ezk 27 18; 47 16 ff. In the Pers period Damascus, if not politically of great importance, was a prosperous city. The overthrow of the Pers empire by Alexander was soon followed (301 BC) by the establishment of the Seleucid kingdom of Syria, with Antioch as its capital, and Damascus lost its position as the chief city of Syria. The center of gravity was moved toward the sea, and the maritime commerce of the Levant became more important than the trade of Damascus with the interior. In 111 BC the Syrian kingdom was divided, and Antiochus Cyzicenus became king of Coele-Syria, with Damascus as his capital. His successors, Demetrius Eucerus and Antiochus Dionysus, had troubled careers, being involved in domestic conflicts and in wars with the Parthians, with Alexander Jannaeus of Judaea, and with Aretas the Nabataean, who obtained possession of Damascus in 85 BC. Tigranes, being of Armenia, held Syria for some years after this date, but was defeated by the Romans, and in 64 BC Pompey finally annexed the country. The position of Damascus during the first cent. and a half of Rom rule in Syria is obscure. For a time it was in Rom hands, and from 31 BC-33 AD its coins bear the names of Augustus or Tiberius. Subsequently it was again in the hands of the Nabataeans, and was ruled by an ethnarch, or governor, appointed by Aretas, the Nabataean king. This ethnarch adopted a hostile attitude to Paul (2 Cor 11 32 f). Later, in the time of Nero, it again became a Rom city. In the early history of Christianity Damascus, as compared with Antioch, played a very minor part. But it is memorable in Christian history on account of its associations with Paul's conversion, and as the scene of his earliest Christian preaching (Acts 9 1-25). All the NT references to the city relate to this event (Acts 9 1-25; 22 5-11; 26 12,20; 2 Cor 11 32 f; Gal 1 17).

Traditional House of Ananias.

Afterward, under the early Byzantine emperor, Damascus, though important as an outpost of civilization on the edge of the desert, continued to be second to Antioch both politically and ecclesiastically. It was not until the Arabian conquest (634 AD) when it passed out of Christian hands, and reverted to the desert, that it once more became a true capital.

(4) Under Islam.—Damascus has now been a Moslem city, or rather a city under Moslem rule, for nearly thirteen centuries. For about a cent. after 650 AD it was the seat of the Omayyad caliphs, and enjoyed a position of preëminence in the Moslem world. Later it was supplanted by Bagdad, and in the 10th cent. it came under the rule of the Fatimites of Egypt. Toward the close of the 11th cent. the Seljuk-Turks entered Syria and captured Damascus. In the period of the Crusades the city, though never of decisive importance, played a considerable part, and was for a time the headquarters of Saladin. In 1300 it was plundered by the Tartars, and in 1399 Timur exacted an enormous ransom from it, and carried off its famous armorers, thus robbing it of one of its most important industries. Finally, in 1516 AD, the Osmanli Turks under Sultan Selim conquered Syria, and Damascus became, and still is, the capital of a province of the Ottoman Empire.

DAMMESEK ELIEZER (Gen 15 2 ERV). See ELIEZER (1).

DAMN, dam, DAMNATION, dam-nā'shun, DAMNABLE, dam'na-b'l: These words have undergone a change of meaning since the AV was made. They are derived from Lat damnare—"to inflict a loss," "to condemn," and that was their original meaning in Eng. Now they denote exclusively the idea of everlasting punishment in hell. It is often difficult to determine which meaning was intended by the translators in AV. They have been excluded altogether from RV. The words for which they stand in AV are:

(1) ἀπόλεια, apōleia, "destruction," trd "damnable" and "damnation" only in 2 Pet 21 3 (RV "destructive," "destruction"). False prophets taught doctrines calculated to destroy others, and themselves incurred the sentence of destruction such as overtook the fallen angels, the world in the Deluge, and the cities of the Plain. Apōleia occurs otherwise 16 times in the NT, and is always trd in AV and RV by either "perdition" or "destruction": twice of waste of treasure (Mt 26 8=Mk 14 4); twice of the beast that comes out of the abyss and goes into perdition (Rev 17 8,11). In all other cases, it refers to men, and defines the destiny that befalls them as the result of sin: Judas is the "son of perdition" (Jn 17 12). Peter consigns Simon Magus and his money to perdition (Acts 8 20).

Some men are "vessels of wrath fitted unto destruction" (Rom 9 22), and others, their "end is perdition" (Phil 3 19). It is the antithesis of salvation (He 10 39; Phil 1 28). Of the two ways of life, one leads to destruction (Mt 7 13). Whether it is utter, final and irretrievable destruction is not stated.

(2) κρίνω, krinō, tr<sup>d</sup> "damned" only in AV of 2 Thess 2 12 (RV "judged") means "to judge" in the widest sense, "to form an opinion" (Lk 7 43), and forensically "to test and try" an accused person. It can only acquire the sense of "judging guilty" or "condemning" from the context.

(3) κατακρίνω, katakrinō, tr<sup>d</sup> "damned" only in AV of Mk 16 16; Rom 14 23 ("condemned" in RV), means properly "to give judgment against" or "to condemn" and is so tr<sup>d</sup> 17 t in AV and always in RV.

(4) κρίσις, krisis, tr<sup>d</sup> "damnation" in AV of Mt 23 33; Mk 3 29; Jn 5 29 (RV "judgment," but in Mk 3 29, "sin" for ἀμαρτία, hamartēma), means (a) judgment in general like krinō, and is so used about 17 t, besides 14 t in the phrase "day of judgment"; (b) "condemnation," like katakrinō, about 14 t.

(5) κρίμα, krima, tr<sup>d</sup> in AV "damnation" 7 t (Mt 23 14=Mk 12 40=Lk 20 47; Rom 3 8; 13 2; 1 Cor 11 29; 1 Tim 5 12), "condemnation" 6 t, "judgment" 13 t, "law" and "avenged" once each; in RV "condemnation" 9 t (Mt 23 14 only inserted in m), "judgment" 17 t, and once in m, "lawsuit" and "sentence" once each. "Judgment" may be neutral, an impartial act of the judge weighing the evidence (so in Mt 7 2; Acts 24 25; Rom 11 33; He 6 2; 1 Pet 4 17; Rev 20 4) and "lawsuit" (1 Cor 6 7); or it may be inferred from the context that judgment is unto condemnation (so in Rom 2 2,3; 5 16; Gal 5 10; 2 Pet 2 3; Rev 17 1; 18 20, and RV Rom 13 2; 1 Cor 11 29). In places where krima and krisis are rightly tr<sup>d</sup> "condemnation," and where "judgment" regarded as an accomplished fact involves a sentence of guilt, they together with katakrinō define the relation of a person to the supreme authority, as that of a criminal, found and held guilty, and liable to punishment. So the Rom empire regarded Jesus Christ, and the thief on the cross (Lk 23 40; 24 20). But generally these words refer to man as a sinner against God, judged guilty by Him, and liable to the just penalty of sin. They imply nothing further as to the nature of the penalty or the state of man undergoing it, nor as to its duration. Nor does the word "eternal" (αἰών, aiōnos, aiōn, aiōnios, often wrongly tr<sup>d</sup> "everlasting" in AV) when added to them, determine the question of duration. Condemnation is an act in the moral universe, which cannot be determined under categories of time.

These terms define the action of God in relation to man's conduct, as that of the Supreme Judge, but they express only one aspect of that relation which is only fully conceived, when coördinated with the more fundamental idea of God's Fatherhood. See ESCHATOLOGY; JUDGMENT.

DAMSEL, dam'zel: A young, unmarried woman; a girl (lass); maiden (cf Fr. demoiselle). RV in Mt 26 69; Jn 18 17; Acts 12 13; 16 16 gives "maid" for παιδίσκη, paidiskē, "a girl," i.e. (spec.) a maid-servant or young female slave (AV "damsel"), and "child" for παιδίον, paidion, "a half-grown boy or girl," in Mk 5 39,40 bis.41.

DAN (דָּן, dān, "judge"; Δάν, Dán): The fifth of Jacob's sons, the first borne to him by Bilhah, the maid of Rachel, to whom, as the child of her slave, he legally belonged. At his birth Rachel, whose barrenness had been a sore trial to her, exclaimed "God hath judged me . . .

1. Name and hath given me a son," so she called his name Dan, i.e. "judge" (Gen 30 6). He was full brother of Naphtali. In Jacob's Blessing there is an echo of Rachel's words, "Dan shall judge his people" (Gen 49 16). Of the patriarch Dan almost nothing is recorded. Of his sons at the settlement in Egypt only one, Hushim, is mentioned (Gen 46 23). The name in Nu 26 42 is Shuham. The tribe however stands second in point of numbers on leaving Egypt, furnishing

2. The 62,700 men of war (Nu 1 39); and Tribe at the second census they were 64,400 strong (26 43). The standard of the camp of Dan in the desert march, with which were Asher and Naphtali, was on the north side of the tabernacle (Nu 2 25; 10 25; of Josh 6 9 AVm "gathering host"). The prince of the tribe was Ahiezer (Nu 1 12). Among the spies Dan was represented by Ammiel the son of Gemalli (13 12). Of the tribe of Dan was Oholiab (AV "Aholiab") one of the wise-hearted artificers engaged in the construction of the tabernacle (Ex 31 6). One who was stoned for blasphemy was the son of a Danite woman (Lev 24 10f). At the ceremony of blessing and cursing, Dan and Naphtali stood on Mount Ebal, while the other Rachel tribes were on Gerizim (Dt 27 13). The prince of Dan at the division of the land was Bukki the son of Jogli (Nu 34 22).

The portion assigned to Dan adjoined those of Ephraim, Benjamin and Judah, and lay on the western slopes of the mountain. The

3. Territory reference in Jgs 5 17: "And Dan, why did he remain in ships?" seems to mean that on the W. Dan had reached the sea. But the passage is one of difficulty. We are told that the Amorites forced the children of Dan into the mountain (Jgs 1 34), so they did not enjoy the richest part of their ideal portion, the fertile plain between the mountain and the sea. The strong hand of the house of Joseph kept the Amorites tributary, but did not drive them out. Later we find Dan oppressed by the Philis, against whom the heroic exploits of Samson were performed (Jgs 14ff). The expedition of the Danites recorded in Jgs 18 is referred to in Josh 19 47ff. The story affords a priceless glimpse of the Danite Raid conditions prevailing in those days.

Desiring an extension of territory, the Danites sent out spies, who recommended an attack upon Laish, a city at the north end of the Jordan valley. The people, possibly a colony from Sidon, were careless in their fancied security. The land was large, and there was "no want of anything that was in the earth." The expedition of the 600, their dealings with Micah and his priest, their capture of Laish, and their founding of an idol shrine with priestly attendant, illustrate the strange mingling of lawlessness and superstition which was characteristic of the time. The town rebuilt on the site of Laish they called Dan—see following art. Perhaps 2 Ch 2 14 may be taken to indicate that the Danites intermarried with the Phoenicians. Divided between its ancient seat in the S. and the new territory in the N. the tribe retained its place in Israel for a time (1 Ch 12 35; 27 22), but it played no part of importance in the subsequent history. The name disappears from the genealogical lists of Ch; and it is not mentioned among the tribes in Rev 7 5ff.

Samson was the one great man produced by Dan, and he seems to have embodied the leading characteristics of the tribe: unsteady, unscrupulous, violent, possessed of a certain grim humor; stealthy in tactics—"a serpent in the way, an adder in the path" (Gen 49 17)—but swift and strong in striking—"a lion's whelp, that leapeth forth from Bashan" (Dt 33 22). Along with Abel, Dan ranked as a city in which the true customs of old Israel were preserved (2 S 20 18 LXX). W. EWING

DAN: A city familiar as marking the northern limit of the land of Israel in the common phrase "from Dan even to Beer-sheba" (Jgs 20 1; 1 S 3 20, etc.). Its ancient name was Laish or Leshem (Jgs 18 7, etc.). It was probably an outlying settlement of Tyre or Sidon. Its inhabitants, pursuing the ends of peaceful traders, were defenceless against the onset of the Danite raiders. Having captured the city the Danites gave it the name of their own tribal ancestor (Jgs 18). It lay in the valley near Beth-rehob (ver 28). Jos places it near Mt. Lebanon and the fountain of the lesser Jordan, a day's journey from Sidon (Ant. V, iii, 1; VIII, viii, 4; BJ, IV, i, 1). Onom says it lay 4 Rom miles from Paneas on the way to Tyre, at the source of the Jordan. This points decisively to Tell el-Kādy, in the plain W. of Banias. The mound of this name—Kādy is the exact Arab. equivalent of the Heb Dan—rises from among the bushes and reeds to a height varying from 40 to 80 ft. The largest of all the springs of the Jordan rises on the west side. The waters join with those of a smaller spring on the other side to form Nahr el-Leddān which flows southward to meet the streams from Bāniās and Hasbeiyeh. The mound, which is the crater of an extinct volcano, has certain ancient remains on the south side, while the tomb of Sheikh Marzuk is sheltered by two holy trees. The sanctuary and ritual established by the Danites persisted as long as the house of God was in Shiloh, and the priesthood in this idolatrous shrine remained in the family of Jonathan till the conquest of Tiglath-pileser (Jgs 18 30; 2 K 15 29). Here Jeroboam I set up the golden calf. The ancient sanctity of the place would tend to promote the success of his scheme (1 K 12 28 f, etc.). The calf, according to a Jewish tradition, was taken away by Tiglath-pileser. Dan fell before Benhadad, king of Syria (1 K 15 20; 2 Ch 16 4). It was regained by Jeroboam II (2 K 14 25). It shared the country's fate at the hands of Tiglath-pileser (2 K 15 29).

It was to this district that Abraham pursued the army of Chedorlaömer (Gen 14 14). For Dr. G. A. Smith's suggestion that Dan may have been at Bāniās see HGHL<sup>1</sup>, 473, 480 f. W. EWING

DANDLE, dan'd'l (דַּנְדָּל, shā'ōsha', a Pulpal form, from root דַּנְדַּל, shā'a', with sense of to "be caressed"). Occurs in Isa 66 12, "shall be dandled upon the knees."

DANGER, dān'jēr: Danger does not express a state of reality but a possibility. In Mt 5 21 f, however, and also AV Mk 3 29 (RV "but is guilty of an eternal sin") the expression "danger" refers to a certainty, for the danger spoken of is in one case judgment which one brings upon himself, and in the other the committing of an unpardonable sin. Both are the necessary consequences of a man's conduct. The reason for translating the Gr ἐνοχος, énokhos (lit. "to be held in anything so one cannot escape") by "is in danger," instead of "guilty" or "liable," may be due to the translator's conception of these passages as a warning against such an act rather than as a statement of the judgment which stands pronounced over every man who commits the sin. A. L. BRESLICH

DANIEL, dan'yel (דָּנִיֵּאל, dāniyē'el, דָּנִיֵּל, dāni'el, "God is my judge"; Δανιήλ, Daniēl):

(1) One of the sons of David (1 Ch 3 1).

(2) A Levite of the family of Ithamar (Ezr 8 2; Neh 10 6).

(3) A prophet of the time of Nebuchadnezzar and Cyrus, the hero and author of the Book of Dnl.

We know nothing of the early life of Daniel, except what is recorded in the book bearing his name. Here it is said that he was one of the youths of royal or noble seed, who were carried captive by Nebuchadnezzar in the third year of Jehoiakim, king of Judah. These youths were without blemish, well-favored, skilful in all wisdom, endowed with knowledge, and understanding science, and such as had ability to stand in the king's palace. The king commanded to teach them the knowledge and tongue of the Chaldeans; and appointed for them a daily portion of the king's food and of the wine which he drank. After having been thus nourished for three years, they were to stand before the king. Ashpenaz, the master or chief of the eunuchs, into whose hands they had been intrusted, following a custom of the time, gave to each of these youths a new and Bab name. To Daniel, he gave the name Belteshazzar. In Bab this name was probably Belu-lita-sharri-usur, which means "O Bel, protect thou the hostage of the king," a most appropriate name for one in the place which Daniel occupied as a hostage of Jehoiakim at the court of the king of Babylon. The youths were probably from 12 to 15 years of age at the time when they were carried captive. (For changes of names, cf Joseph changed to Zaphenath-paneah [Gen 41 45]; Eliakim, to Jehoiakim [2 K 23 34]; Mattaniah, to Zedekiah [2 K 24 17]; and the two names of the high priest Johanan's brother in the Sachau Papyri, i.e. Ostan and Anani.)

Having purposed in his heart that he would not defile himself with the food and drink of the king, Daniel requested of Ashpenaz permission to eat vegetables and drink water. Through the favor of God, this request was granted, notwithstanding the fear of Ashpenaz that his head would be endangered to the king on account of the probably resulting poor appearance of the youths living upon this blood-diluting diet, in comparison with the expected healthy appearance of the others of their class. However, ten days' trial having been first granted, and at the end of that time their countenances having been found fairer and their flesh fatter than the other youths', the permission was made permanent; and God gave to Daniel and his companions knowledge and skill in all learning and wisdom, and to Daniel understanding in all visions and dreams; so that at the end of the three years when the king communed with them, he found them much superior to all the magicians and enchanters in every matter of wisdom and understanding.

Daniel's public activities were in harmony with his education. His first appearance was as an interpreter of the dream recorded in

2. Dream-Interpreter Dnl 2. Nebuchadnezzar having seen in his dream a vision of a great image, excellent in brightness and terrible in appearance, its head of fine gold, its breast and its arms of silver, its belly and its thighs of brass, its legs of iron, its feet part of iron and part of clay, beheld a stone cut out without hands smiting the image and breaking it in pieces, until it became like chaff and was carried away by the wind; while the stone that smote the image became a great mountain and filled the whole earth. When the king awoke from his troubled sleep, he forgot, or feigned that he had forgotten, the dream, and summoned the wise men of Babylon both to tell him the dream and to give the interpretation thereof. The wise men having said that they could not tell the dream, nor interpret it as long as it was untold, the king threatened them with death. Daniel, who seems not to have been present when the other wise men were before the king, when he was informed of the threat of the king, and that preparations were being made to slay all of the wise men of Babylon, himself and his three companions included, boldly went in to the king and requested that he would appoint a time for him to appear to show the interpretation. Then he went to his house, and he and his companions prayed, and the dream and its interpretation were made known unto Daniel. At the appointed time, the dream was explained and the four Hebrews were loaded with wealth and given high positions in the service of the king. In the 4th chapter, we have recorded Daniel's interpretation of the dream of Nebuchadnezzar about the great tree that was hewn at the command of an angel, thus prefiguring the insanity of the king.

Daniel's third great appearance in the book is in ch 5, where he is called upon to explain the extraordinary writing upon the wall of Belshazzar's palace, which foretold the end of the Bab empire and the incoming of the Medes and Persians. For this service Daniel was clothed with purple, a chain of gold put around his neck, and he was made the third ruler in the kingdom.

Daniel, however, was not merely an interpreter of other men's visions. In the last six chapters we have recorded four or five of his own visions, all of which are taken up with revelations concerning the future history of the great world empires, esp. in their relation to the people of God, and predictions of the final triumph of the Messiah's kingdom.

In addition to his duties as seer and interpreter of signs and dreams, Daniel also stood high in the governmental service of Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar, and Darius the Mede, and perhaps also of Cyrus.

5. Official of the Kings

The Book of Dnl, our only reliable source of information on this subject, does not tell us much about his civil duties and performances. It does say, however, that he was chief of the wise men, that he was in the gate of the king, and that he was governor over the whole province of Babylon under Nebuchadnezzar; that Belshazzar made him the third ruler in his kingdom; and that Darius made him one of the three presidents to whom his hundred and twenty satraps were to give account; and that he even thought to set him over his whole kingdom. In all of these positions he seems to have conducted himself with faithfulness and judgment. While in the service of Darius the Mede, he aroused the antipathy of the other presidents and of the satraps. Unable to find any fault with his official acts, they induced the king to make a decree, apparently general in form and purpose, but really aimed at Daniel alone. They saw that they could find no valid accusation against him, unless they found it in connection with something concerning the law of his God. They therefore caused the king to make a decree that no one should make a request of anyone for the space of thirty days, save of the king. Daniel, having publicly prayed three times a day as he was in the habit of doing, was caught in the act, accused, and on account of the irrevocability of a law of the Medes and Persians, was condemned in accordance with the decree to be cast into a den of lions. The king was much troubled at this, but was unable to withhold the punishment. However, he expressed to Daniel his belief that his God in whom he trusted continually would deliver him; and so indeed it came to pass. For in the morning, when the king drew near to the mouth of the den, and called to him, Daniel said that God had sent His angel and shut the mouths of the lions. So Daniel was taken up unharmed, and at the command of the king his accusers, having been cast into the den, were destroyed before they reached the bottom.

LITERATURE

I. Name.—The Book of Dnl is rightly so called, whether we consider Daniel as the author of it, or as the principal person mentioned in it.

II. Place in the Canon.—In the Eng. Bible, Dnl is placed among the Major Prophets, immediately after Ezk, thus following the order of the Sept and of the Lat Vulg. In the Heb Bible, however, it is placed in the third division of the Canon, called the Kethuvim or writings, by the Hebrews, and the hagiographa, or holy writings, by the Seventy. It has been claimed, that Dnl was placed by the Jews in the third part of the Canon, either because they thought the inspiration of its author to be of a lower kind than was that of the other prophets, or because the book was written after the second or prophetic part of the Canon had been closed. It is more probable, that the book was placed in this part of the Heb Canon, because Daniel is not called a nābhī' ("prophet"), but was rather a hōzeh ("seer") and a hākham ("wise man"). None but the works of the n'bhī'im were put in the second part of the Jewish Canon, the third being reserved for the heterogeneous works of seers, wise men, and priests, or for those that do not mention the name or work of a prophet, or that are poetical in form. A confusion has arisen, because the Gr word prophet is used to render the two Heb words nābhī' and hōzeh. In the Scriptures, God is said to speak to the former, whereas the latter see visions and dream dreams. Some have attempted to explain the position of Daniel by assuming that he had the prophetic gift without holding the prophetic office. It must be kept in mind that all reasons given to account for the order and place of many of the books in the Canon are purely conjectural, since we have no historical evidence bearing upon the subject earlier than the time of Jesus ben Sirach, who wrote probably about 180 BC.

III. Divisions of the Book.—According to its subject-matter, the book falls naturally into two great divisions, each consisting of six chapters, the first portion containing the historical sections, and the second the apocalyptic, or predictive, portions; though the former is not devoid of predictions, nor the latter of historical statements. More specifically, the first chapter is introductory to the whole book; chs 2-6 describe some marvelous events in the history of Daniel and his three companions in their relations with the rulers of Babylon; and chs 7-12 narrate some visions of Daniel concerning the great world-empires, esp. in relation to the kingdom of God.

According to the languages in which the book is written, it may be divided into the Aram. portion, extending from 2 4b to the end of ch 7, and a Heb portion embracing the rest of the book.

IV. Languages.—The language of the book is partly Heb and partly a dialect of Aram., which has been called Chaldee, or Bib. Aram. This Aram. is almost exactly the same as that which is found in portions of Ezr. On account of the large number of Bab and Pers words characteristic of this Aram. and of that of the papyri recently found in Egypt, as well as on account of the general similarity of the nominal, verbal and other forms, and of the syntactical construction, the Aram. of this period might properly be called the Bab-Pers Aram. With the exception of the sign used to denote the sound dh, and of the use of kōph in a few cases where Dnl has 'ayin, the spelling in the papyri is the same in general as that in the Bib. books. Whether the change of spelling was made at a later time in the MSS of Dnl, or whether it was a peculiarity of the Bab Aram. as distinguished from the Egyp, or whether it was due to the unifying, scientific genius of Daniel himself, we have no means at present to determine. In view of the fact that the Elephantine Papyri frequently employ the d sign to express the dh sound, and that it is always employed in Ezr to express it; in view further of the fact that the z sign is found as late as the earliest Nabatean inscription, that of 70 BC (see Euting, 349: 1, 2, 4) to express the dh sound, it seems fatuous to insist on the ground of the writing of these two sounds in the Book of Dnl, that it cannot have been written in the Pers period. As to the use of kōph and 'ayin for the Aram. sound which corresponds to the Heb ṣadhe when equivalent to an Arab. dad, any hasty conclusion is debarred by the fact that the Aram. papyri of the 5th cent. BC, the MSS of the Sam Tg and the Mandaic MSS written from 600 to 900 AD all employ the two letters to express the one sound. The writing of 'āleph and hē without any proper discrimination occurs in the papyri as well as in Dnl. The only serious objection to the early date of Dnl upon the ground of its spelling is that which is based upon the use of a final n in the pronominal suffix of the second and third persons masc. pl. instead of the m of the Aram. papyri and of the Zakir and Sendschirli inscriptions. It is possible that Dnl was influenced in this by the corresponding forms of the Bab language. The Syr and Mandaic dialects of the Aram. agree with the Bab in the formation of the pronominal suffixes of the second and third persons masc. pl., as against the Heb, Arab., Minaean, Sabaeen and Ethiopic. It is possible that the occurrence of m in some west Aram. documents may have arisen through the influence of the Heb and Phoen., and that pure Aram. always had n just as we find it in Assy and Bab, and in all east Aram. documents thus far discovered.

The supposition that the use of y in Dnl as a preformative of the third person masculine of the imperfect proves a Palestinian provenience has been shown to be untenable by the discovery that the earliest east Syr also used y. (See M. Pognon, Inscriptions sémitiques, première partie, 17.)

This inscription is dated 73 AD. This proof that in the earlier stages of its history the east Aram. was in this respect the same as that found in Dnl is confirmed by the fact that the forms of the 3d person of the imperfect found in the proper names on the Aram. dockets of the Assy inscriptions also have the preformative y. (See CIS, II, 47.)

V. Purpose of the Book.—The book is not intended to give an account of the life of Daniel. It gives neither his lineage, nor his age, and recounts but a few of the events of his long career. Nor is it meant to give a record of the history of Israel during the exile, nor even of the captivity in Babylon. Its purpose is to show how by His providential guidance, His miraculous interventions, His foreknowledge and almighty power, the God of heaven controls and directs the forces of Nature and the history of nations, the lives of Heb captives and of the mightiest of the kings of the earth, for the accomplishment of His Divine and beneficent plans for His servants and people.

VI. Unity.—The unity of the book was first denied by Spinoza, who suggested that the first part was taken from the chronological works of the Chaldaeans, basing his supposition upon the difference of language between the former and latter parts. Newton followed Spinoza in suggesting two parts, but began his second division with ch 7, where the narrative passes over from the 3d to the 1st person. Köhler follows Newton, claiming, however, that the visions were written by the Daniel of the exile, but that the first 6 chapters were composed by a later writer who also redacted the whole work. Von Orelli holds that certain prophecies of Daniel were enlarged and interpolated by a Jew living in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, in order to show his contemporaries the bearing of the predictions of the book upon those times of oppression. Zöckler and Lange hold to the unity of the book in general; but the former thought that 11 5-45 is an interpolation; and the latter, that 10 1-11 44 and 12 5-13 have been inserted in the original work. Meinhold holds that the Aram. portions existed as early as the times of Alexander the Great—a view to which Strack also inclines. Eichhorn held that the book consisted of ten different original sections, which are bound together merely by the circumstance that they are all concerned with Daniel and his three friends. Finally, De Lagarde, believing that the fourth kingdom was the Rom, held that ch 7 was written about 69 AD. (For the best discussion of the controversies about the unity of Dnl, see Eichhorn, Einleitung, §§ 612-19, and Buhl in RE, IV, 449-51.)

VII. Genuineness.—With the exception of the neo-Platonist Porphyry, a Gr non-Christian philosopher of the 3d cent. AD, the genuineness of the Book of Dnl was denied by no one until the rise of the deistic movement in the 17th cent. The attacks upon the genuineness of the book have been based upon (1) the predictions, (2) the miracles, (3) the text, (4) the language, (5) the historical statements.

The assailants of the genuineness of Dnl on the ground of the predictions found therein, may be divided into two classes—those who deny prediction in general, and those who claim that the apocalyptic character of the predictions of Dnl is a sufficient proof of their lack of genuineness. The first of these two classes includes properly those only who deny not merely Christianity, but theism; and the answering of them may safely be left to those who defend the doctrines of theism, and particularly of revelation. The second class of assailants is, however, of a different character, since it consists of those who are sincere believers in Christianity and predictive prophecy. They claim, however, that certain characteristics of definiteness and detail, distinguishing the predictive portions of the Book of Dnl from other predictions of the OT, bring the genuineness of Dnl into question.

The kind of prediction found here, ordinarily called apocalyptic, is said to have arisen first in the 2d cent. BC, when parts of the Book of En and of the Sibylline Oracles were written; and a main characteristic of an apocalypse is said to be that it records past events as if they were still future, throwing the speaker back into some distant past time, for the purpose of producing on the reader the impression that the book contains real predictions, thus gaining credence for the statements of the writer and giving consolation to those who are thus led to believe in the providential foresight of God for those who trust in Him.

Since those who believe that God has spoken unto man by His Son and through the prophets will not be able to set limits to the extent and definiteness of the revelations which He may have seen fit to make through them, nor to prescribe the method, style, time and character of the revelations, this attack on the genuineness of Dnl may safely be left to the defenders of the possibility and the fact of a revelation. One who believes in these may logically believe in the genuineness of Dnl, as far as this objection goes. That there are spurious apocalypses no more proves that all are spurious than that there are spurious gospels or epistles proves that there are no genuine ones. The spurious epp. of Philaris do not prove that Cicero's Letters are not genuine; nor do the false statements of 2 Macc, nor the many spurious Acts of the Apostles, prove that 1 Macc or Luke's Acts of the Apostles is not genuine. Nor does the fact that the oldest portions of the spurious apocalypses which have been preserved to our time are thought to have been written in the 2d cent. BC, prove that no apocalypses, either genuine or spurious, were written before that time. There must have been a beginning, a first apocalypse, at some time, if ever. Besides, if we admit that the earliest parts of the Book of En and of the Sibylline Oracles were written about the middle of the 2d cent. BC, whereas the Book of Esd was written about 300 AD, 450 years later, we can see no good literary reason why Dnl may not have antedated En by 350 years. The period between 500 BC and 150 BC is so almost entirely devoid of all known Heb literary productions as to render it exceedingly precarious for anyone to express an opinion as to what works may have characterized that long space of time.

Secondly, as to the objections made against the Book of Dnl on the ground of the number or character of the miracles recorded, we shall only say that they affect the whole Christian system, which is full of the miraculous from beginning to end. If we begin to reject the books of the Bible because miraculous events are recorded in them, where indeed shall we stop?

Thirdly, a more serious objection, as far as Dnl itself is concerned, is the claim of Eichhorn that the original text of the Aram. portion has been so thoroughly tampered with and changed, that we can no longer get at the genuine original composition. We ourselves can see no objection to the belief that these Aram. portions were written first of all in Heb, or even, if you will, in Bab; nor to the supposition that some Gr translators modified the meaning in their version either intentionally, or through a misunderstanding of the original. We claim, however, that the composite Aram. of Dnl agrees in almost every particular of orthography, etymology and syntax, with the Aram. of the North Sem inscriptions of the 9th, 8th and 7th cents. BC and of the Egypt papyri of the 5th cent. BC, and that the vocabulary of Dnl has an admixture of Heb, Bab and Pers words similar to that of the papyri of the 5th cent. BC; whereas, it differs in composition from the Aram. of the Nabateans, which is devoid of Pers, Heb, and Bab words, and is full of Arabisms, and also from that of the Palmyrenes, which is full of Gr words, while having but one or two Pers words, and no Heb or Bab.

As to different recensions, we meet with a similar difficulty in Jeremiah without anyone's impugning on that account the genuineness of the work as a whole. As to interpolations of verses or sections, they are found in the Sam recension of the Heb text and in the Sam and other Tgs, as also in certain places in the text of the NT, Jos and many other ancient literary works, without causing us to disbelieve in the genuineness of the rest of their works, or of the works as a whole.

Fourthly, the objections to the genuineness of Dnl based on the presence in it of three Gr names of musical instruments and of a number of Pers words do not seem nearly as weighty today as they did a hundred years ago. The Gr inscriptions at Abu Simbal in Upper Egypt dating from the time of Psamtek II in the early part of the 6th cent. BC, the discovery of the Minoan inscriptions and ruins in Crete, the revelations of the wide commercial relations of the Phoenicians in the early part of the 1st millennium BC, the lately published inscriptions of Sennacherib about his campaigns in Cilicia against the Gr seafarers to which Alexander Polyhistor and Abydenus had referred, telling about his having carried many Greeks captive to Nineveh about 700 BC, the confirmation of the wealth and expensive ceremonies of Nebuchadnezzar made by his own building and other inscriptions, all assure us of the possibility of the use of Gr musical instruments at Babylon in the 6th cent. BC. This, taken along with the well-known fact that names of articles of commerce and esp. of musical instruments go with the thing, leave no room to doubt that a writer of the 6th cent. BC may have known and used borrowed Gr terms. The Aramaeans being the great commercial middlemen between Egypt and Greece on the one hand and Babylon and the Orient on the other, and being in addition a subject people, would naturally adopt many foreign words into their vocabulary.

As to the presence of the so-called Pers words in Dnl, it must be remembered that many words which were formerly considered to be such have been found to be Bab. As to the others, perhaps all of them may be Median rather than Pers; and if so, the children of Israel who were carried captive to the cities of the Medes in the middle of the 8th cent. BC, and the Aramaeans, many of whom were subject to the Medes, at least from the time of the fall of Nineveh about 607 BC, may well have adopted many words into their vocabulary from the language of their rulers. Daniel was not writing merely for the Jews who had been carried captive by Nebuchadnezzar, but for all Israelites throughout the world. Hence, he would properly use a language which his scattered readers would understand rather than the purer idiom of Judaea. Most of his foreign terms are names of officials, legal terms, and articles of clothing, for which there were no suitable terms existing in the earlier Heb or Aram. There was nothing for a writer to do but to invent new terms, or to transfer the current foreign words into his native language. The latter was the preferable method and the one which he adopted.

Fifthly, objections to the genuineness of the Book of Dnl are made on the ground of the historical misstatements which are said to be found in it. These may be classed as

5. Historical State-ments (1) chronological, (2) geographical, and (3) various.
(1) Chronological objections.—The first chronological objection is derived from Dnl 1 1, where it is said that Nebuchadnezzar made an expedition against Jerus in the 3d year of Jehoiakim, whereas Jeremiah seems to imply that the expedition was made in the 4th year of that king. As Daniel was writing primarily for the Jews of Babylon, he would naturally use the system of dating that was employed there; and this system differed in its method of denoting the 1st year of a reign from that used by the Egyptians and by the Jews of Jerus for whom Jeremiah wrote.

The second objection is derived from the fact that Daniel is said (Dnl 1 21) to have lived unto the 1st year of Cyrus the king, whereas in 10 1 he is said to have seen a vision in the 3d year of Cyrus, king of Persia. These statements are easily reconciled by supposing that in the former case it is the 1st year of Cyrus as king of Babylon, and in the second, the 3d year of Cyrus as king of Persia.

The third chronological objection is based on 6 28, where it is said that Daniel prospered in the kingdom of Darius and in the kingdom of Cyrus the Persian. This statement is harmonized with the facts revealed by the monuments and with the statements of the book itself by supposing that Darius reigned synchronously with Cyrus, but as sub-king under him.

The fourth objection is based on 8 1, where Daniel is said to have seen a vision in the third year of Belshazzar the king. If we suppose that Belshazzar was king of the Chaldaeans while his father was king of Babylon, just as Cambyes was king of Babylon while his father, Cyrus, was king of the lands, or as Nabonidus II seems to have been king of Haran while his father, Nabonidus I, was king of Babylon, this statement will harmonize with the other statements made with regard to Belshazzar.

(2) Geographical objections.—As to the geographical objections, three only need be considered as important. The first is, that Shushan seems to be spoken of in 7 2 as subject to Babylon, whereas it is supposed by some to have been at that time subject to Media. Here we can safely rest upon the opinion of Winckler, that at the division of the Assyrian dominions among the allied Medes and Babylonians, Elam became subject to Babylon rather than to Media. If, however, this opinion could be shown not to be true, we must remember that Daniel is said to have been at Shushan in a vision.

The second geographical objection is based on the supposition that Nebuchadnezzar would not have gone against Jerus, leaving an Egyptian garrison at Carchemish in his rear, thus endangering his line of communication and a possible retreat to Babylon. This objection has no weight, now that the position of Carchemish has been shown to be, not at Ciresium, as formerly conjectured, but at Jirabis, 150 miles farther up the Euphrates. Carchemish would have cut off a retreat to Nineveh, but was far removed from the direct line of communication with Babylon.

The third geographical objection is derived from the statement that Darius placed 120 satraps in, or over, all his kingdom. The objection rests upon a false conception of the meaning of satrap and of the extent of a satrapy, there being no reason why a sub-king under Darius may not have had as many satraps under him as Sargon of Assyria had governors and deputies under him; and the latter king mentions 117 peoples and countries over which he appointed his deputies to rule in his place.

(3) Other objections.—Various other objections to the genuineness of Dnl have been made, the principal being those derived from the supposed non-existence of Kings Darius the Mede and Belshazzar the Chaldaean, from the use of the word Chaldaean to denote the wise men of Babylon, and from the silence of other historical sources as to many of the events recorded in Dnl. The discussion of the existence of Belshazzar and Darius the Mede will be found under BELSHAZZAR and DARIUS. As to the argument from silence in general, it may be said that it reduces itself in fact to the absence of all reference to Daniel on the monuments, in the Book of Ecclesiastes, and in the post-exilic lit. As to the latter books it proves too much; for Hag, Zec, and Mal, as well as Ezr, Neh, and Est, refer to so few of the older canonical books and earlier historical persons and events, that it is not fair to expect them to refer to Daniel—at least, to use their not referring to him or his book as an argument against the existence of either before the time when they were written. As to Ecclesiastes, we might have expected him to mention Daniel or the Three Children; but who knows what reasons Ben Sira may have had for not placing them in his list of Hebrew heroes? Perhaps, since he held the views which later characterized the Sadducees, he may have passed Daniel by because of his views on the resurrection and on angels. Perhaps he failed to mention any of the four companions because none of their deeds had been wrought in Pal; or because their deeds exalted too highly the heathen monarchies to which the Jews were subject. Or, more likely, the book may have been unknown to him, since very few copies at best of the whole OT can have existed in his time, and the Book of Dnl may not have gained general currency in Pal before it was made so preëminent by the fulfilment of its predictions in the Maccabean times.

It is not satisfactory to say that Ben Sira did not mention Daniel and his companions, because the stories concerning them had not yet been imbedded in a canonical book, inasmuch as he does place Simon, the high priest, among the greatest of Israel's great men, although he is not mentioned in any canonical book. In conclusion, it may be said, that while it is impossible for us to determine why Ben Sira does not mention Daniel and his three companions among his worthies, if their deeds were known to him, it is even more impossible to understand how these stories concerning them cannot merely have arisen but have been accepted as true, between 180 BC, when Ecclesiastes is thought to have been written, and 169 BC, when, according to 1 Macc, Matthias, the first of the Asmoneans, exhorted his brethren to follow the example of the fortitude of Ananias and his friends.

As to the absence of all mention of Daniel on the contemporary historical documents of Babylon and Persia, such mention is not to be expected, inasmuch as those documents give the names of none who occupied positions such as, or similar to, those which Daniel is said to have filled.

VIII. Interpretation.—Questions of the interpretation of particular passages may be looked for in the commentaries and special works. As to the general question of the kind of prophecy found in the Book of Dnl, it has already been discussed above under the caption of "Genuineness." As to the interpretation of the world monarchies which precede the monarchy of the Messiah Prince, it may be said, however, that the latest discoveries, ruling out as they do a separate Median empire that included Babylon, support the view that the four monarchies are the Bab, the Pers, the Gr, and the Rom. According to this view, Darius the Mede was only a sub-king under Cyrus the Pers. Other interpretations have been made by selecting the four empires from those of Assyria, Babylonia, Media, Persia, Medo-Persia, Alexander, the Seleucids, the Romans, and the Mohammedans. The first and the last of these have generally been excluded from serious consideration. The main dispute is as to whether the 4th empire was that of the Seleucids, or that of the Romans, the former view being held commonly by those who hold to the composition of Dnl in the 2d cent. BC, and the latter by those who hold to the traditional view that it was written in the 6th cent. BC.

IX. Doctrines.—It is universally admitted that the teachings of Daniel with regard to angels and the resurrection are more explicit than those found elsewhere in the OT. As to angels, Daniel attributes to them names, ranks, and functions not mentioned by others. It has become common in certain quarters to assert that these peculiarities of Daniel are due to Pers influences. The Bab monuments, however, have revealed the fact that the Babylonians believed in both good and evil spirits with names, ranks, and different functions. These spirits correspond in several respects to the Heb angels, and may well have afforded Daniel the background for his visions. Yet, in all such matters, it must be remembered that Daniel purports to give us a vision, or revelation; and a revelation cannot be bound by the ordinary laws of time and human influence.

As to the doctrine of the resurrection, it is generally admitted that Daniel adds some new and distinct features to that which is taught in the other canonical books of the Old Testament. But it will be noted that he does not dwell upon this doctrine, since he mentions it only in 12 2. The materials for his doctrine are to be found in Isa 26 14, 21 and 66 24; Ezk 37 1-14, and in Job 14 12; 19 25; Hos 6 2; 1 K 17; 2 K 4, and 8 1-5, as well as in the use of the words for sleep and awakening from sleep, or from the dust, for everlasting life or everlasting contempt in Isa 26 19; Ps 76 6; 13 3; 127 2; Dt 31 16; 2 S 7 12; 1 K 1 21; Job 7 21, and Jer 20 11; 23 40. The essential ideas and phraseology of Daniel's teachings are found in Isa, Jer, and Ezk. The first two parts of the books of En and 2 Mace make much of the resurrection; but on the other hand, Eccl seems to believe not even in the immortality of the soul, and Wisd and 1 Mace do not mention a resurrection of the body.

That the post-exilic prophets do not mention a resurrection does not prove that they knew nothing about Dnl any more than it proves that they knew nothing about Isa, Jer, and Ezk.

There are resemblances, it is true, between the teachings of Daniel with regard to the resurrection and those of the Avesta. But so are there between his doctrines and the ideas of the Egyptians, which had existed for millenniums before his time. Besides there is no proof of any derivation of doctrines from the Persians by the writers of the canonical books of the Jews; and, as we have seen above, both the ideas and verbiage of Daniel are to be found in the acknowledgedly early Heb literature. And finally, this attempt to find a natural origin for all Bib. ideas leaves out of sight the fact that the Scriptures contain revelations from God, which transcend the ordinary course of human development. To a Christian, therefore, there can be no reason for believing that the doctrines of Dnl may not have been promulgated in the 6th cent. BC.

The best commentaries on Dnl from a conservative point of view are those by Calvin, Moses Stuart, Keil, Zöckler, Strong in Lange's Bibelwerk, Fuller in the Speaker's Commentary, Thomson in the Pulpit Commentary, and Wright, Daniel and His Critics. The best defences of Daniel's authenticity and genuineness are Hengstenberg, Authenticity of the Book of Daniel, Tregelles, Defense of the Authenticity, Auberlen, The Prophecies of Daniel, Fuller, Essay on the Authenticity of Daniel, Pusey, Daniel the Prophet (still the best of all), C. H. H. Wright, Daniel and His Critics, Kennedy, The Book of Daniel from the Christian Standpoint, Joseph Wilson, Daniel, and Sir Robert Anderson, Daniel in the Critics' Den. One should consult also Pinches, The Old Testament in the Light of the Historical Records of Assyria and Babylonia, Clay, Light on the Old Testament from Babel, and Orr, The Problem of the OT. For Eng. readers, the radical school is best represented by Driver in his Lit. of the OT and in his Daniel; by Bevan, The Book of Daniel; by Prince, Commentary on Daniel, and by Cornill in his Intro to the OT.

X. Apocryphal Additions.—In the Gr translations of Dnl three or four pieces are added which are not found in the original Heb or Aram. text as it has come down to us. These are The Prayer of Azarias, The Song of the Three Holy Children, Susanna, and Bel and the Dragon. These additions have all been rejected from the Canon by the Protestant churches because they are not contained in the Heb Canon. In the Church of England they are "read for example of life and instruction of manners." The Three was "ordered in the rubric of the first Prayer Book of Edward VI (AD 1549) to be used in Lent as a responsory to the OT Lesson at the Morning Prayer." It contains the Prayer of Azarias from the midst of the fiery furnace, and the song of praise by the three children for their deliverance; the latter being couched largely in phrases borrowed from Ps 148. Sus presents to us the story of a virtuous woman who resisted the seductive attempts of two judges of the elders of the people, whose machinations were exposed through the wisdom of Daniel who convicted them of false witness by the evidence of their own mouth, so that they were put to death according to the law of Moses; and from that day forth Daniel was held in great reputation in the sight of the people. Bel contains three stories. The first relates how Daniel destroyed the image of Bel which Nebuchadnezzar worshipped, by showing by means of ashes strewn on the floor of the temple that the offerings to Bel were devoured by the priests who came secretly into the temple by night. The second tells how Daniel killed the Dragon by throwing lumps of mingled pitch, fat and hair into his mouth, so causing the Dragon to burst asunder. The third gives a detailed account of the lions' den, stating that there were seven lions and that Daniel lived in the den six days, being sustained by broken bread and pottage which a prophet named Habakkuk brought to him through the air, an angel of the Lord having taken him by the arm and borne him by the hair of his head and through the vehemency of his spirit set him in Babylon over the den, into which he dropped the food for Daniel's use.

LITERATURE.—For commentaries on the additions to the Book of Dnl, see the works on Dnl cited above, and also The Apocrypha by Churton and others; the volume on the Apocrypha in Lange's Commentary by Bissell; "The Apocrypha" by Wace in the Speaker's Commentary, and Schürer, History of the Jewish People.

DANITES, dan'īts (דָּנִיִּי, ha-dānī): Occurs as describing those belonging to Dan in Jgs 13 2; 18 1.11; 1 Ch 12 35.

DAN-JAAN, dan-jā'an (דָּן יָאָן, dān ya'an; B, Δάν Εἰδάν καὶ Οὐδάν, Dán Eidán kai Oudán): A place visited by Joab and his officers when taking the census (2 S 24 6). It is mentioned between Gilead and Sidon. Some would identify it with Khān Dāniān, a ruined site N. of Achzib. The text is probably corrupt. Klostermann would read "toward Dan and Ijon" (cf 1 K 15 20).

DANNAH, dan'a (דָּנָה, dannāh): One of the cities in the hill country of Judah (Josh 15 49) between Socoh and Kiriath-sannah (Debir), probably Idhna—the Iedna of the Onom—8 miles W. of Hebron. See PEF, III, 305, 330.

DAPHNE, daí'nē (Δάφνη, Dáphnē, "bay-tree"): A suburb of Antioch on the Orontes, according to Strabo and the Jerus itinerary, about 40 furlongs, or 5 miles distant. It is identified with Beit el-Mā' on the left bank of the river, to the S.W. of the city. Here were the famous grove and sanctuary of Apollo. The grove and shrine owed their origin to Seleucus Nicator. It was a place of great natural beauty, and the Seleucid kings spared no outlay in adding to its attractions. The precincts enjoyed the right of asylum. Hither fled Onias the high priest (171 BC) from the wrath of Menelaus whom he had offended by plain speech. To the disgust and indignation of Jew and Gentile alike, he was lured from the sanctuary by Andronicus and basely put to death (2 Macc 4 33-38). It sheltered fugitives dyed with villainy of every shade. It was the great pleasure resort of the citizens of Antioch; and it gained an evil repute for immorality, as witnessed by the proverbial Daphnici mores. In Tiberim defluxit Orontes, says Juvenal (iii.62), indicating one main source of the corruption that demoralized the imperial city. The decline of Daphne dates from the days of Christian ascendancy in the reign of Julian. The place is still musical with fountains and luxuriant with wild vegetation; but nothing now remains to suggest its former splendor. See ANTIOCH; Gibbon, Decline and Fall, ch xxiii.

W. EWING

DARA, dār'a (דָּרָא, dāra'). See DARDA.

DARDA, dār'da (דָּרְדָּא, darda', "pearl of wisdom"): One of the wise men to whom Solomon is compared (1 K 4 31). He was either a son of Mahol (ibid) or a son of Zerah, son of Judah (1 Ch 2 6, where the corresponding name in the same list is given as DARA). In rabbinic lore the name has been interpreted as dōr dēa', "the generation of knowledge"—the generation of the wilderness.

DARE, dār: The expression "to dare" in the Scriptures never has the meaning of "to defy," "to challenge," or "to terrify." It is always found as the tr of τολμάω, tolmāō, "to manifest courage." This is particularly evident from 2 Cor 10 12, "for we are not bold to number or compare ourselves" (AV "for we dare not make ourselves of the number").

DARIC, dar'ik (דָּרַכְמֶן, dark'mōn, and דָּרְכְּמֶן, dar'ikōn; δαρεικός, dareikōs): A Pers gold coin about a guinea or five dollars in value. The first form of the word occurs in 1 Ch 29 7; Ezr 2 69, and Neh 7 70-72; the second in Ezr 8 27 and is rendered "dram" in AV and "daric" in RV. In the passage in Ch, it must refer to a weight, since at the time of David there were no coins, but in the days of Ezra and Nehemiah the Pers darics were current. See MONEY.

DARIUS, da-rī'us: The name of three or four kings mentioned in the OT. In the original Pers it is spelled "Darayavaush"; in Bab, usually "Darimush"; in Susian(?), "Tariyamaush"; in Egypt, "Antaryuash"; on Aram. inscriptions, דַּרְיָאוּשׁ, or דַּרְיָאוּשׁ; in Heb, דַּרְיָאוּשׁ, dāryāwesh; in Gr, Δαρείος, Dareios; in Lat, "Darius." In meaning it is probably connected with the new Pers word Dara, "king." Herodotus says it means in Gr, ἑρξέλης, Erxeîēs, coercitor, "restrainer," "compeller," "commander."

(1) Darius the Mede (Dnl 6 1; 11 1) was the son of Ahasuerus (Xerxes) of the seed of the Medes (Dnl 9 1). He received the government of Belshazzar the Chaldaean upon the death of that prince (Dnl 5 30,31; 6 1), and was made king over the kingdom of the Chaldaeans.

From Dnl 6 28 we may infer that Darius was king contemporaneously with Cyrus. Outside of the Book of Dnl there is no mention of Darius the Mede by name, though there are good reasons for identifying him with Gubaru, or Ugbaru, the governor of Gutium, who is said in the Nabunaid-Cyrus Chronicle to have been appointed by Cyrus as his governor of Babylon after its capture from the Chaldaeans. Some reasons for this identification are as follows:

(a) Gubaru is possibly a tr of Darius. The same radical letters in Arab. mean "king," "compeller," "restrainer." In Heb, derivations of the root mean "lord," "mistress," "queen"; in Aram., "mighty," "almighty."

(b) Gutium was the designation of the country N. of Babylon and was in all possibility in the time of Cyrus a part of the province of Media.

(c) But even if Gutium were not a part of Media at that time, it was the custom of Pers kings to appoint Medes as well as Persians to satrapies and to the command of armies. Hence Darius-Gubaru may have been a Mede, even if Gutium were not a part of Media proper.

(d) Since Daniel never calls Darius the Mede king of Media, or king of Persia, it is immaterial what his title or position may have been before he was made king over the realm of the Chaldaeans. Since the realm of the Chaldaeans never included either Media or Persia, there is absolutely no evidence in the Book of Dnl that its author ever meant to imply that Darius the Mede ever ruled over either Media or Persia.

(e) That Gubaru is called governor (pihatu), and Darius the Mede, king, is no objection to this identification; for in ancient as well as modern oriental empires the governors of provinces and cities were often called kings. Moreover, in the Aram. language, no more appropriate word than "king" can be found to designate the ruler of a sub-kingdom, or province of the empire.

(f) That Darius is said to have had 120 satraps under him does not conflict with this; for the Pers word "satrap" is indefinite as to the extent of his rule, just like the Eng. word "governor." Besides, Gubaru is said to have appointed pihatu under himself. If the kingdom of the Chaldaeans which he received was as large as that of Sargon he may easily have appointed 120 of these sub-rulers; for Sargon names 117 subject cities and countries over which he appointed his prefects and governors.

(g) The peoples, nations and tongues of ch 6 are no objection to this identification; for Babylonia itself at this time was inhabited by Babylonians, Chaldaeans, Arabians, Aramaeans and Jews, and the kingdom of the Chaldaeans embraced also Assyrians, Elamites, Phoenicians and others within its limits.

(h) This identification is supported further by the fact that there is no other person known to history that can well be meant. Some, indeed, have thought that Darius the Mede was a reflection into the past of Darius Hystaspis; but this is rendered impossible inasmuch as the character, deeds and empire of Darius Hystaspis, which are well known to us from his own monuments and from the Gr historians, do not resemble what Daniel says of Darius the Mede.

(2) Darius, the fourth king of Persia, called Hystaspes because he was the son of a Pers king named Hystaspis, is mentioned in Ezr (4 5, et al.), Hag (1 1) and Zec (1 1). Upon the death of Cambyzes, son and successor to Cyrus, Smerdis the Magian usurped the kingdom and was de-throned by seven Pers nobles from among whom Darius was selected to be king. After many rebellions and wars he succeeded in establishing himself firmly upon the throne (Ant, XI, i). He reorganized and enlarged the Pers empire. He is best known to general history from his conflict with Greece culminating at Marathon, and for his re-digging of the Suez Canal. In sacred history he stands forth as the king who enabled the Jews under Jeshua and Zerubbabel to rebuild the temple at Jerus.

(3) Darius, called by the Greeks Nothus, was called Ochus before he became king. He reigned from 424 to 404 BC. In the Scriptures he is mentioned only in Neh 12 22, where he is called Darius the Pers, probably to distinguish him from Darius the Mede. It is not necessary to suppose that

Darius Codomannus who reigned from 336 to 330 BC, is meant by the author of Neh 12, because he mentions Jaddua; for (a) Johanan, the father of this Jaddua, was high priest about 408 BC, as is clear from the Aram. papyrus from Elephantine lately published by Professor Sachau of Berlin, and Jaddua may well have succeeded him in those troublous times before the death of Darius Nothus in 404 BC. And (b) that a high priest named Jaddua met Alexander in 332 BC, is attested only by Jos (Ant. XI, viii, 5). It is not fair to take the testimony of Jos as to Jaddua without taking his testimony as to the meeting with Alexander and as to the appeal of Jaddua to the predictions of the Book of Dnl. But even if Jos be right, there may have been two Jadduas, one high priest in 404 BC, and the other in 332 BC; or the one who was alive and exercising his functions in 404 BC may still have been high priest in 332 BC. He need not have exceeded 90 years of age. According to the Eshki Haran inscription, which purports to have been written by himself, the priest of the temple in that city had served for 104 years. In our own time how many men have been vigorous in mind and body at the age of 90, or thereabouts; Bismarck and Gladstone, for example? R. DICK WILSON

DARK, dārk, DARKNESS, dārk'nes (דָּרְךְ, hōshekh; σκότος, skōtos): The day and night, light and darkness, are notable antitheses in Pal. There the day does not slowly fade away into the night after a period of twilight, but before sunset there is the brightness of day, and when the sun has disappeared everything has changed and night is at hand. From sunset until the darkness of night is less than an hour.

In the Bible the main use of darkness is in contrast to light. Light is the symbol of God's purity, wisdom and glory. Darkness is the 2. Symbolic opposite. Miraculous occurrence of darkness in the land of Egypt for three days is recorded in Ex 10 21,22, and at the death of Christ (Mt 27 45). See PLAGUES; ECLIPSE.

The fig. uses of darkness are many and various. It is used as a symbol (a) of moral depravity and its punishment. The wicked walk and work in darkness (Ps 82 5; Prov 2 13; Jn 3 19; Rom 13 12), and their reward is to "sit in darkness" (Ps 107 10) or to be "cast forth into the outer darkness" (Mt 8 12); (b) of things mysterious or inexplicable (1 K 8 12; Ps 97 2); (c) of trouble and affliction (2 S 22 29; Job 5 14; Prov 20 20; Isa 9 2; cf Gen 15 12); (d) of punishment (Lam 3 2; Ezk 32 8; Zeph 1 15); (e) of death (1 S 2 9; Job 10 21 f; Eccl 11 8); (f) of nothingness (Job 3 4-6); (g) of human ignorance (Job 19 8; 1 Jn 2 11).

"A dark [RVm "squalid"] place" (2 Pet 1 19) refers esp. to the state of things described in ch 2.

ALFRED H. JOY

DARKLY, dārk'li: The word occurs in 1 Cor 13 12, "For now we see in a mirror, darkly," in tr of the words ἐν αἰνίγματι, en ainigmati, RVm "in a riddle." The contrast is with the "face to face" vision of Divine things in eternity. Earth's best knowledge is partial, obscure, enigmatic, a broken reflection of the complete truth ("broken lights of Thee").

DARKON, dār'kon (דָּרְקוֹן, darkōn, "carrier"): Ancestor of a subdivision of "Solomon's servants," so called, in post-exilic times (Ezr 2 56; Neh 7 58; Lozon, 1 Esd 5 33).

DARK SAYINGS (Prov 1 6; Ps 78 2; sing., Ps 49 4[5]; חִידוֹת, hīdhōth, sing. חִידָה, hīdhāh, elsewhere rendered "riddle," "proverb"): In the heading to the canonical Book of Prov, the general term "proverbs" is made to include "a proverb" (מִשְׁלָּה, māshāl), and a figure [or, an interpretation, מְלִיצָה, mēlīzāh], the words [sing. דְּבָר, dābhār] of the wise, and their dark sayings [or, riddles]. The "proverb" is either a saying current among the people (cf 1 S 10 12; "the proverb of the ancients" 24 13[14]), or a sentence of ethical wisdom composed by the order of wise men (חֲכָמִים, hākhāmīm). Of the latter kind are the sententious maxims of the Wisdom lit. (chiefly Prov, but also Job, Eccl, and among the uncanonical writings Ecclus). They are characterized by a secular touch; wisdom, moreover, flourished among the neighbors of Israel as well; so in Edom and elsewhere. Whatever the date of the collection known as the "Proverbs of Solomon," the wise men existed in Israel at a very early period; the prophets allude to them. But the Heb māshāl is sometimes of a more elaborate character corresponding to our "parables"; frequently a vein of taunt runs through them, and they played an important part in compositions directed against other nations (cf Nu 21 27). The prophets are fond of employing this genre of literary production; in their hands the māshāl becomes a fig. or allegorical discourse (cf Ezk 21 5 ff [8 ff]). The māshāl in the sense of a didactic poem occurs also in the Psalms (Pss 49 and 78). Hence it is that "proverb" and "figure," or "proverb" and "dark saying" are interchangeable terms. The "dark saying" is the popular "riddle" (cf Jgs 14) raised to the dignity of elaborate production. It is in short an allegorical sentence requiring interpretation. Both prophets and psalmists avail themselves thereof. The word of God comes to the prophet in the form of a vision (cf the visions of Amos or Jeremiah), i.e. the truth presents itself to them in the form of a simile. To the perfect prophet of the type of Moses the revelation comes direct in the shape of the naked truth without the mediation of figures of speech or obscure utterances requiring elucidation (cf Nu 12). In the same way St. Paul (1 Cor 13) distinguishes between the childish manner of speaking of things spiritual and the manner of a man: "For now we see in a mirror, darkly [Gr "in a riddle"]; but then face to face." The rabbis say that, whereas all the other prophets saw God and things Divine in a dim mirror, Moses saw them in a polished, clear mirror. Both St. Paul and the rabbis feel the difference between mediate and immediate vision, the revelation which requires dark fig. language as a vehicle and the clear perception which is the direct truth.

DARLING, dār'ling (דָּרְלִיךְ, yāhīdh, "only," AVm "only one"; ARVm "dear life"): Used poetically for the life or soul (Ps 22 20; 35 17).

DART, dārt (דָּרַח, hēç; βέλος, bēlos): A pointed missile weapon, as an arrow or light spear (2 S 18 14; Job 41 26). See ARMOR, ARMS, III, 4; ARROW.

Figurative: (1) Of the penalty of sin (Prov 7 23 AV); (2) of strong suggestions and fierce temptations to evil (Eph 6 16; cf 1 Macc 5 51).

DART-SNAKE, dārt'snake (Isa 34 15). See ARROWSNAKE.

DASH: The idea of "to throw violently" or "to strike" with purpose of causing destruction is usually connected with the word "to dash." There is perhaps but one exception to this: Ps 91 12 and the quotations of this passage in the NT (Mt 4 6; Lk 4 11, προσκόπτω, proskóptō), have the meaning "to strike against accidentally" and not intentionally. Nah 2 1, "he that dasheth in pieces" is doubtful.

"He that scatters" would be in better harmony with the Heb מִפִּיץ, mēphīṣ, and the following description of destruction. In all other cases "to dash" is connected with the idea of destruction, esp. the infliction of punishment which is usually expressed by רָשַׁח, rāṣaḥ, "to dash to the ground" (2 K 8 12; Isa 13 16 ff, et al., "to dash in pieces," AV simply "to dash"), but also by נָפַח, nāphaḥ, "to break to pieces" (Ps 2 9; 137 9, et al.). See also PUNISHMENTS.

A. L. BRESLICH

DATES, dāts (דָּבִשׁ, d'bbash): Arab. ḏibbs (2 Ch 31 5 AVm); EV HONEY (q.v.). See also PALM TREE.

DATHAN, dā'than (דָּתָן, dāthān, meaning and derivation unknown, though the name is found in Assy, in the records of Shalmanezar II): The son of Eliab the son of Pallu the son of Reuben (Nu 26 5 ff; Dt 11 6; Ps 106 17). He and his brother Abiram, with others, followed Korah the Levite in disputing the authority of Moses and Aaron in the wilderness (Nu 16-17, 26; Dt 11 6; Ps 106 17). Other followers of Korah perished by fire before the tent of meeting, but Dathan and Abiram were swallowed up by the earth, with their families and their goods, at their tents. See KORAH.

WILLIS J. BEECHER

DATHEMA, dath'ē-ma (Δάθημα, Dáthema): A stronghold (1 Macc 5 29) in Gilead to which the Jews fled for refuge from the heathen (ver 9). They were delivered by Judas and Jonathan his brother. It was within a night's march from Bosora. It may possibly be identical with 'Athamān which lies E. of el-Muzērib.

DAUB, dób: "To daub" always has the meaning "to cover," "to smear with" in the Scriptures. Ezk compares the flatteries of the false prophets to a slight wall covered with whitewash (lit. "spittle"). See Ezk 13 10 ff; 22 28. In Ex 2 3 "daubed it with slime and with pitch" (Heb מָחָהוּ, wat-tahm'rah, denom. of מָחָה, hēmār, "bitumen" or "asphalt"), "to daub" has the same meaning as in the Ezk passage.

DAUGHTER, dó'tēr (בַּת, bath; θυγάτηρ, thugátēr): Used in Scriptures in several more or less distinct senses: (a) for daughter in the ordinary, literal sense (Gen 46 25; Ex 1 16); (b) daughter-in-law (Ruth 2 2); (c) granddaughter or other female descendant (Ex 21; Lk 1 5; 13 16); (d) the women of a country, or of a place, taken collectively (Lk 23 28), of a particular religion (Mal 2 11); (e) all the population of a place, taken collectively, esp. in Prophets and poetic books (Ps 9 14; Isa 23 10; Jer 46 24; Mt 21 5); (f) used in familiar address, "Daughter, be of good comfort" (Mt 9 22 AV; Mk 5 34; Lk 8 48); (g) women in general (Prov 31 29); (h) the personification of towns or cities, as of the female sex (Isa 47 1; Ezk 16 44-46; cf Nah 3 4-7), esp. of dependent towns and villages (Ps 48 11; Nu 21 25 m; Jgs 1 27 m); (i) in Heb idiom for person or thing belonging to or having the characteristics of that with which it is joined, as "daughter of ninety years," of Sarah, ninety years old (Gen 17 17); "daughters of music," singing birds, or singing women (Eccl 12 4); daughters of a tree, i.e. branches; daughter of the eye, i.e. the pupil.

Daughters were not so highly prized as sons, not being usually mentioned by name. A father might sometimes sell his daughter as bondwoman (Ex 21 7); though not to a foreigner (ver 8); daughters might sometimes inherit as did sons, but could not take the inheritance outside of the tribe (Nu 36 1-12).

DAVID, dā'vid (דָּוִד, dāwidh, or דָּוִד, dāwidh, "beloved"; Δαβίδ, Dauid, also in NT, David, David; see Thayer's Lex.):

I. Name and Genealogy.—This name, which is written "defectively" in the older books, such as those of S, but plene with the yōdh in Ch and the later books, is derived, like the similar name Jediah (2 S 12 25), from a root meaning "to love." The only person who bears this name in the Bible is the son of Jesse, the second king of Israel. His genealogy is given in the table appended to the Book of Ruth (4 18-22). Here the following points are to be noted: David belonged to the tribe of Judah: his ancestor Nahshon was chieftain of the whole tribe (Nu 1 7; 2 3; 1 Ch 2 10) and brother-in-law of Aaron the high priest (Ex 6 23). As no other descendants of Nahshon are mentioned, his authority probably descended to Jesse by right of primogeniture. This supposition is countenanced by the fact that Salma (Salmon), the name of the son of Nahshon and father of Boaz, is also the name of a grandson of Caleb who became "father" of Bethlehem, the home of Jesse (1 Ch 2 51). David was closely connected with the tribe of Moab, the mother of his grandfather Obed being Ruth the Moabitess. Of the wife or wives of Jesse we know nothing, and consequently are without information upon a most interesting point—the personality of the mother of David; but that she too may have been of the tribe of Moab is rendered probable by the fact that, when hard pressed, David placed his parents under the protection of the king of that country (1 S 22 3-4).

II. Early Years.—The home of David when he comes upon the stage of history was the picturesque town of Bethlehem. There his family

1. Shepherd had been settled for generations, indeed ever since the Israelite nation had overrun the land of Canaan. His father was apparently not only the chief man of the place, but he seems to have been chieftain of the whole clan to which he belonged—the clan of Judah. Although the country round Bethlehem is more fertile than that in the neighborhood of Jerus, the inhabitants joined to the cultivation of the soil the breeding of cattle (Lk 2 8). David's father, not only cultivated his ancestral fields, but kept flocks of sheep and goats as well. The flocks were sent out every day to pasture in the neighboring valleys attended by the herdsmen armed so as to defend themselves and their charge, not only against marauders from the surrounding deserts, but also from the lions and bears with which the country was then infested. David seems to have been in the habit of accompanying his father's servants in their task (1 S 17 20-22), and on occasion would be left in full charge by himself. Nor was his post at such times a sinecure. He had not only to keep a sharp lookout for thieves, but on more than one occasion had with no other weapon than his shepherd's club or staff to rescue a lamb from the clutches of a lion or a bear (vs 34 ff). Such adventures, however, must have been rare, and David must often have watched eagerly the lengthening of the shadow which told of the approach of sunset, when he could drive his charge into the zarība for the night and return home. There is, indeed, no life more monotonous and enervating than that of an eastern shepherd, but David must have made good use of his idle time. He seems, in fact, to have made such good use of it as to have neglected his handful of sheep. The incidents of which he boasted to Saul would not have occurred, had his proper occupation taken up all his thoughts; but, like King Alfred, his head seems to have been filled with ideas far removed from his humble task.

David, like Nelson, does not seem to have known what it was to be afraid, and it was not to be expected that he could be satisfied with the lot of the youngest of eight sons of the now aged chief (1 S 17 12; 1 Ch 2 13 ff). In the East every man is a soldier, and David's bent was in that direction. The tribesmen of Benjamin near whose border his home was situated were famed through all Israel as slingers, some of whom could sling at a hair and not miss (Jgs 20 16). Taught, perhaps, by one of these, but certainly by dint of constant practice, David acquired an accuracy of aim which reminds one of tales of William Tell or Robin Hood (1 S 17 49).

Another of the pastimes in the pursuit of which David spent many an hour of his youthful days was music. The instrument which he used was the "harp" (Heb kinnôr).

3. Harpist This instrument had many forms, which may be seen on the Assyrian and Egyptian monuments; but the kind used by David was probably like the modern Arab rubāba, having only one or two strings, played not with a plectrum (Ant, VII, xii, 3) but by the hand (cf 1 S 16 23, etc, which do not exclude a quill). Whatever the nature of the instrument was, D. acquired such proficiency in playing it that his fame as a musician soon spread throughout the countryside (ver 18). With the passing of time he becomes the Heb Orpheus, in whose music birds and mountains joined (cf Korān, ch 21).

To the accompaniment of his lyre David no doubt sang words, either of popular songs or of lyrics of his own composition, in that wailing

4. Poet eastern key which seems to be an imitation of the bleating of flocks. The verses he sang would recount his own adventures or the heroic prowess of the warrior of his clan, or celebrate the loveliness of some maiden of the tribe, or consist of elegies upon those slain in battle. That the name of D. was long connected with music the reverse of sacred appears from the fact that Amos denounces the people of luxury of his time for improvising to the sound of the viol, inventing instruments of music, like D. (6 5). (It is not clear to which clause "like D." belongs, probably to both.) The only remains of the secular poetry of D. which have come down to us are his elegies on Saul and Jonathan and on Abner (2 S 1 19-27; 3 33,34), which show him to have been a true poet.

Did D. also compose religious verses? Was he "the sweet psalmist of Israel" (2 S 23 1)? In the oldest account which we have, contained in the books of S, D. appears as a musician and as a secular poet only, for it is obvious the poetical passages, 2 S 22 1-23 7, do not belong to the original form of that book but are thrust in in the middle of a long list of names of D.'s soldiers. The position is the same in Am (6 5). It is in the later books and passages that sacred music and psalms begin to be ascribed to him. Perhaps the earliest instance is the passage just cited containing the "last words" of D. (2 S 23 1-7). The Chronicler (about 300 BC) seems to put parts of Pss 105, 96 and 106 into the mouth of D. (1 Ch 16 7 ff), and Nehemiah (12 36) regards him apparently as the inventor of the instruments used in the Temple service (1 Ch 23 5), or as a player of sacred music. So too in the LXX psalter (151 2) we read, "My hands made an organ, my fingers fashioned a psalter"; and gradually the whole of the Psalms came to be ascribed to D. as author. In regard to this question it must be remembered that in the East at any rate there is no such distinction as that of sacred and secular.

By sacred poetry we mean poetry which mentions the name of God or quotes Scripture, but the Heb or Arab poet will use the name of God as an accompaniment to a dance, and will freely sprinkle even comic poetry with citations from his sacred book. D. must have composed sacred poems if he composed at all, and he would use his musical gift for the purposes of religion as readily as for those of amusement and pleasure (2 S 6 14,15). Whether any of our psalms was composed by D. is another question. The titles cannot be considered as conclusive evidence, and internal proofs of his authorship are wanting. Indeed the only psalm which claims to have been written by D. is the 18th (= 2 S 22). One cannot help wishing that the 23d were sung by the little herd lad as he watched his father's flocks and guarded them from danger.

There are sayings of Mohammed that the happiest life is that of the shepherd, and that no one became a prophet who had not at one time and for plunging into those day dreams out of which prophets are made. If D., like the Arab poet Tarafa, indulged in sport, in music and in poetry, even to the neglect of his charge, he must have sought out themes on which to exercise his muse; and it must have been with no little chagrin that he learnt that whereas the tribes of Ephraim, Benjamin, Naphtali, Manasseh, Issachar, Zebulun, Levi, Dan, and even the non-Israelite tribes of Kenaz and the debatable land of Gilead could boast of having held the hegemony of Israel and led the nation in battle, his own tribe of Judah had played a quite subordinate part, and was not even mentioned in the national war song of Deborah. As contrasted with the poets of these tribes he could boast in his verses only of Ibzan who belonged to his own town of Bethlehem (Jgs 12 8). The Jerahmeelites were no doubt a powerful clan, but neither they nor any other of the subdivisions of Judah had ever done anything for the common good. Indeed, when the twelve pathfinders had been sent in advance into Canaan, Judah had been represented by Caleb, a member of the Utlander tribe of Kenaz (Nu 13 6). He became apparently the adopted son of Hezron and so D. might claim kinship with him, and through him with Othniel the first of the judges (Jgs 1 13). D. thus belonged to the least efficient of all the Israelitish tribes except one, and one which, considering its size and wealth, had till now failed to play a worthy part in the confederacy. It is difficult to believe that the young D. never dreamed of a day when his own tribe should take its true place among its fellows, and when the deliverer of Israel from its oppressors should belong for once to the tribe of Judah.

III. In the Service of Saul.—The earliest events in the career of D. are involved in some obscurity.

1. David First Meets Saul This is due mainly to what appears to be an insoluble difficulty in chs 16 and 17 of 1 S. In ch 16, D. is engaged to play before Saul in order to dispel his melancholy, and becomes his squire or armor-bearer (16 21), whereas in the following chapter he is unknown to Saul, who, after the death of Goliath, asks Abner who he is, and Abner replies that he does not know (17 55). This apparent contradiction may be accounted for by the following considerations: (a) 16 14-23 may be inserted out of its chronological order for the sake of the contrast with the section immediately preceding—"the spirit of JHVH came mightily upon D. from that day forward . . . the spirit of JHVH departed from Saul" (16 13,14); (b) the fact of D. becoming Saul's squire does not imply constant personal attendance upon him; the text says D. became an (not his) armor-bearer to Saul. The king would have many such squires: Joab, though only commander-in-chief, had, it seems, eighteen (2 S 23 37 reads "armor-bearers"); (c) D. would not play before Saul every day: his presence might not be required for a space of weeks or months; (d) Saul's failure to recognize D. may have been a result of the 'evil spirit from JHVH' and Abner's denial of knowledge may have been feigned out of jealousy. If we accept all the statements of the dramatis personae in these narratives we shall not get very far.

The facts seem to have been somewhat as follows: It had become evident that Saul was not equal to the task to which he had been set—

2. His First task of breaking the Phili power, Exploit and it became the duty of Samuel, as the vicar of Jeh and as still holding very large powers, to look about for a successor. He turned to the tribe of Judah (the full brother of his own ancestor Levi), a tribe which was fast becoming the most powerful member of the federation. The headman of this clan was Jesse of Bethlehem. His name was well known in the country—Saul does not require to be told who he is (1 S 16 18; 17 58)—but he was by this time advanced in years (17 12). He had, however, many sons. Old men in the East often foretell a great future for a young boy (cf Lk 2 34). Samuel saw that D. was formed of other clay than his brothers, and he anointed him as he had done Saul (1 S 10 1). But whereas the anointing of Saul was done surreptitiously and for a definite purpose which was explained at the time (10 1), that of D. was performed before his whole family, but with what object he was not told (16 13). His brothers do not seem to have thought the matter of much consequence (cf 17 28), and all D. could conclude from it was that he was destined to some high office—perhaps that of Samuel's successor (cf 1 K 19 15.16). It would have the effect of nerving him for any adventure and raising his hopes high and steeling his courage. Whether by accident or by contrivance he became attached to Saul as minstrel (cf 2 K 3 15) and subsequently as one of his armor-bearers. He would probably be at this time about twenty years of age. It must have been after an interval of some months that an event happened which made it impossible for Saul ever again to forget the existence of D. This was the famous duel between D. and the Phili Goliath, which saved the situation for Saul for the time (ch 17). In regard to this narrative it must be noted that vs 12–31.41.50.55–58 and the first five verses of ch 18 are wanting in the best MS of the LXX, that is, the sending of D. from Bethlehem and his fresh introduction to Saul and Saul's failure to recognize him are left out. With the omission of these verses all the difficulties of the narrative vanish. For the reason why D. could not wear the armor offered him was not because he was still a child, which is absurd in view of the fact that Saul was exceptionally tall (1 S 9 2), but because he had had no practice with it (17 39). It is ridiculous to suppose that D. was not at this time full-grown, and that two armies stood by while a child advanced to engage a giant. The event gained for D. the reputation won in modern times at the cannon's mouth, but also the devoted friendship of Jonathan and the enmity of Saul (1 S 18 1–9).

The next years of D.'s life were spent in the service of Saul in his wars with the Philis. D.'s success where Saul had failed, however, instead of gratifying only inflamed the jealousy of the latter, and he determined to put D. out of the way. More than once he attempted to do so with his own hand (18 11; 19 10), but he also employed stratagem. It came to his ears that his daughter Michal, as well as his son Jonathan, loved D., and Saul undertook to give her to D. on condition of his killing a hundred Philis. The gruesome dowry was paid, and D. became Saul's son-in-law. The Heb text states that Saul first offered his elder daughter to D., and then failed to implement his promise (18 17–19.21b), but this passage is not found in the Gr. D.'s relation to Saul did not mitigate the hatred of the latter; indeed his enmity became so bitter that D. determined upon flight. With the help of stratagem on the part of Michal, this was effected and D. betook himself to Samuel at Ramah for counsel and advice (19 18). Thither Saul pursued him, but when he came into the presence of the prophet his courage failed and he was overcome by the contagion of the prophetic ecstasy (19 24) as he had been on a previous occasion (10 11). D. returned to Gibeah, while the coast was clear, to meet Jonathan, but Saul also returned immediately, his hatred more intense than before. D. then continued his flight and came to Ahimelech, the priest at Nob (21 1). It is sometimes supposed that we have here two inconsistent accounts of D.'s flight, according to one of which he fled to Samuel at Ramah, and according to the other to Ahimelech at Nob; but there is no necessity for such a supposition, and even if it were correct, it would not clear up all the difficulties of the narrative. There is evidently much in these narratives that is left untold and our business should be to fill up the gaps in a way consistent with what we are given. That Saul made sure that D. would not return is shown by the fact that he gave his daughter Michal to a man of the tribe of Benjamin as wife (25 44).

The relation existing between Jonathan and David was one of pure friendship. There was no reason why it should not be so. A heredito establish such an institution—that of Gideon's family (Jgs 9)—though not of Gideon himself (8 23)—had ended in failure. The principle followed hitherto had been that of election by the sheikhs or caids of the clans. To this Saul owed his position, for the lot was a kind of ballot. Moreover, behind all national movements there lay the power of the prophets, the representatives of Jeh. Saul was indebted for his election to Samuel, just as Barak was to Deborah (Jgs 4 6). Like the judges who preceded him he had been put forward to meet a definite crisis in the national affairs—the rise of the Phili power (9 16). Had he succeeded in crushing these invaders, the newly established kingdom would in the absence of this bond of union have dissolved again into its elements, as had happened on every similar occasion before. He was the only judge who had failed to accomplish the task for which he was appointed, and he was the only one who had been appointed on the understanding that his son should succeed him, for this constitutes the distinction between king and judge. Moreover, not only was Saul aware that he had failed, but he saw before him the man who was ready to step into his place and succeed. His rival had, besides, the backing of the mass of the people and of Samuel who was still virtual head of the state and last court of appeal. It is not to be wondered at that Saul was hostile to D. Jonathan, on the other hand, acquiesced in the turn things had taken and bowed to what he believed to be the inevitable. Such was his love for D. that he asked only to be his vazeer (vizier) when D. came to the throne (1 S 23 17). D.'s position was perhaps the most difficult imaginable. He had to fight the battles of a king whose one idea was to bring about his ruin. He was the bosom friend of a prince whom he proposed to supplant in his inheritance. His hope of salvation lay in the death of his king, the father of his wife and of his best friend. The situation would in ordinary circumstances be intolerable, and it would have been impossible but for the fact that those concerned were obsessed by a profound belief in Fate. Jonathan bore no grudge against D. for aiming at the throne because to the throne he was destined by the will of Jeh. To D. it would never occur that he had the choice of declining the high destiny in store for him. Had he had the power to refuse what he believed to be the decree of Fate, he would hardly escape censure for his ambition and disloyalty.

IV. David in Exile.—From the moment of his flight D. became an outlaw and remained so until the death of Saul. This period of his

1. David as Outlaw career is full of stirring adventures which remind us of Robert Bruce or William Wallace of Scotland. Like

King Arthur and other heroes he carried a famous sword—the sword of Goliath (21 9). Having obtained it of Ahimelech, he for the first time left Israelite territory and betook himself to the Philistines at Gath (21 10). Not feeling safe here he left and took up his abode in the cave of Adullam (22 1) in the country of Judah, almost within sight of his native Bethlehem. This cave was admirably suited to the outlaw's purpose and no doubt D. had many a time explored its recesses when a boy. Here he was joined by his parents and brothers, with their servants, as well as by all sorts of persons who were at war with the government, debtors, fugitives from justice, and discontented persons generally. D. thus became the chief of a band of outlaws who numbered about 400. Of such stuff some of his bravest soldiers were made (2 S 23 13 ff). He had an augur, too, to direct his actions, and, after the massacre of the priests at Nob, a priest, Abiathar, carrying an ephod with which to cast lots (1 S 22 5; 23 6). During this period he supported himself and his men by making raids on the Philistines' outposts and levying blackmail on his own countrymen (25 2 ff) in return for giving them his protection from the Philistines (23 1 ff). Hard pressed both by Saul and the Philistines (who had established themselves even in Bethlehem) he committed his parents to the keeping of the king of Moab, and began to rove as a freebooter through the country (23 5.15.25.29). On two occasions D. had Saul in his power, but refused to seize the opportunity of taking his life (24-26). Here again there are no adequate grounds for supposing we have two accounts of one and the same incident. During his wandering D.'s followers increased in numbers (cf 22 2; 23 13; 25 13). His chief lieutenant was his nephew Abishai, the son of his sister Zeruiah, but his brothers Joab and Asahel do not seem to have joined D. yet. Another of his nephews, Jonathan the son of Shimei (Shammah), is mentioned (2 S 21 21; cf 1 S 16 9) and the Chronicler thinks many other knights joined him during this period (1 Ch 11 10 ff). The position of D. at this time was very similar to that of the brigand Raisuli of late in Morocco. That there was some stability in it is shown by his taking two wives at this time—Ahinoam and Abigail (1 S 25 42.43).

D. now, abandoning all hope of ever conciliating the king (1 S 27 1), made a move which shows at 2. David Joins the Philistines once his reckless daring and consummate genius. He offered the services of himself and his little army of 600 men to the enemies of his country.

The town of Gath appears to have been an asylum for fugitive Israelites (1 K 2 39). D.'s first impulse on his flight from Saul had been to seek safety there (1 S 21 10-15). Then, however, he was the hero of Israel; whose assassination would be the highest gain to the Philistines; now he was the embittered antagonist of Saul, and was welcomed accordingly. Achish placed at his disposal the fortified town of Ziklag in the territory of the now extinct tribe of Simeon, and there he and his followers, each of whom had his family with him, took up their quarters for sixteen months (27 6.7). The advantages to D. were many. He was safe at last from the persecution of Saul (27 4); he could secure ample supplies by making raids upon the Amalekites and other tribes hostile to Israel toward the S. (27 8); and if the opportunity presented itself he could deal a serious blow at the Philistines' arms. The position was no doubt a precarious one. It could last just as long as D. could hoodwink Achish by persuading him that his raids were directed against his own tribe (27 10). This he succeeded in doing so completely that Achish would have taken him with him on the campaign which ended in the decisive battle of Gilboa, but the other chiefs, fearing treachery, refused to allow him to do so. D. was forced to return with his followers to Ziklag, only to find that town razed to the ground and all the women and children carried off by his old enemies the Amalekites (30 1.2). By the time he had recovered the spoil and returned in triumph to Ziklag the battle of Gilboa had been fought and Saul was slain. The conduct of D. in his relations with the Philistines was not more reprehensible than that of the Cid who allied himself with Al-Mutamir of Saragossa, or of Coriolanus who went over to the Volsci. D. composed upon the death of Saul and Jonathan an elegy every sentence of which has become classic.

V. David as King.—D. immediately removed from Ziklag and took up his quarters at Hebron,

1. Civil War where he was at once anointed king over his own tribe of Judah. Thus began the cleavage between Judah and Israel. Here he was joined, apparently for the first time, by his nephew Joab. Abner, however, loyal to his former master, had Esh-baal (1 Ch 8 33), son of Saul, anointed king over the remaining tribes at Mahanaim, a fortified town E. of the Jordan. War continued between D. and Abner for several years, fortune always favoring D. Seeing things were going against him Abner forced Esh-baal into a personal quarrel with himself and then transferred his allegiance and persuaded his side to transfer theirs to D. (2 S 3 21). He did not reap the fruit of his defection, as he was immediately after assassinated by Joab in revenge for the death of Asahel whom Abner had killed in self-defence (3 27). Deprived of his chief support Esh-baal also fell a victim to assassination (4 2 ff). D. denounced both crimes with apparent sincerity. He composed an elegy and fasted for Abner (3 33 ff) and avenged the death of Esh-baal (4 9 ff). Yet these acts of violence laid the sovereignty of all Israel at his feet. Of the male heirs of Saul there remained only a son of Jonathan, Merib-baal (1 Ch 8 34) who was a crippled child of 7. D. was therefore elected king over the nation (2 S 5 1 ff). His sovereignty of Judah is said to have lasted 7½ years and that over the undivided people 33, making a reign of 40 years, beginning from D.'s 30th year (5 5; 1 Ch 3 4; in 2 S 2 10 the text is probably corrupt). These are round numbers.

King of all the Israelitish tribes, D. found his hands free to expel the foreigners who had invaded the sacred territory. His first step

2. Conquests Abroad was to move his headquarters from the Southern Hebron, which he had been compelled at first to make his capital, to the more central Jerus. The fort here, which was still held by the aboriginal Jebusites, was stormed by Joab, D.'s nephew, who also superintended the rebuilding for D. He was in consequence appointed commander-in-chief (1 Ch 11

6.8), a post which he held as long as D. lived. The materials and the skilled workmen for the erection of the palace were supplied by Hiram of Tyre (2 S 5 11). D. now turned his attention to the surrounding tribes and peoples. The most formidable enemy, the Philis, were worsted in several campaigns, and their power crippled (2 S 5 17 ff; 8 1). In one of these D. so nearly came by his death, that his people would not afterward permit him to take part in the fighting (21 16.17). One of the first countries against which D. turned his arms was the land of Moab, which he treated with a severity which would suggest that the Moabite king had ill-treated D.'s father and mother, who had taken refuge with him (8 2). Yet his conduct toward the Bēnē 'Ammōn was even more cruel (12 31), and for a less cause (10 1 ff). The king of Zobah (Chalkis) was defeated (8 3), and Israelite garrisons were placed in Syria of Damascus (8 6) and Edom (8 14). The Bēnē 'Ammōn formed a league with the Syrian kingdoms to the N. and E. of Pal (10 6.16), but these also had no success. All these people became tributary to the kingdom of Israel under D. (10 18.19) except the Bēnē 'Ammōn who were practically exterminated for the time being (12 31). Thus Israel became one of the "great powers" of the world during the reign of D. and his immediate successor.

There is no doubt that the expansion of the boundaries of Israel at this period almost to their ideal limits (Dt 11 24, etc) was largely due to the fact that the two great empires of Egypt and Assyria were at the moment passing through a period of weakness and decay. The Assyrian monarchy was in a decadent state from about the year 1050 BC, and the 22d Dynasty—to which Shishak belonged (1 K 14 25)—had not yet arisen. D., therefore, had a free hand when his time came and found no more formidable opposition than that of the petty states bordering upon Pal. Against the combined forces of all the Israelitish tribes these had never been able to effect much.

It had been the custom of the Israelites on setting out upon expeditions in which the nation as a whole took part to carry with them the sacred box or "ark" which contained the two stone tables (Josh 4 7, etc). When D. had secured the fortress of Jebus for his metropolis one of his first thoughts was to bring into it this emblem of victory. It was then lying at Kiriath-jearim, possibly Abu Gōsh about 8 miles N.W. of Jerus (cf Ps 132). Owing to the sudden death of one of the drivers, which he interpreted as indicative of anger on the part of Jeh, D. left the ark at the house of a Phili which happened to be near at hand. As no misfortune befell this person, but on the contrary much prosperity, D. took courage after three months to bring the sacred chest and its contents into his royal city. The ceremony was conducted with military honors (2 S 6 1) and with religious dancing and music (6 5.14) and festivity (6 18.19). A tent was pitched for it, in which it remained (7 2), except when it was sent with the army to the seat of war (11 11; 15 24). D., however, had already built for himself a stone palace, and he wished now to add to it a chapel royal in the shape of a small temple, such as the neighboring kings had. He was the more anxious to do so as he had much of the material ready to hand in the precious metals which formed the most valuable part of the spoil of the conquered races, such as bronze from Chalkis (8 8), gold and silver (8 11) and the vessels which he had received as a present from the king of Hamath (8 10). He was persuaded, however, by the prophet Nathan to forego that task, on the ground of his having shed much human blood, and to leave it to his successor (1 Ch 22 8; 28 3).

VI. Domestic Life.—In accordance with the practice of the kings of his time D. had several wives. His first wife was Michal, the younger daughter of Saul. When D. fled from Saul she was given to Phaltiel, but was restored to D. after Saul's death. She does not appear to have borne any children. In 2 S 21 8 "Michal" should be Merab (1 S 18 19). During the period of separation from Michal, D. took to wife Ahinoam of Jezreel and Abigail the wife of Nabal (1 S 25 43.42), who accompanied him to Ziklag (27 3 ff), when they were among those captured by the Amalekites (30 5). A fourth wife was the daughter of Talmi of Geshur, Maacah, whom he had captured in war (27 8; 2 S 3 3). When he removed to Hebron Ahinoam bore him his eldest son Amnon, and Abigail his second son Chileab or Daniel (2 S 3 2.3; 1 Ch 3 1); his third son was Absalom, whose mother was Maacah, and his fourth Adonijah. His mother's name was Haggith; nothing is known about her. Two other sons, Shephatiah and Ithream were also born in Hebron (2 S 3 2-5; 1 Ch 3 1-4). When D. added the kingdom of Israel to that of Judah, he, in accordance with custom, took more wives with a view to increase his state and dignity. One of these was Bathsheba, who became the mother of Solomon (2 S 5 13 ff; 1 Ch 3 5 ff; 14 3 ff). D.'s sons discharged priestly functions (2 S 8 18; cf Nathan in Zec 12 12).

It was perhaps inevitable that in so large a household the usual dissensions and crimes of the harim should have sprung up in plenty. A most unvarnished account of these is given in 2 S 11-20—it has been suggested by Abiathar the priest in order to avenge himself on Solomon for his disgrace (1 K 2 26.27), Solomon's mother being Bathsheba (2 S 11, 12). Ch 13 recounts the wrong done to Tamar, the daughter of D. and Maacah, and sister of Absalom, and how the last named, having avenged his sister's honor by killing Amnon, his eldest brother, fled for asylum to his mother's father, the king of Geshur. Thence after two years he returned (ch 14), only to foment rebellion against his father (ch 15), leading to civil war between D. and Judah on the one side and Absalom and Israel on the other (chs 16, 17), and ending in the death of himself (ch 18) and of Amasa, D.'s nephew, at the hands of his cousins Joab and Abishai (20 7 ff), as well as nearly precipitating the disruption of the newly founded kingdom (19 43). The rebellion of Absalom was probably due to the fact of Solomon having been designated D.'s successor (cf 12 24; 1 Ch 22 9), for Absalom had the best claim, Amnon being dead and Chileab apparently of no account.

VII. His Officials.—As D.'s circumstances improved he required assistance in the management of his affairs. The beginning of his good fortune had been the friendship of the prophet Samuel (1 S 16 13; 19 18). The prophet or seer was keeper of the king's conscience and was not appointed by him, but claimed Divine authority (2 S 7 3.5 ff; 12 1 ff; 24 11 ff). Among the persons who discharged this duty for D. were Gad the seer (1 S 22 5) and Nathan the prophet (1 K 1 11 ff). All these are said to have written memoirs of their times (1 Ch 29 29; 2 Ch 9 29).

Next to the prophet came the priest. The ko-hēn (priest) was, as the name indicates, a soothsayer or diviner. The duty of Abiathar, D.'s first priest (1 S 22 20 ff), was to carry the ephod—an object used for casting lots (23 6 ff), in order to decide what to do in cases where there was no other way of making up one's mind (30 7). It is not to be confused with the dress of the same name (1 S 2 18). Later, at Hebron, Abiathar was given a colleague, Zadok (1 Ch 12 28), and it became their duty to carry the ark in expeditions (2 S 15 24). Shortly after the death of D., Abiathar was deposed by Solomon for his part in Adonijah's attempt to seize the throne (1 K 2 26, 27), and Zadok remained sole priest to the king (2 S 35). D.'s sons also acted in the same capacity (2 S 8 18). An extra private priest is mentioned in 2 S 20 26 (cf 23 26, 38).

When still an outlaw D. required the services of a henchman to take command of his men in his absence. This post was held at first by different persons according to circumstances, but generally, it seems, by his nephew Abishai (1 S 26 6).

It was only after the death of Saul that his brother Joab threw in his lot with D. His great military talents at once gave him a leading place, and as a reward for the capture of Jebus he was given the chief command, which he held against all rivals (2 S 3 27; 20 10) during the whole reign. D.'s special body-guard of Phili troops—the Cherethites and Pelethites—were commanded by Benaiah, who in the following reign, succeeded Joab (1 K 2 35).

The office of recorder or magister memoriae was held during this reign and in the following by Jehoshaphat (2 S 8 16); and that of secretary by Seraiah (2 S 8 17), also called Shavsha (1 Ch 18 16) or Shisha (1 K 4 3). There were also the counsellors, men noted for their great acumen and knowledge of human nature, such as Ahithophel and Hushai.

It was natural that there should be much mutual jealousy and rivalry among these officials, and that some of them should attach themselves to one of D.'s many sons, others to another.

5. Mutual Rivalry Thus Amnon is the special patron of D.'s nephew Jonadab (2 S 13 3; cf 21 21), and Absalom is backed by Amasa (17 25). The claim of Adonijah to the throne is supported by Joab and Abiathar (1 K 1 7), as against that of Solomon who is backed by Nathan, Benaiah, Zadok (ver 8) and Hushai (cf Ant. VII, xiv, 4). Ahithophel sides with Absalom; Hushai with D. (2 S 15 12, 32).

VIII. Personal Character of David.—We should obtain a very different idea of the personal character of D. according as we drew our conclusions from the books of S and K or from the books of Ch. There is no doubt whatever that the former books are much truer to fact, and any estimate or appreciation of D. or of any of the other characters described must be based upon them. The Chronicler, on the other hand, is biased by the religious ideas of his own time and is prejudiced in favor of some of those whose biographies he writes and against others. He accordingly suppresses the dark passages of D.'s life, e.g. the murder of Uriah (1 Ch 20), or sets them in a favorable light, e.g. by laying the blame of the census upon Satan (1 Ch 21 1). D.'s success, esp. as against Saul's misfortune, is greatly exaggerated (12 2, 22). Ceremonial functions are greatly elaborated (ch 16; cf 2 S 6). The various orders of priests and singers in the second temple have their origin traced back to D. (16 4 ff, 37 ff; chs 23–27), and the temple of Solomon itself is to all intents and purposes built by him (chs 22, 28). At the same time there may be much material in the shape of names and isolated statements not found in the older books, which so long as they are not tinged with the Chronicler's pragmatism or "tendency," may possibly be authentic records preserved within the circle of the priestly caste, e.g. we are told that Saul's skull was fastened in the temple of Dagon (1 Ch 10 10). There is no doubt that the true names of Ish-bosheth, Mephibosheth and Eliada (2 S 2 8; 4 4; 5 16) were Ish-baal (Esh-baal), Merib-baal and Beeliada (1 Ch 8 33; 9 39; 8 34; 9 40; 14 7); that the old name of Jerusalem was Jebus (11 4, 5; cf Jgs 19 10, 11); perhaps a son of D. called Nogah has to be added to 2 S 5 15 from 1 Ch 3 7; 14 6; in 2 S 8 8 and 21 18, for Betah and Gob read Tebah (Tibhath) and Gezer (1 Ch 18 8; Gen 22 24; 1 Ch 20 4). The incident recounted in 2 S 23 9 ff happened at Pasdammim (1 Ch 11 13). Shammah the Harodite was the son of Elikah (2 S 23 25; cf 1 Ch 11 27), and other names in this list have to be corrected after the readings of the Chronicler. Three (not seven) years of famine was the alternative offered to D. (2 S 24 13; cf 1 Ch 21 12).

If we could believe that the Book of Pss was in whole or in part the work of D., it would throw a flood of light upon the religious side of his nature.

2. Psalms Indeed, we should know as much about his religious life as can well be known about anyone. Unfortunately the date and authorship of the Pss are questions regarding which the most divergent opinions are held. In the early Christian centuries all the Pss were ascribed to D. and, where necessary, explained as prophecies. The author of the Ep. to the He speaks of the Book of Pss simply as "David" (4 7). The Gr text, however, of that book ascribes only some 87 of the poems to D., and the Heb only 73. Some of these are not D.'s, and in the whole book there is only one which professes from its contents to be his, namely, Ps 18 (= 2 S 22). The occasion on which a psalm was composed is stated only in the case of 13 psalms, all of which are ascribed to D. Each of these is referred to some incident recorded in the books of S, although sometimes the citation is erroneous (see PSALMS). The LXX supplies occasions to two or three more psalms; but all such statements are merely the conjectures of readers and scribes and are of no historical value.

To form a correct opinion of anyone is much more difficult than to state the facts of his life; to form an opinion which will be generally

3. Complex Character accepted is impossible. Of D.'s character the most opposite estimates have been formed. On one hand he is extolled as a saint, and yet few men have committed worse crimes. The character of D. must remain, like that of everyone, an insoluble enigma. A person is to be judged by his motives rather than by his actions, and one's true motives are unknown even to oneself (Jer 17 9). There are several sides of D.'s nature in regard to which there cannot be two opinions.

Perhaps the feature of his character which stands out most prominently in his earlier years, at any rate, is his boundless physical courage.

4. Physical Courage He never shirked danger (1 S 17 28, 34 ff) and delighted in hairbreadth escapes (26 6). Like most Semites he was fond of gambling and liked to take risks (18 26; cf 23 9; 30 7), even when modesty would have led him to decline them (17 32; cf Jgs 8 20). A native indifference to the shedding of blood grew into a liking for it, giving rise to acts of gross cruelty (1 S 27 9; 2 S 8 2; 16 7, etc). He had need, indeed, to be a brave man, considering the character of the men whom he ruled (1 S 22 2). Yet he could rule them by gentleness as well as by force (30 23). All classes had unbounded confidence in his personal courage and soldierly qualities (2 S 18 3), and were themselves driven to restrain his military ardor (21 17).

Whether D. possessed moral courage to an equal degree is another matter. Had he done so he would hardly have permitted the execution

5. Moral Courage of seven sons of Saul (2 S 21 1 ff), and that, too, at the cost of breaking his plighted word (1 S 24 21); he would not have stood in awe of the sons of his sister Zeruiah (2 S 3 39), and would have punished Joab instead of weakly invoking an imprecation on his head (ver 29), however much he might have felt the loss of his services. But in many matters his natural sense of justice was blunted by the superstitions of the age in which he lived.

But D. was even more prudent than courageous. He is so described by the person who recommended him (somewhat eulogistically) to Saul

6. Prudence (1 S 16 18). Prudence or wisdom was indeed what his biographer most remarks in him (18 5,30), and situated as he was he could not have too much of it. It shows itself in the fact that he consistently made as many friends and as few enemies as was possible. His wonderful foresight is shown in such acts as his conciliating the Judaeans chiefs with gifts taken from his spoil (30 26 ff), in his commendation of the men of Jabesh-gilead (2 S 2 5-7), and in his reception of Abner (3 20). Yet it must be confessed that this constant looking forward to the future takes away from the spontaneity of his virtue. His gratitude is often a keen sense of favors to come. His kindness to Merib-baal did him no harm and some advantage (ch 9; 19 24 ff), and his clemency to Shimei helped to win him the tribe of Benjamin (19 16 ff). Even in his earliest youth he seems to have preferred to attain his ends by roundabout ways. The means by which he obtained introduction or reintroduction to Saul (1 S 17 26 ff) afford some justification for the opinion which his eldest brother held of him (ver 28). Perhaps nothing proves the genius of D. better than his choice of Jebus as the capital of the country—which it still continues to be after a lapse of three thousand years.

Yet it must be confessed that D.'s prudence often degenerates into cunning. With true oriental subtlety he believed firmly in keeping

7. Strategy one's secret to oneself at all costs (1 S 21 2). The manner in which he got himself out of Gath after this first visit there (21 13) and the fact that he hoodwinked Achish during sixteen months (ch 27; 28 1; 29) may excite our admiration but not our respect. The Oriental, however, delights in a display of cunning and makes use of it without shame (2 S 15 34), just as the European does in secret. There is something curiously modern in the diplomacy which D. employed to ensure his own return in due state (19 11 ff). We must remember, however, that D. lived among persons hardly one of whom he could trust. Joab accuses Abner of deceit, while he himself was faithful to none except D. (2 S 3 25). Ziba accuses Merib-baal of treachery, and Merib-baal, Ziba of falsehood, and D. cannot tell which is speaking the truth (2 S 16 1 ff; 19 24 ff). D. himself is outwitted by Joab, though with a friendly purpose (2 S 14 1 ff). The wonder, therefore, is, not that D. was guilty of occasional obliquity, but that he remained as straightforward and simple as he was.

D. was, indeed, a man very much ahead of the times in which he lived. His fine elegies upon the death of Saul and Jonathan, Abner

8. Nobility and Absalom show that his nature was untainted with malice. It was no superstitious fear but a high sense of honor which kept him back from putting out of his way his arch-enemy when he had him in his power (1 S 24-26). He even attempts to find an excuse for him (26 19), while depreciating himself (24 14; 26 20) in phrases which are more than a mere oriental metonymy (2 S 9 8). It was the ambition of his life to be the founder of a permanent dynasty (2 S 7 29), yet he was willing that his house should be sacrificed to save his nation from destruction (24 17). Like most Orientals he was endowed with a refinement of feeling unknown in the West. His refusal to drink of water obtained at the cost of bloodshed has become classic (2 S 23 17). And he seems to have been gifted with the saving sense of humor (1 S 26 15). That he was a religious person goes without saying (2 S 7; 8 11). He did not probably believe that outside the land of Israel Jeh ceased to rule: the expression used in 1 S 26 19 is not a term of dogmatic theology. Like other Hebrews D. had no theology. He believed in Jeh alone as the ruler, if not of the universe, at any rate of all the world known to him. He certainly did not believe in Chemosh or Milcom, whether in the lands of Moab and Ammon or out of them (2 S 12 30; for "their king" read Malcam [Milcom]).

D. discharged, as most Orientals do, his duty toward his parents (1 S 22 3). To Michal his first wife his love was constant (2 S

9. David in Relation to His Family 3 13), although she did not bear him any children. In accordance with the custom of the times, as his estate improved, he took other wives and slave-girls. The favorite wife of his latter days was Bathsheba. His court made some show of splendor as contrasted with the dwellings of the peasantry and the farmer class (19 28,35), but his palace was always small and plain, so that it could be left to the keeping of ten women when he removed from it (15 16). D. and Michal seem to have lived on terms of perfect equality (6 20 ff). In this he contrasts somewhat with Ahab (1 K 21 5 ff). D.'s chief weakness in regard to his family was his indulgence of some of his sons and favoring some above others, and want of firmness in regard to them. He could refuse them nothing (2 S 13 27). His first favorite was his eldest son Amnon (13 21 LXX). After the death of Amnon, Absalom became the favorite (18 33), and after the death of Absalom, Adonijah (1 K 1 6). Yet D. lived for two whole years in Jerus along with Absalom without seeing him (2 S 14 28), and he was succeeded not by Adonijah, but by Solomon, whose mother was the favorite wife of his later years.

Not only did D. know the value of having many friends, but he was capable of sincere attachment.

10. David in Relation to His Friends There is no reason to doubt the sincerity of his love for Jonathan, although it is not so completely cut off from all suspicion of self-interest as is that of Jonathan for him. D., indeed, had the faculty of winning the confidence and love of all sorts and conditions of people, not only of Jonathan (1 S 18 1 ff; 20; 23 16 ff), but of J.'s sister Michal (18 20), of the whole people (18 28 LXX; 2 S 19 14), and even of his people's enemies (2 S 17 27 ff). His friendship lasted as long as the object of it lived (2 S 1 17 ff; 10 1 f). In the case of his officers this was partly due to his faculty for choosing good men (2 S 8 16 ff), so that the same persons often held the same offices during D.'s life (20 23 ff). Yet the services of one of them at least were retained more by compulsion than by choice (2 S 3 39). He seems, indeed, to have continued Joab in his post because he felt he could not do without him. Joab was devoted to D. with the devotion of Caleb Balderstone to his master, and he was as utterly unscrupulous. He did not hesitate to commit any crime that would benefit D. The latter dared not perpetrate these atrocities himself, but he did not mind taking advantage of such a useful instrument, and never punished Joab for them, save with an impotent curse (3 29). He dealt otherwise with malefactors who could be better spared (2 S 1 14 ff; 4 9 ff). Indeed, a suspicious juryman might find that D. put both Abner and Amasa in the way of Joab (3 23 ff; 19 13; 20 4 ff). It does not say much for D. that he fell so low as to fear losing the good opinion even of Joab, this ready instrument of his worst crime (11 25).

One reason for the high position D. held in the popular estimation was no doubt his almost uninterrupted success. He was regarded as the chosen of Heaven, by friend and foe alike (1 S 23 17). Fortune seemed to favor him. Nothing could have been more timely than the death of Saul and Jonathan, of Ishbaal and Abner, of Absalom and Amasa, and he did not raise his hand against one of them. As a guerilla chief with his 600 bandits he could keep at bay Saul with his 3,000 picked men (1 S 24 2; 26 2), but he was not a great general. Most of the old judges of Israel did in one pitched battle what D. effected in a campaign (1 S 18 30; 19 8; 23 1 ff; 2 S 5 17 ff; 21 15 ff). Most of his conquests were won for him by Joab (1 Ch 11 6; 2 S 11 1), who willingly accorded D. the credit of what he himself had done (2 S 12 27,28; cf 2 S 8 13; 1 Ch 18 11 with the title of Ps 60). And to crown all, when he came to turn his arms east and west, he found his two most formidable opponents in these directions crippled and harmless. That he ever survived Saul he owed to a timely incursion of the Philis (1 S 23 24 ff), and his whole career is largely to be explained by the fact that, at the moment, the tribe of Judah as a whole was passing from insignificance to supremacy.

In the prosecution of his military achievements D. employed everyone who came to his hand as an instrument without any question of nationality. This is not to impugn his patriotism. Eastern peoples are united not by the ties of country but of religion. Still it does seem strange that two of D.'s best friends were two enemies of his nation—Nahash, king of the Benē 'Ammōn (1 S 11 1; 2 S 10 1 ff) and Achish, lord of Gath (1 S 21 10; 27; 28 1 ff; 29). He appears to have found the Philis more reliable and trustworthy than the Hebrews. When he became king his personal body-guard was composed of mercenaries of that nation—the Cherethites and Pelethites—with whom he had become acquainted when at Ziklag (1 S 30 14; 2 S 8 18; 20 23). It was to a native of Gath that he committed the care of the sacred ark on its passage from Kiriath-jearim to Jerus (2 S 6 10,11). When the rebellion broke out under Absalom, he committed one-third of his forces to a banished soldier of the same town, who had come to him a little while before with a band of followers (2 S 15 19 ff; 18 2). Some of the soldiers in whom he placed the greatest confidence were Hittites (1 S 26 6; 2 S 11 6), and his commissariat was furnished by persons outside of Israel (2 S 17 27; the Machir tribe were half Syrian; Gilead is the son of Machir, 1 Ch 7 14). The threshing-floor of a Jebusite became the site of the temple of Solomon (2 S 24 18 ff).

D. was a strong believer in the power of Nemesis, and that daughter of Night played a considerable part in his life. He felt a peculiar satisfaction in being undeservedly cursed by Shimei, from a conviction that poetic justice would in the end prevail (2 S 16 12). He must have felt that the same unseen power was at work when his own eldest son was guilty of a crime such as his father had committed before him (2 S 13 and 11), and when the grandfather of the wife of Uriah the Hittite became the enemy whom he had most to fear (2 S 11 3; 23 34; cf Ps 41 9; 55 12 f). And D.'s own last hours, instead of being spent in repose and peace following upon a strenuous and successful life, were passed in meting out vengeance to those who had incurred his displeasure as well as commending those who had done him service (1 K 2 5 ff).

Even as early as Ezekiel D. became the ruler who was to govern the restored people of Israel (34 23.

24; 37 24). If there were to be a ruling house it must be the Davidic dynasty; it did not occur to the Jews to think of any other solution (Am 9 11; Hos 3 5; Jer 30 9; Zec 12 8).

That Jesus was descended from D. (Mt 9 27, etc) is proved by the fact that his enemies did not deny that he was so (22 41 ff). In the NT, D. is regarded as the author of the Pss (Acts 4 25; Rom 4 6; He 4 7). He is also one of the OT saints (He 11 32) whose actions (unless otherwise stated) are to be imitated (Mt 12 3); but yet not to be compared with the Messiah (Acts 2 29 ff; 13 36) who has power over the life to come (Rev 3 7) and who is "the Root of David" (5 5; 22 16).

DAVID, CITY OF. See ZION.

DAVID, ROOT, rōōt, OF (ἡ ῥίζα Δαυὶδ, hē rhiza Daulid, Rev 5 5; 22 16): Root here means stock, family, descendant, hence "the Root of David" is that which descended from David, not that from which David descended. Jesus Christ in His human nature and family connections was a descendant of David, a member of his family.

DAVID, TOWER, tou'ēr, OF. See JERUSALEM.

DAWN, dōn, DAWNING: The word means the approach of the morning light, the breaking of the day. There are several words in the Bible that indicate this. נֶשֶׁפֶת, nesheph, "twilight" of the morning (Job 7 4; Ps 119 147). The same word is used for evening twilight (1 S 30 17; 2 K 7 5,7); פְּנוֹת הַבֹּקֶר, penōth ha-bōker, "the turning" of the morning, the change from darkness to light, approach of the morning (Jgs 19 26); עֵפְפֵי שָׁהָר, 'aph'appē shahar, "the eyelids" of the morning (Job 3 9; 41 18 [10]); עֲלֹת הַשָּׁהָר, 'ālōth ha-shahar, "the ascent" or "rise" of the morning (Josh 6 15); ἐπιφώσκει, epiphōskō, "to grow light," the approach of the dawn (Mt 28 1; Lk 23 54 m); διαγγάζω, diaggázō, "to grow bright," "lustrous" (2 Pet 1 19), "until the day dawn"; fig. of the Second Coming of Christ (cf ver 16).

DAY, dā (יּוֹם, yōm; ἡμέρα, hēméra): This common word has caused some trouble to plain readers, because they have not noticed that the word is used in several different senses in the Eng. Bible. When the different uses of the word are understood the difficulty of interpretation vanishes. We note several different uses of the word:

(1) It sometimes means the time from daylight till dark. This popular meaning is easily discovered by the context, e.g. Gen 1 5; 8 22, etc. The marked periods of this daytime were morning, noon and night, as with us. See Ps 55 17. The early hours were sometimes called "the cool of the day" (Gen 3 8). After the exile the day or daytime was divided into twelve hours and the night into twelve (see Mt 20 1-12; Jn 11 9; Acts 23 23); 6 AM would correspond to the first hour, 9 AM to the third; 12 M to the sixth, etc. The hours were longer during the longer days and shorter during the shorter days, as they always counted 12 hours between sunrise and sunset.

(2) Day also means a period of 24 hours, or the time from sunset to sunset. In Bible usage the day begins with sunset (see Lev 23 32; Ex 12 15-20; 2 Cor 11 25, where night is put before day). See DAY AND NIGHT.

(3) The word "day" is also used of an indefinite period, e.g. "the day" or "day that" means in general "that time" (see Gen 2 4; Lev 14 2); "day of trouble" (Ps 20 1); "day of his wrath" (Job 20 28); "day of Jehovah" (Isa 2 12); "day of the Lord" (1 Cor 5 5; 1 Thess 5 2; 2 Pet 3 10); "day of salvation" (2 Cor 6 2); "day of Jesus Christ" (Phil 1 6).

(4) It is used figuratively also in Jn 9 4, where "while it is day" means "while I have opportunity to work, as daytime is the time for work." In 1 Thess 5 5,8, "sons of the day" means spiritually enlightened ones.

(5) We must also bear in mind that with God time is not reckoned as with us (see Ps 90 4; 2 Pet 3 8).

(6) The apocalyptic use of the word "day" in Dnl 12 11; Rev 2 10, etc, is difficult to define. It evidently does not mean a natural day. See APOCALYPSE.

(7) On the meaning of "day" in the story of Creation we note (a) the word "day" is used of the whole period of creation (Gen 2 4); (b) these days are days of God, with whom one day is as a thousand years; the whole age or period of salvation is called "the day of salvation"; see above. So we believe that in harmony with Bible usage we may understand the creative days as creative periods. See also ASTRONOMY; CREATION; EVOLUTION.

Figurative: The word "day" is used fig. in many senses, some of which are here given.

(1) The span of human life.—Gen 5 4: "And the days of Adam . . . were eight hundred years." "And if thou wilt walk . . . then I will lengthen thy days" (1 K 3 14; cf Ps 90 12; Isa 38 5).

(2) An indefinite time.—Existence in general: Gen 3 14: "All the days of thy life" (cf Gen 21 34; Nu 9 19; Josh 22 3; Lk 1 24; Acts 21 10).

(3) A set time.—Gen 25 24: "And when her days . . . were fulfilled"; Dnl 12 13: "Thou shalt stand in thy lot, at the end of the days" (cf Lev 12 6; Dnl 2 44).

(4) A historic period.—Gen 6 4: "The Nephilim were in the earth in those days"; Jgs 17 6: "In those days there was no king in Israel" (cf 1 S 3 1; 1 Ch 5 17; Hos 2 13).

(5) Past time.—Ps 18 18: "the day of my calamity"; Ps 77 5: "I have considered the days of old" (cf Mic 7 20; Mt 3 7; Mt 23 30).

(6) Future time.—Dt 31 14: "Thy days approach that thou must die"; Ps 72 7: "In his days shall . . ." (cf Ezk 22 14; Joel 2 29; Mt 24 19; 2 Pet 3 3; Rev 9 6).

(7) The eternal.—In Dnl 7 9,13, where God is called "the ancient of days."

(8) A season of opportunity.—Jn 9 4: "We must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work" (cf Rom 13 12,13; 1 Thess 5 5-8). See DAY (4), above.

(9) Time of salvation.—Specially referring to the hopes and prospects of the parousia (see ESCHATOLOGY OF NT). Rom 13 12: "The night is far spent, and the day is at hand."

HENRY E. DOSKER

DAY AND NIGHT: "Day," יוֹם, yôm; ordinarily, the Heb "day" lasted from dawn to the coming forth of the stars (Neh 4 21). The context usually makes it clear whether the term "day" refers to the period of twenty-four hours or to daytime; when there was a possibility of confusion, the term לַיְלָה, laylāh, "night," was added (Gen 7 4,12; 31 39). The "day" is reckoned from evening to evening, in accordance with the order noted in the account of Creation, viz. "And there was evening and there was morning, one day" (Gen 1 5); Lev 23 32 and Dnl 8 14 reflect the same mode of reckoning the day. The phrase עֶרֶב בֹּקֶר, 'erebh bōker,' "evening-morning," used in this last passage, is simply a variation of yôm and laylāh, "day" and "night"; it is the equivalent of the Gr νυχθημερον, nuchthēmeron (2 Cor 11 25). That the custom of reckoning the day as beginning in the evening and lasting until the following evening was probably of late origin is shown by the phrase "tarry all night" (Jgs 19 6-9); the context shows that the day is regarded as beginning in the morning; in the evening the day "declined," and until the new day (morning) arrived it was necessary to "tarry all night" (cf also Nu 11 32).

The transition of day to night begins before sunset and lasts till after sunset; the change of night to day begins before sunrise and continues until after sunrise. In both cases, neither 'erebh,' "evening," nor bōker, "morning," indicate an exact space of time (cf Gen 8 11; Ex 10 13; Dt 16 6). The term נֶשֶׁפֶה, nesheph, is used for both evening twilight and morning dawn (cf 1 S 30 17; 2 K 7 5,7; Job 7 4). As there were no definite measurements of the time of day, the various periods were indicated by the natural changes of the day; thus "midday" was the time of the day when the sun mounted its highest (צֶהְרָא, sehōrāyim); afternoon was that part of the day when the sun declined (נְטוּחַ הַיּוֹם, netūh ha-yôm); and evening was the time of the going down of the sun (עֶרֶב, 'erebh'). "Between the evenings" (בֵּין הָעֶרְבַּיִם, bēn hā-'arbayim) was the interval between sunset and darkness. The day was not divided into hours until a late period. שָׁעָה, shā'ah=Aram. (Dnl 3 6), is common in Syr and in later Heb; it denoted, originally, any short space of time, and only later came to be equivalent to our "hour" (Driver). The threefold division of the day into watches continued into post-exilic Rom times; but the Rom method of four divisions was also known (Mk 13 35), where all four divisions are referred to: "at even" (ὁψέ, opsé), "midnight" (μεσονύκτιον, mesonuktion), "at cock crowing" (ἀλεκτοροφωνία, alektorophōnia), "in the morning" (πρωί, prōi). These last extended from six to six o'clock (cf also Mt 14 25; Mk 13 35). Acts 12 4 speaks of four parties of four Rom soldiers (quaternions), each of whom had to keep guard during one watch of the night. In B'rākhōth 3b, Rabbi Nathan (2d cent.) knows of only three night-watches; but the patriarch, Rabbi Judah, knows four. See also DAY.

HORACE J. WOLF

DAY BEFORE THE SABBATH (ἡ παρασκευή, hē paraskeuē, "preparation"): Considered as a day of preparation, in accordance with Ex 16 23, both before the regular Sabbath and before a feast Sabbath (Mt 27 62; Mk 15 42; Lk 23 54; Jn 19 14,31,42). At 3 PM, the Hebrews began to prepare their food for the next day, and to perform all labors which were forbidden to be done on the Sabbath and yet must be done. They bathed and purified themselves, dressed in festive apparel, set their tables, and lighted their lamps. On the day before Easter, the Hebrews of the later period made it their chief business to remove all leaven from the house (1 Cor 5 7). This custom of converting at least a portion of the day before the Sabbath into a holy day was recognized by the Romans to such an extent that, according to a rescript of Augustus, Jews need not appear in court after 3 PM on such days. Criminal cases were not brought before court on this day, and journeys exceeding 12 Rom miles were prohibited. The signal for the preparations was given by the priests by means of trumpets blown six times at intervals.

DAY, LAST (ἡ ἐσχάτη ἡμέρα, hē eschátē hēméra): Repeatedly used by Jesus in Jn (6 39.40.44.54; 11 24; 12 48) for the day of resurrection and judgment (see ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT). Cf the usage in the OT (Isa 2 2; Mic 4 1) and the NT (Acts 2 17; 2 Tim 3 1; 2 Pet 3 3; 1 Jn 2 18; Jude ver 18) of "last days" and "last time" to denote the Messianic age. See LATTER DAYS; LAST DAYS; LAST TIME.

In Jn 7 37, "the last day, the great day of the feast" refers to the eighth day of the feast of Tabernacles. This closing day was observed as a Sabbath (Lev 23 36). On it the libation of water made on other days was not made; hence the allusion of Jesus to Himself as the Giver of the living water.

DAY OF THE LORD (JEHOVAH) (יום יהוה, yōm YHWH; ἡ ἡμέρα τοῦ Κυρίου, hē hēméra tou Kuríou): The idea is a common OT one. It denotes the consummation of the kingdom of God and the absolute cessation of all attacks upon it (Isa 2 12; 13 6.9; 34 8; Ezk 13 5; 30 3; Joel 1 15; 2 11; Am 5 18; Zeph 1 14; Zec 14 1). It is a "day of visitation" (Isa 10 3), a day "of the wrath of Jeh" (Ezk 7 19), a "great day of Jeh" (Zeph 1 14). The entire conception in the OT is dark and foreboding.

On the other hand the NT idea is pervaded with the elements of hope and joy and victory. In the NT it is eminently the day of Christ, the day of His coming in the glory of His father. The very conception of Him as the "Son of Man" points to this day (E. Kuehl, Das Selbstbewusstsein Jesu, 68). Jn 5 27: "And he gave him authority to execute judgment, because he is a son of man" (cf Mt 24 27.30; Lk 12 8). It is true in the NT there is a dark background to the bright picture, for it still remains a "day of wrath" (Rom 2 5.6), a "great day" (Rev 6 17; Jude ver 6), a "day of God" (2 Pet 3 12), a "day of judgment" (Mt 10 15; 2 Pet 3 7; Rom 2 16). Sometimes it is called "that day" (Mt 7 22; 1 Thess 5 4; 2 Tim 4 8), and again it is called "the day" without any qualification whatever, as if it were the only day worth counting in all the history of the world and of the race (1 Cor 3 13). To the unbeliever, the NT depicts it as a day of terror; to the believer, as a day of joy. For on that day Christ will raise the dead, esp. His own dead, the bodies of those that believed in Him—"that of all that which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up at the last day" (Jn 6 39). In that day He comes to His own (Mt 16 27), and therefore it is called "the day of our Lord Jesus" (2 Cor 1 14), "the day of Jesus Christ" or "of Christ" (Phil 1 6.10), the day when there "shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven" (Mt 24 30). All Paulinic lit. is esp. suffused with this longing for the "parousia," the day of Christ's glorious manifestation. The entire conception of that day centers therefore in Christ and points to the everlasting establishment of the kingdom of heaven, from which sin will be forever eliminated, and in which the antithesis between Nature and grace will be changed into an everlasting synthesis. See also ESCHATOLOGY (OF OT AND NT).

HENRY E. DOSKER

DAYS JOURNEY, jûr'ni (דֶּרֶךְ יוֹם, derekh yôm, Gen 30 36; Nu 10 33; 11 31; ἡμέρας ὁδός, hēméras hodós, Lk 2 44): The common way of estimating distances in the East is by hours and days. This is natural in a country where roads are mere bridle paths or non-existent, as in the desert. The distance traveled must of course differ largely according to the difficulties of the way, and it is more important to know where night will overtake the traveler than the actual distance accomplished. A day's journey is now commonly reckoned at about 3 miles per hour, the distance usually covered by a loaded mule, the number of hours being about 8. Hence a day's journey is about 24 miles, and this may be taken as a fair estimate for Bible times.

DAYS, LAST. See LAST DAYS.

DAYS MAN, dāz'man (יָכַח, yākhah, "to argue, decide, convince," RV UMPIRE): The use of this word appears to have been more common in the 16th cent. than at the later date of the tr of AV, when its adoption was infrequent. The oldest instance of the term given in the Oxford English Dictionary is Plumpton Corresp. (1489), p. 82: "Sir, the dayesmen cannot agre us." It appears also in the 1551 ed of the OT in 1 S 2 25, where the EV "judge" is tr<sup>d</sup> "dayes-man." Tindale's tr has for Ex 21 22, "He shall paye as the dayesmen apoynte him" (EV as the "judges determine"). See also Edmund Spenser's Faerie Queene, ii, c. 8, published in 1590. As used in AV (Job 9 33) the word means an arbitrator, umpire, referee; one who stands in a judicial capacity between two parties, and decides upon the merits of their arguments or case at law. "Neither is there any daysman [RV "umpire"] betwixt us, that might lay his hand upon us both" (cf Gen 31 37). It was the eastern custom for a judge to lay his hands upon the heads of the two parties in disagreement, thus emphasizing his adjudicatory capacity and his desire to render an unbiased verdict. Job might consider a human judge as capable of acting as an umpire upon his own claims, but no man was worthy to question the purposes of Jeh, or metaphorically, to "lay his hands upon" Him.

In the NT (1 Cor 4 3, ἀνθρωπίνῃ, anthrōpīnē, hēméra, hēméra) "man's judgment" is lit. "man's day," in the sense of a day fixed for the trial of a case. Both Tindale and Coverdale so translate. See also 1 Tim 2 5, where the Saviour is termed the "one mediator . . . between God and men." Here the word understands a pleader, an advocate before an umpire, rather than the adjudicator himself (see Job 19 25-27).

ARTHUR WALWYN EVANS

DAYS PRING, dā'spring: This beautiful Eng. word, in current use in the time of the AV, is found in the OT as the tr of שָׁחַר, shahar, "Hast thou . . . caused the dayspring to know his place?" (Job 38 12 AV). This is no doubt intended lit. for the dawn. The "place" of the dayspring is the particular point of the horizon at which the sun comes up on any given day. This slowly changes day by day through the year, moving northward from midwinter till midsummer, and back again southward from midsummer to midwinter. See ASTRONOMY, I, 2. Also once in the NT for ἀνατολή, anatolē, "a rising."

"The dayspring from on high hath visited us" (AV; RV "shall visit us," Lk 1 78). Also in Apoc, "At the dayspring pray unto thee" (AV; RV "plead with thee at the dawning of the light," Wisd 16 28). Both the Heb and Gr words, however, are of frequent occurrence, but variously rendered, "dawn," "break of day," "morning," "sunrise," "east." Note esp. "the spring of the day" (1 S 9 26), "the day began to spring" (Jgs 19 25). Used with hēliou, "sun," for rising of the sun (Rev 7 2; 16 12). In LXX the same Gr word is used for Heb cemah, "branch," to designate the Messiah (Jer 23 5; Zec 6 12). But this sense of the word is wholly unknown in profane Gr. The word is also employed in LXX to express the rising of a heavenly body, as the moon (Isa 60 19). This is good Gr. See the kindred vb. anatellō, "to rise" (LXX, Isa 60 1; Mal 4 2).

What is the meaning of anatolē in Lk 1 78? Certainly not branch; that does not fit any of the facts, unless it be rendered "branch of light" (see Reynolds, John the Baptist, 115). It occurs in Zacharias' hymn over the birth of his son. The ode consists of two parts, "The glory and security of the Messiah's kingdom," and "The glory of the Forerunner." The expression before us is in the latter part. It naturally refers, therefore, not to the Messiah himself, but to John. He is the dayspring from on high who hath visited the people who sat in darkness and the shadow of death. With Godet we believe that the picture is borrowed from the caravan which has missed its way in the desert. The unfortunate pilgrims, overtaken by the night, are sitting down expecting death, when suddenly a star brightly beams above them. They take courage at the sight. The whole caravan leaps to its feet. It is the herald of the coming day and soon they see the great orb himself filling the east with orient pearl and gold. Is not one tempted to go a little farther and see here the morning star, herald of the coming sun to be obliterated by his rising? 'He must wax, but I must wane' (Jn 3 30). What was John's work but, by his own testimony, to guide the benighted pilgrims into the way of peace, that is, to Him who was the Prince of Peace? If, however, as by most commentators, it be taken to refer to the Messiah, it probably implies prophetic knowledge that the conception of Jesus had already taken place, and that the Messianic era was at hand, when the Jewish world should be filled with spiritual splendor. See DAY-STAR.

DAY-STAR (הַלֵּל בֶּן־שָׁחַר, hēlēl ben-shāḥar, Isa 14 12; φῶσφόρος, phōsphōros, 2 Pet 1 19): The OT passage is rendered in AV "Lucifer, son of the morning," in AVm and RV "day-star," i.e. the morning star. The reference is to the king of Babylon (ver 4). In 2 Pet 1 19, "Until . . . the day-star arise in your hearts," the word is lit. "light-bringer." It is applicable, therefore, not only to the planet Venus, seen as a morning star, herald of the dawn, but to the sun itself, and is used here as a title of Our Lord. See ASTRONOMY, I, 6.

DEACON, dē'k'n, DEACONESS, dē'k'n-es: The term διάκονος, diákonos, and its cognates occur many times in the NT, as do its synonyms ὑπηρέτης, hypēretēs, and δούλος, doulos, with their respective cognates. It may be said in general that the terms denote the service or ministrations of the bondservant (doulos), underling (hypēretēs) or helper (diákonos), in all shades and gradations of meaning both literal and metaphorical. It would serve no useful purpose to list and discuss all the passages in detail. Christianity has from the beginning stood for filial service to God and His kingdom and for brotherly helpfulness to man, and hence terms expressive of these functions abound in the NT. It behooves us to inquire whether and where they occur in a technical sense sufficiently defined to denote the institution of a special ecclesiastical office, from which the historical diaconate may confidently be said to be derived.

Many have sought the origin of the diaconate in the institution of the Seven at Jerus (Acts 6), and this view was countenanced by many of the church Fathers. The Seven were appointed to "serve tables" (diakoneîn trapézais), in order to permit the Twelve to "continue stedfastly in prayer, and in the ministry [diakonia] of the word." They are not called deacons (diakonoi), and the qualifications required are not the same as those prescribed by Paul in 1 Tim 3 8-12; furthermore, Stephen appears in Acts preëminently as a preacher, and Philip as an evangelist. Paul clearly recognizes women as deaconesses, but will not permit a woman to teach (1 Tim 2 12). The obvious conclusion is that the Seven may be called the first deacons only in the sense that they were the earliest recorded helpers of the Twelve as directors of the church, and that they served in the capacity, among others, of specially appointed ministrants to the poor.

Paul says, "I commend unto you Phoebe our sister, who is a servant [RVm "or, deaconess"] of the church that is at Cenchreae" (Rom 16 1). This is by many taken as referring to an officially appointed deaconess; but the fact that there is in the earlier group of Paul's epistles no clear evidence of the institution of the diaconate, makes against this interpretation. Phoebe was clearly an honored helper in the church closely associated with that at Corinth, where likewise evidence of special ecclesiastical organization is wanting.

In Phil 1 1 Paul and Timothy send greetings "to all the saints . . . at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons." Here then we find mention of "deacons" in a way to suggest a formal diaconate; but the want of definition as to their qualifications and duties renders it impossible to affirm with certainty the existence of the office.

In 1 Tim 3 8-12, after prescribing the qualifications and the method of appointment of a bishop or overseer, Paul continues: "Deacons in like manner must be grave, not double-tongued, not given to much wine, not greedy of filthy lucre; holding the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience. And let these also first be proved; then let them serve as deacons, if they be blameless. Women in like manner must be grave, not slanderers, temperate, faithful in all things. Let deacons be husbands of one wife, ruling their children and their own houses well." Deacons and deaconesses are here provided for, and the character of their qualifications makes it clear that they were to be appointed as dispensers of alms, who should come into close personal relations with the poor.

We conclude, therefore, that the Seven and Phoebe did not exercise the diaconate in a technical sense, which appears first certainly in 1 Tim 3, although it is not improbably recognized in Phil 1 1, and was foreshadowed in the various agencies for the dispensing of alms and the care of the poor of the church instituted in various churches at an earlier date. DEAD, ded (מֵת, mūth; νεκρός, nekrós): Used in several senses: (1) as a substantive, denoting the body deprived of life, as when Abraham speaks of burying his dead (Gen 23); (2) as a collective noun including all those that have passed away from life (as Rev 20 12). In several passages dead in this sense is used in contrast to the quick or living (as Nu 16 48). This collective mode of expression is used when resurrection is described as "rising from the dead"; (3) as an adj., coupled with body, carcass or man, as Dt 14 8 AV; (4) most frequently it is used as a complement of the vb. "to be," referring to the condition of being deceased or the period of death, e.g. 2 S 12 19; Mk 5 35; (5) in the sense of being liable to death it occurs in Gen 20 3; Ex 12 33; 2 S 16 9; (6) as an intensive adj. it is used in the phrase "dead sleep," to mean profound sleep simulating death (Ps 76 6); (7) figuratively "dead" is used to express the spiritual condition of those who are unable to attain to the life of faith. They are dead in trespasses, as in Eph 2 1, or conversely, those who by the New Birth are delivered from sin, are said to be dead to the Law (as Col 2 20, etc.). A faith which does not show its life in the practical virtues of Christianity is called dead (Jas 2 17); (8) in Rom 4 19; He 11 12, "dead" signifies the senile condition of loss of vigor and virility.

The passage in Job (26 5), wherein in AV "dead things" seem to mean things that never had life, is more accurately tr'd in RV as "they that are deceased," i.e. the shades of the dead.

There are few references to the physical accompaniments of the act of dying. Deborah has a poetical account of the death of Sisera (Jgs 5 24 ff), and in Eccl 12, where the failure of the bodily faculties in old age culminates in death, it is pictorially compared to the breaking of a lamp extinguishing the flame ("golden" being probably used of "oil," as it is in Zec 4 12), and the loosing of the silver hebbel or chain by which the lamp is suspended in the tent of the Arab.

The dead body defiled those who touched it (Lev 11 31) and therefore sepulture took place speedily, as in the case of Lazarus (Jn 11 17-39) and Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5 6-10). This practice is still followed by the fellahin.

The uselessness of the dead is the subject of a proverb (Eccl 9 4) and the phrase "dead dog" is used as a contemptuous epithet as of a person utterly worthless (1 S 24 14; 2 S 9 8; 16 9).

DEADLY, ded'li: In the OT two words are used in the sense of a "mortal [Heb nepesh, "hateful," "foul"] enemy" (Ps 17 9), and in the sense of "fatal disease," the destructiveness of which causes a general panic (Heb māweth, "death," 1 S 5 11).

In the NT we have in Rev 13 3, 12 the expression "deadly wound" (Gr thánatos), better "death-stroke," as in RV, and the phrases "deadly thing," i.e. poison (thanásimón ti, Mk 16 18), and "full of deadly poison" (mesitē ioi thanatēphōrou, Jas 3 8), said of an unruly tongue. Both Gr words convey the idea of "causing or bringing death" and occur in classical lit. in a variety of uses in combination with the bite of venomous reptiles, deadly potions, mortal wounds and fatal contagion.

The name given by Gr and Lat writers to the remarkable inland lake occupying the deepest part of the depression of the ARABAH (q.v.). In the Bible it is called the Salt Sea (Gen 14 3; Dt 3 17); the Sea of the Plain (Ārābhāh) (Josh 3 16); and the (East) Eastern Sea (Ezk 47 18; Joel 2 20). Among the Arabs it is still called Bahr Lūt (Sea of Lot). By Jos it was called Lake Asphaltites (Ant, I, ix) from the quantities of bitumen or asphalt occasionally washed upon its shores and found in some of the tributary wadies.

I. Present Area.—The length of the lake from N. to S. is 47 miles; its greatest width 10 miles narrowing down to less than 2 miles opposite Point Molyneux on el-Lisān. Its area is approximately 300 sq. miles. From various levelings its surface is found to be 1,292 ft. below that of the Mediterranean, while its greatest depth, near the eastern shore 10 miles S. of the mouth of the Jordan is 1,278 ft. But the level varies from 10 to 15 ft. semiannually, and more at longer intervals; and we are not sure from which one of these levels the above figures have been derived. Throughout the northern half of the lake on the E. side the descent to the extreme depth is very rapid; while from the western side the depth increases more gradually, esp. at the extreme northern end, where the lake has been filled in by the delta of the Jordan.

About two-thirds of the distance to the southern end, the peninsula, el-Lisān ("the Tongue"), projects from the E. more than half-way across the lake, being in the shape, however, of a boot rather than a tongue, with the toe to the N., forming a bay between it and the eastern mainland. The head of this bay has been largely filled in by the débris brought down by Wady Kerak, and Wady Ben Hamid, and shoals very gradually down to the greatest depths to the N. The toe of this peninsula is named Point Costigan, and the heel, Point Molyneux, after two travelers who lost their lives about the middle of the 19th cent. in pioneer attempts to explore the lake. Over the entire area S. of Point Molyneux, the water is shallow, being nowhere more than 15 ft. deep, and for the most part not over 10 ft., and in some places less than 6 ft. In high water the lake extends a mile or more beyond low-water mark, over the Mud Flat (Sebkah) at the south end.

From the history of the crossing of the Jordan by Joshua and the expedition of Chedorlaomer when Lot was captured, it is evident that the outlines of the sea were essentially the same 3,500 years ago as they are now, showing that there has been no radical change in climatic conditions since then.

II. Former Enlargement.—But if we go back a few thousand years into prehistoric times the evidence is abundant that the valley has witnessed remarkable climatic changes (see ARABAH). At Ain Abu Werideh, about 40 miles beyond the south end of the lake, Hull in 1883 discovered deposits of an abandoned shore line 1,400 ft. above its level (see ARABAH). A pronounced abandoned shore line at the 650 ft. level had been observed first by Tristram, and noted afterward by many travelers. But from the more detailed examination made by Professor Ellsworth Huntington in 1909 (see Pal and Its Transformation) five abandoned shore lines of marked size have been determined, surrounding the valley at the following approximate heights above the present level of the lake: 1,430, 640, 430, 300 and 250 ft. He writes that "at its greatest extent the sea stretched at least 30 miles south of its present termination, while northward it probably covered the Sea of Galilee and the Waters of Merom, and sent an arm into the Vale of Jezreel. . . . Lacustrine deposits exist in the Jordan valley shortly south of the Sea of Galilee. A mile north of Jisr el-Mujamiyeh, as the modern railroad bridge is called, a tilted series of clays, apparently lacustrine, lies under some untilted whitish clays, also apparently lacustrine. The elevation here is about 840 ft. below that of the Mediterranean Sea, or 450 above the Dead Sea. . . . So far as can be detected by the aneroid the highest deposits [about the Dead Sea] lie at the same elevation on all sides of the lake."

There are also numerous minor strands below the 250 ft. major strand. These are estimated by Huntington as 210, 170, 145, 115, 90, 70, 56, 40, 30 and 12 ft. above the lake successively. It is noted, also, that the lower beaches all show less erosion than those above them. This certainly points to a gradual diminution of the water in the basin during the prehistoric period, while on the other hand there is much evidence that there has been a considerable rise in the water within the historic period. Date palms and tamarisks are seen standing out from the water in numerous places some little distance from the present shore where the water is several feet deep. These are of such size as to show that for many years the soil in which they grew was not subject to overflow. As long ago as 1876 Merrill noticed such trees standing in the water 40 ft. from the shore, near the N.E. corner of the lake (East of the Jordan, 224). Numerous trunks of date palms and tamarisks can now be seen submerged to a similar extent along the western shore. In 1818 Irby and Mangles (Travels, 454) saw a company of Arabs ford the lake from Point Molyneux to the west side, and noted that the line of the ford was marked by branches of trees which had been stuck into the bottom. In 1838 Robinson found the water at such a stage that the ford was impracticable and so it has been reported by all travelers since that time. But Mr. A. Forder, having recently examined the evidence for the Pal Exploration Fund, learns from the older Arabs that formerly there was a well-known causeway leading from el-Lisân opposite Wady Kerak to Wady Umm Baghek, across which sheep, goats and men could pass, while camels and mules could be driven across anywhere in the water. Moreover the Arab guide said that the channel "was so narrow that the people of his tribe used to sit on the edge of the Lisân and parley with Arabs from the west as to the return of cattle that had been stolen by one or other of the parties." (See PEFS [April, 1910], 112.)

III. Level of, in Early Historic Times.—Numerous general considerations indicate that in the early historic period the level of the water was so much lower than now that much of the bay S. of Point Molyneux was dry land. In Josh 15 2.5 f the south border of Judah is said to extend from "the bay [tongue, Lisân] that looketh southward"; while the "border of the north quarter was from the bay [tongue, Lisân] of the sea at the end of the Jordan; and the border went up to Beth-hoglah, and passed along by the north of Beth-arabah." If the limits of the north end of the Dead Sea were the same then as now the boundary must have turned down to the mouth of the Jordan by a sharp angle. But according to the description it runs almost exactly E. and W. from beyond Jerus to Beth-hoglah, and nothing is said about any change in direction, while elsewhere, any such abrupt change in direction as is here supposed is carefully noted. Furthermore, in detailing the boundary of Benjamin (Josh 18 19) we are told that "the border passed along to the side of Beth-hoglah northward; and the goings out of the border were at the north bay [tongue, Lisân] of the Salt Sea, at the south end of the Jordan: this was the south border." This can hardly have any other meaning than that the north end of the Dead Sea was at Beth-hoglah. From these data Mr. Clermont-Ganneau (see Recueil d'archéologie orientale, V [1902], 267-80) inferred that in the time of Joshua the level of the sea was so much higher than now that a tongue-like extension reached the vicinity of Beth-hoglah, while the underlying topography was essentially the same as now. On the contrary, our present knowledge of the geologic forces in operation would indicate that at that time the Dead Sea was considerably lower than now, and that its rise to its present level has been partly caused by the silting up of a bay which formerly extended to Beth-hoglah.

VIEW FROM MOUNT OF OLIVES, OVERLOOKING THE DEAD SEA

The geological evidence concerning this point is so interesting, and of so much importance in its bearing upon our interpretation of various historical statements concerning the region, that it is worth while to present it somewhat in detail. As already stated (see ARABAH), the present level of the Dead Sea is determined by the equilibrium established between the evaporation (estimated at 20,000,000 cubic ft. per diem) over the area and the amount of the extent to which these encroachments have tended to narrow the limits of the original lake. The sediment deposited by the Jordan, at the north end of the Dead Sea, is practically all derived from the portion of the drainage basin between it and the Sea of Galilee—the latter serving as a catch-basin to retain the sediment brought down from the upper part of the valley. The Zôr, or narrow channel which the Jordan has eroded in the sedimentary water brought into the valley by the tributary streams. The present area of the sea is, in round numbers, 300 sq. miles. The historical evidence shows that this evaporating surface has not varied appreciably since the time of Abraham. But the encroachments of the delta of the Jordan upon this area, as well as of the deltas of several other streams, must have been very great since that period. The effect of this would be to limit the evaporating surface, which would cause the water to rise until it overflowed enough of the low land at the south end to restore the equilibrium.

It is easy to make an approximate calculation of plain through which it flows (see JORDAN, VALLEY OF), is approximately half a mile wide, 100 feet deep, and 60 miles long. All the sediment which formerly filled this has been swept into the head of the sea, while the Jarmuk, the Jabbok, and a score of smaller tributaries descending rapidly from the bordering heights of Gilead, three or four thousand ft. above the valley, bring an abnormal amount of débris into the river, as do a large number of shorter tributaries which descend an equal amount from the mountains of Galilee, Samaria, and Judah. The entire area thus contributing to this part of the Jordan is not less than 3,000 sq. miles

All writers are impressed by the evidence of the torrential floods which fill these water courses after severe storms. The descent being so rapid, permits the water after each rainfall to run off without delay, and so intensifies its eroding power. The well-known figure of Our Lord (Mt 7 26 ft) in describing the destruction of the house which is built upon the sand, when the rains descend and the winds beat upon it, is drawn from Nature. The delta terraces at the mouths of such mountain streams where they debouch on the lowlands are formed and re-formed with extreme rapidity, each succeeding storm tending to wash the previous delta down to lower levels and carry away whatever was built upon it.

The storms which descend upon the plains of Gilead, as well as those upon the Judean hills, are exceedingly destructive. For though the rainfall at Jerus, according to the observations of Chaplin (see J. Glaisher, "On the Fall of Rain at Jerus," PEFS [January, 1894], 39) averages but 20 inches annually, ranging from 32.21 inches in 1878 to 13.39 inches in 1870, nearly all occurs in the three winter months, and therefore in quantities to be most effective in erosive capacity. And this is effective upon both sides of the Jordan valley, in which the rainfall is very slight. "Day after day," Tristram remarks, "we have seen the clouds, after pouring their fatness on Samaria and Judaea, pass over the valley, and then descend in torrents on the hills of Gilead and Moab," a phenomenon naturally resulting from the rising column of heated air coming up from the torrid conditions of the depressed Jordan valley.

Tristram (The Land of Moab, 23, 24) gives a vivid description of the effect of a storm near Jerus. As his party was encamped during the night the whole slope upon which they pitched became a shallow stream, while "the deep ravines of the wilderness of Judah [were] covered with torrents, and tiny cascades rolling down from every rock. . . . So easily disintegrated is the soft limestone of these wadies, that the rain of a few hours . . . did more to deepen and widen the channels than the storms of several years could effect on a Northumbrian hillside. No geologist could watch the effect of this storm without being convinced that in calculating the progress of denudation, other factors than that of time must be taken into account, and that denudation may proceed most rapidly where rains are most uncertain."

Lieutenant Lynch writes that while ascending the Kerak "there came a shout of thunder from the dense cloud which had gathered at the summit of the gorge, followed by a rain, compared to which the gentle showers of our more favoured clime are as dew drops to the overflowing cistern. . . . The black and threatening cloud soon enveloped the mountain tops, the lightning playing across it in incessant flashes, while the loud thunder reverberated from side to side of the appalling chasm. Between the peals we soon heard a roaring and continuous sound. It was the torrent from the rain cloud, sweeping in a long line of foam down the steep declivity, bearing along huge fragments of rocks, which, striking against each other, sounded like mimic thunder."

I can bear similar testimony from observations when traveling in Turkestan where the annual rainfall is only about 4 inches. At one time a storm was seen raging upon the mountains 20 miles away, where it spent its entire force without shedding a drop upon the plain. Upon skirting the base of the mountain the next day, however, the railroad track was covered for a long distance 2 or 3 ft. deep with debris which had been washed down by the cloudburst. No one can have any proper comprehension of the erosive power of the showers of Pal without duly taking into account the extent and the steepness of the descent from the highlands on either side, and the irregularity of the rainfall. These form what in the Rocky Mountains would be called arroyos. After the debris has been brought into the Jordan by these torrents, and the rise of water makes it "overflow all its banks," the sediment is then swept on to the Dead Sea with great rapidity.

All these considerations indicate that the deltas of the streams coming into the valley of the Jordan and the Dead Sea must be increasing at an unusually rapid rate. It will be profitable, therefore, to compare it with other deltas upon which direct observations have been made. The Mississippi River is sweeping into the Gulf of Mexico sediment at a rate which represents one foot of surface soil over the whole drainage basin, extending from the Rocky Mountains to the Alleghenies, in a little less than 5,000 years. The Hoang-Ho is lowering its drainage basin a foot in 1,464 years, while the river Po is reducing its level a foot in 729 years. So rapidly has the river Po filled up its valley that the city of Adria, which was a seaport 2,000 years ago, is now 14 miles from the mouth of the river. The Tigris and Euphrates rivers have silted up the head of the Persian Gulf nearly 100 miles. (See Croll, Climate and Time, 332, 333; Darwin, Formation of Vegetable Mould through the Action of Worms, 233.) From these considerations it is a conservative estimate that the tributaries of the Jordan valley between the Lake of Galilee and the Dead Sea bring down sediment enough to lower the basin one foot in 2,000 years, so that since the time of Abraham 167,270,400,000 cubic feet of solid matter have been added to its delta. This would cover 25 sq. miles 250 ft. deep. Taking into consideration the probable depth of water at the north end of the sea, it is, therefore, not an extravagant supposition that the Jordan delta has encroached upon the sea to the extent of 15 or 20 sq. miles, limiting the evaporating surface to that extent and causing the level of the water to rise, and extend an equal amount over the low lands at the south end.

At the same time the other streams coming directly into the lake have been contributing deltas to narrow its margin at various points. The Kerak, the Arnon and the Zerka Ma'in bring in an immense amount of sediment from the E.; el-Hessi, el-Seib and el-Fikri from the S.; and Wady el-Muhawwât, el-Areyeh and the Kedron, with numerous smaller intermediate streams, from the W. A detailed examination of these deposits will serve the double purpose of establishing the point in question and of giving a vivid conception of the sea and its surroundings.

Throughout the lower part of its course the river Jordan flows as has been already said, through a narrow gorge called the Zôr, which the river has eroded in the soft sedimentary deposits which cover the bottom of the valley (or Ghôr) from side to side. Opposite Jericho the Ghôr is about 15 miles wide. The Zôr, however, does not average more than one-half mile in width and is about 100 ft. lower than the general level of the Ghôr. But at "the Jews' Castle," about 8 miles from the mouth of the Jordan, the Zôr begins to enlarge and merge into a true delta. The embankment of the Zôr slopes away in a S.W. direction till it reaches the Judaean mountains at Khurbet Kumran, 10 miles distant, leaving a triangle of low land between it and the Dead Sea averaging fully one mile in width and being nearly 3 miles wide opposite the mouth of the Jordan. The face of the embankment separating the Zôr from the Ghôr has in several places been deeply cut into by the small wadies which come down from the western mountains, and the wash from these wadies as well as that from more temporary streams after every shower has considerably raised the western border of the Zôr throughout this distance. But it can safely be estimated that the original boundary of the Dead Sea has here been encroached upon to the extent of 10 or 15 sq. miles. Again, upon the eastern side of the Jordan the other limb of the delta, though smaller, is equally in evidence. Merrill (East of the Jordan, 223, 224), in describing his survey of the region, says he was compelled to walk for some hours along the shore and then north to reach his horses, which evidently had been coming over the harder and more elevated surface of the Ghôr. "The plain," he says, "for many sq. miles north of the sea is like ashes in which we often sank over shoe."

Returning to the N.W. corner of the lake we find the delta deposit which we left at Khurbet Kumran

extending 2 miles farther south with an average width of one-half mile to Râs Feshkah, which rises abruptly from the water's edge, and renders it impossible for travelers to follow along the shore. But just beyond Râs Feshkah a delta half a mile or more in length and width is projected into the sea at the mouth of Wady en Nâr, which comes down from Jerus and is known in its upper portions as Kedron. This is the wady which passes the convent of Mar Saba and is referred to in such a striking manner in Ezk 47. Like most of the other wadies coming into the Dead Sea, this courses the most of its way through inaccessible defiles and has built up a delta at its mouth covered with "fragments of rock or boulders swept along by the torrent in its periodical overflows" (De Saulcy, I, 137, 138).

From Râs Feshkah to Râs Mersid, a distance of 15 miles, the shore is bordered with a deposit of sand and gravel averaging a half a mile in width, while opposite Wady ed Derajeh and Wady Hûsâsa (which descend from Bethlehem and the wilderness of Tekoah) the width is fully one mile. At the mouth of one of the smaller gorges De Saulcy noted what geologists call a "cone of dejection" where "the gravel washed down from the heights was heaped up to the extent of nearly 250 yards" (I, 44).

Râs Mersid, again, obstructs the passage along the shore almost as effectually as did Râs Feshkah, but farther south there is no other obstruction. The plain of En-gedi, connected in such an interesting manner with the history of David and with numerous other events of national importance, is described by the Pal Exploration Fund as "about half a mile broad and a mile in length." This consists of material brought down for the most part by Wady el-'Areyeh, which descends from the vicinity of Hebron with one branch passing through Tekoah. The principal path leading from the west side of the Dead Sea to the hills of Judaea follows the direction of this wady.

Between En-gedi and Sebbeh (Masada), a distance of 10 miles, the limestone cliffs retreat till they are fully 2 miles from the shore. Across this space numerous wadies course their way bringing down an immense amount of debris and depositing it as deltas at the water's edge. These projecting deltas were noticed by Robinson as he looked southward from the height above En-gedi, but their significance was not understood.

"One feature of the sea," he says, "struck us immediately, which was unexpected to us, viz. the number of shoal-like points and peninsulas which run into its southern part, appearing at first sight like flat sand-banks or islands. Below us on the S. were two such projecting banks on the western shore, composed probably of pebbles and gravel, extending out into the sea for a considerable distance. The larger and more important of these is on the S. of the spot called Birket el-Khûlî, a little bay or indentation in the western precipice, where the water, flowing into shallow basins when it is high, evaporates, and deposits salt. This spot is just S. of the mouth of Wady el-Khûbarah" (BR, I, 501). One of these deltas is described by De Saulcy as 500 yds. in breadth and another as indefinitely larger.

Six miles S. of Masada, probably at the mouth of Wady Umm Baghek, Lynch notes a delta extending "half a mile out into the sea." Still farther S. the combined delta of the Wady Zuweirah and Wady Muhawwat covers an area of 2 or 3 sq. miles, and is dotted with boulders and fragments of rock a foot or more in diameter, which have been washed over the area by the torrential floods. Beyond Jebel Usdum, Wady el-Fikreh, draining an area of 200 or 300 sq. miles, has deposited an immense amount of coarse sediment on the W. side of the Sebkah (a mud flat which was formerly occupied, probably by a projection of the Dead Sea). Into the S. end of the depression, extending from the Sebkah to the Ascent of Akrabbim, deltas of Wady el-Jeib, Wady el-Khanzireh and Wady Tufileh have in connection with Wady Fikreh encroached upon the valley to the extent of 12 or 15 sq. miles. Altogether these wadies drain an area of more than 3,000 sq. miles, and the granitic formations over which they pass have been so disintegrated by atmospheric influences that an excessive amount of coarse sediment is carried along by them (see Hull, Mount Seir, etc., 104-6). In ascending them, one encounters every indication of occasional destructive floods.

Following up the eastern shore, Wady el-Hessi coming down from the mountains of Edom has built up the plain of Safieh which pushes out into the neck of the Sebkah and covers an area of 3 or 4 sq. miles. Farther N., Wady Kerak and Wady Beni Hamid have with their deltas encroached to the extent of 2 or 3 sq. miles upon the head of the bay, projecting into the Lisan east of Point Costigan. Still farther N., Wady Mojib (the Arnon) and Wady Zerka Ma'in (coming down from the hot springs of Callirrhoe) have built up less pronounced deltas because of the greater depth of the water on the E. side, but even so they are by no means inconsiderable, in each case projecting a half-mile or more into the lake.

Putting all these items together, there can be little doubt that the area of the Dead Sea has been encroached upon to the extent of 25 or 30 sq. miles since the time of Abraham and that this has resulted in a rise of the general level of the water sufficient to overflow a considerable portion of the lagoon at the S. end, thus keeping the evaporating area constant. The only escape from this conclusion is the supposition that the rainfall of the region is less than it was at the dawn of history, and so the smaller evaporating area would be sufficient to maintain the former level. But of this we have no adequate evidence. On the contrary there is abundant evidence that the climatic conditions connected with the production of the Glacial Period had passed away long before the conquest of the Vale of Siddim by Amraphel and his confederates (Gen 14).

The consequences of this rise of water are various and significant. It lends credibility to the persistent tradition that the sites of Sodom and Gomorrah are covered by the shallow water at the S. end of the sea, and also to the statement of Scripture that the region about these cities (on the supposition that they were at the S. end of the sea) was like the garden of the Lord; for that plain was then much larger than it is now, and was well watered, and possessed greater elements of fertility than are now apparent. Furthermore, this supposed lower level of the lake in early times may have greatly facilitated the passage of armies and caravans from one end to the other, thus rendering it more easy to understand the historical statements relating to the earliest periods of occupation. Even now the road at the base of Jebel Usdum which is open at low water is impassable at high water. On the last of December, 1883, Professor Hull (Mount Seir, etc., 133) traversed the shore at the base of the salt cliffs along a gravel terrace 100 ft. wide, which "abruptly terminated in a descent of about 5 ft. to the line of driftwood which marked the upper limit of the waters." On the 1st of January, 1901, the water along the base of the salt cliffs was so deep that it was impossible for my party to pass along the shore. It is easy to believe that the level might have been lowered sufficiently to expose a margin of shore which could be traversed on the W. side from one end to the other.

IV. Constitution of the Water.—As in the case of all inclosed basins, the waters of the Dead Sea are impregnated to an excessive degree with saline matter. "The salt which they contain," however, "is not wholly or even principally common salt, but is mostly the chloride and bromide of magnesium and calcium, so that they are not merely a strong brine, but rather resemble the mother liquors of a salt-pan left after the common salt has crystallized out" (Dawson, Egypt and Syria, 123). The following analysis is given by Booth and Muckle of water brought by Commander Lynch and taken by him May 5 from 195 fathoms deep opposite the mouth of Wady Zerka Ma'in. Other analyses vary from this more or less, owing doubtless to the different localities and depths from which the specimens had been obtained.

Specific gravity at 60°.....	1.22742
Chloride of magnesium.....	145.8971
Chloride of calcium.....	31.0746
Chloride of sodium.....	78.5537
Chloride of potassium.....	6.5860
Bromide of potassium.....	1.3741
Sulphate of lime.....	0.7012
	264.1867
Water.....	735.8133
Total amount of solid matter found by direct experiment.....	264.0000

What is here labeled bromide of potassium, however, is called by most other analysts bromide of magnesium, it being difficult to separate and distinguish these elements in composition. The large percentage of bromide, of which but a trace is found in the ocean, is supposed to have been derived from volcanic emanations. As compared with sea water, it is worthy of note that that of the Dead Sea yields 26 lbs. of salts to 100 lbs. of water, whereas that of the Atlantic yields only 6 lbs. in the same quantity. Lake Urumiah is as salt as the Dead Sea.

As results of this salinity the water is excessively buoyant and is destructive of all forms of animal life. Lynch found that his metal boats sank an inch deeper in the Jordan when equally heavily laden than they did in the Dead Sea. All travelers who bathe in it relate that when they throw themselves upon their backs their bodies will be half out of the water. Jos (BJ, IV, viii, 4) relates that the emperor Vespasian caused certain men who could not swim to be thrown into the water with their hands tied behind them, and they floated on the surface. Dead fish and various shells are indeed often found upon the shore, but they have evidently been brought in by the tributary fresh-water streams, or belong to species which live in the brackish pools of the bordering lagoons, which are abundantly supplied with fresh water. The report extensively circulated in earlier times that birds did not fly over the lake has no foundation in fact, as some species of birds are known even to light upon the surface and sport upon the waters. The whole depression is subject to frequent storms of wind blowing through its length. These produce waves whose force is very destructive of boats encountering them owing to the high specific gravity of the water; but for the same reason the waves rapidly subside after a storm, so that the general appearance of the lake is placid in the extreme.

The source from which these saline matters have been derived has been a subject of much speculation—some having supposed that it was derived from the dissolution of the salt cliffs in Jebel Usdum. But this theory is disproved by the fact that common salt forms but a small portion of the material held in solution by the water. It is more correct to regard this salt mountain as a deposit precipitated from the saturated brine which had accumulated, as we have supposed, during the Cretaceous age. Probably salt is now being deposited at the bottom of the lake from the present saturated solution to appear in some future age in the wreck of progressive geological changes. The salts of the Dead Sea, like those in all similarly inclosed basins, have been brought in by the streams of water from all over the drainage basin. Such streams always contain more or less solid matter in solution, which becomes concentrated through the evaporation which takes place over inclosed basins. The ocean is the great reservoir of such deposits, but is too large to be affected to the extent noticeable in smaller basins. The extreme salinity of the Dead Sea water shows both the long continuance of the isolation of the basin and the abundance of soluble matter contained in the rocks of the inscribed area. The great extent of recent volcanic rocks, esp. in the region E. of the Jordan, accounts for the large relative proportion of some of the ingredients.

V. Climate.—Owing to the great depression below sea level, the climate is excessively warm, so that palms and other tropical trees flourish on the borders of the rivers wherever fresh water finds soil on which to spread itself. Snow never falls upon the lake, though it frequently covers the hills of Judaea and the plateau of Moab. As already explained the rainfall in the Jordan valley is less than on the bordering mountains. During the winter season the Arab tribes go down to the valley with their flocks of sheep and goats and camp upon the surrounding plains. But the excessive heat of the summer, rising sometimes to 130° F., drives them back to the hills again.

VI. Roads.—Except at the N. end the approaches to the Dead Sea are few and very difficult to travel. On the W. side the nearest approach is at En-gedi, and this down a winding descent of 2,000 ft. where a few men at the top of the cliff could hold an army at bay below. The path up Wady Zurweirah from the N. end of Jebel Usdum is scarcely better. Upon the S. end the path leads up Wady Fikreh for a considerable distance on the W. side of the Mud Flat, and then crosses over to the Wady el-Jeib, up whose torrential bed during the dry season caravans can find their way through the Arabah to Akabah. More difficult paths lead up from the E. of the Mud Flat into the Arabah, and through the mountains of Moab to Petra into the plains beyond and the Pilgrim route from Damascus to Mecca. From the Lisân a difficult path leads up Wady Kerak to the fortress of the same name 20 miles distant and 5,000 ft. above the lake. Another path a little farther north leads up the Wady Beni Hamid to Ar of Moab. From the Arnon to the N. end of the Dead Sea the mountains are so precipitous that travel along the shore is now practically impossible. But there are, according to Tristram (The Land of Moab, 355), remnants of an "old and well-engineered road of ancient times" extending as far S. at least as the Zerka Ma'in.

VII. Miscellaneous Items.—There are numerous points about the border of the lake of special interest. When Lot and Abraham looked

1. The down from the heights of Bethel (Gen Plain of the 13 10 ff) they are said to have beheld Jordan "all the Plain of the Jordan, that it was well watered every where, before Jeh destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah, like the garden of Jeh, like the land of Egypt, as thou goest unto Zoar. So Lot chose him all the Plain of the Jordan; and Lot journeyed east: . . . and Lot dwelt in the cities of the Plain, and moved his tent as far as Sodom." The word here trad "Plain" is kikkâr (Ciccar), meaning "circle," and indicating the appearance from Bethel of the Jordan valley surrounding the N. end of the Dead Sea. From this fact, many recent writers have located Sodom and Gomorrah at that end of the sea (see CITIES OF THE PLAIN). But it is by no means certain that it is necessary thus to narrow down the meaning of the phrase. Though the S. end of the Dead Sea is not visible from the heights of Bethel, it is so connected with the general depression that it may well have been in the minds of Abraham and Lot as they were dividing the country between them, one choosing the plain, a part of which was visible, the other remaining on the bordering mountainous area, so different in all its natural resources and conditions. The extent of the region chosen by Lot may therefore be left to be determined by other considerations.

Ain Jidi, "fountain of the kid" (?) (see EN-GEDE) is an oasis at the base of the western cliffs about half-way between the N. and

2. Ain Jidi the S. ends of the lake, fed by springs (En-gedi) of warm water which burst from beneath the overhanging cliffs. The 650 ft. shore line composed of shingle and calcareous marl is here prominent, and, as already remarked, there is an extensive gravel terrace at the present water level. Palms and vines formerly flourished here (Cant 1 14), but now only a few bushes of acacia and tamarisk are to be found. From time immemorial, however, it has been the terminus of the principal trail which zig-zags up the cliffs to the plateau, across which paths lead to Hebron and Bethlehem.

The Fortress of Masada was the last stronghold held by the fanatical Jews (Zealots) after the destruction of Jerus by the Romans, and offers a bird's-eye view of the Dead Sea, which is as instructive as it is interesting. It is situated half-way between Jebel Usdum and En-gedi, directly opposite the northern promontory of el-Lisân. Here on a precipitous height, 2,000 ft. above the sea, is a plateau about 700 yds. long, and 200 wide, adorned with ruins of dwellings, palaces and temples of the Herodian age. Standing upon this height one sees the outlines of the Rom camp, near the shore of the sea, and those of another camp in a depression several hundred yards to the W., from which the final attack of the besiegers was made over a pathway constructed along a sloping ridge.

Jebel Usdum (Mount of Sodom) is a salt mountain extending 7 or 8 miles along the S.W. shore of the lake and on the W. side of the Valley of Salt to its southern boundary. Its name is derived from the traditional belief that Sodom was located at the S. end of the sea; but, on the other hand, it is not unlikely that the name would become attached to it because of its seeming to contain the pillar of salt, which, according to the ordinary tr., marked the place where Lot's wife was overwhelmed. The mountain rises 600 ft. above the lake, and has a general level surface except where streams have worn furrows and gullies in it. The eastern face presents a precipitous wall of rock salt, which, as said above, at the time of my visit (January, 1901), was washed by the waves of the lake making it impossible to pass along its base. At other times when the water is low, travelers can pass along the whole length of the shore. This wall of salt presents much the appearance of a glacier, the salt being as transparent as ice, while the action of the waves has hollowed out extensive and picturesque caverns and left isolated towers and connected pinnacles of salt often resembling a Gothic cathedral. These towers and pinnacles are, of course, being displaced from time to time, while others are formed to continue the illusion. Any pillar of salt known to the ancients must be entirely different from those which meet the eye of the modern traveler. It follows also as a matter of course that the gradual dissolution of this salt must partly account for the excessive salinity of the Dead Sea.

Here many miles away from their base of supplies the Romans slowly but irresistibly drew in their besieging lines to the final tragic consummation when the last remnant of the defenders committed suicide (BJ, VII, ix, 1). The view gives one a profound impression of the difficulties attending military campaigns in all that region. Upon lifting up one's eyes to take in the broader view, he sees the Dead Sea in its whole length with the low ridge of Jebel Usdum, the Valley of Salt, the Ascent of Akrabbim, the depression of the Arabah, and Mt. Hor, to the S., while across the whole horizon to the E. is the long wall of Moab dissected by Wady Kerak and the river Arnon, leading up to the strongholds of Ker, Aroer and Dibon, of Moab; while immediately in the front are the white cliffs of el-Lisân, and to the N., near by, the green oasis of En-gedi, and, dimmed by distance, the plains of Jericho, and the cluster of peaks surrounding Mt. Pisgah; while the sea itself sparkles like a gem of brilliant azure in the midst of its desolate surroundings, giving no token of the deadly elements which permeate its water.

It is uncertain how deep the deposit extends below the surface. It rises upward 200 or 300 ft., where it is capped by consolidated strata of sedimentary material, consisting of sand and loam, which most geologists think was deposited at the time of the formation of the 650 ft. terrace already described, and which they connect with the climatic conditions of the Glacial period.

This view is presented as follows by Professor B.K. Emerson: "In the earlier portion of the post-glacial stadium, a final sinking of a fraction of the bottom of the trough, near the S. end of the lake, dissected the low salt plateau, sinking its central parts beneath the salt waters, while fragments remain buttressed against the great walls of the trench forming the plains of Jebel Usdum and the peninsula el-Lisân with the swampy Sebkah between. . . . It exposed the wonderful eastern wall of Jebel Usdum: 7 miles long, with 30-45 m. of clear

Sea to the "Ascent of Akrabbim" which
5. Vale of Siddim crosses the valley from side to side, and forms the southern margin of the

Ghôr. At present the area of the vale is about 50 sq. miles; but if our theory concerning the lower level of the Dead Sea in the time of Abraham is correct, it may then have included a considerable portion of the lagoon S. of el-Lisân and so have been a third larger than now. In Gen 14 10 the vale is said to have been full of slime (that is, of bitumen or asphalt) pits. In modern times masses of asphalt are occasionally found floating in the blue salt at the base, capped by 125-140 m. of gypsum-bearing marls impregnated with sulphur, and conglomerates at times cemented by bitumen" ("Geological Myths," Proc. Am. Assoc. for Adv. of Sci. [1896], 110, 111). If this was the case there has been a depression of the S. end of the Dead Sea to the extent of several hundred feet within a comparatively few thousand years, in which case the traditional view that Sodom and Gomorrah were overwhelmed by Dead Sea water at the time of their destruction would refer to an occurrence exactly in line with movements that have been practically continuous during Tertiary, Glacial, and post-Glacial times.

With more reason, Lartet contends that this salt is a Cretaceous or Tertiary deposit covered with late Tertiary strata, in which case the sinking of the block between Jebel Usdum and el-Lisân, for the most part, took place at a much earlier date than the formation of the 650 ft. terrace. A striking corollary of this supposition would be that the climatic conditions have been practically the same during all of the post-Carboniferous times, there having been cycles of moist and dry climate in that region succeeding each other during all these geological periods.

The Vale of Siddim (Gen 14 3.8.10) is probably the same as the Valley of Salt (2 K 14 7; 1 Ch 18 southern part of the Dead Sea. After the earthquake of 1834 a large quantity was cast upon the shore near the S.W. corner of the lake, 3 tons of which were brought to market by the Arab natives. After the earthquake of January, 1837, a mass of asphaltum was driven aground on the W. side not far from Jebel Usdum. The neighboring Arabs swam off to it, cut it up with axes and carried it to market by the camel load, and sold it to the value of several thousand dollars. At earlier times such occurrences seem to have been still more frequent. Jos affirms that "the sea in many places sends up black masses of asphaltum having the form and size of headless oxen"; while Diodorus Siculus relates that the bitumen (asphaltum) was thrown up in masses covering sometimes two or three acres and having the appearance of islands (Jos, BJ, IV, viii, 4; Diod. Sic. ii.48; Pliny, NH, vii.13; Tac. Hist. v.6; Dioscor., De re Med., i.99).

Since asphalt is a product of petroleum from which the volatile elements have been evaporated, the ultimate source of these masses is doubtless to be found in the extensive beds of bituminous limestone which appear in numerous places on both sides of the Dead Sea. An outcrop of it can be observed at Nebv Mousa, on the road from Jerus to Jericho, which Dawson describes as resembling dry chalk saturated with coal tar. When long weathered this becomes white and chalky at the surface, so that a mass of it, quite white externally, reveals an intense blackness when broken. It is this that the people of Bethlehem call "Dead Sea stone," and which they carve into various ornamental articles and expose for sale. Some specimens of it are sufficiently bituminous to burn with flame like cannel-coal. These beds are still more abundant about the S. end of the lake and doubtless underlie the whole region, and for all time must have been exuding bituminous and gaseous matter, but much more abundantly in former times than now.

In these accumulations of bitumen at the S. end of the Ghôr we probably have the incentive which led the Babylonians under Amraphel and Chedorlaomer to make such long expeditions for the sake of conquering the region and holding it under their power. Bitumen was much in demand in Babylonia.

El-Lisân (the Tongue), which projects half-way across the lake from the mouth of Wady Kerak, is, like Jebel Usdum, a promontory of white calcareous sediment containing beds of salt and gypsum, and breaking off on its western side in a cliff 300 ft. high. Its upper surface rises in terraces to the 600 ft. level on the E., as Jebel Usdum does on the W. The length of the promontory from N. to S. is 9 miles. This corresponds so closely in general structure and appearance to Jebel Usdum on the opposite side of the lake that we find it difficult to doubt the theory of Professor Emerson, stated above, that the formation originally extended across and that a block of the original bottom of the lake has dropped down, leaving these remnants upon the sides. Frequent occurrences similar to this are noted by the United States geologists in the Rocky Mountain region.

VIII. History.—Difficulty of access has prevented the Dead Sea from playing any important part in history except as an obstruction both to commerce and to military movements. Boats have never been used upon it to any considerable extent. From earliest times salt has been gathered on its western shores and carried up to market over the difficult paths leading to Jerus. A similar commerce has been carried on in bitumen; that from the Dead Sea being specially prized in Egypt, while as already remarked, it is by no means improbable that the pits of bitumen which abounded in the "Vale of Siddim" were the chief attraction leading the kings of Babylonia to undertake long expeditions for the conquest of the region. Productive as may have been the plain at the S. end of the sea, it was too far outside the caravan route leading through Petra to the S. end of the Arabah and the mines of the Sinaitic Peninsula to divert the course of travel. Still the settlements on the eastern border of the Vale of Siddim were of sufficient importance in mediaeval times to induce the Crusaders to visit the region and leave their marks upon it. The Arabian town of Zoghar, probably the Bib. Zoar, appears at one time to have been a most important place, and was the center of considerable commercial activity. Indigo was grown there, and the oasis was noted for its fine species of dates. The country round about abounded in springs and there was much arable land (see Le Strange, Pal under the Moslems, 286 ff.). The hot springs upon the eastern shore of the Dead Sea at Callirrhoe some distance up the Wady Zerka Ma'ain were much resorted to for their medicinal properties. Here Herod came as a last resort, to secure relief from his loathsome malady, but failed of help. The fortress of Machaerus, where John the Baptist was imprisoned, is situated but a few miles S. of the Zerka Ma'ain, but access to this region is possible only through a difficult road leading over the mountains a few miles E. of the sea.

On four occasions important military expeditions were conducted along the narrow defiles which border the S.W. end of the Dead Sea: (1) That of Amraphel and his confederates from Babylonia, who seem first to have opened the way past Petra to the mines of the Sinaitic Peninsula, and then to have swept northward through the land of the Amalekites and Amorites and come down to the Dead Sea at En-gedi, and then to have turned to subdue the Cities of the Plain, where Lot was dwelling. This accomplished, they probably retreated along the west shore of the lake, which very likely afforded at that time a complete passage-way to the valley of the Jordan. Or they may have gone on eastward to the line of the present pilgrim route from Damascus to Mecca and followed it northward. (2) In the early part of the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 20), the Moabites, Ammonites and some other tribes joined together, forming a large army, and, following around the S. end of the Dead Sea, marched along the W. shore to En-gedi, and having ascended the zigzag path leading up the precipitous heights to the wilderness of Tekoa, were there thrown into confusion and utterly annihilated. (3) Not many years later Jehoram and Jehoshaphat "fetched a compass [RV "made a circuit"] of seven days' journey" (2 K 3 9) around the S. end of the Dead Sea and attacked the Moabites in their own country, but returned without completing the conquest. The particulars of this expedition are given in 2 K 3 and in the inscription on the Moabite Stone. (4) The Romans shortly after the destruction of Jerus conducted a long siege of the fortress of Masada, of which an account has already been given in a previous section (VII, 3). All their supplies must have come down the tortuous path to En-gedi and thence been brought along the western shore to the camp, the remains of which are still to be seen at the base of the fortress.

For many cents., indeed for well-nigh 1,800 years, the Dead Sea remained a mystery, and its geology and physical characteristics were practically unknown. The first intimation of the depression of the lake below sea level was furnished in 1837 by Moore and Beke, who made some imperfect experiments with boiling water from which they inferred a depression of 500 ft. In 1841 Lieutenant Simmons of the British navy, by trigonometrical observations, estimated the depression to be 1,312 ft. In 1835 Costigan, and again in 1847 Lieutenant Molyneux ventured upon the sea in boats; but the early death of both, consequent upon their exposures, prevented their making any full reports. Appropriately, however, their names have been attached to prominent points on the Lisân. In 1848 Lieutenant Lynch, of the United States navy, was dispatched to explore the Jordan and the Dead Sea. The results of this expedition were most important. Soundings of the depths were carefully and systematically conducted, and levels were run from the Dead Sea by Jerus to the Mediterranean, giving the depression at the surface of the Dead Sea as 1,316.7 ft., and its greatest depth 1,278 ft. More recently Sir C. W. Wilson in connection with the Ordinance Survey of Pal carried levels over the same route with the result of reducing the depression to 1,292 ft., which is now generally accepted to be correct. But as already stated the stage of water in the lake is not given, and that is known to vary at least 15 ft. annually, and still more at longer intervals.

GEORGE FREDERICK WRIGHT
DEAD, STATE OF THE. See HADES.

DEAF, def (דָּפֵן, hērēsh; κωφός, kōphós): Used either in the physical sense, or figuratively as expressing unwillingness to hear the Divine message (Ps 58 4), or incapacity to understand it for want of spirituality (Ps 38 13). The prophetic utterances were sufficiently forcible to compel even such to hear (Isa 42 18; 43 8) and thereby to receive the Divine mercy (Isa 29 18; 35 5).

The expression "deaf adder that stoppeth her ear" (Ps 58 4) alludes to a curious notion that the adder, to avoid hearing the voice of the charmer, laid its head with one ear on the ground and stopped the other with the tip of its tail (Diary of John Manningham, 1602). The adder is called deaf by Shakespeare (2 Hen VI, iii, 2, 76; Troilus and Cressida, ii, 2, 172). The erroneous idea probably arose from the absence of external ears.

Physical deafness was regarded as a judgment from God (Ex 4 11; Mic 7 16), and it was consequently impious to curse the deaf (Lev 19 14). In NT times deafness and kindred defects were attributed to evil spirits (Mk 9 18 ff). See DUMB.

DEAL, dēl: The noun "deal" is not found in RV. The AV tr of דֶּשֶׁרֶן, 'issārōn, "the tenth deal" (Ex 29 40; Lev 14 10, et al.) is rendered uniformly "the tenth part" in RV (see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES). The vb. "to deal" often means "to apportion," "to distribute" (cf 2 S 6 19; 1 Ch 16 3; Isa 58 7; Rom 12 3), but more frequently it is used in the sense of "to act," "to do," "to have transaction of any kind with." In the Pss "to deal" always means "to confer benefit," "to deal bountifully," with the exception of Ps 105 25, where it means "to deal subtly with." The expression "to deal," i.e. "to be engaged in," is not found in the Scriptures. The tr of συγχράμασι, sugchrōmat, in Jn 4 9, "Jews have no dealings with Samaritans," conveys the idea that they have nothing in common.

DEAR, dēr, DEARLY, dēr'li ("held at a great price," "highly valued"): In Acts 20 24, Paul does not hold his life "dear" (τίμιος, timios, "at a price"); cf 1 Cor 3 12, "costly stones"; 1 Pet 1 19, "precious blood." Lk 7 2, the servant was "dear" to the centurion (ἐντίμος, ēntimos, "highly prized"; cf Phil 2 29; 1 Pet 2 6). 1 Thess 2 8, "very dear to us" (ἀγαπητός, agapētos, "beloved"). In RV, agapētos is generally tr'd "beloved." "Dear-ly" before "beloved" of AV is omitted in all passages in RV. The word "dear" occurs but once in the OT, viz. Jer 31 20. RV correctly changes "dear Son" of AV (Col 1 13) into "the Son of his love."

DEARTH, dūrth. See FAMINE.

DEATH (מָוֶת, māweth; θάνατος, thánatos):

PHYSIOLOGICAL AND FIGURATIVE VIEW

The word "Death" is used in the sense of (1) the process of dying (Gen 21 16); (2) the period of de- cease (Gen 27 7); (3) as a possible synonym for poison (2 K 4 40); (4) as descriptive of person in danger of perishing (Jgs 15 18; "in deaths oft" 2 Cor 11 23). In this sense the shadow of death is a familiar expression in Job, the Psalms and the Prophets; (5) death is personified in 1 Cor 15 55 and Rev 20 14. Deliverance from this catastrophe is called the "issues from death" (Ps 68 20 AV; tr'd "escape" in RV). Judicial execution, "putting to death," is mentioned 39 times in the Levitical Law.

Figuratively: Death is the loss of spiritual life as in Rom 8 6; and the final state of the unregener- ate is called the "second death" in Rev 20 14.

ALEX. MACALISTER

THEOLOGICAL VIEW

According to Gen 2 17, God gave to man, created in His own image, the command not to eat of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, and added thereto the warning, "In the day that thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die." Though not exclusively, reference is certainly made here in the first place to bodily death. Yet because death by no means came upon Adam and Eve on the day of their transgression, but took place hundreds of years later, the expression, "in the day that," must be conceived in a wider sense, or the delay of death must be attributed to the entering-in of mercy (Gen 3 15). However this may be, Gen 2 17 places a close connection between man's death and his trans- gression of God's commandment, thereby attaching to death a religious and ethical significance, and on the other hand makes the life of man dependent on his obedience to God. This religious-ethical nature of life and death is not only decidedly and clearly expressed in Gen 2, but it is the fundamental thought of the whole of Scripture and forms an essential element in the revelations of salvation. The theologians of early and more recent times, who have denied the spiritual significance of death and have separated the connection between ethical and physical life, usually endeavor to trace back their opinions to Scripture; and those passages which un- doubtedly see in death a punishment for sin (Gen 2 17; Jn 8 44; Rom 5 12; 6 23; 1 Cor 15 21), they take as individual opinions, which form no part of the organism of revelation. But this en- deavor shuts out the organic character of the reve- lation of salvation. It is true that death in Holy Scripture is often measured by the weakness and frailty of human nature (Gen 3 19; Job 14 1.12; Ps 39 5.6; 90 5; 103 14.15; Eccl 3 20, etc). Death is seldom connected with the transgression of the first man either in the OT or the NT, or mentioned as a specified punishment for sin (Jn 8 44; Rom 5 12; 6 23; 1 Cor 15 21; Jas 1 15); for the most part it is portrayed as something natural (Gen 5 5; 9 29; 15 15; 25 8, etc), a long life being presented as a blessing in contrast to death in the midst of days as a disaster and a judgment (Ps 102 23 f; Isa 65 20). But all this is not contrary to the idea that death is a consequence of, and a punishment for, sin. Daily, everyone who agrees with Scripture that death is held out as a punishment for sin, speaks in the same way. Death, though come into the world through sin, is nevertheless at the same time a consequence of man's physical and frail existence now; it could therefore be threatened as a punishment to man, because he was taken out of the ground and was made a living soul, of the earth earthy (Gen 2 7; 1 Cor 15 45.47). If he had remained obedient, he would not have returned to dust (Gen 3 19), but have pressed forward on the path of spiritual devel- opment (1 Cor 15 46.51); his return to dust was possible simply because he was made from dust (see ADAM IN THE NT). Thus, although death is in this way a consequence of sin, yet a long life is felt to be a blessing and death a disaster and a judg- ment, above all when man is taken away in the bloom of his youth or the strength of his years. There is nothing strange, therefore, in the manner in which Scripture speaks about death; we all ex- press ourselves daily in the same way, though we at the same time consider it as the wages of sin. Beneath the ordinary, everyday expressions about death lies the deep consciousness that it is unnatural and contrary to our innermost being.

This is decidedly expressed in Scripture, much more so even than among ourselves. For we are influenced always more or less by the Greek, Platonic idea, that the body dies, yet the soul is immortal. Such an idea is utterly contrary to the Israelite consciousness, and is nowhere found in the OT. The whole man dies, when in death the spirit (Ps 146 4; Eccl 12 7), or soul (Gen 35 18; 2 S 1 9; 1 K 17 21; Jon 4 3), goes out of a man. Not only his body, but his soul also returns to a state of death and belongs to the nether-world; therefore the OT can speak of a death of one's soul (Gen 37 21 [Heb]; Nu 23 10m; Dt 22 21; Jgs 16 30; Job 36 14; Ps 78 50), and of defilement by coming in contact with a dead body (Lev 19 28; 21 11; 22 4; Nu 5 2; 6 6; 9 6; 19 10 ff; Dt 14 1; Hag 2 13). This death of man is not annihilation, however, but a deprivation of all that makes for life on earth. The Sheol (sh'öl) is in contrast with the land of the living in every respect (Job 28 13; Prov 15 24; Ezk 26 20; 32 23); it is an abode of darkness and the shadow of death (Job 10 21. 22; Ps 88 12; 143 3), a place of destruction, yea destruction itself (Job 26 6; 28 22; 31 12; Ps 88 11; Prov 27 20), without any order (Job 10 22), a land of rest, of silence, of oblivion (Job 3 13.17.18; Ps 94 17; 115 17), where God and man are no longer to be seen (Isa 38 11), God no longer praised or thanked (Ps 6 5; 115 17), His perfections no more acknowledged (Ps 88 10-13; Isa 38 18.19), His wonders not contemplated (Ps 88 12), where the dead are unconscious, do no more work, take no account of anything, possess no knowledge nor wisdom, neither have any more a portion in anything that is done under the sun (Eccl 9 5.6.10). The dead ("the Shades" RVm; cf art. DECEASED) are asleep (Job 26 5; Prov 2 18; 9 18; 21 6; Ps 88 11; Isa 14 9), weakened (Isa 14 10) and without strength (Ps 88 4).

The dread of death was felt much more deeply therefore by the Israelites than by ourselves.

3. Light in the Darkness Death to them was separation from all that they loved, from God, from His service, from His law, from His people, from His land, from all the rich companionship in which they lived.

But now in this darkness appears the light of the revelation of salvation from on high. The God of Israel is the living God and the fountain of all life (Dt 5 26; Josh 3 10; Ps 36 9). He is the Creator of heaven and earth, whose power knows no bounds and whose dominion extends over life and death (Dt 32 39; 1 S 2 6; Ps 90 3). He gave life to man (Gen 1 26; 2 7), and creates and sustains every man still (Job 32 8; 33 4; 34 14; Ps 104 29; Eccl 12 7). He connects life with the keeping of His law and appoints death for the transgression of it (Gen 2 17; Lev 18 5; Dt 30 20; 32 47). He lives in heaven, but is present also by His spirit in Sheol (Ps 139 7.8). Sheol and Abaddon are open to Him even as the hearts of the children of men (Job 26 6; 38 17; Prov 15 11). He kills and makes alive, brings down into Sheol and raises from thence again (Dt 32 39; 1 S 2 6; 2 K 5 7). He lengthens life for those who keep His commandments (Ex 20 12; Job 5 26), gives escape from death, can deliver when death menaces (Ps 68 20; Isa 38 5; Jer 15 20; Dnl 3 26), can take Enoch and Elijah to Himself without dying (Gen 5 24; 2 K 2 11), can restore the dead to life (1 K 17 22; 2 K 4 34; 13 21). He can even bring death wholly to nothing and completely triumph over its power by rising from the dead (Job 14 13-15; 19 25-27; Hos 6 2; 13 14; Isa 25 8; 26 19; Ezk 37 11.12; Dnl 12 2).

This revelation by degrees rejects the old contrast between life on earth and the disconsolate existence after death, in the dark place of Sheol, and puts another in its place. The physical 4. Spiritual Significance contrast between life and death gradually makes way for the moral and spiritual difference between a life spent in the fear of the Lord, and a life in the service of sin. The man who serves God is alive (Gen 2 17); life is involved in the keeping of His commandments (Lev 18 5; Dt 30 20); His word is life (Dt 8 3; 32 47). Life is still for the most part understood to mean length of days (Prov 2 18; 3 16; 10 30; Isa 65 20). Nevertheless it is remarkable that Prov often mentions death and Sheol in connection with the godless (2 18; 5 5; 7 27; 9 18), and on the other hand only speaks of life in connection with the righteous. Wisdom, righteousness, the fear of the Lord is the way of life (8 35.36; 11 19; 12 28; 13 14; 14 27; 19 23). The wicked is driven away in his wickedness, but the righteous hath hope in his death (14 32). Blessed is he who has the Lord for his God (Dt 33 29; Ps 1 1.2; 2 12; 32 1.2; 33 12; 34 9, etc); he is comforted in the greatest adversity (Ps 73 25-28; Hab 3 17-19), and sees a light arise for him behind physical death (Gen 49 18; Job 14 13-15; 16 16-21; 19 25-27; Ps 73 23-26). The godless on the contrary, although enjoying for a time much prosperity, perish and come to an end (Ps 1 4-6; 73 18-20; Isa 48 22; Mal 4 3, etc).

The righteous of the OT truly are continually occupied with the problem that the lot of man on earth often corresponds so little to his spiritual worth, but he strengthens himself with the conviction that for the righteous it will be well, and for the wicked, ill (Eccl 8 12.13; Isa 3 10.11). If they do not realize it in the present, they look forward to the future and hope for the day in which God's justice will extend salvation to the righteous, and His anger will be visited on the wicked in judgment. So in the OT the revelation of the new covenant is prepared wherein Christ by His appearance hath abolished death and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel (2 Tim 1 10). See ABOLISH. This everlasting life is already here on earth presented to man by faith, and it is his portion also in the hour of death (Jn 3 36; 11 25.26). On the other hand, he who lives in sin and is disobedient to the Son of God, is in his living dead (Mt 8 22; Lk 15 32; Jn 3 36; 8 24; Eph 2 1; Col 2 13); he shall never see life, but shall pass by bodily death into the second death (Rev 2 11; 20 6.14; 21 8).

This view of Scripture upon death goes much deeper than that which is found in other religions, but it nevertheless receives support from the unanimous witness of humanistic and dread. The so-called nature-religions and in peoples even feel that death is much more of an enigma than life; Tiele (Inleiding tot de goddienst-artschap, II [1900], 202, referring to Andrew Lang, Modern Mythology, ch xiii) says rightly, that all peoples have the conviction that man by nature is immortal, that immortality wants no proof, but that death is a mystery and must be explained. Touching complaints arise in the hearts of all men on the frailty and vanity of life, and the whole of mankind fears death as a mysterious power. Man finds comfort in death only when he hopes it will be an end to a still more miserable life. Seneca may be taken as interpreter of some philosophers when he says: Stultitia est timore mortis mori ("It is stupid to die through the fear of death") and some may be able, like a Socrates or a Cato, to face death calmly and courageously; what have these few to say to the millions, who through fear of death are all their lifetime subject to bondage (He 2 15)? Such a mystery has death remained up to the present day. It may be said with Kassowitz, Verworm and others that the "cell" is the beginning, and the old, gray man is the natural end of an uninterrupted life-development, or with Metschnikoff, that science will one day so lengthen life that it will fade away like a rose at last and death lose all its dread; death still is no less a riddle, and one which swallows up all the strength of life. When one considers, besides, that a number of creatures, plants, trees, animals, reach a much higher age than man; that the larger half of mankind dies before or shortly after birth; that another large percentage dies in the bloom of youth or in the prime of life; that the law of the survival of the fittest is true only when the fact of the survival is taken as a proof of their fitness; that the graybeards, who, spent and decrepit, go down to the grave, form a very small number; then the enigma of death increases more and more in mysteriousness. The endeavors to bring death into connection with certain activities of the organism and to explain it by increasing weight, by growth or by fertility, have all led to shipwreck. When Weismann took refuge in the immortality of the "einzellige Protozoën," he raised a hypothesis which not only found many opponents, but which also left mortality of the "Körperplasma" an insoluble mystery (Beth, "Ueber Ursache und Zweck des Todes, Glauben und Wissen [1909], 285-304, 335-48). Thus science certainly does not compel us to review Scripture on this point, but rather furnishes a strong proof of the mysterious majesty of death. When Pelagius, Socinus, Schleiermacher, Ritschl and a number of other theologians and philosophers separate death from its connection with sin, they are not compelled to do so by science, but are led by a defective insight into the relation between éthos and phúsis. Misery and death are not absolutely always consequences and punishment of a great personal transgression (Lk 13 2; Jn 9 3); but that they are connected with sin, we learn from the experience of every day. Who can number the victims of mammonism, alcoholism and licentiousness? Even spiritual sins exercise their influence on corporal life; envy is a rotteness of the bones (Prov 14 30). This connection is taught us in a great measure by Scripture, when it placed the not yet fallen man in a Paradise, where death had not yet entered, and eternal life was not yet possessed and enjoyed; when it sends fallen man, who, however, is destined for redemption, into a world full of misery and death; and at last assigns to the wholly renewed man a new heaven and a new earth, where death, sorrow, crying or pain shall no longer exist (Rev 21 4).

Finally, Scripture is not the book of death, but of life, of everlasting life through Jesus Christ Our Lord. It tells us, in oft-repeated and unmistakable terms, of the dreaded reality of death, but it proclaims to us still more loudly the wonderful power of the life which is in Christ Jesus. See also DECEASE.

DEATH, BODY OF. See BODY OF DEATH.

DEATH, SECOND (ὁ δεύτερος θάνατος, ho deuteros thánatos): An expression, peculiar to the Book of Rev (2 11; 20 6, 14; 21 8) in Scripture, denoting the final penalty of the unrighteous; parallel with another expression likewise peculiar, "the lake of fire," in 20 14; 21 8. See ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT.

DEBATE, dē-bāt': This word is used only once in RV (Prov 25 9). It evidently refers to the settling of a difficulty with a neighbor, and anticipates Mt 18 15. It argues for and shows the advantage of private, peaceable settlement of difficulties. Cf Eccles 28 9, and see MAKEBATES.

DEBIR, dē'bēr (דְּבִיר, dēbhīr, or דְּבִיר, dēbhīr, "oracle"): King of Eglon, one of the five Amorite kings whose confederation against Israel was overcome and who were killed by Joshua (Josh 10 3).

DEBIR, dē'bēr (דְּבִיר, dēbhīr; Δαβεῖρ, Dabeir): "And Joshua returned, and all Israel with him, to Debir, and fought against it: and he took it, and the king thereof, and all the cities thereof; and they smote them with the edge of the sword . . . he left none remaining" (Josh 10 38, 39). In Josh 15 15-17 and Jgs 1 11-13 is an account of how Othniel captured Debir, which "beforetime was Kiriath-sepher," and won thereby the hand of Achsah, Caleb's daughter. In Josh 15 49 Debir is called Kiriath-sannah. It had once been inhabited by the Anakim (Josh 11 21). It was a Levitical city (Josh 21 15; 1 Ch 6 58).

(1) Debir is usually accepted as meaning "back," but this is doubtful; the word dēbhīr is used to denote the "holy of holies" (1 K 6 5).

1. The Meaning of According to Sayce (HDB), "the city must have been a sacred one with a the Name well-known temple." Kiriath-sepher is trd "town of books," and Sayce and others consider that in all probability there was a great storehouse of clay tablets here; perhaps the name may have been kiryath šōphēr, "town of scribes." Kiriath-sannah (Josh 15 49) is probably a corruption of Kiriath-sepher; the LXX has here as in references to the latter πόλις γραμμάτων, pólis grammátōn, "town of books."

Unfortunately this site, important even if the speculations about the books are doubtful, is still a matter of uncertainty. Edh-Dhá-

2. The Site heriyeh, some 11 miles S.W. of Hebron, has a good deal of support. It was unquestionably a site of importance in ancient times as the meeting-place of several roads; it is in the Negeb (cf Jgs 1 15), in the neighborhood of the probable site of Anab (Josh 11 21; 15 50); it is a dry site, but there are "upper" and "lower" springs about 6½ miles to the N. A more thorough examination of the site than has as yet been undertaken might produce added proofs in favor of this identification. No other suggestion has any great probability. See PEF, III, 402; PEFS, 1875.

(2) Debir, on the border between Judah and Benjamin (Josh 15 7), must have been somewhere E. of Jerus not far from the modern Jericho road. Thogh-gret ed Debr, "the pass of the rear," half a mile S.W. of the Tal'at ed Dumm (see ADUMMIN), close to the so-called, "Inn of the Good Samaritan," may be an echo of the name which has lingered in the neighborhood. Many authorities consider that there is no place-name in this reference at all, the text being corrupt.

(3) Debir RVm, Lidebir (Josh 13 26), a town on the border of Gad, near Mahanaim; Ibdar, S. of the Yarmuk has been suggested. May be identical with Lo-debar (2 S 9 4). E. W. G. MASTERMAN

DEBORAH, deb'ō-ra (דְּבִרָה, dēbhōrah, signifying "bee"):

(1) Rebekah's nurse, who died near Bethel and was buried under "the oak of weeping" (Gen 35 8 m).

(2) A prophetess, fourth in the order of the "judges." In aftertimes a palm tree, known as the "palm tree of Deborah," was shown between Ramah and Bethel, beneath which the prophetess was wont to administer justice. Like the rest of the "judges" she became a leader of her people in times of national distress. This time the oppressor was Jabin, king of Hazor, whose general was Sisera. Deborah summoned Barak of Kedesh-naphtali and delivered to him the Divine message to meet Sisera in battle by the brook Kishon. Barak induced Deborah to accompany him; they were joined by 10,000 men of Zebulun and Naphtali. The battle took place by the brook Kishon, and Sisera's army was thoroughly routed. While Barak pursued the fleeing army, Sisera escaped and sought refuge with Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite, near Kedesh. The brave woman, the prototype of Judith, put the Canaanite general to sleep by offering him a draft of milk and then slew him by driving a peg into his temple. Thus runs the story in Jgs 4. It is on the whole substantiated by the ode in ch 5 which is ascribed jointly to Deborah and Barak. It is possible that the editor mistook the archaic form קָמַרְי, kāmī, in ver 7 which should be rendered "thou arosest" instead of "I arose." Certainly the ode was composed by a person who, if not a contemporary of the event, was very near it in point of time. The song is spoken of as one of the oldest pieces of Heb lit. Great difficulties meet the exegete. Nevertheless the general substance is clear. The Lord is described as having come from Sinai near the "field of Edom" to take part in the battle; "for from heaven they fought, the very stars from their courses fought against Sisera" (ver 20). The nation was in a sad plight, oppressed by a mighty king, and the tribes loth to submerge their separatist tendencies. Some, like Reuben, Gilead, Dan and Asher remained away. A community by the name of Meroz is singled out for blame, "because they came not to the help of Jeh, to the help of Jeh among the mighty" (ver 23; cf RVm). Ephraim, Issachar, Machir, Benjamin were among the followers of Barak; "Zebulun . . . jeopardized their lives unto the death, and Naphtali, upon the high places of the field" (ver 18). According to the song, the battle was fought at Taanach by the waters of Megiddo; Sisera's host was swept away by "that ancient river, the river Kishon" (ver 21). Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, receives here due meed of praise for her heroic act. The poem vividly paints the waiting of Sisera's mother for the home-coming of the general; the delay is ascribed to the great booty which the conqueror is distributing among his Canaanite host. "So let all thine enemies perish," concludes the song; "O Jeh: but let them that love him be as the sun when he goeth forth in his might." It is a song in praise of the "righteous acts" of the Lord, His work of victory which Israel's leaders, 'the long-haired princes,' wrought, giving their lives freely to the nation's cause. And the nation was sore bestead because it had become faithless to the Lord and chosen new gods. Out of the conflict came, for the time being, victory and moral purification; and the inspiring genius of it all was a woman in Israel, the prophetess Deborah.

MAX L. MARGOLIS

DEBT, det, DEBTOR, det'er: It is difficult nowadays to think of debt without associating with it the idea of interest, and even usury. Certain it is that this idea is associated with the OT idea of the word, at least in the later period of OT history. This is true of the NT entire. The Heb word (נֶשֶׁה, n'shē) always carries with it the idea of "biting interest" (cf 2 K 4 7). The Gr words dávion, dáneion (Mt 18 27), and opheilē, opheilē (Mt 18 32), may point only to the fact of indebtedness; the idea of interest, however, is clearly taught in the NT (cf Mt 25 27).

Quite extensive legislation is provided in the OT governing the matter of debt and debtors. Indebtedness and loaning had not, however, the commercial aspect among the Jews so characteristic of the nations surrounding Pal. Indeed the Mosaic legislation was seemingly intended to guard against just such commercialism. It was looked upon as a misfortune to be in debt; it indicated poverty brought on probably by blighted harvests; consequently those in debt were to be looked upon with pity and dealt with in leniency. There must be no oppression of the poor under such circumstances (Ex 22 25; Dt 23 19-20; Ezk 18 18). Even where a pledge is given and received, certain restrictions are thrown around it, e.g. the creditor must not take a mill, nor a necessary garment, nor a widow's ox, etc, in pledge (Ex 22 25-27; Dt 24 6.10-13; Job 22 6; Am 2 8). And further, the pledge is to be restored in some instances "before the sun goeth down" (Ex 22 26.27), and in all cases full redemption in the seventh and jubilee years (Neh 10 31, etc). The Jews were strictly exhorted to take no interest at all from their own nation (Ex 22 25; Dt 23 19.20). Strangers, however, might be charged interest (ibid). A devout Jew would not lend money to another Jew on interest.

It would seem that as Israel came into contact with the surrounding nations, debt became increasingly a commercial matter. The Mosaic laws regarding clemency toward the poor who were compelled for the time being to become debtors were utterly disregarded, and the poor were oppressed by the rich. An illustration of the severity with which debtors came to be dealt with is to be found in 2 K 4 1-7, in which, because of the inability of a widow to pay a small debt contracted by her dead husband, the woman complains to the prophet that the creditors have come to sell her two children in order that the debt might be paid. Strangely the prophet, while helping the widow by miraculously multiplying the oil in order that the debt might be paid, says nothing by way of condemnation of such conduct on the part of the creditors. Are we to understand by this that commercialism had already so powerful a grip upon Israel that even to a prophet the practice had come to seem proper, or at least expected? The debtor himself or his family might be sold for debt, or the debtor might become a slave for a certain length of time until the debt was paid (Lev 25 39.47; Isa 50 1). So oppressive had the commercial system in Israel become that the debtor cursed the creditor and the creditor the debtor (Jer 15 10). Sometimes debtors were outlawed, as in the case of the men who came to David in the cave of Adullam (1 S 22 2). That the matter of borrowing and lending had assumed very grievous proportions is evident from the very sharp warnings concerning the matter in the Book of Prov (6 1; 11 15; 20 16, etc).

The teaching of the NT on this subject is confined very largely to the parables of Our Lord. Some think that the expression, "Owe no man anything" (Rom 13 8), is an absolute warning against indebtedness. Quite a noticeable advance in the matter of debts and debtors is noticed as we enter the time of the NT. We read of bankers, exchangers, money-changers, interest, investments, usury (Mt 25 16-27; Jn 2 13-17). The taking of interest does not seem to be explicitly condemned in the NT. The person of the debtor, as well as his family and lands, could be seized for non-payment of debt (Mt 18 21-26). Indeed, the debtor was often cast into prison and tormented because of non-payment (Mt 18 30.34). That compassion and leniency should be exercised toward those in debt is the clear teaching of Christ in the parables of the Unmerciful Servant (Mt 18 23-35) and the Two Debtors (Lk 7 41-43).

Figurative: Debt and debtor are used in a moral sense also as indicating the obligation of a righteous life which we owe to God. To fall short in righteous living is to become a debtor. For this reason we pray, "Forgive us our debts" (Mt 6 12). Those who are ministered to in spiritual things are said to be debtors to those who minister to them (Rom 15 27). To make a vow to God is to put one's self in debt in a moral sense (Mt 23 16-18; RVm "bound by his oath"). In a deeply spiritual sense the apostle Paul professed to be in debt to all men in that he owed them the opportunity to do them good (Rom 1 14).

The parables of Jesus as above named are rich with comforting truth. How beautiful is the willingness of God, the great and Divine Creditor, to release us from our indebtedness! Just so ought we to be imitators of the Father in heaven who is merciful.

DECALOGUE, dek'a-log. See TEN COMMANDMENTS.

DECAPOLIS, dê-kap'ô-lis (Δεκάπολις, Dekápolis): The name given to the region occupied by a league of "ten cities" (Mt 4 25; Mk 5 20; 7 31), which Eusebius defines (Onom) as "lying in the Peraea, round Hippos, Pella and Gadara." Such combinations of Gr cities arose as Rome assumed dominion in the East, to promote their common interests in trade and commerce, and for mutual protection against the peoples surrounding them. This particular league seems to have been constituted about the time of Pompey's campaign in Syria, 65 BC, by which several cities in Decapolis dated their eras. They were independent of the local tetrarchy, and answerable directly to the governor of Syria. They enjoyed the rights of association and asylum; they struck their own coinage, paid imperial taxes and were liable to military service (Ant, XIV, iv, 4; BJ, I, vii, 7; II, xviii, 3; III, ix, 7; Vita, 65, 74). Of the ten cities, Scythopolis, the ancient Bethshean, alone, the capital of the league, was on the W. side of Jordan. The names given by Pliny (NH, v.18) are Scythopolis (Beisân), Hippos (Susiye), Gadara (Umm Keis), Pella (Fahil), Philadelphia ('Ammân), Gerasa (Jerash), Dion (Adûn?), Canatha (Kanawât), Damascus and Raphana. The last named is not identified, and Dion is uncertain. Other cities joined the league, and Ptolemy, who omits Raphana, gives a list of 18. The Gr inhabitants were never on good terms with the Jews; and the herd of swine (Mk 5 11 ff) indicates contempt for what was probably regarded as Jewish prejudice. The ruins still seen at Gadara, but esp. at Kanawât (see KENATH) and Jerash, of temples, theaters and other public buildings, attest the splendor of these cities in their day.

DECAY, dê-kā': Although this word is still in good use in both its lit. sense, of the putrefaction of either animal or vegetable matter, and its derived sense, denoting any deterioration, decline or gradual failure, the RV has replaced it by other expressions in Lev 25 35; Eccl 10 18; Isa 44 26; He 8 13; in some of these cases with a gain in accuracy of tr. In Neh 4 10 (כָּשַׁל, kāshal, "to be feeble," "stumble") RV retains "is decayed"; in Job 14 11 (חָרַב, hārēbh, "to be dried up") ARV substitutes "wasteth," and in Jn 11 39 ARV has "the body decayeth" instead of the more literal tr offensive to modern ears (δύει, ôzei, "emits a smell").

F. K. FARR

DECEASE, dê-sēs', IN OT AND APOC (נָפַח, rāphā', pl. r'phā'im, "ghosts," "shades," is tr<sup>d</sup> by "dead," "dead body," and "deceased" in both AV and RV): The word seems to mean "soft," "inert," but its etymology is uncertain (see REPHAIM). The various writers of the OT present, as is to be expected on such a subject, different conceptions of the condition of the deceased. In the beginning probably a vague idea of the continuation of existence was held, without the activities (Isa 59 10) and the joys of the present life (Ps 49 17). They dwell in the "land of forgetfulness" (Job 14 21; Ps 88 5; cf Isa 26 14), they "tremble" of cold (Job 26 5), they totter and "stumble at noonday as in the twilight" (Isa 59 10), their voice is described as low and muttering or chirping (Isa 8 19; 29 4), which may refer to the peculiar pitch of the voice of the spirit medium when a spirit speaks through him. (The calling up of the dead, which was strictly forbidden to Israel [Lev 19 31; 20 27] is referred to in 1 S 28 13 and perhaps in Isa 14 9.) The deceased are separated from their friends; love and hatred have both ceased with them (Eccl 9 5,6); "There is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in Sheol" (Eccl 9 10). The deceased are unable to praise Jeh (Ps 6 5; 88 10-12; Isa 38 18; Bar 2 17; Sir 17 27,28). Nor does there seem to have been at first an anticipation of reward or punishment after death (Ps 88 10; Sir 41 4), probably because the shades were supposed to be lacking the organs by which either reward or punishment could be perceived; nevertheless they are still in the realm of God's power (1 S 2 6; Ps 86 13; 139 8; Prov 15 11; Isa 7 11; Hos 13 14; Am 9 2; Tob 13 2).

Gradually the possibility of a return of the departed was conceived (Gen 5 24; 2 K 13 21; Ps 49 15; 73 24; 86 13; Hos 13 14; Wisd 3 1-7; 4 13,14; 6 18,19; 10 14). Even here it is often more the idea of the immortality of the soul than that of the resurrection of the body, and some of these passages may be interpreted as allegorical expressions for a temporal rescue from great disaster (e.g. 1 S 2 6); nevertheless this interpretation presupposes the existence of a deliverance from the shadows of Sheol to a better life in the presence of Jeh. Some passages refer clearly to such an escape at the end of the age (Dnl 12 2; Isa 26 19). Only very few of the OT believers reached the sublime faith of Job (19 25,26) and none the blessed expectation taught in the NT, for none but Christ has "brought life and immortality to light" (2 Tim 1 10; Jn 5 28,29).

The opinion that the dead or at least the newly buried could partake of the food which was placed in graves, a custom which recent excavations have clearly shown to have been almost universal in Pal, and which is referred to in Dt 26 14 and Tob 4 17, was soon doubted (Sir 30 18), and food and drink prepared for the funeral was henceforth intended as the "bread of comfort" and the "cup of consolation" for the mourners (Jer 16 7; 2 S 3 35; Ezk 24 17). Similarly the offering and burning of incense, originally an homage to the deceased, became a relief for the mourner (2 Ch 16 14; 21 19; Jer 34 5). See also Wisd 3 2; 7 6; Sir 38 23, and arts. on CORPSE; DEATH; HAIRES; SHEOL.

H. L. E. LUERING

DECEASE, dê-sēs', IN NT (τελευτάω, teleutáo, "to come to an end," "married and deceased" [Mt 22 25]): With θανάτω, thanátō, "death," "die the death" (Mt 15 4; Mk 7 10, RVm "surely die"). Elsewhere the word is tr<sup>d</sup> "die" (Mt 2 19; 9 18; Mk 9 48 and often; He 11 22, RV "end was nigh").

Also the subst., ἐξόδος, éxodos, "exodus," "exit," "departure," "his decease which he was about to accomplish" (Lk 9 31, RVm "departure"); "after my decease" (2 Pet 1 15, RVm "departure").

DECEIT, dê-sēt' (βλάβη, mārah; δόλος, dólos): The intentional misleading or beguiling of another; in Scripture represented as a companion of many other forms of wickedness, as cursing (Ps 10 7), hatred (Prov 26 24), theft, covetousness, adultery, murder (Mk 7 22; Rom 1 29). The RV introduces the word in Prov 14 25; 2 Thess 2 10; but in such passages as Ps 55 11; Prov 20 17; 26 26; 1 Thess 2 3, renders a variety of words, more accurately than the AV, by "oppression," "falsehood," "guile," "error."

DECEIVABLENESS, dē-sēv'a-b'l-nes, DECEIVE, dē-sēv' (נָפַח, nāḥā, "to lead astray"): "The pride of thy heart hath deceived thee" (Jer 49 16), i.e. "Thy stern mountain fastnesses have persuaded thee that thou art impregnable." In Jer 20 7, "O Lord, thou hast deceived me, and I was deceived," נָפַח, pāḥāh, signifies "to be enticed," "persuaded," as in ARV and RVm.

In the OT most often, and in the NT regularly, the various words rendered in AV "deceive" denote some deliberate misleading in the moral or spiritual realm. False prophets (Jer 29 8), false teachers (Eph 5 6) and Satan himself (Rev 12 9) are deceivers in this sense. In the gospels, AV "deceive" (πλανᾶω, planāō, 9 t, Mt 24 4.5 || Mk 13 5.6 || Lk 21 8; Mt 24 11.24; Jn 7 12.47) becomes in RV "lead astray"; the same change is made in 1 Jn 2 26; 3 7; but elsewhere (13 t) both AV and RV render planāō by "deceive."

"Deceivableness" (ἀπάτη, apátē), only in 2 Thess 2 10, signifies power to deceive, not liability to deception; RV "deceit." F. K. FARR

DECENTLY, dē'sent-li (εὐσεβῶς, euschēmōnōs): Only once is this word found in our Eng. Bible (1 Cor 14 40). It is in the last verse of that remarkable chapter on the proper use of spiritual gifts in the church and the proper conduct of public worship. It does not refer here to absence of impurity or obscenity. It rather refers to good order in the conduct of public worship. All things that are done and said in public worship are to be in harmony with that becoming and reverent spirit and tone that befit the true worshippers of God.

DECISION, dē-sizh'un: Has several different shades of meaning. It expresses the formation of a judgment on a matter under consideration. It expresses the quality of being firm or positive in one's actions. It expresses the termination of a contest or question in favor of one side or the other, as the decision of the battle, or the decision of the judge.

Until recent times the decision of disputed points between nations was determined by force of arms.

Thus the questions of dispute were decided between Israel and the surrounding tribes, between Israel and Assyria, between Israel and Egypt, and later between Judaea and Rome.

In the earliest times the questions of dispute between individuals were decided by the patriarch who was the head of the family.

2. Judicial Israel became a nation men were appointed to decide the difficulties between the people. At first this was one of the most important duties of Moses, but when the task became too great he appointed judges to assist him (see Ex 18 13-26). One important function of those who are called judges was to decide the difficulties between the people (see Jgs 4 4.5). The kings also decided questions of dispute between individuals (see 2 S 15 1-6; 1 K 3 16-28). As the people developed in their national ideals the decisions in judicial matters were rendered by councils appointed for that purpose.

Perplexing questions were many times decided by the casting of lots. The people believed that God would in this way direct them to the

3. Methods right decision (Prov 16 33; Josh 7 of Forming 10-21; 14 2; 1 S 10 20 f). Casting Decisions lots must have been a common method of deciding perplexing questions (see 1 S 14 41.42; Jon 1 7). It was resorted to by the apostles to decide which of the two men they had selected should take the place of Judas (Acts 1 21-26). The custom gradually lost in favor, and decisions, even of perplexing questions, were formed by considering all the facts. See AUGURY IV, 3; LOTS. A. W. FORTUNE

DECISION, VALLEY OF. See JEHOSEPHAT, VALLEY OF.

DECLARATION, dek-la-rā'shun, DECLARE, dē-kār': "Declare" is the tr of a variety of Heb and Gr words in the OT and NT, appearing to bear uniformly the meaning "to make known," "set forth," rather than (the older meaning) "to explain" (Dt 1 5). Declaration (Est 10 2 AV, RV "full account"; Job 13 17; Eccles 43 6; Lk 1 1 AV, RV "narrative"; 2 Cor 8 19 AV, RV "to show") has the like meaning.

DECLINE, dē-klīn' (סָר, ṣār, or שָׁרַף, ṣār, נָחָה, nāḥāh): In AV this word occurs 9 t in its original sense (now obsolete) of "turn aside." RV substitutes "turn aside" in Ex 23 2; Dt 17 11; 2 Ch 34 2; Job 23 11. In Ps 102 11; 109 23, the lengthening shadows of afternoon are said to "decline," and RV introduces the word in the same general sense in Jgs 19 8; 2 K 20 10; Jer 6 4. See AFTERNOON.

DEDAN, dē'dan, DEDANITES, dē'dan-its (AV Dedanim, ded'a-nim; דִּדָּן, d'dhān, "low," דִּדְיָיִם, d'dhānīm): An Arabian people named in Gen 10 7 as descended from Cush; in Gen 25 3 as descended from Keturah. Evidently they were, like the related Sheba (Sabaeans), of mixed race (cf Gen 10 7.28). In Isa 21 13 allusion is made to the "caravans of Dedanites" in the wilds of Arabia, and Ezk mentions them as supplying Tyre with precious things (Ezk 27 20; in ver 15, "Dedan" should probably be read as in LXX, "Rodan," i.e. Rhodians). The name seems still to linger in the island of Dadan, on the border of the Pers Gulf. It is found also in Min. and Sab. inscriptions (Glazer, II, 392 ff).

DEDICATE, ded'i-kāt, DEDICATION, ded-i-kā'shun (קִדְּשָׁה, qādhēsh, "to be clean," "sanctify"; קָדַשׁ, qādhēsh, "to be clean," "sanctify"; קָדַשׁ, qādhēsh, "a thing devoted [to God]"): Often used in Heb of the consecration of persons, but usually in the EV of the setting apart of things to a sacred use, as of the altar (Nu 7 10f.84.88; cf Dnl 3 2.3, "the d. of the image"), of silver and gold (2 S 8 11; 2 K 12 4), of the Temple (1 K 8 63; Ezr 6 16 f; cf Ex 29 44), of the wall of Jerus (Neh 12 27), of private dwellings (Dt 20 5). RV substitutes "devoted" for "dedicated" in Ezk 44 29. See CONSECRATION; SANCTIFICATION.

DEDICATION, ded-i-kā'shun, FEAST OF (ῥᾷ ἐγκαίνια, tá egkainia, Jn 10 22): A feast held by the Jews throughout the country for eight days, commencing on the 25th Kislev (December), in commemoration of the cleansing of the temple and dedication of the altar by Judas Maccabaeus after their desecration by Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc 4 56.59). The feast was to be kept "with mirth and gladness." 2 Macc 10 6.7 says it was kept like the Feast of the Tabernacles, with the carrying of palm and other branches, and the singing of psalms. Jos calls it "Lights," from the joy which accompanied it (Ant. XII, vii, 7). At this winter feast Jesus delivered in the temple the discourse recorded in Jn 10 24 ff, at Jerus. JAMES ORR

DEED, dēd: Used in its ordinary modern sense in EV. In the OT it is used to tr five Heb words: gmūlāh, lit. "recompense" (Isa 59 18); dābhār, lit. "word," "thing" (2 Ch 35 27 AV, RV "acts"; Est 1 17.18; Jer 5 28); ma'dseh (Gen 20 9; 44 15; Ezr 9 13); ālilāh (1 Ch 16 8 AV, RV "doings"; Ps 105 1 AV, RV "doings"); pō'al (Ps 28 4 AV, RV "work"; Jer 25 14). In the NT "deed" very frequently translates ἔργον, érگون (same root as Eng. "work"; cf "energy"), which is still more frequently (esp. in RV) rendered "work." In Lk 23 51; Acts 19 18; Rom 8 13; Col 3 9 AV, RV "doings," it stands for Gr πρᾶξις, prāxis (lit. "a doing," "transaction"), each time in a bad sense, equivalent to wicked deed, crime, a meaning which is frequently associated with the pl. of praxis (cf Eng. "practices" in the sense of trickery; so often in Polybius; Deissmann maintains that praxis was a technical term in magic), although in Mt 16 27 (AV "works") and Rom 12 4 the same Gr word has a neutral meaning. In Jas 1 25 AV "deed" is the tr of Gr ποιήσις, poiēsis, more correctly rendered "doing" in RV. D. MIALl EDWARDS

DEEP (תְּהוֹם, tēhōm; ἄβυσσος, ábussos, Lk 8 31 AV; Rom 10 7 AV; βάθος, báthos, Lk 5 4; βυθός, buthós, 2 Cor 11 25). The Heb word ("water in commotion") is used (1) of the primeval watery waste (Gen 1 2), where some suggest a connection with Bab Tiamat in the creation-epic; (2) of the sea (Isa 51 10 and commonly); (3) of the subterranean reservoir of water (Gen 7 11; 8 2; 49 25; Dt 33 13; Ezk 31 4, etc). In the RV the Gr word first noted is rendered, lit., "abyss." See ABYSS; also ASTRONOMY, III, 7.

DEEP SLEEP. See SLEEP, DEEP.

DEER, dēr (אֵיִל, 'ayyāl, fem. אֵיִלָּה, 'ayyālāh, and אֵיִלֶּה, 'ayyeleth [cf Arab. 'ayyāl and 'iyāl, "deer" and אֵיִל, 'ayil, "ram," and Lat caper and capra, "goat," caprea, capreolus, "wild goat," "chamois," or "roe deer"]; דְּבַרִּי, yahmūr [cf Arab. yahmūr, "deer"]; יַעֲלָה, ya'ālāh, fem. of יַעֲלֵל, ya'ēl [cf Arab. wa'l, "Pers wild goat"]; צִבְּרִי, ṣṣbhī, and fem. צִבְּרִיָּה, ṣṣbhīyāh [cf Arab. zabi and fem. zabīyah, "gazelle"]; עֶפְרַיִם, 'opher [cf Arab. ghafr and ghufr, "young of the mountain goat"]):

Of the words in the preceding list, the writer believes that only the first two, i.e. 'ayyāl (with its fem. forms) and yahmūr should be trd "deer." 'ayyāl for the roe deer and yahmūr for the fallow deer. Further, he believes that ya'ēl (incl. ya'ālāh) should be trd "ibex," and ṣṣbhī, "gazelle." 'Opher is the young of a roe deer or of a gazelle.

'Ayyāl and its fem. forms are regularly in EV rendered "hart" and "hind," terms which are more commonly applied to the male and female of the red deer, Cervus elaphus, which inhabits Great Britain, the continent of Europe, the Caucasus and Asia Minor, but which has never been reported as far south as Syria or Pal. The roe deer, Capreolus caprea, however, which inhabits the British Isles, the greater part of Europe, the Caucasus and Persia, is certainly found in Pal. The museum of the Syrian Protestant College at Beirūt possesses the skeleton of a roe deer which was shot in the mountains near Tyre. As late as 1890 it was fairly common in southern Lebanon and Carmel, but has now (1912) become very scarce. The fallow deer, Cervus dama, is a native of Northern Africa and countries about the Mediterranean. It is found in central Europe and Great Britain, where it has been introduced from its more southern habitat. A variety of the fallow deer, sometimes counted as a separate species under the name of Cervus Mesopotamicus, inhabits northeastern Mesopotamia and Persia. It may in former times have been found in Pal, and Tristram reports having seen the fallow deer in Galilee (Fauna and Flora of Pal), but while Tristram was a remarkably acute observer, he appears sometimes to have been too readily satisfied, and his observations, when unaccompanied, as in this case, by specimens, are to be accepted with caution. Now 'ayyāl (and its fem. forms) occurs in the Bible 22 t, while yahmūr occurs only twice, i.e. in the list of clean animals in Dt 14 5, and in 1 K 4 23, in the list of animals provided for Solomon's table. In both places AV has "fallow deer" and RV "roe-buck." In view of the fact that the roe deer has within recent years been common in Pal, while the occurrence of the fallow deer must be considered doubtful, it seems fair to render 'ayyāl "roe deer" or "roe-buck," leaving yahmūr for fallow deer.

The Arabs call the roe deer both 'ayyāl and wa'l. Wa'l is the proper name of the Pers wild goat, Capra aegagrus, and is also often used for the Arab. or Sin ibex, Capra bedu, though only by those who do not live within its range. Where the ibex is at home it is always called bedu. This looseness of nomenclature must be taken into account, and we have no reason to suppose that the Hebrews were more exact than are the Arabs. There are many examples of this in Eng., e.g. panther, coney, rabbit (in America), locust, adder and many others.

Yā'ēl (incl. ya'ālāh) occurs 4 t. In Job 39 1; Ps 104 18; 1 S 24 2, EV renders ya'ēl by "wild goat." For ya'ālāh in Prov 5 19, AV has "roe," while RV has "doe," which is non-committal, since the name, "doe," may be applied to the female of a deer or of an ibex. Since the Arab. wa'l, which is etymologically closely akin to ya'ēl, means the Pers wild goat, it might be supposed that that animal was meant, were it not that it inhabits the plains of the Syrian desert, and not the mountains of Southern Pal, where the ibex lives. At least two of the passages clearly indicate the latter locality, i.e. Ps 104 18: "The high mountains are for the wild goats," and 1 S 24 2: "Saul . . . went to seek David and his men upon the rocks of the wild goats." The conclusion then seems irresistible that ya'ēl, and consequently ya'ālāh, is the ibex.

Ṣṣbhī (incl. ṣṣbhīyāh) is uniformly rendered "roe" or "roe-buck" in AV, while RV, either in the text or in the margin, has in most cases "gazelle." In two places "roe" is retained in RV without comment, i.e. 2 S 2 18: "Asahel was as light of foot as a wild roe," and 1 Ch 12 8: "were as swift as the roes upon the mountains." 'Ayyāl and ṣṣbhī occur together in Dt 12 15.22; 14 5; 15 22; 1 K 4 23; Cant 2 9.17, i.e. in 7 of the 16 passages in which we find ṣṣbhī. If therefore it be accepted that 'ayyāl is the roe deer, it follows that ṣṣbhī must be something else. Now the gazelle is common in Pal and satisfies perfectly every passage in which we find ṣṣbhī. Further, one of the Arab. names of the gazelle is zabi, a word which is etymologically much nearer to ṣṣbhī than appears in this translation.

'Opher is akin to 'aphār, "dust," and has reference to the color of the young of the deer or gazelle, to both of which it is applied. In Cant 2 9.17 and 8 14, we have 'opher hā-'ayyālīm, EV "young hart," lit. "fawn of the roe deer." In Cant 4 5 and 7 3, we have 'ōpharīm t'ōmē ṣṣbhīyāh, AV "young roes that are twins," RV "fawns that are twins of a roe,"

RVm "gazelle" (for "roe"). For further reference to these questions, see ZOOLOGY.

With the exception of mere lists of animals, as in Dt 14 and 1 K 4, the treatment of these animals is highly poetical, and shows much appreciation of their grace and beauty. ALFRED ELY DAY

DEFAME, dē-fām', DEFAMING, dē-fām'ing: These words occur but twice in AV, and are translations of דִּבְבָּהּ, dibbāh, "slander," from דָּבַח, "to slander," or spread an evil report, and βλασφημέω, blasphēmēō, "to speak injuriously" of anyone (Jer 20 10; 1 Cor 4 13). "To defame" differs from "to revile" in that the former refers to public slander, the latter to personal abuse.

DEFECT, dē-fekt', DEFECTIVE, dē-fekt'iv (הִתְחַמָּה, hēttēma, "loss," "a defect"): Occurs in 1 Cor 6 7: "Nay, already it is altogether a defect in you [AV "there is utterly a fault among you"], that ye have lawsuits one with another." "Defect" means "want or absence of something necessary for completeness" (RVm "a loss to you"). The meaning of the passage in RV is that when Christians have lawsuits one with another it produces a lack of something which brings them short of completeness, they suffer a spiritual loss or defeat, and perhaps defect is not quite strong enough fully to express that idea.

Defective: Sir 49 4 AV, RV "committed trespass." A. W. FORTUNE

DEFENCE, dē-fens'. See COURTS, JUDICIAL.

DEFENCED. See FORTIFICATION.

DEFER, dē-fūr' (דָּוַר, 'āhar [in Hiphil], דָּוַר, 'ārakh [in Hiphil], מָשַׁחַח [in Niphil], "to postpone," more or less definitely, "delay"): In OT passages such as Isa 48 9; Ezk 12 25,28; Dnl 9 19, the idea of indefinite postponement agrees with the Heb and with the context. In the only NT occurrence of the word ἀναβάλλω, anabállō, in the middle voice, Acts 24 22) a definite postponement is implied.

DEFILE, dē-fil', DEFILEMENT, dē-fil'ment (AS āfýlau, etc; ME defoulen, "make foul," "pollute," render [AV] 9 Heb roots [RV six]: דָּבַל, gā'al, "defile"; הָלַל, hālāl, "defile" [from "untie, loosen, open," i.e. "make common," hence "profane"]; הִנָּח, hānēph, "incline away" [from right or religion], hence "profane," "defile" [Jer 3 9, ARV "pollute"]; נָחַם, tāmē, the principal root, over 250 t, tr<sup>d</sup> "defile" 74 t, "to become, or render, unclean"; נָחַם, tānaph, "to soil" [Cant 5 3]; נָחַם, ālāl, "deal severely, or decidedly, with," "roll" [Job 16 15, AV, ARVm]; נָחַם, ānāh, "humble" [Gen 34 2 AV, ARV "humble"]; נָחַם, kādash, "separate," "sanctify," "devote to religious use," hence "forfeit" [Dt 22 9 AV, ARV "forfeit," m "consecrated"]. They also render 6 [AV] Gr roots [ARV, 4]: κοινός, koínos, etc, "common" or "unclean," because appertaining to the outside world and not to the people of God, opposite of καθάρως, "clean," used 13 t; μαινώ, maiṇō, μῆλασμα, miasma, μῆλασμός, miasmós, "stain," "tinge," "dye"; "In their dreamings d. the flesh," Jude ver 8; μολύνω, molúnō, "stain," "contaminate": "not d. their garments" [Rev 3 4]; σπιλῶ, spilōō, "spot," "stain"; "d. the whole body" [Jas 3 6]; φθείρω, phtheirō, "corrupt," "destroy": the temple of God [1 Cor 3 17 AV, ARV "destroyeth"]; ἀρσενοκoίτης, arsenokoitēs: "d. themselves with men" [1 Tim 1 10 AV, ARV "abusers of"]):

Defilement in the OT was physical, sexual, ethical, ceremonial, religious, the last four, esp., overlapping.

(1) Physical: "I have washed my feet; how shall I d. them?" (Cant 5 3). (2) Sexual: which might be ceremonial or moral; of individuals by illicit intercourse (Lev 18 20), or by intercourse at forbidden times (15 24; 1 S 21 5); of the land by adultery: "Shall not that land be greatly defiled?" (Jer 3 1 ARV "polluted," usually substituted where the moral or religious predominates over the ceremonial). (3) Ethical: "Your hands are defiled with blood" (Isa 59 3); "Neither shall they d. themselves any more with . . . any of their transgressions" (Ezk 37 23). (4) Ceremonial: to render ceremonially unclean, i.e. disqualified for religious service or worship, and capable of communicating the disqualification. (a) Persons were defiled by contact with carcasses of unclean animals (Lev 11 24); or with any carcass (17 15); by eating a carcass (22 8); by contact with issues from the body, one's own or another's, e.g. abnormal issues from the genitals, male or female (15 2,25); menstruation (Lev 15 19); by contact with anyone thus unclean (15 24); copulation (15 16-18); uncleanness after childbirth (12 2-5); by contact with unclean persons (6 3), or unclean things (22 6), or with leprosy (esp. defiling; 13 14), or with the dead (Nu 6 12), or with one unclean by such contact (19 22), or by funeral rites (Lev 21 1); by contact with creeping things (22 5), or with unclean animals (11 26). (b) Holy objects were ceremonially defiled by the contact, entrance or approach of the defiled (15 31; Nu 19 13); by the presence of dead bodies, or any remains of the dead (Ezk 9 7; 2 K 23 16: Josiah's defilement of heathen altars by the ashes of the priests); by the entrance of foreigners (Ps 79 1; see Acts 21 28); by forbidden treatment, as the altar by being tooled (Ex 20 25); objects in general by contact with the unclean. Ceremonial defilement, strictly considered, implied, not sin, but ritual unfitness. (5) Religious: not always easily distinguished or entirely distinguishable from the ceremonial, still less from the ethical, but in which the central attitude and relationship to Jeh as covenant God and God of righteousness, was more fully in question. The land might be defiled by bloodshed (Nu 35 33), esp. of the just or innocent; by adultery (Jer 3 1); by idolatry and idolatrous practices, like sacrificing children to idols, etc (Lev 20 3; Ps 106 39); the temple or altar by disrespect (Mal 1 7,12); by offering the unclean (Hag 2 14); by any sort of unrighteousness (Ezk 36 17); by the presence of idols or idolatrous paraphernalia (Jer 7 30).

The scope of defilement in its various degrees (direct, or primary, as from the person or thing defiled; indirect, or secondary, tertiary, or even further, by contact with the defiled) had been greatly widened by rabbinism into a complex and immensely burdensome system whose shadow falls over the whole NT life. Specific mentions are comparatively few. Physical d. is not mentioned. Sexual d. appears, in a figurative sense: "These are they that were not defiled with women" (Rev 14 4). Ceremonial d. is found in, but not approved by, the NT. Examples are: by eating with unwashed, "common," not ceremonially cleansed, hands (Mk 7 2); by eating unclean, "common," food (Acts 10 14; Peter's vision); by intimate association with Gentiles, such as eating with them (not expressly forbidden in Mosaic law; Acts 11 3), or entering into their houses (Jn 18 28; the Pharisees refusing to enter the Praetorium); by the presence of Gentiles in the Temple (Acts 21 28). But with Christ's decisive and revolutionary dictum (Mk 7 19): "This he said, making all meats clean," etc, and with the command in Peter's vision: "What God hath cleansed, make not thou common" (Acts 10 15), and with Paul's bold and consistent teaching: "All things indeed are clean" (Rom 14 20, etc), the idea of ceremonial or ritual d., having accomplished its educative purpose, passed. Defilement in the NT teaching, therefore, is uniformly ethical or spiritual, the two constantly merging. The ethical is found more predominantly in: "The things which proceed out of the mouth come forth out of the heart; and they defile the man" (Mt 15 18); "that did not defile their garments" (Rev 3 4); "defileth the whole body" (Jas 3 6). The spiritual seems to predominate in: "defiled and unbelieving" (Tit 1 15); "conscience being weak is defiled" (by concession to idolatry) (1 Cor 8 7); "lest any root of bitterness springing up trouble you, and thereby the many be defiled" (He 12 15). For the supposed origins of the idea and details of defilement, as from hygienic or aesthetic causes, "natural aversions," "taboo," "totemism," associations with ideas of death, or evil life, religious symbolism, etc, see POLLUTION; PURIFICATION; UNCLEAN. Whatever use God may have made of ideas and feelings common among many nations in some form, the Divine purpose was clearly to impress deeply and indelibly on the Israelites the ideas of holiness and sacredness in general, and of Jeh's holiness, and their own required holiness and separateness in particular, thus preparing for the deep NT teachings of sin, and of spiritual consecration and sanctification.

PHILIP WENDELL CRANNELL

DEFY, dē-fī' (דָּפִי, hāraph, דָּפִי, zā'am): In 1 S 17 10.25.26.36.45 (the story of David and Goliath) and kindred passages, this word is used in its most familiar sense—"to taunt," "challenge to combat" (Heb hāraph). In Nu 23 7.8 "denounce" would be a better tr than "defy" (Heb zā'am).

DEGENERATE, dē-jen'ēr-āt: Only in Jer 2 21, where Judah is compared to a "noble vine" which it "turned into the degenerate branches of a foreign vine." It represents Heb šūrim="stray" or "degenerate (shoots)," from šūr="to turn aside," esp. to turn aside from the right path (Gr pikria, lit. "bitterness").

DEGREE, dē-grē' (מַעְלָה, ma'ālāh, "a going up" or "ascent," hence a staircase or flight of steps; "rank": ταπεινός, tapeinós, "low"): By derivation it should mean "a step down" (Lat, de, down, gradus, step). It is used, however, of any step, up or down; then of grade or rank, whether high or low. (1) In its literal sense of step (as of a stair), it is used in the pl. to translate Heb ma'ālōth ("steps"), in the || passages 2 K 20 9-11 AV (5 t); Isa 38 8 AV (3 t), where we read of the "degrees" (RV "steps") on the "dial of Ahaz" (Heb "steps of Ahaz"). See DIAL OF AHAZ. It seems to mean steps or progressive movements of the body toward a certain place in the phrase "A Song of Degrees" (RV "Ascents"), which forms the title of each of the Pss 120-34, probably because they were sung on the way up to the great feasts at Jerus. See PSALMS. (2) The secondary (but now the more usual) sense of rank, order, grade is found in the following passages: (a) 1 Ch 15 18, "their brethren of the second (degree)," lit. "of the seconds" (Heb mishnām; cf 2 Ch 28 7, "Elkanah that was next to the king," Heb, "the king's second," i.e. in rank); (b) 1 Ch 17 17, "a man of high degree" (Heb ma'ālāh, "step"); (c) Ps 62 9, "men of low degree . . . men of high degree," a paraphrase of Heb "sons of man . . . sons of man," the first "man" being Heb 'ādām ("common humanity"; cf Gr ánthrōpos, Lat homo, Welsh dyn), and the second Heb 'īsh (man in a superior sense; cf Gr anēr, Lat vir, Welsh gwr); (d) "of low degree" for Gr tapeinos in Sir 11 1; Lk 1 52; Jas 1 9; (e) In 1 Tim 3 13 AV "a good degree" (Gr bathmós kalós, RV "a good standing") is assured to those who have "served well as deacons." Some take this to mean promotion to a higher official position in the church; but it probably means simply a position of moral weight and influence in the church gained by faithfulness in service (so Hort). DEGREES, SONGS OF (שִׁיר הַמַּעְלָה, shīr ha-ma'ālōth; LXX ὁδὴ τῶν ἀναβαθμῶν, ōdē tōn ana-bathmōn; Vulg canticum graduum, RV "a song of ascents"): The title prefixed to 15 psalms (Pss 120-34) as to the significance of which there are four views: (1) The Jewish interpretation. According to the Mish, Middōth 2 5, Sukkah 51b, there was in the temple a semicircular flight of stairs with 15 steps which led from the court of the men of Israel down to the court of the women. Upon these stairs the Levites played on musical instruments on the evening of the first day of Tabernacles. Later Jewish writers say that the 15 psalms derived their title from the 15 steps. (2) Gesenius, Delitzsch and others affirm that these psalms derive their name from the step-like progressive rhythm of their thoughts. They are called Songs of Degrees because they move forward climactically by means of the resumption of the immediately preceding word. But this characteristic is not found in several of the group. (3) Theodoret and other Fathers explain these 15 hymns as traveling songs of the returning exiles. In Ezr 7 9 the return from exile is called "the going up [ha-ma'ālāh] from Babylon." Several of the group suit this situation quite well, but others presuppose the temple and its stated services. (4) The most probable view is that the hymns were sung by pilgrim bands on their way to the three great festivals of the Jewish year. The journey to Jerus was called a "going up," whether the worshipper came from north or south, east or west. All of the songs are suitable for use on such occasions. Hence the title Pilgrim Psalms is preferred by many scholars. See DIAL OF AHAZ.

JOHN RICHARD SAMPEY

DEHAITES, dē-hā'tēz (דְּהָאִי, dehāwē; AV Dehavites): A people enumerated in Ezr 4 9 with Elamites, etc, as among those settled by the Assyrian king Osnappar (Assurbanipal) in Samaria. The identification is uncertain.

DEHORT, dē-hōrt' (ἀποστορέφω, apostrophō; RV DISSUADE): Not found in the Eng. Bible; once only in Apoc (1 Mace 9 9). An obsolete Eng. word; the opposite of "exhort." It means "to dissuade," "to forbid," "to restrain from."

DEKAR, dē-kār (דֶּקֶר, deker, "lancer"): Father of one of Solomon's commissaries (1 K 4 9 AV). See BEN-DEKER.

DELAIAH, dē-lā'ya (דְּלַיָּה, dēlāyāh, "God has raised"):

(1) A descendant of David (1 Ch 3 24; AV "Dalaiah").

(2) One of David's priests and leader of the 23d course (1 Ch 24 18).

(3) One of the princes who pleaded with Jehoia-kim not to destroy the roll containing the prophecies of Jeremiah (Jer 36 12.25).

(4) The ancestor of a post-exilic family whose genealogy was lost (Ezr 2 60; Neh 7 62; 1 Esd 5 37 m). See DALAN.

(5) The father of timorous Shemaiah (Neh 6 10).

DELAY, dē-lā': The noun "delay" (Acts 25 17, "I made no delay"; AV "without any delay") means "procrastination." The vb. "to delay" (Ex 22 29; דָּלַי, 'ahar) involves the idea "to stop for a time," the people being admonished not to discontinue a custom. The Pil. pf. of בָּרַשׁ, bāsh (Ex 32 1), "Moses delayed to come," expresses not only the fact that he tarried, but also the disappointment on the part of the people, being under the impression that he possibly was put to shame and had failed in his mission, which also better explains the consequent action of the people. "To delay" (χρονίζω, chronizō) is used transitively in Mt 24 48 (RV "My lord tarrieth") and in Lk 12 45. The meaning here is "to prolong," "to defer."

A. L. BRESLICH

DELECTABLE, dē-lek'ta-b'l (דְּלֵקָבֵל, hāmādh, "to desire"): Found only in Isa 44 9 AV: "Their delectable things shall not profit," AVm "desirable." ARV translates: "the things that they delight in." The reference is to idols or images. Delitzsch renders the phrase: "Their darlings are good for nothing." The word may be traced back to the Lat delectabilis, "pleasant," or "delightful."

DELICACY, del'i-ka-si (τὸ στρογγύος, tō strōenos): Found only in Rev 18 3 AV: "The merchants of the earth are waxed rich through the abundance of her delicacies." RV has very properly changed delicacies to "wantonness," and "luxury" in the margin, which is much nearer to the original.

DELICATE, del'i-kāt, DELICATELY, del'i-kāt-li (דְּלֵקָה, ēdhen, דְּלֵקָה, 'ānōgh; ἐν τρυφῇ, en truphē): "Delicate" usually an adj., but once a subst. (Jer 51 34 AV), "He hath filled his belly [RV "maw"] with my delicacies." RV retains the word, but ARV very properly has replaced it with "delicacies." In Sir 30 18, RV agathā, "good things." The adj. seems to have two meanings, though not easily distinguished: (1) tenderly reared, and (2) wanton or voluptuous. In Dt 28 54.56; Isa 47 1; Jer 6 2, "luxurious" or "daintily bred" would certainly be nearer the original than "delicate." "Delicate children" of Mic 1 16 AV is changed by RV to "children of thy delight," i.e. beloved children, rather than children begotten in passion. The advb. "delicately" is employed in the same sense as the adj. (Lam 4 5; Lk 7 25). In the old Eng. writers "delicate" is often used for voluptuous: "Dives for his delicate life to the devil went" (Piers Plowman). The meaning of "delicately" (ma'ādhān) in 1 Sam 15 32 (AV) is a real puzzle. The AV reads, "And Agag came unto him delicately," with a possible suggestion of weakness or fear. ARV and RVm substitute "cheerfully." Others, by metathesis or change of consonants in the Heb word, tr "in bonds" or "fetters."

W. W. DAVIES

DELICIOUSLY, dē-lish'us-li (στρογγύως, strēniādō, "to live hard or wantonly"): "She [Babylon] . . . lived deliciously" (Rev 18 7.9 AV, RV "wantonly," RVm "luxuriously").

DELIGHT, dē-lit' (vb., דָּלִית, hāphēc, דָּלִית, rācāh, דָּלִית, shā'a'; συνήδομαι, sunēdomai): "To delight" is most frequently expressed by hāphēc, which means originally "to bend" (cf Job 40 17, "He moveth his tail"), hence, "to incline to," "take pleasure in." It is used of God's pleasure in His people (Nu 14 8; 2 S 22 20; Ps 18 19, etc.), and in righteousness, etc (Isa 66 4; Jer 9 24; Mic 7 18, etc.), also of man's delight in God and His will (Ps 40 8; 73 25; AV and RV, "There is none upon earth that I desire besides thee"), and in other objects (Gen 34 19; 1 S 18 22; Est 2 14; Isa 66 3); shā'a', "to stroke," "caress," "be fond of," occurs in Ps 94 19, "Thy comforts delight my soul"; 119 16.47.70, "I will delight myself in thy statutes." Similarly, St. Paul says (Rom 7 22), "I delight [sunēdomai] in [m, RV "Gr with"] the law of God after the inward man." This is the only occurrence of the word in the NT.

"To delight one's self" (in the Lord) is represented chiefly by ānagh (Job 22 26; 27 10; Ps 37 4.11; Isa 58 14).

Delight (noun), chiefly hēphēc (1 S 15 22; Ps 1 2; 16 3), rācōn (Prov 11 1.20; 12 22; 15 8), shā'āshū'im (Ps 119 24.77.92.143.174; Prov 8 30.31). RV has "delight" for "desire" (Neh 1 11; Ps 22 8; 51 16), for "observe," different reading (Prov 23 26), "no delight in" for "smell in" (Am 5 21), "delightest in me" for "favoorest me" (Ps 41 11), "his delight shall be in" (m "Heb 'scent'") for "of quick understanding" (Isa 11 3).

The element of joy, of delight in God and His law and will, in the Heb religion is noteworthy as being something which we are apt to fall beneath even in the clearer light of Christianity.

DELIGHTSOME, dē-lit'sum: דְּלִיטָה, hēphēc, is rendered "delightsome": Mal 3 12, "Ye shall be a delightsome land," lit. "a land of delight."

DELILAH, dē-lī'la (דְּלִילָה, dēlīlāh, "dainty one," perhaps; LXX Δαλειδά, Daleiddā, Δαλιδά, Daliddā): The woman who betrayed Samson to the Philis (Jgs 16). She was presumably a Philis, though that is not expressly stated. She is not spoken of as Samson's wife, though many have understood the account in that way. The Philis paid her a tremendously high price for her services. The account indicates that for beauty, personal charm, mental ability, self-command, nerve, she was quite a wonderful woman, a woman to be admired for some qualities which she exhibits, even while she is to be utterly disapproved. See SAMSON.

WILLIS J. BEECHER

DELIVER, dē-liv'ēr (דָּלַי, nācal, דָּלַי, nāthan; ρυόμαι, rhuōmai, παραδίδωμι, paradidōmi): Occurs very frequently in the OT and represents various Heb terms. The Eng. word is used in two senses, (1) "to set free," etc, (2) "to give up or over."

(1) The word most often tr<sup>d</sup> "deliver" in the first sense is nācal, meaning originally, perhaps, "to draw out." It is used of all kinds of deliverance (Gen 32 11; Ps 25 20; 143 9, etc; Jer 7 10; Ezk 3 19, etc; Zeph 1 18, etc). The Aram. nācal occurs in Dal 3 29; 6 14; 8 4.7; yāsha', "to save," in Jgs 3 9.31 AV, etc; mālat, "to let or cause to escape," in Isa 46 2, "recover," etc. In the NT rhuōmai, "to rescue," is most frequently tr<sup>d</sup> "deliver" in this sense (Mt 6 13 AV, "Deliver us from evil"); katargēō, "to make useless" or "without effect" (Rom 7 6 RV, "discharged"). In the NT "save" takes largely the place of "deliver" in the OT, and the idea is raised to the spiritual and eternal.

(2) For "deliver" in the sense of "give over, up," etc, the most frequent word is nāthan, the common word for "to give" (Gen 32 16; 40 13 AV; Ex 5 18). Other words are māghan (Hos 11 8, AV and ERV "How shall I deliver thee Israel?" i.e. "How shall I give thee up?" as in the first clause of the verse, with a different word [nāthan], ARV "How shall I cast thee off?"), yhabh, Aram. (Ezr. 5 14). In the NT paradidōmi, "to give over to," is most frequent (Mt 6 25; 11 27, "All things have been delivered [given or made over] unto me of my Father"; Mk 7 13; Lk 1 2; 1 Tim 1 20, etc); charizomai, "to grant as a favor" (Acts 25 11.16 AV).

(3) Yāladh, "to bring forth," is also rendered "deliver" in the sense of childbirth (Gen 25 24; Ex 1 19, etc.). In the NT this sense is borne by τίκτω, tiktō (Lk 1 57; 2 6; Rev 12 2.4), and γεννάω, gennōō (Jn 16 21).

In RV there are many changes, such as, for "deliver," "restore" (Gen 37 22; 40 13; Ex 22 26; Dt 24 13); for "delivered," "defended" (1 Ch 11 14); for "cannot deliver thee," "neither . . . turn thee aside" (Job 36 18); for "betray," "betrayed" we have "deliver," "delivered up," etc (Mt 10 4 m; Mk 13 12; 14 10 f; Lk 21 16); for "delivered into chains," "committed to pits," (2 Pet 2 4, m "some ancient authorities read chains"; cf Wisd 17 17); "Deliver us from evil," omitted in Lk 11 4, m "Many ancient authorities add but deliver us from the evil one (or, from evil)."

DELOS, dē'los (Δῆλος, Dēlos): An island, now deserted, one of the Cyclades in the Aegean Sea, about 3 miles long and 1 mile broad, with a rocky mountain (Cynthus) several hundred feet high in the center. In antiquity Delos enjoyed great prosperity. According to Gr legend the island once floated on the surface of the water, until Poseidon fastened it on four diamond pillars for the wandering Leto, who, like Io, was pursued by the vengeful Hera. It was here that Apollo and Artemis were born; hence the island was sacred, and became one of the chief seats of worship of the two deities. Numerous temples embellished Delos. The most magnificent was that of Apollo, which contained a colossal statue of the god, a dedicatory offering of the Naxians. This temple was a sanctuary visited by all the Greeks, who came from far and near to worship at the deity's shrine. There was a Dorian peripteral temple in Delos from the beginning of the 4th cent. BC. To the N. was a remarkable altar composed entirely of ox-horns. The various Ionian cities sent sacred embassies (theōriai) with rich offerings. There was also a celebrated oracle in Delos which was accounted one of the most trustworthy in the world. Every five years the famous Delian festival was celebrated with prophecies, athletic contests and games of every kind. All the nations of Greece participated.

The earliest inhabitants of Delos were Carians; but about 1000 BC the island was occupied by Ionians. For a long time it enjoyed independence. In 478 Delos was chosen as the place for the convention of the representatives of the Gr states for deliberation about means for defence against Persia. The treasury of the Athenian Confederacy was kept here after 476. The island became independent of Athens in 454. During the 2d and 1st cents. BC it became one of the chief ports of the Aegean. This was partly due to its location, and partly to the fact that the Romans, after 190 BC, favored the island as a rival to the sea-power of Rhodes. In 166 Delos was given to Athens; the inhabitants fled to Achaëa, and the island was colonized by Athenians, together with Romans.

The ruins of the city of Delos, which became a flourishing commercial port, are to the N. of the temple. It became the center of trade between Alexandria and the Black Sea, and was for a long time one of the chief slave markets of the Gr world. But Delos received a severe blow, from which it never recovered, in the war between Rome and Mithridates. The latter's general landed in 88 BC and massacred many, and sold the remainder of the defenceless people, and sacked and destroyed the city together with the temple and its countless treasures. At the conclusion of peace (84) Delos came into the possession of the Romans, who later gave it back to Athens. Under the Empire the island lost its importance entirely.

Delos was one of the states to which Rome addressed letters in behalf of the Jews (138-137 BC; see 1 Macc 15 16-23). Among those who came to Delos from the East must have been many of this nation. Jos cites in full a decree passed in Delos which confirmed the Jewish exemption from military service (Ant, XIV, x, 4).

The excavations of the French have laid bare 8 temples within the sacred inclosure (Apollo, Artemis, Dionysus). Numerous statues, dating from the earliest times of Gr art down to the latest, have been discovered; also 2,000 inscriptions, among which was an inventory of the temple treasure.

By the side of Delos, across a very narrow strait, lies Rheneia, another island which was the burying-ground of Delos; for on the sacred isle neither births, deaths nor burials were permitted. In 426 BC Delos was "purified" by the Athenians—by the removal of the bodies that had been interred there previously.

The means described in Gen 6-8 by which the Lord destroyed, on account of their wickedness, all the members of the human race except

1. The Noah and his family. According to Biblical the account, Noah was warned of the Account event 120 years before (Gen 6 3; 1 Pet 3 20; 2 Pet 2 5). During all this time he is said to have been a "preacher of righteousness" "while the ark was a preparing," when we may well suppose (according to the theory to be presently propounded) the physical events leading up to the final catastrophe may have given point to his preaching. When the catastrophe came, the physical means employed were twofold, namely, the breaking up of the "fountains of the great deep" and the opening of "the windows of heaven" (Gen 7 11). But the rain is spoken of as continuing as a main cause only 40 days, while the waters continued to prevail for 150 days (ver 24), when (8 2.3) "the fountains also of the deep and the windows of heaven were stopped, and the rain from heaven was restrained; and the waters returned from off the earth continually," so that after 10 months the ark rested upon "the mountains of Ararat" (not the peak of Mount Ararat, but the highlands of Armenia in the upper part of the valley of the Euphrates and Tigris; see ARARAT). Here it rested 40 days before the water subsided sufficiently to suggest disembarking, when a raven (which could easily find its food on the carcasses of the animals which had been destroyed) was sent forth, and did not return (ver 7); but a dove sent out at the same time found no rest and returned empty to the ark (ver 9). After 7 days, however, it was sent out again and returned with a fresh olive leaf (ver 11). After 7 days more the dove was sent forth again and did not return. After 56 days more of waiting Noah and his family departed from the ark. The following are the leading

It will thus be seen that there is no need of supposing any duplication and overlapping of accounts in the Bib. story. There is continual progress in the account from beginning to end, with only such repetitions for literary effect as we are familiar with in oriental writings. In Gen 6 5-7 13 the wickedness of the world is assigned as the reason which prevailed in the Divine counsels for bringing about the contemplated catastrophe. While emphasizing the righteousness of Noah which led to his preservation, 6 13-21 contains the direction for the making of the ark and of the preparations to bring into it a certain number of animals. This preparation having been made, the order was given (7 1-4) for the embarkation which (ver 5) was duly accomplished. We are then told that Noah and his family, and beasts both clean and unclean, were shut up in the ark during the prevalence of the water and its final subsidence. Altogether the account is most graphic and impressive (see W. H. Green, Unity of the Book of Genesis, 83 ff.).

Compared with other traditions of the Deluge, the Bib. account appears in a most favorable light, while the general prevalence of such traditions strongly confirms the reality of the Bib. story.

An Egypt legend of the Deluge is referred to in Plato's Timaeus, where the gods are said to have purified the earth by a great flood of water from which only a few shepherds escaped by climbing to the summit of a high mountain. In the Egypt documents themselves, however, we find only that Ra' the creator, on account of the insolence of man, proceeded to exterminate him by a deluge of blood which flowed up to Heliopolis, the home of the gods; but the heinousness of the deed so affected him that he repented and swore never more to destroy mankind.

In Indian mythology there is no reference to the Flood in the Rig Veda, but in the laws of Manu we are told that a fish said to Manu, "A deluge will sweep all creatures away. . . . Build a vessel and worship me. When the waters rise enter the vessel and I will save thee. . . . When the Deluge came, he had entered the vessel. . . . Manu fastened the cable of the ship to the horn of the fish, by which means the latter made it pass over the mountains of the North. The fish said: 'I have saved thee; fasten the vessel to a tree that the water may not sweep it away while thou art in the mountain; and in proportion as the waters decrease, thou shalt descend.' Manu descended with the waters, and this is what is called the Descent of Manu on the mountains of the North. The Deluge had carried away all creatures, and Manu remained alone" (tr<sup>d</sup> by Max Müller).

The Chinese tradition is embodied in sublime language in their book of Lü-Ki: "And now the pillars of heaven were broken, the

5. The earth shook to its very foundation; Chinese Tradition the sun and the stars changed their motions; the earth fell to pieces, and the waters enclosed within its bosom burst forth with violence, and overflowed. Man having rebelled against heaven, the system of the universe was totally disordered, and the grand harmony of nature destroyed. All these evils arose from man's despising the supreme power of the universe. He fixed his looks upon terrestrial objects and loved them to excess, until gradually he became transformed into the objects which he loved, and celestial reason entirely abandoned him."

The Greeks, according to Plutarch, had five different traditions of the Deluge, that of Deucalion being the most important. Accord-

6. The ing to this, Prometheus warned his son Deucalion of the flood which Zeus had resolved to bring upon the earth by reason of its wickedness. Accordingly Deucalion constructed an ark and took refuge in it, but with his vessel was stranded on Mount Parnassus in Thessaly, whereupon they disembarked and reseeded the earth by the fantastic process revealed to them by the goddess Themis of throwing stones about them, those which Deucalion threw becoming men and those which Pyrrha threw becoming women. Lucian's form of the legend, however, is less fantastic and more nearly in line with Sem tradition. In the Gr legend as in the Sem, a dove is sent forth which returns both a first and a second time, its feet being tinged with mud the second time, intimating the abatement of the flood. But neither Homer nor Hesiod have this tradition. Probably it was borrowed from the Semites or the Hindus.

In Britain there is a Druid legend that on account of the profrigacy of mankind, the Supreme Being sent a flood upon the earth when "the

7. The waves of the sea lifted themselves on British Tradition high round the border of Britain. The rain poured down from heaven and the waters covered the earth."

But the patriarch, distinguished for his integrity, had been shut up with a select company in a strong ship which bore them safely upon the summit of the waters (Ed. Davies in his Mythology and Rites of British Druids). From these the world was again reseeded. There are various forms of this legend but they all agree in substance.

Among the American Indians traditions of the Deluge were found by travelers to be widely disseminated. Mr. Catlin says, "Among

8. American Indian Traditions the 120 different tribes which I visited in North, South, and Central America, not a tribe exists that has not related to me distinct or vague traditions of such a calamity, in which one, or three, or eight persons were saved above the waters upon the top of a high mountain" (quoted by Wm. Restelle in Bib. Sac. [January, 1907], 157). While many, perhaps most, of these traditions bear the stamp of Christian influence through the early missionaries, the Mexican legend bears evident marks of originality. According to it the 4th age was one of water, when all men were turned into fishes except Tezpi and his wife Hochiquetzal and their children, who with many animals took refuge in a ship which sailed safely over the tumultuous waters which overwhelmed the earth. When the flood subsided the ship stranded on Mount Cohuacan, whereupon he sent forth a vulture which did not return, and then a humming bird which returned with some leaves in its beak. The Peruvian story differs from this in many particulars. According to it a single man and woman took refuge in a box and floated hundreds of miles from Cuzco to an unknown land where they made clay images of all races, and animated them.

The Moravian missionary Cranz, in his History of Greenland, says that "the first missionaries among the Greenlanders found a tolerably distinct tradition of the Deluge" to the effect that "the earth was once tilted over and all men were drowned" except one "who smote afterward upon the ground with a stick and thence came out a woman with whom he peopled the earth again." Moreover, the Greenlanders point to the remains of fishes and bones of a whale on high mountains where men never could have dwelt, as proof that the earth was once flooded. Among the North American Indians generally legends of the Deluge are so embellished that they become extremely fantastic, but in many of them there are peculiarities which point unquestionably to a common origin of extreme antiquity.

The unprejudiced reader cannot rise from the study of the subject without agreeing in general with François Lenormant, who writes: "As the case now stands, we do not hesitate to declare that, far from being a myth, the Bib. Deluge is a real and historical fact, having, to say the least, left its impress on the ancestors of three races—Aryan, or Indo-European, Sem, or Syrio-Arabian, Chamitic, or Kushite—that is to say on the three great civilized races of the ancient world, those which constitute the higher humanity—before the ancestors of these races had as yet separated, and in the part of Asia together inhabited" (Contemporary Review, November, 1879).

The most instructive of these traditions are those which have come down to us from Babylonia, which until recently were known to us only through the Gr historian Berosus of the 4th cent. BC, who narrates that a great deluge happened at some indefinite time in the past during the reign of Xisuthrus, son of Ardates. Xisuthrus was warned beforehand by the deity Cronos, and told to build a ship and take with him his friends and relations and all the different animals with all necessary food and trust himself fearlessly to the deep, whereupon he built "a vessel 5 stadia [3,000 ft.] long and 2 stadia [1,200 ft.] broad." After the flood subsided Xisuthrus, like Noah, sent out birds which returned to him again. After waiting some days and sending them out a second time, they returned with their feet tinged with mud. Upon the third trial they returned no more, whereupon they disembarked and Xisuthrus with his wife, daughter and pilot offered sacrifice to the gods and were translated to live with the gods. It was found that the place where they were was "the land of Armenia," but they were told to return to Babylon. Berosus concluded his account by saying that "the vessel being thus stranded in Armenia, some part of it yet remains in the Corcyraean mountains."

An earlier and far more important tradition was found inscribed on cuneiform tablets in Babylonia dating from 3000 BC. These were discovered by George Smith in 1870 and filled as many as 180 lines. The human hero of the account, 10. Cuneiform Tablets corresponding to Noah of the Bible and Xisuthrus of Berosus, is Gilgamesh, who lived in Shurippak, a city full of violence, on the banks of the Euphrates. He was warned of an approaching flood and exhorted to pull down his house and build a ship and cause "seed of life of every sort to go up into it." The ship, he says, was to be "exact in its dimensions, equal in its breadth and its length. . . . Its sides were 140 cubits high, the border of its top equaled 140 cubits. . . . I constructed it in 6 stories, dividing it into 7 compartments. Its floors I divided into 9 chambers. . . . I chose a mast (or rudder pole), and supplied what was necessary. Six sars of bitumen I poured over the outside; three sars of bitumen over the inside." After embarking, the storm broke with fearful violence and the steering of the ship was handed over to Bezur-Bel, the ship man. But amidst the roll of thunder and the march of mountain waves the helm was wrenched from the pilot's hands and the pouring rain and the lightning flashes dismayed all hearts. "Like a battle charge upon mankind" the water rushed so that the gods even were dismayed at the flood and cowered like dogs, taking refuge in the heaven of Anu while Ishtar screamed like a woman in travail, and repenting of her anger, resolved to save a few and "to give birth to my people" till like "the fry of fishes they fill the sea." The ship was therefore turned to the country of Nizir (Armenia).

It is worthy of notice that the cuneiform tablet exhibits as much variety of style as does the Bib. account. Plain narrative and rhetorical prose are intermingled in both accounts, a fact which effectually disposes of the critical theory which regards the Bib. account as a clumsy combination made in later times by piecing together two or more independent traditions. Evidently the piecing together, if there was any, had been accomplished early in Bab history. See BABYLONIA AND ASSYRIA.

On comparing the Bib. account with that of the cuneiform tablets, the following similarities and contrasts are brought to light:

(1) That the cuneiform inscription is from start to finish polytheistic (ll. 3-17), whereas the narrative in Gen is monotheistic.

(2) The cuneiform agrees with the Bib. narrative in making the Deluge a Divine punishment for the wickedness of the world (ll. 5, 6).

(3) The names differ to a degree that is irreconcilable with our present knowledge.

(4) The dimensions of the ark as given in Gen (6 15) are reasonable, while those of Berosus and the cuneiform tablets are unreasonable. According to Gen, the ark was 300 cubits (562½ ft.) long, 50 cubits (93¾ ft.) wide, and 30 cubits (56¼ ft.) deep, which are the natural proportions for a ship of that size, being in fact very close to those of the great steamers which are now constructed to cross the Atlantic. The "Celtic" of the White Star line, built in 1901, is 700 ft. long, 75 ft. wide and 49½ ft. deep. The dimensions of the "Great Eastern," built in 1858 (692 ft. long, 83 ft. broad, and 58 ft. deep), are still closer to those of the ark. The cuneiform tablets represent the length, width and depth each as 140 cubits (262 ft.) (ll. 22, 23, 38-41), the dimensions of an entirely unseaworthy structure. According to Berosus, it was 5 stadia (3,000 ft.) and 2 stadia (1,200 ft.) broad; while Origen (Against Cel-sus, 4.41), represented it to be 135,000 ft. (25 miles) long, and 3,750 ft. (¾ mile) wide.

(5) In the Bib. account, nothing is introduced conflicting with the sublime conception of holiness and the peculiar combination of justice and mercy ascribed to God throughout the Bible, and illustrated in the general scheme of providential government manifest in the order of Nature and in history; while, in the cuneiform tablets, the Deluge is occasioned by a quarrel among the gods, and the few survivors escape, not by reason of a merciful plan, but by a mistake which aroused the anger of Bel (ll. 146-50).

(6) In all the accounts, the ark is represented as floating up stream. According to Gen, it was not, as is usually trad, on "Mount Ararat" (8 4), but in the "mountains of Ararat," designating an indefinite region in Armenia upon which the ark rested; according to the inscriptions, it was in Nizir (ll. 115-20), a region which is watered by the Zab and the Tornadus; while, according to Berossus, it was on the Corcyraean Mountains, included in the same indefinite area. In all three cases, its resting-place is in the direction of the headwaters of the Euphrates valley, while the scene of the building is clearly laid in the lower part of the valley.

(7) Again, in the Bib. narrative, the spread of the water floating the ark is represented to have been occasioned, not so much by the rain which fell, as by the breaking-up of "all the fountains of the great deep" (7 11), which very naturally describes phenomena connected with one of the extensive downward movements of the earth's crust with which geology has made us familiar. The sinking of the land below the level of the ocean is equivalent, in its effects, to the rising of the water above it, and is accurately expressed by the phrases used in the sacred narrative. This appears, not only in the language concerning the breaking-up of the great deep which describes the coming-on of the Flood, but also in the description of its termination, in which it is said, that the "fountains also of the deep . . . were stopped, . . . and the waters returned from off the earth continually" (8 2,3). Nothing is said of this in the other accounts.

(8) The cuneiform tablets agree in general with the two other accounts respecting the collecting of the animals for preservation, but differ from Gen in not mentioning the sevens of clean animals and in including others beside the family of the builder (ll. 66-69).

(9) The cuneiform inscription is peculiar in providing the structure with a mast, and putting it in charge of a pilot (ll. 45, 70, 71).

(10) The accounts differ decidedly in the duration of the Flood. According to the ordinary interpretation of the Bib. account, the Deluge continued a year and 17 days; whereas, according to the cuneiform tablets, it lasted only 14 days (ll. 103-7, 117-22).

(11) All accounts agree in sending out birds; but, according to Gen (8 8) a raven was first sent out, and then in succession two doves (8 8-12); while the cuneiform inscription mentions the dove and the raven in reverse order from Gen, and adds a swallow (ll. 121-30).

(12) All accounts agree in the building of an altar and offering a sacrifice after leaving the ark. But the cuneiform inscription is overlaid with a polytheistic coloring: "The gods like flies swarmed about the sacrifices" (ll. 132-43).

(13) According to the Bib. account, Noah survived the Flood for a long time; whereas Nûnapishtim and his wife were at once deified and taken to heaven (ll. 177-80).

(14) Both accounts agree in saying that the human race is not again to be destroyed by a flood (Gen 9 11; ll. 162-69).

Close inspection of these peculiarities makes it evident that the narrative in Gen carries upon its face an appearance of reality not found in the other accounts. It is scarcely possible that the reasonable dimensions of the ark, its floating up stream, and the references to the breaking-up of the fountains of the great deep should have been hit upon by accident. It is in the highest degree improbable that correct statements of such unobvious facts should be due to the accident of legendary guesswork. At the same time, the duration of the Deluge, according to Gen, affords opportunity for a gradual progress of events which best accords with scientific conceptions of geological movements. If, as the most probable interpretation would imply, the water began to recede after 150 days from the beginning of the Flood and fell 15 cubits in 74 days, that would only be 3½ inches per day—a rate which would be imperceptible to an ordinary observer. Nor is it necessary to suppose that the entire flooded area was uncovered when Noah disembarked. The emergence of the land may have continued for an indefinite period, permitting the prevailing water to modify the climate of all western and central Asia for many cents. Evidence that this was the case will be found in a later paragraph.

In considering the credibility of the Bib. story we encounter at the outset the question whether the narrative compels us to believe the 11. Was Flood to have been universal. In the Flood answer, it is sufficient to suggest that Universal? since the purpose of the judgment was the destruction of the human race, all the universality which it is necessary to infer from the language would be only such as was sufficient to accomplish that object. If man was at that time limited to the Euphrates valley, the submergence of that area would meet all the necessary conditions. Such a limitation is more easily accepted from the fact that general phrases like "Everybody knows," "The whole country was aroused," are never in literature literally interpreted. When it is said (Gen 41 54-57) that the famine was "in all lands," and over "all the face of the earth," and that "all countries came into Egypt . . . to buy grain," no one supposes that it is intended to imply that the irrigated plains of Babylonia, from which the patriarchs had emigrated, were suffering from drought like Pal. (For other examples of the familiar use of this hyperbole, see Dt 2 25; Job 37 3; Acts 2 25; Rom 1 8.)

As to the extent to which the human race was spread over the earth at the time of the Flood, two suppositions are possible. First, that of Hugh Miller (Testimony of the Rocks) that, owing to the shortness of the antediluvian chronology, and the violence and moral corruption of the people, population had not spread beyond the boundary of western Asia. An insuperable objection to this theory is that the later discoveries have brought to light remains of prehistoric man from all over the northern hemisphere, showing that long before the time of the Flood he had become widely scattered.

Another theory, supported by much evidence, is that, in connection with the enormous physical changes in the earth's surface during the closing scenes of the Glacial epoch, man had perished from off the face of the earth except in the valley of the Euphrates, and that the Noachian Deluge is the final catastrophe in that series of destructive events (see ANTEDILUVIANS). The facts concerning the Glacial epoch naturally lead up to this conclusion. For during the entire epoch, and esp. at its close, the conditions affecting the level of the land surfaces of the northern hemisphere were extremely abnormal, and continued so until some time after man had appeared on the earth.

The Glacial epoch followed upon, and probably was a consequence of, an extensive elevation of all the land surfaces of the northern hemisphere at the close of the Tertiary period. This elevation was certainly as much as 2,000 ft. over the northern part of the United States, and over Canada and Northern Europe. Snow accumulated over this high land until the ice formed by it was certainly a mile thick, and some of the best authorities say 2, or even 3 miles. The surface over which this was spread amounted to 2,000,000 sq. miles in Europe and 4,000,000 in North America. The total amount of the accumulation would therefore be 6,000,000 cubic miles at the lowest calculation, or twice or three times that amount if the largest estimates are accepted. (For detailed evidence see Wright, Ice Age in North America, 5th ed.) But in either case the transference of so much weight from the ocean beds to the land surfaces of the northern hemisphere brings into the problem a physical force sufficient to produce incalculable effects. The weight of 6,000,000 cubic miles of ice would be twenty-four thousand million million (24,000,000,000,000,000) tons, which is equal to that of the entire North American continent above sea level. Furthermore this weight was first removed from the ocean beds, thus disturbing still more the balance of forces which secure the stability of the land. The geological evidence is abundant that in connection with the overloading of the land surfaces in the Northern Hemisphere, and probably by reason of it, the glaciated area and a considerable margin outside of it sank down until it was depressed far below the present level. The post-Glacial depression in North America was certainly 600 ft. below sea level at Montreal, and several hundred feet lower farther north. In Sweden the post-Glacial sea beaches show a depression of the land 1,000 ft. below the sea.

The evidences of a long-continued post-Glacial subsidence of the Aral-Caspian basin and much of the surrounding area is equally conclusive. At Trebizond, on the Black Sea, there is an extensive recent sea beach clinging to the precipitous volcanic mountain back of the city 750 ft. above the present water level. The gravel in this beach is so fresh as to compel a belief in its recent origin, while it certainly has been deposited by a body of water standing at that elevation after the rock erosion of the region had been almost entirely effected. The deposit is about 100 ft. thick, and extends along the precipitous face of the mountain for a half-mile or more. So extensive is it that it furnishes an attractive building place for a monastery. When the water was high enough to build up this shore line, it would cover all the plains of southern Russia, of Western Siberia and of the Aral-Caspian depression in Turkestan. Similar terraces of corresponding height are reported by competent authorities on the south shore of the Crimea and at Baku, on the Caspian Sea.

Further and most interesting evidence of this post-Glacial land depression is found in the existence of Arctic seal 2,000 miles from the Arctic Ocean in bodies of water as widely separated as the Caspian Sea, the Aral Sea and Lake Baikal. Lake Baikal is now 1,500 ft. above sea level. It is evident, therefore, that there must have been a recent depression of the whole area to admit the migration of this species to that distant locality. There are also clear indications of a smaller depression around the eastern shores of the Mediterranean Sea, where there are abandoned sea beaches from 200 to 300 ft. above tide, which abound in species of shells identical with those now living nearby.

These are found in Egypt, in the valley of the Red Sea, and in the vicinity of Joppa and Beirut. During their formation Asia and Africa must have been separated by a wide stretch of water connecting the Mediterranean with the Red Sea. The effect of such lingering wide expanses of water upon the climate of Western Asia must have been profound, and would naturally provide those conditions which would favor the early development of the human race in Armenia (where even now at an elevation of 5,000 ft. the vine is indigenous), from which the second distribution of mankind is said to have taken place.

Furthermore there is indubitable evidence that the rainfall in central Asia was, at a comparatively recent time, immensely greater than it has been in the historic period, indicating that gradual passage from the conditions connected with the Deluge to those of the present time, at which we have hinted above. At the present time the evaporation over the Aral Sea is so great that two rivers (the ancient Oxus and the Jaxartes), coming down from the heights of central Asia, each with a volume as great as that of Niagara, do not suffice to cause an overflow into the Caspian Sea. But the existence of such an overflow during the prehistoric period is so plain that it has been proposed to utilize its channel (which is a mile wide and as distinctly marked as that of any living stream) for a canal.

Owing to the comparatively brief duration of the Noachian Deluge proper, we cannot expect to find many positive indications of its occurrence. Nevertheless, Professor Prestwich (than whom there has been no higher geological authority in England during the last cent.) adduces an array of facts relating to Western Europe and the Mediterranean basin which cannot be ignored (see Phil. Trans. of the Royal Soc. of Lond., CXXIV [1893], 903-84; SCOT, 238-82). Among these evidences one of the most convincing is to be found in the cave of San Ciro at the base of the mountains surrounding the plain of Palermo in Sicily. In this cave there was found an immense mass of the bones of hippopotami of all ages down to the foetus, mingled with a few of the deer, ox and elephant. These were so fresh when discovered that they were cut into ornaments and polished and still retained a considerable amount of their nitrogenous matter. Twenty tons of these bones were shipped for commercial purposes in the first six months after their discovery. Evidently the animals furnishing these bones had taken refuge in this cave to escape the rising water which had driven them in from the surrounding plains and cooped them up in the amphitheater of mountains during a gradual depression of the land. Similar collections of bones are found in various ossiferous fissures, in England and Western Europe, notably in the Rock of Gibraltar and at Santenay, a few miles S. of Chalons in central France, where there is an accumulation of bones in fissures 1,000 ft. above the sea, similar in many respects to that in the cave described at San Ciro, though the bones of hippopotami did not appear in these places; but the bones of wolves, bears, horses and oxen, none of which had been gnawed by carnivora, were indiscriminately commingled as though swept in by all-pervading currents of water. Still further evidence is adduced in the deposits connected with what is called the rubble drift on both sides of the English Channel and on the Jersey Islands. Here in various localities, notably at Brighton, England, and near Calais, France, elephant bones and human implements occur beneath deep deposits of unsorted drift, which is not glacial nor the product of limited and local streams of water, but can be accounted for only by general waves of translation produced when the land was being reelevated from beneath the water by a series of such sudden earthquake shocks as cause the tidal waves which are often so destructive.

Thus, while we cannot appeal to geology for direct proof of the Noachian Deluge, recent geological discoveries do show that such a catastrophe is perfectly credible from a scientific point of view; and the supposition that there was a universal destruction of the human race, in the northern hemisphere at least, in connection with the floods accompanying the melting off of the glacial ice is supported by a great amount of evidence. There was certainly an extensive destruction of animal species associated with man during that period. In Europe the great Irish elk, the machairodus, the cave lion, the rhinoceros, the hippopotamus and the elephant disappeared with prehistoric man, amid the floods at the close of the Glacial epoch. In North America equally large felines, together with horses, tapirs, llamas, great mastodons and elephants and the huge megalonyx went to destruction in connection with the same floods that destroyed so large a part of the human race during the dramatic closing scenes of the period. It is, therefore, by no means difficult for an all-round geologist to believe in a final catastrophe such as is described in Gen. If we disbelieve in the Bib. Deluge it is not because we know too much geology, but too little.

DELUSION, dē-lū'zhun: (1) Isa 66 4, "I also will choose their delusions" (RVm "mockings"), Heb ta'ālūlm, which occurs only here and Isa 3 4 (where it is tr<sup>d</sup> "babes," RVm "childishness"). Its meaning is somewhat ambiguous. The best tr seems to be "wantonness," "caprice," "Their wanton dealing, i.e. that inflicted on them" (BDB). Other trs suggested are "insults" (Skinner), "freaks of fortune" (Cheyne), "follies" (Whitehouse). LXX has empaigmata, "mockings," Vulg illusiones. (2) 2 Thess 2 11 AV, "God shall send them strong delusion" (RV "God sendeth them a working of error"), πλάνη, plánē, "a wandering," "a roaming about," in the NT "error," either of opinion or of conduct.

DEMAND, dē-mand': The peremptory, imperative sense is absent from this word in its occurrences in AV, where it means no more than "ask," "inquire" (cf Fr. demande) one or the other of which RV substitutes in 2 S 11 7; Mt 2 4; Lk 3 14; 17 20; Acts 21 33. RV retains "demand" in Ex 5 14; Job 38 3; 40 7; 42 4; Dnl 2 27; and inserts it (AV "require") in Neh 5 18.

DEMAs, dē'mas (Δημάς, Dēmás, "popular"): According to Col 4 14; 2 Tim 4 10; Philem ver 24, one who was for a time a "fellow-worker" with Paul at Rome (Col, Philem), but at last, "having loved this present world," forsook the apostle and betook himself to Thessalonica (2 Tim). No other particulars are given concerning him. See APOSTASY; DEMETRIUS.

DEMETRIUS, dē-mē'tri-us (Δημήτριος, Dēmētrios, "of" or "belonging to Demeter," an ordinary name in Greece):

(1) Demetrius I, surnamed Σωτήρ, Sōtēr ("saviour"), was the son of Seleucus IV (Philopator). He was sent as a boy to Rome, by his father, to serve as a hostage, and remained there quietly during his father's life. He was detained also during the reign of his uncle, ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES (q.v.) from 175 to 164 BC; but when Antiochus died Demetrius, who was now a young man of 23 (Polyb. xxxi.12), chafed at a longer detention, particularly as his cousin, Antiochus Eupator, a boy of 9, succeeded to the kingdom with Lysias as his guardian. The Rom Senate, however, refused to listen to his plea for the restoration to Syria, because, as Polybius says, they felt surer of their power over Syria with a mere boy as king.

In the meantime, a quarrel had arisen between Ptolemy Philometor and Euergetes Physkon (Livy Ept. 46; Diod. Sic. fr xi), and Gnaeus Octavius, who had been sent to quell the disorder, was assassinated in Syria, while plundering the country. Demetrius, taking advantage of the troubled condition of affairs, consulted with his friend Polybius as to the advisability of attempting to seize the throne of Syria (op. cit. xxxi.19). The historian advised him not to stumble twice on the same stone, but to venture something worthy of a king, so after a second unsuccessful appeal to the Senate, Demetrius escaped to Tripolis, and from there advanced to Antioch where he was proclaimed king (162 BC). His first act was to put to death young Antiochus, his cousin, and his minister Lysias (Appian, Syr., c. 47; Ant., XII, x, 1; 1 Macc 7 1-4; 2 Macc 14 1.2).

As soon as he was established in power, Demetrius made an attempt to placate the Romans by sending them valuable gifts as well as the assassin of Gn. Octavius (Polyb. xxi.23); and he then tried to secure the Hellenizing party by sending his friend BACCHIDES (q.v.) to make the wicked Alcimus high priest. After a violent struggle and much treachery on the part of Bacchides (Ant., XII, x, 2), the latter left the country, having charged all the people to obey Alcimus, who was protected by an army.

The Jews under Judas resented his presence, and Judas inflicted severe punishment on all who had gone over to Alcimus (1 Macc 7 24). Alcimus, in fear, sent a message for aid to Demetrius, who sent to his assistance Nicanor, the best disposed and most faithful of his friends, who had accompanied him in his flight from Rome (Ant., XII, x, 4). On his arrival in Judaea, he attempted to win by guile, but Judas saw through his treachery, and Nicanor was forced to fight openly, suffering two signal defeats, the first at Capharsalama (1 Macc 7 31.32), and the second (in which Nicanor himself was killed), at Adasa (7 39 ff; 2 Macc 15 26 ff).

In a short while, however, Demetrius, hearing of the death of Nicanor, sent Bacchides and Alcimus into Judaea again (1 Macc 9 1). Judas arose against them with an army of 3,000 men, but when these saw that 20,000 opposed them, the greater part of them deserted, and Judas, with an army of 800, lost his life, like another Leonidas, on the field of battle (1 Macc 9 4.6.18). Then Bacchides took the wicked men and made them lords of the country (1 Macc 9 25); while Jonathan, who was appointed successor to Judas, fled with his friends (1 Macc 9 29 ff).

During the next seven years, Demetrius succeeded in alienating both the Romans (Polyb. xxxii.20) and his own people, and ALEXANDER BALAS (q.v.) was put forward as a claimant to the throne, his supporters maintaining that he was the son of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc 10 1-21; Ant., XIII, ii, 1-3). Both Alexander and Demetrius made bids for the support of the Jews, the former offering the high-priesthood and the title of King's Friend (1 Macc 10 20), and the latter freedom from taxes, tributes and customs (10 28 ff). Alexander's bait proved more alluring, since the Jews "gave no credence" to the words of Demetrius, and with the aid of the Maccabees, he vied with Demetrius for the space of two years for the complete sovereignty of Syria. At the end of this time, a decisive battle took place, in which Demetrius was slain, and Alexander became king of Syria (150 BC) (10 48-50; Ant., XIII, ii, 4; Polyb. iii.5; see also MACCABEES).

(2) Demetrius II, surnamed Νικάτωρ, Nikátor ("conqueror"), was the son of Demetrius Soter. When Balas was warring with Demetrius I, he sent his son to a place of safety in Crete. Three years after his father's death (147 BC), the unpopularity of Alexander gave the young man an opportunity to return and seize the government. He landed in Cilicia with Cretan mercenaries and secured the support of all Syria with the exception of Judaea (1 Macc 10 67 ff). Apollonius, his general, the governor of Coele-Syria, who essayed the conquest of the Jews, was defeated at Azotus with great loss.

Ptolemy Philometor, whose daughter was the wife of Alexander Balas, now entered into the struggle, and taking Cleopatra, his daughter, from Alexander, he gave her to Demetrius (11 12). He then joined Demetrius' army and the combined forces inflicted a defeat on Balas (145 BC), and from this Demetrius received his surname Nikator (Ant, XIII, iv, 8; 1 Macc 11 14 ff).

Jonathan now concluded a favorable treaty with Demetrius, whereby three Samaritan provinces were added to Judaea and the whole country was made exempt from tax (1 Macc 11 20-37; Ant, XIII, iv, 9). Demetrius then dismissed his army except the foreigners, thinking himself safe with the loyalty of the Jews assured. In the meantime, Tryphon, one of Balas' generals, set up the son of Alexander, Antiochus, as a claimant to the throne, and secured the assistance of the discarded army of Demetrius. Jonathan's aid was sought and he quelled the rebellion, on condition that the Syrian garrison be removed from Jerus (1 Macc 11 41-52; Ant, XIII, v, 2-3).

The king, however, falsified all that he had said, and kept none of his promises, so the Jews, deserting him, took sides with Tryphon and supported the claims of the boy Antiochus (1 Macc 11 53-59; Ant, XIII, v, 5-11). Demetrius' generals then entered Syria but were defeated by Jonathan at Hazor (1 Macc 11 63-74), and by skilful generalship he made futile a second attempt at invasion (12 24 ff).

Tryphon, who was now master of Syria, broke faith with Jonathan (12 40) and essayed the conquest of Judaea. Jonathan was killed by treachery, and Simon, his successor, made proposals of peace to Demetrius, who agreed to let bygones be bygones (1 Macc 13 36-40; Ant, XIII, vi, 7). Demetrius then left Simon to carry on the war, and set out to Parthia, ostensibly to secure the assistance of the king, Mithridates, against Tryphon (1 Macc 14 1). Here he was captured and imprisoned (14 3; Ant, XIII, v, 11; Jos, however, puts this event in 140 rather than 138 BC).

After an imprisonment of ten years, he was released and resumed the sovereignty 128 BC, but becoming involved in a quarrel with Ptolemy Physkon, he was defeated in battle at Damascus. From this place, he fled to Tyre, where he was murdered in 125 BC, according to some, at the instigation of Cleopatra, his wife (Jos, Ant, XIII, ix, 3).

(3) Demetrius III, Εὐκαίρος, Eúkaĩros ("the fortunate"), was the son of Antiochus Grypus, and grandson of Demetrius Nikator. When his father died, civil war arose, in which his two elder brothers lost their lives, while Philip, the third brother, secured part of Syria as his domain. Demetrius then took up his abode in Coele-Syria with Damascus as his capital (Ant, XIII, xiii, 4; BJ, I, iv, 4).

War now broke out in Judaea between Alexander Jannaeus and his Pharisee subjects, who invited Demetrius to aid them. Thinking this a good opportunity to extend his realm, he joined the insurgent Jews and together they defeated Jannaeus near Shechem (Ant, XIII, xiv, 1; BJ, I, iv, 5).

The Jews then deserted Demetrius, and he withdrew to Beroea, which was in the possession of his brother Philip. Demetrius besieged him, and Philip summoned the Parthians to his assistance. The tables were turned, and Demetrius, besieged in his camp and starved into submission, was taken prisoner and sent to Arsaces, who held him captive until his death (Ant, XIII, xiv, 3). The dates of his reign are not certain. ARTHUR J. KINSELLA

DEMETRIUS, dē-mē'tri-us (Δημήτριος, Dēmētrios, "belonging to Ceres"); The name of two persons:

(1) A Christian disciple praised by St. John (3 Jn ver 12).

(2) A silversmith of Ephesus who manufactured the little silver shrines of the goddess Diana to sell to the visiting pilgrims (Acts 19 23 ff). Because the teachings of Paul were injuring the trade of the silversmiths, there arose a riot of which Demetrius was the chief. Upon an inscription which Mr. Wood discovered among the ruins of the city, there appeared the name Demetrius, a warden of the Ephesian temple for the year 57 AD, and some authors believe the temple warden to be identical with the ringleader of the rebellion. The name, however, has been most common among the Greeks of every age. Because of its frequent use it cannot be supposed that Demetrius, the disciple of 3 Jn ver 12, was the silversmith of Ephesus, nor that Demas of 2 Tim 4 10, who bore the name in a contracted form, may be identified with him.

DEMON, dē'mon, DEMONIAC, dē-mō'nī-ak, DEMONOLOGY, dē-mon-ol'-ō-jī (Δαιμόνιον, daimōnion, earlier form δαίμων, daimōn = πνεῦμα ἀκάθαρτον, ponēron, pneuma akátharton, ponērōn, "demon," "unclean or evil spirit," incorrectly rendered devil in AV):

I. Definition.—The word daimōn or daimonion seems originally to have had two closely related meanings; a deity, and a spirit, superhuman but not supernatural. In the former sense the term occurs in the LXX tr of Dt 32 17; Ps 106 37; Acts 17 18. The second of these meanings, which involves a general reference to vaguely conceived personal beings akin to men and yet belonging to the unseen realm, leads to the application of the term to the peculiar and restricted class of beings designated "demons" in the NT.

II. The Origin of Biblical Demonology.—An interesting scheme of development has been suggested (by Baudissin and others) in which Bib. demonism is brought through polytheism into connection with primitive animism.

A simple criticism of this theory, which is now in the ascendant, will serve fittingly to introduce what should be said specifically concerning
1. The Evolutionary Theory Bib. demonology. (1) Animism, which is one branch of that general primitive view of things which is designated as spiritism, is the theory that all Nature is alive (see Ladd, Phil. Rel., I, 89 f) and that all natural processes are due to the operation of living wills. (2) Polytheism is supposed to be the outcome of animism. The vaguely conceived spirits of the earlier conception are advanced to the position of deities with names, fixed characters and specific functions, organized into a pantheon. (3) Bib. demonology is supposed to be due to the solvent of monotheism upon contemporary polytheism. The Hebrews were brought into contact with surrounding nations, esp. during the Pers, Bab and Gr periods, and monotheism made room for heathenism by reducing its deities to the dimension of demons. They are not denied all objective reality, but are denied the dignity and prerogatives of deity.

The objections to this ingenious theory are too many and too serious to be overcome. (1) The genetic connection between animism and polytheism is not clear. In fact, the specific religious character of animism is altogether problematical. It belongs to the category of primitive philosophy rather than of religion. It is difficult to trace the process by which spirits unnamed and with characteristics of the vaguest become deities—esp. is it difficult to understand how certain spirits only are advanced to the standing of deities. More serious still, polytheism and animism have coexisted without close combination or real assimilation (see Sayce, Babylonia and Assyria, 232; Rogers, Religion of Babylonia and Assyria, 75 f) for a long course of history. It looks as if animism and polytheism had a different raison d'être, origin and development. It is, at least, unsafe to construct a theory on the basis of so insecure a connection. (2) The interpretation of heathen deities as demons by no means indicates that polytheism is the source of Bib. demonology. On general principles, it seems far more likely that the category of demons was already familiar, and that connection with polytheism brought about an extension of its application. A glance at the OT will show how comparatively slight and unimportant has been the bearing of heathen polytheism upon Bib. thought. The demonology of the OT is confined to the following passages: Lev 16 21,22; 17 7; Isa 13 21; 34 13; Dt 32 17; Ps 106 37 (elsewhere commented upon; see COMMUNION WITH DEMONS). Gesenius well says of Lev 16 21 that it is "vexed with the numerous conjectures of interpreters." If the prevalent modern view is accepted we find in it an actual meeting-point of popular superstition and the religion of Jeh (see AZAZEL). According to Driver (HDB, I, 207), this item in the Levitical ritual "was intended as a symbolical declaration that the land and the people are now purged from guilt, their sins being handed over to the evil spirit to whom they are held to belong, and whose home is in the desolate wilderness remote from human habitations" (ver 22, into a land cut off). A more striking instance could scarcely be sought of the way in which the religion of Jeh kept the popular spiritism at a safe distance. Lev 17 7 (see COMMUNION WITH DEMONS) refers to participation in the rites of heathen worship. The two passages—Isa 13 20,21; 34 13,14—are poetical and really imply nothing as to the writer's own belief. Creatures both seen and unseen supposed to inhabit places deserted of man are used, as any poet might use them, to furnish the details for a vivid word-picture of uninhabited solitude. There is no direct evidence that the narrative of the Fall (Gen 3 1-19) has any connection with demonology (see HDB, I, 590 n.), and the suggestion of Whitehouse that the mention of satyrs and night-monsters of current mythology with such creatures as jackals, etc, implies "that demons were held to reside more or less in all these animal denizens of the ruined solitude" is clearly fanciful. It is almost startling to find that all that can possibly be affirmed of demonology in the OT is confined to a small group of passages which are either legal or poetical and which all furnish examples of the inhibiting power of high religious conceptions upon the minds of a naturally superstitious and imaginative people. Even if we add all the passages in which a real existence seems to be granted to heathen deities (e.g. Nu 21 29; Isa 19 1, etc) and interpret them in the extreme sense, we are still compelled to affirm that evidence is lacking to prove the influence of polytheism in the formation of the Bib. doctrine of demons. (3) This theory breaks down in another still more vital particular. The demonology of the Bible is not of kin either with primitive animism or popular Sem demonism. In what follows we shall address ourselves to NT demonology—that of the OT being a negligible quantity.

III. NT Demonology.—The most marked and significant fact of NT demonology is that it provides no materials for a discussion of the nature and characteristics of demons. Whitehouse says (HDB, I, 593) that NT demonology "is in all its broad characteristics the demonology of the contemporary Judaism stripped of its cruder and exaggerated features." How much short of the whole truth this statement comes will appear later, but as it stands it defines the specific direction of inquiry into the NT treatment of demons; namely, to explain its freedom from the crude and exaggerated features of popular demonism. The presence among NT writers of an influence curbing curiosity and restraining the imagination is of all things the most important for us to discover and emphasize. In four of its most vital features the NT attitude on this subject differs from all popular conceptions: (a) in the absence of all imaginative details concerning demons; (b) in the emphasis placed upon the moral character of demons and their connection with the ethical disorders of the human race; (c) in the absence of confidence in magical methods of any kind in dealing with demons; (d) in its intense restrictions of the sphere of demoniacal operations.

A brief treatment under each of these heads will serve to present an ordered statement of the most important facts.

(a) In the NT we are told practically nothing about the origin, nature, characteristics or habits of demons. In a highly figurative passage (Mt 12 43) Our Lord speaks of demons as passing through "waterless places," and in the story of the Gadarene demoniac (Lk 8 31) the "abyss" is mentioned as the place of their ultimate detention. The method of their control over human beings is represented in two contrasted ways (cf Mk 1 23 ff; Lk 4 33 ff), indicating that there was no fixed mode of regarding it. With these three scant items our direct information ceases. We are compelled to infer from the effects given in the limited number of specific instances narrated. And it is worthy of more than passing mention that no theoretical discussion of demons occurs. The center of interest in the Gospels is the person of Jesus, the sufferers and the cures. Interest in the demons as such is absent. Certain passages seem to indicate that the demons were able to speak (see Mk 1 24,26,34; Lk 4 41, etc), but comparing these statements with others (cf Mk 1 23; Lk 8 28) it is seen that no distinction is drawn between the cries of the tormented in the paroxysms of their complaint and the cries attributed to the demons themselves. In other particulars the representation is consistent. The demons belong to the unseen world, they are incapable of manifestation except in the disorders which they cause—there are no materializations, no grotesque narratives of appearances and disappearances, no morbid dealing with repulsive details, no license of speculation in the narratives. In contrast with this reticence is not merely the demonology of primitive people, but also that of the non-canonical Jewish books. In the Book of En demons are said to be fallen angels, while Jos holds that they are the spirits of the wicked dead. In the rabbinical writings speculation has run riot in discussing the origin, nature and habits of demons. They are represented as the offspring of Adam and Eve in conjunction with male and female spirits, as being themselves sexed and capable of reproduction as well as performing all other physical functions. Details are given of their numbers, haunts and habits, of times and places where they are esp. dangerous, and of ways and methods of breaking their power (see EXORCISM). Full sweep is also given to the imagination in descriptive narratives, oftentimes of the most morbid and unwholesome character, of their doings among men. After reading some of these narratives one can agree with Edersheim when he says, "Greater contrast could scarcely be conceived than between what we read in the NT and the views and practices mentioned in Rabbinic writings" (LTJM, II, 776).

(b) It is also clearly to be noted that while in its original application the term daimonion is morally indifferent, in NT usage the demon is invariably an ethically evil being. This differentiates the NT treatment from extra-canonical Jewish writings. In the NT demons belong to the kingdom of Satan whose power it is the mission of Christ to destroy. It deepens and intensifies its representations of the earnestness of human life and its moral issues by extending the sphere of moral struggle to the invisible world. It clearly teaches that the power of Christ extends to the world of evil spirits and that faith in Him is adequate protection against any evils to which men may be exposed. (For significance of this point see Plummer, St. Luke [JCC], 132-33.)

(c) The NT demonology differs from all others by its negation of the power of magic rites to deliver from the affliction. Magic which is clearly separable from religion at that specific point (see Gwatkin, Knowledge of God, I, 249) rests upon and is dependent upon spiritism. The ancient Bab incantation texts, forming a surprisingly large proportion of the extant documents, are addressed directly to the supposed activities and powers of demons. These beings, who are not trusted and prayed to in the sense in which deities are, command confidence and call forth prayer, are dealt with by magic rites and formulas (see Rogers, op. cit., 144). Even the Jewish non-canonical writings contain numerous forms of words and ceremonies for the expulsion of demons. In the NT there is no magic. The deliverance from a demon is a spiritual and ethical process (see EXORCISM).

(d) In the NT the range of activities attributed to demons is greatly restricted. According to Bab ideas: "These demons were everywhere; they lurked in every corner, watching for their prey. The city streets knew their malevolent presence, the rivers, the seas, the tops of mountains; they appeared sometimes as serpents gliding noiselessly upon their victims, as birds horrid of mien flying resistlessly to destroy or afflict, as beings in human forms, grotesque, malformed, awe-inspiring through their hideousness. To these demons all sorts of misfortune were ascribed—a toothache, a headache, a broken bone, a raging fever, an outburst of anger, of jealousy, of incomprehensible disease" (Rogers, op. cit., 145). In the extra-canonical Jewish sources the same exuberance of fancy appears in attributing all kinds of ills of mind and body to innumerable, swarming hosts of demons lying in wait for men and besieging them with attacks and ills of all descriptions. Of this affluence of morbid fancy there is no hint in the NT. A careful analysis of the instances will show the importance of this fact. There are, taking repetitions and all, about 80 references to demons in the NT. In 11 instances the distinction between demon-possession and diseases ordinarily caused is clearly made (Mt 4 24; 8 16; 10 8; Mk 1 32.34; 6 13; 16 17.18; Lk 4 40.41; 9 1; 13 32; Acts 19 12). The results of demon-possession are not exclusively mental or nervous (Mt 9 32.33; 12 22). They are distinctly and peculiarly mental in two instances only (Gadarene maniac, Mt 8 28 and parallels, and Acts 19 13 f). Epilepsy is specified in one case only (Mt 17 15). There is distinction made between demonized and epileptic, and demonized and lunatic (Mt 4 24). There is distinction made between diseases caused by demons and the same disease not so caused (cf Mt 12 22; 15 30). In most of the instances no specific symptoms are mentioned. In an equally large proportion, however, there are occasional fits of mental excitement often due to the presence and teaching of Christ.

A summary of the entire material leads to the conclusion that, in the NT cases of demon-possession, we have a specific type of disturbance, physical or mental, distinguishable not so much by its symptoms which were often of the most general character, as by its accompaniments. The aura, so to say, which surrounded the patient, served to distinguish his symptoms and to point out the special cause to which his suffering was attributed. Another unique feature of NT demonology should be emphasized. While this group of disorders is attributed to demons, the victims are treated as sick folk and are healed. The whole atmosphere surrounding the narrative of these incidents is calm, lofty and pervaded with the spirit of Christ. When one remembers the manifold cruelties inspired by the unreasoning fear of demons, which make the annals of savage medicine a nightmare of unimaginable horrors, we cannot but feel the world-wide difference between the Bib. narratives and all others, both of ancient and modern times, with which we are acquainted. Every feature of the NT narratives points to the conclusion that in them we have trustworthy reports of actual cures. This is more important for NT faith than any other conclusion could possibly be.

It is also evident that Jesus treated these cases of invaded personality, of bondage, of depression, of helpless fear, as due to a real superhuman cause, to meet and overcome which He addressed Himself. The most distinctive and important words we have upon this obscure and difficult subject, upon which we know far too little to speak with any assurance or authority, are these: "This kind can come out by nothing, save by prayer" (Mk 9 29).

DEMOPHON, dem'ō-fon (Δημόφων, Dēmophōn): A Syrian general in Pal under Antiochus V (Eupator) who continued to harass the Jews after covenants had been made between Lysias and Judas Maccabaeus (2 Macc 12 2).

DEN (מֵעוֹן, mā'ōn, מְעוֹנָה, mē'ōnāh, "habitation"; מְעָרָה, mē'ārāh, and σπήλαιον, spēlaion, "cave"; מְאִירָה, mē'ārāh [Isa 11 8], "a light-hole," fr אֵר, 'ēr, "light," perhaps for mē'ārāh; שֹׁם, śōkh [Ps 10 9 AV], and סֻכָּה, sukkāh [Job 38 40], "a covert," elsewhere 'booth'; אֶרֶב, 'erebh [Job 37 8], "covert," as in RV; גֵּב, gōbbh; cf Arab. jubb, "pit" [Dnl 6 7]; מִן־הָרֹחַ, minhārōth, "fissure" or "cleft" [Jgs 6 2]): In the limestone mountains of Pal, caves, large and small, are abundant, the calcium carbonate, of which the rock is mainly composed, being dissolved by the water as it trickles over them or through their crevices. Even on the plains, by a similar process, pits or "lime sinks" are formed, which are sometimes used by the Arabs for storing straw or grain. Of this sort may have been the pit, bōr, into which Joseph was cast by his brethren (Gen 37 20). Caves and crevices and sometimes spaces among piled-up boulders at the foot of a cliff or in a stream bed are used as dens by jackals, wolves and other wild animals. Even the people, for longer or shorter periods, have lived as troglodytes. Cf Jgs 6 2: "Because of Midian the children of Israel made them the dens [minhārōth] which are in the mountains, and the caves [mē'ārāh], and the strongholds [m<sup>c</sup>gādh].” The precipitous sides of the valleys contain many caves converted by a little labor into human habitations. Notable instances are the valley of the Kidron near Mār-Sāba, and Wādī-ul-Ḥamām near the Sea of Tiberias. See CAVE.

ALFRED ELY DAY

DENARIUS, dē-nā'ri-us (δηνάριον, dēnāriōn): A Rom silver coin, 25 of which went to the aureus, the standard gold coin of the empire in the time of Augustus, which was equal in value to about one guinea or $5.25; more exactly £1.0.6=$5.00, the £=$4.866. Hence the value of the denarius would be about 20 cents and this was the ordinary wage of a soldier and a day laborer. The word is uniformly rendered “penny” in the AV and “shilling” in the ARV, except in Mt 22 19; Mk 12 15 and Lk 20 24, where the Lat word is used, since in these passages it refers to the coin in which tribute was paid to the Rom government. See MONEY.

H. PORTER

DENOUNCE, dē-nouns': Occurs in Dt 30 18: “I denounce unto you this day, that ye shall surely perish.” It is used here in the obsolete sense of “to declare,” to make known in a solemn manner. It is not found in the Bible with the regular meaning of “to censure,” “arraign,” etc.

DENY, dē-nī': This word is characteristic of the NT rather than the OT, although it translates three different Heb originals, viz. כָּחַשׁ, kāhash, “to lie,” “disown” (Gen 18 15; Josh 24 27; Job 8 18; 31 28; Prov 30 9); מָנָה, mānā, “to withhold,” “keep back” (1 K 20 7; Prov 30 7); שָׁחַב, shābh, “to turn back,” “say no” (1 K 2 16).

In the NT, ἀντιλέγω, antilegō, is once tr<sup>d</sup> “deny,” in the case of the Sadducees who denied the resurrection (Lk 20 27 AV), and where it carries the sense of speaking against the doctrine. But the word commonly is ἀρνέομαι, arnéomai, with or without the prefix ap. In the absence of the prefix the sense is “to disown,” but when it is added it means “to disown totally” or to the fullest extent. In the milder sense it is found in Mt 10 33; 26 70. 72; of Simon Peter, Mk 14 68.70 (Acts 3 13.14; 2 Tim 2 12.13; 2 Pet 2 1; 1 Jn 2 22.23; Jude ver 4; Rev 2 13; 3 8). But it is significant that the sterner meaning is associated with Mt 16 24 and its parallels, where Christ calls upon him who would be His disciple to deny himself and take up his cross and follow Him. See also PETER, SIMON.

DEPOSIT, dē-poz'it (παράθεσις, parathēkē, 1 Tim 6 20; 2 Tim 1 12.14 RVm, paraphrased in both AV and RV into “that which is committed” [see COMMENT]): The noun was used in the classical Gr, just as its Eng. equivalents, for “that which is placed with another for safe keeping,” a charge committed to another's hands, consisting often of money or property; cf Ex 22 7; Lev 6 2. This practice was common in days when there were no banks. (1) In 1 Tim 6 20; also 2 Tim 1 14, the reference is to a deposit which God makes with man, and for which man is to give a reckoning. The context shows that this deposit is the Christian faith, “the pattern of sound words” (2 Tim 1 13), that which is contrasted with the “oppositions of the knowledge which is falsely so called” (1 Tim 6 20). “Keep the talent of the Christian faith safe and undiminished” (Vincentius Lirenensis). (2) In 2 Tim 1 12, the deposit is one which man makes with God. The key to the meaning of this expression is found probably in Ps 31 5: “Into thy hand I commend my spirit: Thou hast redeemed me,” i.e. “All that I am, with all my interests, have been intrusted to Thy safe keeping, and, therefore, I have no anxieties with respect to the future. The day of reckoning, ‘that day,’ will show how faithful are the hands that hold this trust.”

DEPUTY, dep'ū-ti: This is the correct rendering of נִשְׁבָּח, niṣṣābh (1 K 22 47). In Est 8 9 and 9 3 the term improperly represents שָׂגָה, sāghān, in AV, and is corrected to “governor” in RV. In the NT “deputy” represents ἀνθύπατος, anthūpalos (Acts 13 7.8.12; 18 12; 19 38), which RV correctly renders “proconsul” (q.v.). The Rom proconsuls were officers invested with consular power over a district outside the city, usually for one year. Originally they were retiring consuls, but after Augustus the title was given to governors of senatorial provinces, whether they had held the office of consul or not. The proconsul exercised judicial as well as military power in his province, and his authority was absolute, except as he might be held accountable at the expiration of his office. See GOVERNMENT.

DERBE, dūr'bē (Δέρβη, Dērbē, Acts 14 20.21; 16 1; Δερβαίος, Derbaíos, 20 4; Δερβήτης, Derbētēs, Strabo, Cicero): A city in the extreme S.E. corner of the Lycaonian plain is mentioned twice as having been visited by Paul (on his first and second missionary journeys respectively), and it may now be regarded as highly probable that he passed through it on his third journey (to the churches of Galatia). The view that these churches were in South Galatia is now accepted by the majority of Eng. and Am. scholars, and a traveler passing through the Cilician Gates to Southern Galatia must have traversed the territory of Derbe.

Derbe is first mentioned as the seat of Antipater, who entertained Cicero, the Rom orator and governor of Cilicia. When the kingdom

1. History of Amyntas passed, at his death in 25 BC, to the Romans, it was made into a province and called Galatia (see GALATIA). This province included Laranda as well as Derbe on the extreme S.E., and for a time Laranda was the frontier city looking toward Cappadocia and Cilicia and Syria via the Cilician Gates. But between 37 and 41 AD Laranda was transferred to the “protected” kingdom of Antiochus, and Derbe became the frontier city. It was the last city on distinctively Rom territory, on the road leading from Southern Galatia to the E.; it was here that commerce entering the province had to pay the customs dues. Strabo records this fact when he calls Derbe a limēn, or “customs station.” It owed its importance (and consequently its visit from Paul on his first journey) to this fact, and to its position on a great Rom road leading from Antioch, the capital of Southern Galatia, to Iconium, Laranda, Heracleia-Cybistra, and the Cilician Gates. Rom milestones have been found along the line of this road, one at a point 15 miles N.W. of Derbe. It was one of those Lycaonian cities honored with the title “Claudian” by the emperor Claudius; its coins bear the legend “Claudio-Derbe.” This implied considerable importance and prosperity as well as strong pro-Rom feeling; yet we do not find Derbe standing aloof, like the Rom coloniae Iconium and Lystra, from the Common Council of Lycaonian cities (Koinon Lykaonias).

Derbe remained in the province Galatia till about 135 AD, when it passed to the jurisdiction of the triple province Cilicia-Isauria-Lycaonia. It continued in this division till 295 AD, and was then included in the newly formed province Isauria. This arrangement lasted till about 372 AD, when Lycaonia, including Derbe, was formed into a separate province. The statement of Stephanus of Byzantium that Derbe was "a fortress of Isauria" originated in the arrangement which existed from 295 to 372 AD. Coins of the city represent Heracles, Fortuna and a winged Victory writing on a shield (after the pattern of the Venus of Melos, in the Louvre, Paris). Derbe is mentioned several times in the records of the church councils. A bishop, Daphnus of Derbe, was present at the Council of Constantinople in 381.

The site of Derbe was approximately fixed by the American explorer Sterrett, and more accurately by Sir W. M. Ramsay, who, after care-

2. Situation fully examining all the ruins in the neighborhood, placed it at Gudelisin.

Up to 1911, certain epigraphic evidence fixing the site had not been found, but Ramsay's identification meets all the conditions, and cannot be far wrong. On the E., Derbe was confederate with Laranda, on the N.E. with Barata in the Kara Dag. It bordered on the territory of Iconium on the N.W., and on Isauria on the W. Its territory touched the foothills of Taurus on the S., and the site commands a fine view of the great mountain called Hadji Baba or the Pilgrim Father. The Greeks of the district say that the name is a reminiscence of St. Paul, "over whose travels" the mountain "stood as a silent witness."

The remains are mostly of the late Rom and Byzantine periods, but pottery of an earlier date has been found on the site. An inscription of a village on the territory of Derbe records the erection of a building by two architects from Lystra. A line of boundary stones separating the territory of Derbe from that of Barata, is still standing. It probably belongs to an early delimitation of the territory of the frontier town of Galatia (Ramsay).

In Acts 14 20,21, it is narrated that Paul and Barnabas, after being driven out of Lystra, departed to Derbe, where they "preached

3. Paul at Derbe the gospel . . . and made many disciples." But they did not go farther. Paul's mission included only the centers of Graeco-Rom civilization; it was no part of his plan to pass over the frontier of the province into non-Rom territory. This aspect of his purpose is illustrated by the reference to Derbe on his second journey (Acts 16 1). Paul started from Antioch and "went through Syria and Cilicia, confirming the churches" (15 41). "Then he came to Derbe and Lystra" (16 1 AV). The unwarned reader might forget that in going from Cilicia to Derbe, Paul must have passed through a considerable part of Antiochus' territory, and visited the important cities of Heracleia-Cystrita and Laranda. But his work ends with the Rom Cilicia and begins again with the Rom Galatia; to him, the intervening country is a blank. Concentration of effort, and utilization only of the most fully prepared material were the characteristics of Paul's missionary journeys in Asia Minor. That Paul was successful in Derbe may be gathered (as Ramsay points out) from the fact that he does not mention Derbe among the places where he had suffered persecution (2 Tim 3 11). Gaius of Derbe (among others) accompanied Paul to Jerus, in charge of the donations of the churches to the poor in that city (Acts 20 4).

LITERATURE.—The only complete account of Derbe is that given in Sir W. M. Ramsay's Cities of St. Paul, 385-404. On Paul's mission there, see the same author's St. Paul the Traveller and Rom Citizen, 119, 178. Many inscriptions of the later Rom period are collected in Sterrett, Wolfe Expedition to Asia Minor, Nos. 18-52. The principal ancient authorities, besides Acts, are Cicero Ad Fam. xiii.73; Strabo xxx.569; Ptolemaeus, v.6, 17; Steph. Byz., Hierocl., 675; Notit. Episcop., I, 404, and the Acta Conciliarum.

W. M. CALDER

DERISION, dē-rizh'un: Three vb. are so tr<sup>d</sup>: לִרְצֹק, lūṣ, "scorn" (Ps 119 51); לָאֵגַח, lā'agh, "mock" (2 4; 59 8; Ezk 23 32); and שָׁחַק, sāḥaq, "laugh at" (Job 30 1; Ex 32 25 m, "a whispering"; cf Wisd 5 3). This word is found almost exclusively in the Psalms and Prophets; Jeremiah is fond of it. It is used both as a subst. and a vb., the latter in the phrase "to have in derision."

DESCEND, dē-sen'd' (יָרַד, yāradh; καταβαίνω, katabainō, "go down"); DESCENT, dē-sen't' (κατάβασις, katabasis): Of Jeh (Ex 34 5); of the Spirit (Mt 3 16); of angels (Gen 28 12; Mt 28 2; Jn 1 51); of Christ (1 Thess 4 16; Eph 4 9). "He also descended into the lower parts of the earth" is variously interpreted, the two chief interpretations being the one of the incarnation, and the other of the "descent into hell" (1 Pet 3 19). The former regards the clause "of the earth," an appositive genitive, as when we speak of "the city of Rome," viz., "the lower parts, i.e. the earth." The other regards the genitive as possessive, or, with Meyer, as governed by the comparative, i.e. "parts lower than the earth." For the former view, see full discussion in Eadie; for the latter, Ellicott and esp. Meyer, in commentaries on Eph. H. E. JACOBS

DESCENT, dē-sen't', OF JESUS. See APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS.

DESCRIBE, dē-skrib': This vb., now obsolete, in the sense used in Josh 18 4.6.8.9 and Jgs 8 14, is a tr of כָּתַב, kāthab, usually rendered "to write" or "inscribe." But in the above passages it has the OE meaning of dividing into parts or into lots, as for example: "Walk through the land, and describe it according to their inheritance" (Josh 18 4); that is, describe in writing the location and size of the several parcels of land thus portioned out. In Jgs 8 14 "described" should be tr<sup>d</sup> "wrote down a list of." "Describe" occurs twice in the AV of the NT (Rom 4 6 and 10 5), where λέγω, lēgō, and γράφω, gráphō, are both rendered "describeth." RV corrects both, and substitutes "pronounceth" in the first and "writeth" in the second passage.

Description = "list" (1 Esd 5 39).

W. W. DAVIES

DESCRY, dē-skri': This word like "describe" came into the Eng. through the Fr. descrive (Lat describere); it occurs only in the AV of Jgs 1 23: "And the house of Joseph sent to descry Bethel." תִּיר, tūr, the vb. thus tr<sup>d</sup>, signifies "to explore" or "examine," and RV correctly renders "sent to spy out."

DESERT, dez'ért (מִדְבָּר, midhbār, חֲרָבָה, ḥor-bāh, יְשִׁמּוֹן, y'shīmōn, עֲרָבָה, ārābhāh, צִיָּה, ṣiyāh, תֹּהוּ, tōhū; ἔρημος, ērēmos, ἐρημία, erēmía): Midhbār, the commonest word for "desert," more often rendered "wilderness," is perhaps from r. dābhar, in the sense of "to drive," i.e. a place for driving or pasturing flocks. Y'shīmōn is from yā-shām, "to be empty"; ḥorbāh (cf Arab. kharīb, "to lie waste"; kharibāh, "a ruin"; kharāb, "devastation"), from hārabh, "to be dry"; cf also ārābh, "to be dry," and ārābhāh, "a desert" or "the Arabah" (see CHAMPAIGN). For ereṣ ṣiyāh (Ps 63 1; Isa 41 18), "a dry land," cf ṣiyim, "wild beasts of the desert" (Isa 13 21, etc.). Tōhū, variously rendered "without form" (Gen 1 2 AV), "empty space," AV "empty place" (Job 26 7), "waste," AV "nothing" (Job 6 18), "confusion," RVm "wasteness" (Isa 24 10 ERV), may be compared with Arab. tāh,

"to go astray," at-Tih, "the desert of the wandering." In the NT we find erēmos and erēmia: "The child [John] . . . was in the deserts till the day of his showing unto Israel" (Lk 1 80); "Our fathers did eat manna in the desert" (Jn 6 31 AV).

In the Desert of Edom.

The desert as known to the Israelites was not a waste of sand, as those are apt to imagine who have in mind the pictures of the Sahara. Great expanses of sand, it is true, are found in Arabia, but the nearest one, an-Nufūd, was several days' journey distant from the farthest southeast reached by the Israelites in their wanderings. Most of the desert of Sinai and of Pal is land that needs only water to make it fruitful. E. of the Jordan, the line between "the desert" and "the sown" lies about along the line of the Hijāz railway. To the W. there is barely enough water to support the crops of wheat; to the E. there is too little. Near the line of demarkation, the yield of wheat depends strictly upon the rainfall. A few inches more or less of rain in the year determines whether the grain can reach maturity or not. The latent fertility of the desert lands is demonstrated by the season of scant rains, when they become carpeted with herbage and flowers. It is marvelous, too, how the camels, sheep and goats, even in the dry season, will find something to crop where the traveler sees nothing but absolute barrenness. The long wandering of the Israelites in "the desert" was made possible by the existence of food for their flocks and herds. Cf Ps 65 11.12:

"Thou crownest the year with thy goodness;
And thy paths drop fatness.
They drop upon the pastures of the wilderness,
And the hills are girded with joy"; and also Joel 2 22: "The pastures of the wilderness do spring."

"The desert" or "the wilderness" (ha-midhbār) usually signifies the desert of the wandering, or the northern part of the Sinaitic Peninsula. Cf Ex 3 1 AV: "Moses . . . led the flock [of Jethro] to the backside of the desert"; Ex 5 3 AV: "Let us go . . . three days' journey into the desert"; Ex 19 2 AV: "They . . . were come to the desert of Sinai"; Ex 23 31 AV: "I will set thy bounds from the Red Sea even unto the sea of the Philistines, and from the desert unto the river" (Euphrates). Other uncultivated or pasture regions are known as Wilderness of Beersheba (Gen 21 14), W. of Judah (Jgs 1 16), W. of En-gedi (1 S 24 1), W. of Gibeon (2 S 2 24), W. of Maon (1 S 23 24), W. of Damascus; cf Arab. Bādīyet-ush-Shām (1 K 19 15), etc. Midhbār yām, "the wilderness of the sea" (Isa 21 1), may perhaps be that part of Arabia bordering upon the Pers Gulf.

Aside from the towns and fields, practically all the land was midhbār or "desert," for this term included mountain, plain and valley. The terms, "desert of En-gedi," "desert of Maon," etc, do not indicate circumscribed areas, but are applied in a general way to the lands about these places. To obtain water, the shepherds with their flocks traverse long distances to the wells, springs or streams, usually arranging to reach the water about the middle of the day and rest about it for an hour or so, taking shelter from the sun in the shadows of the rocks, perhaps under some overhanging ledge.

DESIRE, dē-zīr': The vb. "to desire" in the Scriptures usually means "to long for," "to ask for," "to demand," and may be used in a good or bad sense (cf Dt 7 25 AV). RV frequently renders the more literal meaning of the Heb. Cf Job 20 20, "delight"; Prov 21 20, "precious"; Ps 40 6, "delight"; alrēw, ailēō (except Col 1 9), and ēporāw, erōlāō (except Lk 7 36) are rendered "to ask" and zērēw, zēlēō, "to seek" (cf Lk 9 9 et al.). The Heb קָסַף, kāṣaph, lit. "to lose in value," is tr<sup>d</sup> (Zeph 2 1) by "hath no shame" (RVm "longing," AV "not desired"). The literal tr "to lose in value," "to degenerate," would be more in harmony with the context than the translations offered. The Heb הִמְדָּה, hemdāh (2 Ch 21 20, "without being desired"), means according to the Arab. "to praise," "to give thanks." The context brings in contrast the burial of the king Jehoram with that of his fathers. In the latter case there was "burning," i.e. recognition and praise, but when Jehoram died, there was no hemdāh, i.e. there was no praise for his services rendered to the kingdom. For "desire" in Eccl 12 5, see CAPERBERRY. A. L. BRESLICH

DESIRE OF ALL NATIONS: This phrase occurs only in Hag 2 7 (AV, ERV "desirable things," ARVm "things desired"), and is commonly applied to the Messiah.

At the erection of the temple in Ezra's time, the older men who had seen the more magnificent house of Solomon were disappointed and distressed at the comparison. The prophet, therefore, is directed to encourage them by the assurance that Jeh is with them nevertheless, and in a little while will shake the heavens, the earth, the sea, the dry land and the nations, and "the desire of all nations" shall come, and the house shall be filled with glory, so that "the later glory of this house shall be greater than the former."

(1) Many expositors refer the prophecy to the first advent of Christ. The shaking of the heavens, the earth, the sea and the dry land is the figurative setting of the shaking of the nations, while this latter expression refers to those changes of earthly dominion coincident with the overthrow of the Persians by the Greeks, the Greeks by the Romans, and so on down to the beginning of our era. The house then in process of construction was filled with glory by the later presence of the Messiah, which glory was greater than the Shekinah of Solomon's time. Objections are presented to this view as follows: First, there is the element of time. Five cents, more or less, elapsed between the building of Ezra's temple and the first advent of Christ, and the men of Ezra's time needed comfort for the present. Then there is the difficulty of associating the physical phenomena with any shaking of the nations occurring at the first advent. Furthermore, in what sense, it is asked, could Christ, when He came, be said to be the desire of all nations? And finally, what comfort would a Jew find in this magnifying of the Gentiles?

(2) These difficulties, though not insuperable, lead others to apply the prophecy to the second advent of Christ. The Jews are to be restored to Jerus, and another temple is to be built (Ezk 40-48). The shaking of the nations and the physical phenomena find their fulfilment in the "Great Tribulation" so often spoken of in the OT and Rev, and which is followed by the coming of Christ in glory to set up His kingdom (Mal 3 1; Mt 24 29. 30 and other places). Some of the difficulties spoken of in the first instance apply here also, but not all of them, while others are common to both interpretations. One such common difficulty is that Ezra's temple can hardly be identified with that of the time of Herod and Christ, and certainly not with that of Ezekiel; which is met, however, by saying that all the temples, including Solomon's, are treated as but one "house"—the house of the Lord, in the religious sense, at least, if not architecturally. Another such difficulty touches the question of time, which, whether it includes five centuries or twenty, is met by the principle that to the prophets, "ascending in heart to God and the eternity of God, all times and all things of this world are only a mere point." When the precise time of particular events is not revealed, they sometimes describe them as continuous, and sometimes blend two events together, having a near or partial, and also a remote or complete fulfilment. "They saw the future in space rather than in time, or the perspective rather than the actual distance." It is noted that the Lord Jesus so blends together the destruction of Jerus by Titus, AD 70, and the days of the anti-Christ at the end of this age, that it is difficult to separate them, and to say which belongs exclusively to either (Mt 24). That the words may have an ultimate fulfilment in the second advent of Christ receives strength from a comparison of vs 21 and 22 of the same chapter (ch 2) of Hag with He 12 26.27. The writer of that epistle condenses the two passages in Hag 2 6.7 and 21. 22, implying that it was one and the same shaking, of which the former vs denote the beginning, and the latter the end. The shaking, in other words, began introductory to the first advent and will be finished at the second. Concerning the former, cf Mt 3 17; 27 51; 28 2; Acts 2 2; 4 31, and concerning the latter, Mt 24 7; Rev 16 20; 20 11 (Bengel, quoted by Canon Faussett).

(3) Other expositors seek to cut the Gordian knot by altogether denying the application to the Messiah, and translating "the desire of all nations" by "the beauty," or "the desirable things of all nations," i.e. their precious gifts (see Isa 60 5.11; 61 6). This application is defended in the following way: (a) The Heb word means the quality and not the thing desired; (b) the Messiah was not desired by all the nations when He came; (c) the vb. "shall come" is pl., which requires the noun to be understood in the pl., whereas if the Messiah be intended, the noun is singular; (d) "The silver is mine," etc (Hag 2 8) accords with the tr "the desirable things of all nations"; (e) the agreement of the Sept and Syr VSS with such rendering.

All these arguments, however, can be fairly met by counter-arguments, leaving the reader still in doubt. (a) An abstract noun is often put for the concrete; (b) the result shows that while the Jews rejected Christ, the Gentiles received and hence desired Him; (c) where two nouns stand together after the manner of "the desire" and "nations," the vb. agrees in number sometimes with the latter, even though the former be its nominative; (d) the 8th ver of the prophecy can be harmonized about as easily with one view as the other; (e) the AV is sustained by the Vulg and early Jewish rabbis.

DESOLATE, des'ô-lât (very frequently in the OT for שָׁמֵם, shāmēm, and its derivatives; less frequently, הָרֵב, hārēbh, and its derivatives, and other words. In the NT it stands for ἔρημος, érēmos [Mt 23 38; Acts 1 20; Gal 4 27], erēmōō [Rev 17 16], and monōō [1 Tim 5 5]): From Lat de, intens., solus, alone. Several shades of meaning can be distinguished: (1) Its primary sense is "left lonely," "forlorn," e.g. Ps 25 16, "Have mercy upon me; for I am desolate" (Heb yāhīdh, "alone"); 1 Tim 5 5, "she that is a widow indeed, and desolate" (Gr memonōmēnē, "left alone"). (2) In the sense of "laid waste," "deserted of inhabitants," e.g. Jer 4 7, "to make thy land desolate, that thy cities be laid waste, without inhabitant." (3) With the meaning "comfortless," "afflicted," e.g. Ps 143 4, "My heart within me is desolate." (4) In the sense of "barren," "childless," "unfruitful," e.g. Job 15 34; Isa 49 21 (Heb galmūdh).

D. MIALl EDWARDS

DESOLATION, ABOMINATION OF. See ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION.

DESPAIR, dê-spâr': The subst. only in 2 Cor 4 8, "perplexed, but not in (RV "yet unto") despair," lit. "being at a loss, but not utterly at a loss." "Unto despair" here conveys the force of the Gr prefix ex ("utterly," "out and out"). Desperate, in Job 6 26; Isa 17 11. In the latter instance, the Heb adj. is derived from a vb. = "to be sick," and the lit. rendering would be "incurable" (cf Job 34 6, "my wound is incurable"). Desperately in Jer 17 9 AV, where the heart is said to be "desperately [i.e. incurably] wicked" or "sick."

DESPITE, dê-spīt', DESPITEFUL, dê-spīt'fōol: "Despite" is from Lat despectus, "a looking down upon." As a noun (= "contempt") it is now generally used in its shortened form, "spite," while the longer form is used as a prep. (= "in spite of"). In EV it is always a noun. In the OT it translates Heb sh'āt, in Ezk 25 6, and in RV Ezk 25 15; 36 5 ("with despite of soul"). In He 10 29 ("hath done despite unto the Spirit of grace") it stands for Gr enubrizō, "to treat with contempt." The adj. "despiteful" occurs in AV Ezk 25 15; 36 5; Sir 31 31 ("despiteful words," RV "a word of reproach"); Rom 1 30 (RV "insolent" = Gr hubristēs, fr hupér, "above"; cf Eng. "uppish").

DESSAU, des'ô, des'a-ū (Δεσσαού, Dessaou [2 Macc 14 16]): RV LESSAU (which see).

DESTINY, des'ti-ni (MENI): A god of Good Luck, possibly the Pleiades. See ASTROLOGY, 10; MENI.

DESTROYER, dê-stroi'ér: In several passages the word designates a supernatural agent of destruction, or destroying angel, executing Divine judgment. (1) In Ex 12 23, of the "destroyer" who smote the first-born in Egypt, again referred to under the same title in He 11 28 RV (AV "he that destroyed"). (2) In Job 33 22, "the destroyers" (lit. "they that cause to die") = the angels of death that are ready to take away a man's life during severe illness. No exact || to this is found in the OT. The nearest approach is "the angel that destroyed the people" by pestilence (2 S 24 16.17 || 1 Ch 21 15.16); the angel that smote the Assyrians (2 K 19 35 = Isa 37 36 || 2 Ch 32 21); "angels of evil" (Ps 78 49). (3) In the Apoc, "the destroyer" is once referred to as "the minister of punishment" (RV; lit. "him who was punishing"), who brought death into the world (Wisd 18 22-25). (4) In 1 Cor 10 10, "the destroyer" is the angelic agent to whose instrumentality Paul attributes the plague of Nu 16 46-49.

In later Jewish theology (the Tgs and Midr), the "destroyer" or "angel of death" appears under the name Sammael (i.e. the poison of God), who was once an archangel before the throne of God, and who caused the serpent to tempt Eve. According to Weber, he is not to be distinguished from Satan. The chief distinction between the "destroyer" of early thought and the Samael of later Judaism is that the former was regarded as the emissary of Jeh, and subservient to His will, and sometimes was not clearly distinguished from Jeh Himself, whereas the latter was regarded as a perfectly distinct individuality, acting in independence or semi-independence, and from purely malicious and evil motives. The change was largely due to the influence of Pers dualism, which made good and evil to be independent powers.

D. MIALl EDWARDS

DESTRUCTION, dē-struk'shun: In AV this word translates over 30 Heb words in the OT, and 4 words in the NT. Of these the most interesting, as having a technical sense, is 'ābhaddōn (from vb. 'ābhadh, "to be lost," "to perish"). It is found 6 t in the Wisdom Literature, and nowhere else in the OT; cf Rev 9 11. See ABADDON.

DESTRUCTION, CITY OF (Isa 19 18; HELLIOPOLIS OR CITY OF THE SUN). See ASTRONOMY, 1, 2; IR-HA-HERES; ON.

DETERMINE, dē-tūr'mi-nāt (ὁρισμένος, hōris-mēnos, "determined," "fixed"): Only in Acts 2 23, "by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God," Gr hōrismenos, fr horizō, "to set boundaries," "determine," "settle" (cf Eng. word "horizon"—lit. "that which bounds"). It is remarkable that Peter in one and the same sentence speaks of the death of Christ from two quite distinct points of view. (1) From the historical standpoint, it was a crime perpetrated by men who were morally responsible for their deed ("him . . . ye by the hand of lawless men did crucify and slay"). (2) From the standpoint of Divine teleology, it was part of an eternal plan ("by the determinate," etc). No effort is made to demonstrate the logical consistency of the two ideas. They represent two aspects of the one fact. The same Gr word is used in Lk 22 22, where Christ speaks of His betrayal as taking place "as it was [RV "hath been"] determined" (κατά τὸ ἰσχυρισμένον). Cf Lk 24 26.

D. MIALl EDWARDS

DETERMINE, dē-tūr'min:

(1) "To resolve," "decide." This is the primary meaning of the word and it is also the one that is the most common. In the NT the Gr word κρίνω, krinō, is tr<sup>d</sup> "determine," and it has the above meaning (Acts 20 16; 25 25; 1 Cor 2 2). The word occurs frequently in the OT with this meaning (see Ex 21 22; 1 S 20 7.9.33).

(2) "To decree," "ordain," "mark out." The Gr word that is rendered "determine" with this meaning is horizō. See DETERMINE.

The Heb term hāraç is tr<sup>d</sup> "determine" with the above meaning; as "his days are determined" (Job 14 5); "a destruction is determined" (Isa 10 22); "desolations are determined" (Dnl 9 26). The Heb term mishpāt, which means "judgment" or "sentence," is tr<sup>d</sup> "determination" in Zeph 3 8.

DETESTABLE, dē-tes'ta-b'l, THINGS (שִׁקְצוֹת, shikkūç; שִׁקְצָה, shekeç, synonymous with תִּבְחָה, tō'ebhah, "abomination," "abominable thing"): The tr of shikkūçim in Jer 16 18; Ezk 5 11; 7 20; 11 18.21; 37 23; a term always applied to idol-worship or to objects connected with idolatry; often also tr<sup>d</sup> "abomination," as in 1 K 11 5.7 (bis); Jer 4 1; Ezk 20 7.8.30. Shekeç, tr<sup>d</sup> "abomination," is applied in the Scriptures to that which is ceremonially unclean (Lev 7 21), creatures forbidden as food, as water animals without fins or scales (11 10-12), birds of prey and the like (ver 18), winged creeping things (vs 20.23), creeping vermin (vs 41 f). Cf also Isa 66 17. By partaking of the food of the animals in question one makes himself detestable (Lev 11 43; 20 25). Similarly the idolatrous appurtences are to be held in detestation; nothing of the kind should be appropriated for private use (Dt 7 26). See ABOMINATION.

DEUEL, dū'el, dē-u'el (דְּאוֹל, dē'u'el, "knowledge of God"): A Gadite, the father of Eliasaph, the representative of the tribe of Gad in the census-taking (Nu 1 14), in making the offering of the tribe at the dedication of the altar (7 42.47), and as leader of the host of the tribe of the children of Gad in the wilderness (10 20). Called Reuel in Nu 2 14, ד (d) being confused with ר (r).

DEUTERO-CANONICAL, dū-tēr-ō-ka-non'i-kal, BOOKS: A term sometimes used to designate certain books, which by the Council of Trent were included in the OT, but which the Protestant churches designated as apocryphal (see APOCRYPHA), and also certain books of the NT which for a long time were not accepted by the whole church as Scripture. Webster says the term pertains to "a second Canon or ecclesiastical writing of inferior authority," and the history of these books shows that they were all at times regarded by a part of the church as being inferior to the others and some of them are so regarded today. This second Canon includes Tob, Jth, Wisd, Ecclus, 2 Esd, 1 Macc and 2 Macc of the OT, and He, Jas, 2 Pet, 2 Jn, 3 Jn, Jude and Rev of the NT.

The OT books under consideration were not in the Heb Canon and they were originally designated as apocryphal. The LXX contained

1. The OT Books many of the apoc books, and among these were most of those which have designated deuterocanonical.

The LXX was perhaps the Gr Bible of NT times and it continued to be the OT of the early church, and hence these books were widely distributed. It seems, however, that they did not continue to hold their place along with the other books, for Athanasius, bishop of Alex, in his Festal Epistle in 367 gave a list of the books of the Bible which were to be read, and at the close of this list he said: "There are also other books besides these, not canonized, yet set by the Fathers to be read to those who have just come up and who wish to be informed as to the word of godliness: Wisd, Sir, Est, Jth, Tob, the so-called Teaching of the Apos, and the Shepherd of Hermas." Jerome also made a distinction between the apoc books and the others. In his Preface, after enumerating the books contained in the Heb Canon, he adds: "This prologue I write as a preface to the books to be translated by us from the Heb into Lat, that we may know that all the books which are not of this number are apoc; therefore Wisd, which is commonly ascribed to Solomon as its author, and the book of Jesus the son of Sir, Jth, Tob and the Shep are not in the Canon." Rufinus made the same distinction as did Jerome. He declared that "these books are not canonical, but have been called by our forefathers ecclesiastical." Augustine included these books in his list which he published in 397. He begins the list thus: "The entire canon of Scripture is comprised in these books." Then follows a list of the books which includes Tob, Jth, 1 Macc, 2 Macc, 2 Esd, Wisd and Ecclus, and it closes with these words: "In these 44 books is comprised all the authority of the OT." Inasmuch as these books were regarded by the church at large as ecclesiastical and helpful, and Augustine had given them canonical sanction, they rapidly gained in favor and most of them are found in the great MSS. See CANON OF THE OT.

It is not probable that there was any general council of the church in those early centuries that set apart the various books of the NT and canonized them as Scripture for the whole church. There was no single historical event which brought together the NT books which were everywhere to be regarded as Scripture. These books

2. The NT did not make the same progress in the various provinces and churches. A careful study of conditions reveals the fact that there was no uniform NT canon in the church during at least the first 3 cents. The Ethiopic church, for example, had 35 books in its NT, while the Syrian church had only 22 books.

From an early date the churches were practically agreed on those books which are sometimes designated as the protocanonical, and which Eusebius designated as the homologoumena. They differed, however, in regard to the 7 disputed books which form a part of the so-called deutero-canon, and which Eusebius designated as the antilegomena. They also differed in regard to other ecclesiastical writings, for there was no fixed line between canonical and non-canonical books. While there was perhaps no council of the church that had passed on the books and declared them canonical, it is undoubtedly true that before the close of the 2d cent. all the books that are in our NT, with the exception of those under consideration, had become recognized as Scripture in all orthodox churches.

The history of these seven books reveals the fact that although some of them were early used by the Fathers, they afterward fell into disfavor. That is esp. true of He and Rev. Generally speaking, it can be said that at the close of the 2d cent. the 7 books under consideration had failed to receive any such general recognition as had the rest; however, all, with perhaps the exception of 2 Pet, had been used by some of the Fathers. He was freely attested by Clement of Rome and Justin Martyr; Jas by Hermas and probably by Clem of Rome; 2 Jn, 3 Jn and Jude by the Muratorian Fragment; Rev by Hermas and Justin Martyr who names John as its author. See CANON OF THE NT.

Jerome, who prepared the Vulg in the closing years of the 4th cent., accepted all 7 of the doubtful books, yet he held that 2 Jn and 3 Jn were written by the Presbyter, and he intimated that 2 Pet and Jude were still rejected by some, and he said the Latins did not receive He among the canonical Scriptures, neither did the Gr churches receive Rev. Augustine, who was one of the great leaders during the last part of the 4th cent. and the first part of the 5th, accepted without question the 7 disputed books. These books had gradually gained in favor and the position of Jerome and Augustine practically settled their canonicity for the orthodox churches. The Council of Carthage, held in 397, adopted the catalogue of Augustine. This catalogue contained all the disputed books both of the NT and the OT.

Since the Reformation.—The Canon of Augustine became the Canon of the majority of the churches and the OT books which he accepted were added to the Vulg, but there were some who still held to the Canon of Jerome. The awakening of the Reformation inevitably led to a reinvestigation of the Canon, since the Bible was made the source of authority, and some of the disputed books of the NT were again questioned by the Reformers. The position given the Bible by the Reformers led the Rom church to reaffirm its sanction and definitely to fix the books that should be accepted. Accordingly the Council of Trent, which convened in 1546, made the Canon of Augustine, which included the 7 apoc books of the OT, and the 7 disputed books of the NT, the Canon of the church, and it pronounced a curse upon those who did not receive these books. The Protestants at first followed the example of Rome and adopted these books which had long had the sanction of usage as their Bible. Gradually, however, the questioned books of the OT were separated from the others. That was true in Coverdale's tr, and in Matthew's Bible they were not only separated from the others but they were prefaced with the words, "the volume of the book called Hagiographa." In Cranmer's Bible, Hagiographa was changed into Apoc, and this passed through the succeeding ed into the AV. A. W. FORTUNE

LITERATURE

In Heb אֵלֶּה הַדְּבָרִים, 'elleh hä-d'bhārîm, "these are the words"; in Gr, Δευτερονόμιον, Deuteronómion, "second law"; whence the Lat deuteronomii, and the Eng. Deuteronomy.

1. Name nomii, and the Eng. Deuteronomy. The Gr title is due to a mistranslation by the Sept of the clause in Dt 17 18 rendered, "and he shall write for himself this repetition of the law." The Heb really means "and he shall write out for himself a copy of this law." However, the error on which the Eng. title rests is not serious, as Dt is in a very true sense a repetition of the law.

Dt is the last of the five books of the Pent, or "five-fifths of the Law." It possesses an individuality and impressiveness of its own. In Ex-Nu Jeh is represented as speaking unto Moses, whereas in Dt, Moses is represented as speaking at Jeh's command to Israel (1 1-4; 5 1; 29 1). It is a hortatory recapitulation of various addresses delivered at various times and places in the desert wanderings—a sort of homily on the constitution, the essence or gist of Moses' instructions to Israel during the forty years of their desert experience. It is "a Book of Reviews"; a tr of Israel's redemptive history into living principles; not so much a history as a commentary. There is much of retrospect in it, but its main outlook is forward. The rabbins speak of it as "the Book of Reproofs." It is the text of all prophecy; a manual of evangelical oratory; possessing "all the warmth of a St. Bernard, the flaming zeal of a Savonarola, and the tender, gracious sympathy of a St. Francis of Assisi." The author's interest is entirely moral. His one supreme purpose is to arouse Israel's loyalty to Jeh and to His revealed law. Taken as a whole the book is an exposition of the great commandment, "Thou shalt love Jeh thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might." It was from Dt Jesus summarized the whole of the Old Covenant in a single sentence (Mt 22 37; cf Dt 6 5), and from it He drew His weapons with which to vanquish the tempter (Mt 4 4.7.10; cf Dt 8 3; 6 16.13).

Dt is composed of three discourses, followed by three short appendices: (1) 1 1-4 43, historical; a review of God's dealings with Israel, specifying in great detail where and when delivered (1 1-5), recounting in broad oratorical outlines the chief events in the nation's experience from Horeb to Moab (1 6-3 29), on which the author bases an earnest appeal to the people to be faithful and obedient, and in particular to keep clear of all possible idolatry (4 1-40). Appended to this first discourse is a brief note (vs 41-43) concerning Moses' appointment of three cities of refuge on the E. side of the Jordan. (2) 4 44-26 19, hortatory and legal; introduced by a superscription (4 44-49), and consisting of a résumé of Israel's moral and civil statutes, testimonies and judgments. Analyzed in greater detail, this second discourse is composed of two main sections: (a) chs 5-11, an extended exposition of the Ten Commandments on which the theocracy was based;

(b) chs 12–26, a code of special statutes concerning worship, purity, tithes, the three annual feasts, the administration of justice, kings, priests, prophets, war, and the private and social life of the people. The spirit of this discourse is most ethical and religious. The tone is that of a father no less than that of a legislator. A spirit of humanity pervades the entire discourse. Holiness is its ideal. (3) 27 1–31 30, predictive and minatory; the subject of this third discourse being “the blessings of obedience and the curses of disobedience.” This section begins with directions to inscribe these laws on plastered stones to be set up on Mt. Ebal (27 1–10), to be ratified by an antiphonal ritual of blessings and cursings from the two adjacent mountains, Gerizim and Ebal (vs 11–26). These are followed by solemn warnings against disobedience (28 1–29 1), and fresh exhortations to accept the terms of the new covenant made in Moab, and to choose between life and death (29 2–30 20). Moses’ farewell charge to Israel and his formal commission of Joshua close the discourse (ch 31). The section is filled with predictions, which were woefully verified in Israel’s later history. The three appendices, spoken of above, close the book: (a) Moses’ Song (ch 32), which the great Lawgiver taught the people (the Law was given to the priests, 31 24–27); (b) Moses’ Blessing (ch 33), which forecast the future for the various tribes (Simeon only being omitted); (c) a brief account of Moses’ death and burial (ch 34) with a noble panegyric on him as the greatest prophet Israel ever had. Thus closes this majestic and marvelously interesting and practical book. Its keyword is “possess”; its central thought is “Jeh has chosen Israel, let Israel choose Jeh.”

The great central thought of Dt is the unique relation which Jeh as a unique God sustains to Israel as a unique people. “Hear O Israel; Jeh our God is one Jeh.” The monotheism of Dt is very explicit.

Following from this, as a necessary corollary almost, is the other great teaching of the book, the unity of the sanctuary. The motto of the book might be said to be, “One God, one sanctuary.”

(1) Jehovah, a unique god.—Jeh is the only God, “There is none else besides him” (4 35.39; 6 4; 32 39), “He is God of gods, and Lord of lords” (10 17), “the living God” (5 26), “the faithful God, who keepeth covenant and lovingkindness with them that love him and keep his commandments” (7 9), who abominates graven images and every species of idolatry (7 25.26; 12 31; 13 14; 18 12; 20 18; 27 15), to whom belong the heavens and the earth (10 14), who rules over all the nations (7 19), whose relation to Israel is near and personal (28 58), even that of a Father (32 6), whose being is spiritual (4 12.15), and whose name is “Rock” (32 4.15.18.30.31). Being such a God, He is jealous of all rivals (7 4; 29 24–26; 31 16.17), and hence all temptations to idolatry must be utterly removed from the land, the Canaanites must be completely exterminated and all their altars, pillars, Asherim and images destroyed (7 1–5.16; 20 16–18; 12 2.3).

(2) Israel, a unique people.—The old Israel had become unique through the covenant which Jeh made with them at Horeb, creating out of them “a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation” (Ex 19 6). The new Israel who had been born in the desert were to inherit the blessings vouchsafed to their fathers, through the covenant just now being made in Moab (Dt 26 16–19; 27 9; 29 1; 5 2.3). By means of it they became the heirs of all the promises given unto their fathers the patriarchs (4 31; 7 12; 8 18; 29 13); they too became holy and peculiar, and especially beloved of Jeh (7 6; 14 2.21; 26 18.19; 28 9; 4 37), disciplined, indeed, but for their own good (8 2.3.5.16), to be established as a people, as Jeh’s peculiar lot and inheritance (32 6.9; 4 7).

(3) The relation between Jehovah and Israel a unique relation.—Other nations feared their deities; Israel was expected not only to fear Jeh but to love Him and cleave to Him (4 10; 5 29; 6 5; 10 12.20; 11 1.13.22; 13 3.4; 17 19; 19 9; 28 58; 30 6.16.20; 31 12.13). The highest privileges are theirs because they are partakers of the covenant blessings; all others are strangers and foreigners, except they be admitted into Israel by special permission (23 1–8).

The essential unity of the great kernel of Dt (chs 5–26) is recognized and freely allowed by nearly everyone (e.g. Kautzsch, Kuenen, Dillmann, Driver). Some would even defend the unity of the whole of chs 1–26 (Knobel, Graf, Kusters, Colenso, Kleinert). No other book of the OT, unless it be the prophecies of Ezekiel, bears such unmistakable signs of unity in aim, language and thought. “The literary style of Dt,” says Driver, “is very marked and individual; in his command of a chaste, yet warm and persuasive eloquence, the author of Dt stands unique among the writers of the OT” (Dt, lxxvii, lxxxviii). Many striking expressions characterize the style of this wonderful book of oratory: e.g. “cause to inherit”; “Hear O Israel”; the oft-repeated root, meaning in the Kal vb.-species “learn,” and in the Piel vb.-species “teach”; “be willing”; “so shalt thou exterminate the evil from thy midst”; “as at this day”; “that it may be well with thee”; “the land whither thou goest in to possess it”; “with all thy heart and with all thy soul”; and many others, all of which occur frequently in Dt and rarely elsewhere in the OT, thus binding, so far as style can, the different sections of the book into one solid unit. Barring various titles and editorial additions (1 1–5; 4 44–49; 29 1; 33 1.7.9.22; 34 1) and a few archaeological notes such as 2 10–12.20–23; 3 9.11.14; 10 6–9, and of course the last chapter, which gives an account of Moses’ death, there is every reason necessary for supposing that the book is a unit. Few writings in the entire field of literature have so clear a unity of purpose or so uniform a style of address.

There is one passage bearing upon the authorship of Dt wherein it is stated most explicitly that Moses wrote “this law.” It reads, “And

6. Author- Moses wrote this law, and delivered ship it unto the priests the sons of Levi.

... And it came to pass, when Moses had made an end of writing the words of this law in a book, until they were finished [i.e. to the end], that Moses commanded the Levites, that bare the ark of the covenant of Jeh, saying, ‘Take this book of the law, and put it by the side of the ark of the covenant of Jeh your God, that it may be there for a witness against thee’ (Dt 31 9.24–27). This passage is of more than traditional value, and should not be ignored as is so often done (e.g. by Ryle, art. “Dt,” HDB). It is not enough to say that Moses was the great fountain-head of Heb law, that he gave oral but not written statutes, or, that Moses was only the traditional source of these statutes. For it is distinctly and emphatically stated that “Moses wrote this law.” And it is further declared (31 22) that “Moses wrote this song,” contained in ch 32. Now, these statements are either true, or they are false. There is no escape. The authorship of no other book in the OT is so explicitly emphasized. The present writer believes that Moses actually wrote the great body of Dt, and for the following general reasons:

(1) Di as a whole is eminently appropriate to what we know of Moses’ times.—It closes most fittingly the formative period of Israel's history. The historical situation from first to last is that of Moses. The references to foreign neighbors—Egypt, Canaan, Amalek, Ammon, Moab, Edom—are in every case to those who flourished in Moses' own times. As a law book its teaching is based upon the Ten Commandments. If Moses gave the Ten Commandments, then surely he may have written the Book of Dt also. Besides, the Code of Hammurabi, which antedates Moses by at least 700 years, makes it possible certainly that Moses also left laws in codified or written form.

(2) Dt is represented as emanating from Moses.—The language is language put into Moses' mouth. Nearly forty times his name occurs, and in the majority of instances as the authoritative author of the subject-matter. The first person is used predominately throughout: "I commanded Joshua at that time" (3 21); and "I charged your judges at that time" (1 16); "And I commanded you at that time" (ver 18); "I have led you forty years in the wilderness" (29 5). "The language surely purports to come from Moses; and if it was not actually used by him, it is a most remarkable case of impersonation, if not of literary forgery, for the writer represents himself as reproducing, not what Moses might have said, but the exact words of Moses" (Zerbe, The Antiquity of Heb Writing and Lit., 1911, 261).

(3) Dt is a military law book, a code of conquest, a book of exhortation.—It was intended primarily neither for Israel in the desert nor for Israel settled in Canaan, but for Israel on the borderland, eager for conquest. It is expressly stated that Moses taught Israel these statutes and judgments in order that they should obey them in the land which they were about to enter (4 5, 14; 5 31). They must expel the aborigines (7 1; 9 1-3; 20 17; 31 3), but in their warfare they must observe certain laws in keeping with the theocracy (20 1-20; 23 9-14; 21 10-14; 31 6, 7), and, when they have finally dispossessed their enemies, they must settle down to agricultural life and live no longer as nomads but as citizens of a civilized land (19 14; 22 8-10; 24 19-21). All these laws are regulations which should become binding in the future only (cf Kittel, History of the Hebrews, I, 32). Coupled with them are prophetic exhortations which seem to be genuine, and to have had their birth in Moses' soul. Indeed the great outstanding feature of Dt is its parenetic or hortatory character. Its exhortations have not only a military ring as though written on the eve of battle, but again and again warn Israel against allowing themselves to be conquered in religion through the seductions of idolatry. The book in short is the message of one who is interested in Israel's political and religious future. There is a paternal vein running throughout it which marks it with a genuine Mosaic, not a merely fictitious or artificial, stamp. It is these general features, so characteristic of the entire book, which compel one to believe in its Mosaic authorship.

Certain literary features exist in Dt which lead the present writer to think that the bulk of the book was spoken twice; once, to the first generation between Horeb and Kadesh-barnea in the 2d year of the Exodus wanderings, and a second time to the new generation, in the plains of Moab in the 40th year. Several considerations point in this direction:

(1) The names of the widely separated geographical places mentioned in the title (1 1, 2).—"These are the words which Moses spake unto all Israel beyond the Jordan in the wilderness, in the Arabah over against Suph, between Paran, and Tophel, and Laban, and Hazeroth, and Di-zahab"; to which is added, "It is eleven days' journey from Horeb by the way of Mount Seir unto Kadesh-barnea." If these statements have any relevancy whatever to the contents of the book which they introduce, they point to a wide area, from Horeb to Moab, as the historico-geographical background of the book. In other words, Dt, in part at least, seems to have been spoken first on the way between Horeb and Kadesh-barnea, and later again when Israel were encamped on the plains of Moab. And, indeed, what would be more natural than for Moses when marching northward from Horeb expecting to enter Canaan from the south, to exhort the Israel of that day in terms of chs 5-26? Being baffled, however, by the adverse report of the spies and the faithlessness of the people, and being forced to wait and wander for 38 years, what would be more natural than for Moses in Moab, when about to resign his position as leader, to repeat the exhortations of chs 5-26, adapting them to the needs of the new desert-trained generation and prefacing the whole by a historical introduction such as that found in chs 1-4?

(2) The double allusion to the cities of refuge (4 41-43; 19 1-13).—On the supposition that chs 5-26 were spoken first between Horeb and Kadesh-barnea, in the 2d year of the Exodus, it could not be expected that in this section the names of the three cities chosen E. of the Jordan should be given, and in fact they are not (19 1-13); the territory of Sihon and Og had not yet been conquered and the cities of refuge, accordingly, had not yet been designated (cf Nu 35 2 14). But in 4 41-43, on the contrary, which forms a part of the historical introduction, which ex hypothesi was delivered just at the end of the 39 years' wanderings, after Sihon and Og had been subdued and their territory divided, the three cities of refuge E. of the Jordan are actually named, just as might be expected.

(3) The section 4 44-49, which, in its original form, very probably introduced chs 5-26 before these chapters were adapted to the new situation in Moab.

(4) The phrase "began Moses to declare this law" (1 5), suggesting that the great lawgiver found it necessary to expound what he had delivered at some previous time. The Heb word tr<sup>d</sup> "to declare" is found elsewhere in the OT only in Dt 27 8 and in Hab 2 2, and signifies "to make plain."

(5) The author's evident attempt to identify the new generation in Moab with the patriarchs.—"Jeh made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us, even us, who are all of us here alive this day," i.e. with us who have survived the desert discipline (Dt 5 3). In view of these facts, we conclude that the book in its present form (barring the exceptions above mentioned) is the product of the whole 39 years of desert experience from Horeb on, adapted, however, to meet the exigencies of the Israelites as they stood between the victories already won on the E. of the Jordan and those anticipated on the W. The impression given throughout is that the aged lawgiver's work is done, and that a new era in the people's history is about to begin.

The influence of Dt began to be felt from the very beginning of Israel's career in Canaan. Though the references to Dt in Josh, Jgs, S and K are comparatively few, yet they are sufficient to show that not only the principles of Dt were known and observed but that they were known in written form as codified statutes. For example, when Jericho was taken, the city and its spoil were "devoted" (Josh 6 17, 18) in keeping with Dt 13 15 ff (cf Josh 10 40; 11 12, 15 with Dt 7 2; 20 16, 17). Achan trespassed and he and his household were stoned, and afterward burned with fire (Josh 7 25; cf Dt 13 10; 17 5). The fact that his sons and his daughters were put to death with him seems at first sight to contradict Dt 24 16, but there is no proof that they suffered for their father's sin (see ACHAN; ACHOR); besides the Hebrews recognized the unity of the household, even that of Rahab the harlot (Josh 6 17). Again when Ai was taken, "only the cattle and the spoil" did Israel take for a prey unto themselves (Josh 8 27), in keeping with Dt 20 14; also, the body of the king of Ai was taken down before night-fall from the tree on which he had been hanged (Josh 8 29), which was in keeping with Dt 21 23 (cf Josh 10 26.27). As in warfare, so in worship. For instance, Joshua built an altar on Mt. Ebal (Josh 8 30.31), "as Moses the servant of Jeh commanded" (Dt 27 4-6), and he wrote on them a copy of the law (Josh 8 32), as Moses had also enjoined (Dt 27 3.8). Moreover, the elders and officers and judges stood on either side of the ark of the covenant between Ebal and Gerizim (Josh 8 33), as directed in Dt 11 29; 27 12.13, and Joshua read to all the congregation of Israel all the words of the law, the blessings and the cursings (Josh 8 34.35), in strict accord with Dt 31 11.12.

But the passage of paramount importance is the story of the two and a half tribes who, on their return to their home on the E. side of the Jordan, erected a memorial at the Jordan, and, when accused by their fellow-tribesmen of plurality of sanctuary, emphatically disavowed it (Josh 22 29; cf Dt 12 5). Obviously, therefore, Dt was known in the days of Joshua. A very few instances in the history of the Judges point in the same direction: e.g. the utter destruction of Zephath (Jgs 1 17; cf Dt 7 2; 20 16f); Gideon's elimination of the fearful and faint-hearted from his army (Jgs 7 1-7; cf Dt 20 1-9); the author's studied concern to justify Gideon and Manoah for sacrificing at altars other than at Shiloh on the ground that they acted in obedience to Jeh's direct commands (Jgs 6 25-27; 13 16); esp. the case of Micah, who congratulated himself that Jeh would do him good seeing he had a Levite for a priest, is clear evidence that Dt was known in the days of the Judges (Jgs 17 13; cf Dt 10 8; 13 1-8; 33 8-11). In 1 S 1 1-9.21.24 the pious Elkanah is pictured as going yearly to worship Jeh at Shiloh, the central sanctuary at that time. After the destruction of Shiloh, when the ark of the covenant had been captured by the Philis, Samuel indeed sacrificed at Mizpah, Ramah and Bethlehem (1 S 7 7-9.17; 16 5), but in doing so he only took advantage of the elasticity of the Deuteronomic law: "When . . . he giveth you rest from all your enemies round about, so that ye dwell in safety; then it shall come to pass that to the place which Jeh your God shall choose, to cause his name to dwell there, thither shall ye bring all that I command you: your burnt-offerings, and your sacrifices" (Dt 12 10.11). It was not until Solomon's time that Israel's enemies were all subdued, and even then Solomon did not observe strictly the teachings of Dt; "His wives turned away his heart," so that he did not faithfully keep Jeh's "covenant" and "statutes" (1 K 11 3.11). Political disruption followed, and religion necessarily suffered. Yet Jehoiada the priest gave the youthful Joash "the crown" and "the testimony" (2 K 11 12; cf Dt 17 18). King Amaziah did not slay the children of the murderers who slew his father, in conscious obedience apparently to the law of Dt (2 K 14 6; cf Dt 24 16). Later on, Hezekiah, the cultured king of Judah, reformed the cultus of his day by removing the high places, breaking down the pillars, cutting down the Asherahs, and even breaking in pieces the brazen serpent which Moses had made (2 K 18 4.22). Hezekiah's reforms were unquestionably carried through under the influence of Dt.

It is equally certain that the prophets of the 8th cent. were not ignorant of this book. For example, Hosea complains of Israel's sacrificing upon the tops of the mountains and burning incense upon the hills, and warns Judah not to follow Israel's example in coming up to worship at Gilgal and Beth-aven (Hos 4 13.15). He also alludes to striving with priests (Hos 4 4; cf Dt 17 12), removing landmarks (Hos 5 10; cf Dt 19 14), returning to Egypt (Hos 8 13; 9 3; cf Dt 28 68), and of Jeh's tender dealing with Ephraim (Hos 11 3; cf Dt 1 31; 32 10). The courage of Amos, the shepherd-prophet of Tekoa, can best be explained, also, on the basis of a written law such as that of Dt with which he and his hearers were already more or less familiar (Am 3 2; cf Dt 7 6; 4 7.8). He condemns Israel's inhumanity and adultery in the name of religion, and complains of their retaining overnight pledges wrested from the poor, which was distinctly forbidden in Dt (Am 2 6-8; cf Dt 24 12-15; 23 17). Likewise, in the prophecies of Isaiah there are conscious reflections of Dt's thought and teaching. Zion is constantly pictured as the center of the nation's religion and as Jeh's secure dwelling-place (Isa 2 2-4; 8 18; 28 16; 29 1.2; cf Mic 4 1-4). In short, no one of the four great prophets of the 8th cent. BC—Isaiah, Micah, Amos, Hosea—ever recognized "high places" as legitimate centers of worship.

Over against the Bib. view, certain modern critics since De Wette (1805) advocate a late origin of Dt, claiming that it was first published in 621 BC, when Hilkiah found "the book of the law" in the temple in the 18th year of King Josiah (2 K 22 8 ff).

The kernel of Dt and "the book of the law" discovered by Hilkiah are said to be identical. Thus, Dr. G. A. Smith claims that "a code like the Book of Dt was not brought forth at a stroke, but was the expression of the gradual results of the age-long working of the Spirit of the Living God in the hearts of His people" (Jerusalem, II, 115). According to Dr. Driver, "Dt may be described as the prophetic reformulation and adaptation to new needs, of an older legislation. It is probable that there was a tradition, if not a written record, of a final legislative address delivered by Moses in the steppes of Moab: the plan followed by the author would rest upon a more obvious motive, if he thus worked upon a traditional basis. But be that as it may, the bulk of the laws contained in Dt is undoubtedly far more ancient than the author himself. . . . What is essentially new in Dt is not the matter, but the form. . . . The new element in Dt is thus not the laws, but their parenetic setting" (Dt, lxi, lvi). This refined presentation of the matter would not be so very objectionable, were Drs. Smith and Driver's theory not linked up with certain other claims and allegations to the effect that Moses in the 15th cent. BC could not possibly have promulgated such a lofty monotheism, that in theological teaching "the author of Dt is the spiritual heir of Hosea," that there are discrepancies between it and other parts of the Pent, that in the early history of Israel down to the 8th cent. plurality of sanctuaries was legally permissible, that there are no traces of the influence of the principal teachings of a written Dt discoverable in Heb lit. until the time of Jeremiah, and that the book as we possess it was originally composed as a program of reform, not by Moses but in the name of Moses as a forgery or pseudopigraph. For example, F. H. Woods says, "Although not a necessary result of accepting the later date, the majority of critics believe this book of the law to have been the result of a pious fraud promulgated by Hilkiah and Shaphan with the intention of deceiving Josiah into the belief that the reforms which they desired were the express command of God revealed to Moses" (HDB, II, 368). Some are unwilling to go so far. But in any case, it is claimed that the law book discovered and published by Hilkiah, which brought about the reformation by Josiah in 621 BC, was no other than some portion of the Book of Dt, and of Dt alone. But there are several considerations which are opposed to this theory: (1) Dt emphasizes centralization of worship at one sanctuary (12 5); Josiah's reformation was directed rather against idolatry in general (2 K 23 4ff). (2) In Dt 18 6-8, a Levite coming from the country to Jerus was allowed to minister and share in the priestly perquisites; but in 2 K 23 9, "the priests of the high places came not up to the altar of Jeh in Jerus, but they did eat unleavened bread among their brethren." And according to the critical theory, "Levites" and "priests" are interchangeable terms. (3) The following passages in Ex might almost equally with Dt account for Josiah's reformation: 20 3; 22 18,20; 23 13,24,32,33; 34 13,14-17. (4) The law book discovered by Hilkiah was recognized at once as an ancient code which the fathers had disobeyed (2 K 22 13). Were they all deceived? Even Jeremiah (cf Jer 11 3,4)? "There were many persons in Judah who had powerful motives for exposing this forgery if it was one" (Raven, OT Introduction, 112). (5) One wonders why so many archaic and, in Josiah's time, apparently obsolete laws should have been incorporated in a code whose express motive was to reform an otherwise hopeless age: e.g. the command to exterminate the Canaanites, who had long since ceased to exist (Dt 7 18,22), and to blot out Amalek (Dt 25 17-19), the last remnants of whom were completely destroyed in Hezekiah's time (1 Ch 4 41-43). Esp. is this true of the score and more of laws peculiar to Dt, concerning building battlements on the roofs of houses (Dt 22 8), robbing birds' nests (vs 6,7), the sexes exchanging garments (ver 5), going out to war (20 1ff), etc. (6) Esp. remarkable is it that if Dt were written, as alleged, shortly before the reign of Josiah, there should be no anachronisms in it betraying a post-Mosaic origin. There are no allusions to the schism between Judah and Israel, no hint of Assyrian oppression through the exaction of tribute, nor any threats of Israel's exile either to Assyria or Babylonia, but rather to Egypt (Dt 28 68). "Jerusalem" is never mentioned. From a literary point of view, it is psychologically and historically well-nigh impossible for a writer to conceal all traces of his age and circumstances. On the other hand, no Egyptologist has ever discovered any anachronisms in Dt touching Egypt matters. From first to last the author depicts the actual situation of the times of Moses. It is consequently hard to believe, as is alleged, that a later writer is studying to give "an imaginative revivification of the past."

(7) The chief argument in favor of Dt's late origin is its alleged teaching concerning the unity of the sanctuary. Wellhausen lays special emphasis upon this point. Prior to Josiah's reformation, it is claimed, plurality of sanctuaries was allowed. But in opposition to this, it is possible to point victoriously to Hezekiah's reformation (2 K 18 4, 22), as a movement in the direction of unity; and especially to Ex 20 24, which is so frequently misinterpreted as allowing a multiplicity of sanctuaries. This classical passage when correctly interpreted allows only that altars shall be erected in every place where Jeh records His name, "which presumably during the wanderings and the time of the judges would mean wherever the Tabernacle was"

(Mackay, Intro to OT, 110). This interpretation of this passage is confirmed and made practically certain, indeed, by the command in Ex 23 14-19 that Israel shall repair three times each year to the house of Jeh and there present their offering. On the other hand, Dt's emphasis upon unity of sanctuary is often exaggerated. The Book of Dt requires unity only after Israel's enemies are all overcome (Dt 12 10,11). "When" Jeh giveth them rest, "then" they shall repair for worship to the place which "God shall choose." As Davidson remarks: "It is not a law that is to come into effect on their entry into Canaan; it is to be observed from the time that Jeh shall have given them rest from all their enemies round about; that is, from the times of David, or more particularly, Solomon; for only when the temple was built did that place become known which Jeh had chosen to place His name there" (OT Theology, 361). Besides, it should not be forgotten that in Dt itself the command is given to build an altar in Mt. Ebal (27 5-7). As a matter of fact, the unity of sanctuary follows as a necessary consequence of monotheism; and if Moses taught monotheism, he probably also enjoined unity of worship. If, on the other hand, monotheism was first evolved by the prophets of the 8th cent., then, of course, unity of sanctuary was of 8th-cent. origin also.

(8) Another argument advanced in favor of the later origin of Dt is the contradiction between the laws of Dt and those of Lev-Nu concerning the priests and Levites. In Nu 16 10,35,40, a sharp distinction is drawn, it is alleged, between the priests and common Levites, whereas in Dt 18 1-8, all priests are Levites and all Levites are priests. But as a matter of fact, the passage in Dt does not invest a Levite with priestly but with Levitical functions (cf 18 7). "The point insisted upon is that all Levites shall receive full recognition at the sanctuary and be accorded their prerogatives. It goes without saying that if the Levite be a priest he shall serve and fare like his brethren the priests; if he be not a priest, he shall enjoy the privileges that belong to his brethren who are Levites, but not priests" (J. D. Davis, art. "Dt," in DB, 117). The Book of Dt teaches not that all the tribe, but only the tribe of Levi may exercise priestly functions, thus restricting the exercise of priestly prerogatives to one and only one tribe. This was in perfect harmony with Lev-Nu and also in keeping with the style of popular discourse.

(9) Recently Professor Ed. Naville, the Egyptologist, has propounded a theory of the origin of "the Book of the Law" discovered by Hilkiah, which is not without some value. On the analogy of the Egypt custom of burying texts of portions of "the Book of the Dead" at the foot of statues of gods and within foundations of temple walls, as at Hermopolis, he concludes that Solomon, when he constructed the Temple, probably deposited this "Book of the Law" in the foundations, and that when Josiah's workmen were about their tasks of repairing the edifice, the long-forgotten document came to light and was given to Hilkiah the priest. Hilkiah, however, upon examination of the document found it difficult to read, and so, calling for Shaphan the scribe, who was more expert in deciphering antique letters than himself, he gave the sacred roll to him, and he in turn read it to both Hilkiah and the king. The MS may indeed have been written in cuneiform. Thus, according to Naville, "the Book of the Law," which he identifies with Dt, must be pushed back as far as the age of Solomon at the very latest. Geden shares a similar view as to its date: "some time during the prosperous period of David and the United Monarchy" (Intro to the Heb Bible, 1909, 330).

But why not ascribe the book to the traditional author? Surely there can be no philosophical objection to doing so, in view of the now-known Code of Hammurabi, which antedates Moses by so many hundreds of years! No other age accounts so well for its origin as that of the great lawgiver who claims to have written the bulk of it. And the history of the disintegration of the book only shows to what extremes a false method may lead; for example, Steuernagel separates the "Thou" and "Ye" sections from each other and assigns them to different authors of late date: Kennett, on the other hand, assigns the earliest strata to the period of the Exile (Jour. of Theol. Studies, 1904). On the whole, no theory is so satisfactory as that which, in keeping with Dt 31 22,24, ascribes to Moses the great bulk of the book. See also CRITICISM; PENTATEUCH.

DEVICE, dē-vīs': "A scheme," "invention," "plot." In the OT it stands for six Heb words, of which the most common is maḥāshebheleth (from ḥāshabh, "to think," "contrive"). In the NT it occurs only twice, once for Gr enthūmēsis (Acts 17 29), and once for nōēma (2 Cor 2 11). Sometimes the word means simply that which is planned or invented, without any evil implication, as in 2 Ch 2 14; Acts 17 29 (of artistic work or invention), and Eccl 9 10 (in the general sense of reasoning or contriving). But more frequently it is used in an evil sense, of a wicked purpose or plot, "Let us devise devices against Jeremiah" (Jer 18 18); "For we are not ignorant of his [i.e. Satan's] devices" (2 Cor 2 11), etc. D. DEVIL, dev'1. See DEMON; SATAN.

DEVOTED, dē-vōt'ed, THINGS (דָּוָה, hērem). See CURSE; DEDICATE.

DEVOTION, dē-vō'shun, DEVOTIONS (σεβάσματα, sebāsмата): For AV "your devotions" (Acts 17 23), RV has "the objects of your worship," which is probably the intended meaning of AV. RV reads "devotion" for AV "prayer" in Job 15 4 (RVm "meditation," Heb stāḥ).

DEVOUT, dē-vout' (εὐλαβής, eulabēs, εὐσεβής, eusebēs, σέβομαι, sebomai, "pious," "dutiful," "reverential"): The word is peculiar to St. Luke. Applied to Simeon (Lk 2 25), Cornelius (Acts 10 2,7), Ananias (22 12). "Devout proselytes" (13 43, AV "religious proselytes"); with possible reference to the proselytes of righteousness as distinguished from the proselytes of the gate (see PROSELYTE). "Devout women of honorable estate" (13 50), proselytes to Judaism and wives of the men in high position among the heathen (see Jos, BJ, II, xx, 2). "Devout Greeks" (17 4), probably, though not necessarily, proselytes of the gate, heathen by birth, who attended the synagogue services and worshipped God. "Devout persons" (ver 17), proselytes of the gate. M. O. EVANS

DEW, dū (לֵבָנָה, lāl; δρόσος, drósos): Two things are necessary for the formation of dew, moisture and cold. In moist countries there is

tion of Dew perature between day and night is too small. In the deserts where the change in temperature between day and night is sometimes as much as 40° F., there is seldom dew because of lack of moisture in the atmosphere. Pal is fortunate in being near the sea, so that there is always a large percentage of water vapor in the air. The skies are clear, and hence there is rapid radiation beginning immediately after sunset, which cools the land and the air until the moisture is condensed and settles on cool objects. Air at a low temperature is not capable of holding as much water vapor in suspension as warm air. The ice pitcher furnishes an example of the formation of dew. Just as the drops of water form on the cool pitcher, so dew forms on rocks, grass and trees.

In Pal it does not rain from April to October, and were it not for the dew in summer all vegetation would perish. Dew and rain are

2. Value of equally important. If there is no rain
Dew in the winter grass and harvests fail;
Palestine if no dew, the late crops dry up and there is no fruit. Failure of either of these gifts of Nature would cause great want and hardship, but the failure of both would cause famine and death. Even on the edge of the great Syrian desert in Anti-Lebanon, beyond Jordan and in Sinai, a considerable vegetation of a certain kind flourishes in the summer, although there is not a drop of rain for six months. The dews are so heavy that the plants and trees are literally soaked with water at night, and they absorb sufficient moisture to more than supply the loss due to evaporation in the day. It is more surprising to one who has not seen it before to find a flourishing vineyard practically in the desert itself. Some of the small animals of the desert, such as the jerboa, seem to have no water supply except the dew. The dew forms most heavily on good conductors of heat, such as metals and stones, because they radiate their heat faster and cool the air around them. The wetting of Gideon's fleece (Jgs 6 38) is an indication of the amount of dew formed, and the same phenomenon might be observed any clear night in summer in Pal.

Dew was a present necessity to the people of Israel as it is today to the people of the same lands, so Jeh says, "I will be as the dew unto Israel" (Hos 14 5). Dew and rain are of equal importance and are spoken of together in 1 K 17 1. It was esp.

valued by the children of Israel in the desert, for it supplied the manna for their sustenance (Ex 16 13; Nu 11 9).

Isaac in blessing Jacob asked that the "dew of heaven" (Gen 27 28) may be granted to him; that these things which make for fertility vancing down the steps at its quickest rate, but he moving only slowly toward the left of those who were mounting them. It may well have been the case, therefore, that the time had come when the priests from Ophel, and the officials and courtiers from the palace, were going up the ascent into the house of the Lord to be present at the evening sacrifice; passing from the bright sunshine at the foot of the stairs into the shadow that had already fallen upon the upper steps. The sun would be going straight down behind the buildings and the steps already in shadow would sink into deeper shadow, not to emerge again into the light until a new day's sun had arisen upon the earth.

4. Symbol and prosperity may be his portion.

We can therefore understand the nature of the choice of the sign that was offered by the prophet to the dying king. Would he choose that ten more steps should be straight-
5. Heze- way engulfed in the shadow, or that kiah's ten steps already shadowed should be Choice of brought back into the light? Either the Sign might serve as a sign that he should arise on the third day and go up in renewed life to the house of the Lord; but the one sign would be in accordance with the natural progress of events, and the other would be directly opposed to it. It would be a light thing, as Hezekiah said, for the shadow to go forward ten steps; a bank of cloud rising behind the Temple would effect that change. But no disposition of cloud could bring the shadow back from that part of the staircase which had already passed into it, and restore it to the sunshine. The first change was, in human estimation, easily possible, "a light thing"; the second change seemed impossible. Hezekiah chose the seemingly impossible, and the Lord gave the sign and answered his prayer. We need not ask whether the king showed more or less faith in choosing the "impossible" rather than the "possible" sign. His father Ahaz had shown his want of faith by refusing to put the Lord to the test, by refusing to ask a sign, whether in the heaven above or in the earth beneath. The faith of Hezekiah was shown in asking a sign, which was at once in the heaven above and in the earth beneath, in accepting the choice offered to him, and so putting the Lord to the test. And the sign chosen was most fitting. Hezekiah lay dying, whether of plague or of cancer we do not know, but his disease was mortal and beyond cure; he was already entering into the shadow of death. The word of the Lord was sure to him; on "the third day" he would rise and go up in new life to the house of God. But what of the sign? Should the shadow of death swallow him up; should his

6. Meaning life be swiftly cut off in darkness, and of the Sign be hidden until a new day should dawn, and the light of a new life, a life of resurrection, arise? (Cf Jn 11 24.) Or should the shadow be drawn back swiftly, and new years be added to his life before death could come upon him? Swift death was in the natural progress of events; restoration to health was of the impossible. He chose the restoration to health, and the Lord answered his faith and his prayer.

We are not able to go farther into particulars. The first temple, the royal palace, and the staircase of Ahaz were all destroyed in the destruction of Jerus by Nebuchadnezzar, and we have no means of ascertaining the exact position of the staircase with respect to Temple or palace, or the number of the steps that it contained, or the time of the day, or the season of the year when the sign was given. It is possible that if we knew any or all of these, a yet greater significance, both spiritual and astronomical, might attach to the narrative.

Fifteen years were added to the life of Hezekiah. In the restoration of the second temple by Herod fifteen steps led from the Court of the Women to the Court of Israel, and on these steps the Levites during the Feast of Tabernacles were accustomed to stand in order to sing the fifteen "songs of degrees" (Pss 120-34). At the head of these same steps in the gateway, lepers who had been cleansed from their disease presented themselves to the priests. It has been suggested that Hezekiah himself was the compiler of these fifteen "songs of the steps," in thankfulness for his fifteen years of added life. Five of them are ascribed to David or as written for Solomon, but the remaining ten bear no author's name. Their subjects are, however, most appropriate to the great crises and desires of Hezekiah's life. His great Pass-over, to which all the tribes were invited, and so many Israelites came; the blasphemy of Rabshakeh and of Sennacherib's threatening letter; the danger of the Assyrian invasion and the deliverance from it; Hezekiah's sickness unto death and his miraculous restoration to health; and the fact that at that time he would seem to have had no son to follow him on the throne—all these subjects seem to find fitting expression in the fifteen Psalms of the Steps.

DIAMOND, di'a-mund. See STONES, PRECIOUS.

DIANA, di-an'a (ARTEMIS) ("Apreus, Artemis, "prompt," "safe"): A deity of Asiatic origin, the mother goddess of the earth, whose seat of worship was the temple in Ephesus, the capital of the Roman province of Asia. Diana is but the Latinized form of the Gr word Artemis, yet the Artemis of Ephesus should not be confused with the Gr goddess of that name.

She may, however, be identified with the Cybele of the Phrygians whose name she also bore, and with several other deities who were worshipped under different names in various parts of the Orient. In Cappadocia she was known as Ma; to the Syrians as Atargatis or Mylitta; among the Phoenicians as Astarte, a name which appears among the Assyrians as Ishtar; the modern name Esther is derived from it. The same goddess seems to have been worshipped by the Hittites, for a female deity is sculptured on the rocks at Yazili Kaya, near the Hittite city of Boghazkeui. It may be shown ultimately that the various goddesses of Syria and Asia Minor all owe their origin to the earlier Assyrian or Babylonian Ishtar, the goddess of love, whose chief attributes they possessed. The several forms and names under which she appears are due to the varying developments in different regions.

Tradition says that Diana was born in the woods near Ephesus, where her temple was built, when her image of wood (possibly ebony; Pliny, NH, xvi. 40; Acts 19 35) fell from the sky (see also ASTRONOMY, I, 8 [2]). Also according to tradition the city which was later called Ephesus was founded by the Amazons, and Diana or Cybele was the deity of those half-mythical people. Later when Ephesus fell into the possession of the Greeks, Gr civilization partly supplanted the Asiatic, and in that city the two civilizations were blended together. The Gr name of Artemis was given to the Asiatic goddess, and many of the Gr colonists represented her on their coins as Greek. Her images and forms of worship remained more Asiatic than Gr. Her earliest statues were figures crudely carved in wood. Later when she was represented in stone and metals, she bore upon her head a mural headdress, representing a fortified city wall; from it, drapery hung upon each side of her face to her shoulders. The upper part of her body was completely covered with rows of breasts to signify that she was the mother of all life. The lower arms were extended. The lower part of the body resembled a rough block, as if her legs had been wrapped up in cloth like those of an Egypt mummy. In later times her Gr followers represented her with stags or lions standing at her sides. The most renowned of her statues stood on the platform before the entrance to her temple in Ephesus. As the statues indicate, she impersonated the reproductive powers of men and of animals and of all other life.

Diana.

At the head of her cult was a chief priest, originally a eunuch who bore the name and later the title Megabyzos. Under him were priests known as Essenes, appointed, perhaps from the city officials, for but a single year; it was their duty to offer the sacrifices to the goddess in behalf of the city. Other subordinate classes of priests known as Kourêtes, Krobatai and Hilroi performed duties which are now obscure. The priestesses were even more numerous, and, probably from their great numbers, they were called Melissai or bees; the Ephesian symbol therefore which appears commonly upon the coins struck in the city, is a bee. The Melissai, which in the early times were all virgins, were of three classes; it is no longer known just what the special duties of each class were. The ritual of the temple services consisted of sacrifices and of ceremonial prostitution, a practice which was common to many of the religions of the ancient Orient, and which still exists among some of the obscure tribes of Asia Minor.

The temple of Diana was not properly the home of the goddess; it was but a shrine, the chief one, devoted to her service. She lived in Nature; she was everywhere wherever there was life, the mother of all living things; all offerings of every possible nature were therefore acceptable to her; hence the vast wealth which poured into her temple. Not only was she worshipped in her temple, but in the minute shrines or naoi which were sometimes modeled after the temple. More frequently the shrines were exceedingly crude objects, either of silver or stone or wood or clay. They were made at Ephesus by dependents of the temple, and carried by the pilgrims throughout the world. Before them Diana might also be worshipped anywhere, just as now from the soil of the sacred Mesopotamian city of Kerbela, where the sons of Ali were martyred, little blocks are formed and are carried away by the Shiah Moslems that they may pray upon sacred ground wherever they may be. The makers of the shrines of Diana formed an exceedingly large class among whom, in Paul's time, was Demetrius (Acts 19 24). None of the silver shrines have been discovered, but those of marble and of clay have appeared among the ruins of Ephesus. They are exceedingly crude; in a little shell-like bit of clay, a crude clay female figure sits, sometimes with a tambourine in one hand and a cup in the other, or with a lion at her side or beneath her foot. Though the shrines were sold as sacred dwelling-places of the goddess, that the pilgrims who carried them to their distant homes, or buried them in the graves with their dead, might be assured of her constant presence, their real purpose was to increase the temple revenues by their sale at a price which was many times their cost. With the shrines of Diana may be compared the household gods of clay found in abundance among the ruins of the earlier Bab cities, esp. those cities in which temples to the goddess Ishtar stood.

DIASPORA, dī-as'pō-ra. See DISPERSION.

DIBLAH, dib'la (דִּבְלָה, dibhlāh, "circle"; Δεβλάθα, Deblātha): The name occurs only in Ezk 6 14 (AV "Diblath"), and the place has not been identified. If the reading is correct it may possibly be represented by Dibl, a village in Upper Galilee, S. of Tibnān. But more likely it is a scribal error for Riblah.

DIBLAIM, dib'lā-im, dib-lā'im (דִּבְלַיִם, dibhlayim, "two cakes"): A native of Northern Israel and father of Gomer, the wife of Hosea (Hos 1 3).

DIBLATH, dib'lath. See DIBLAH.

DIBLATHAIM, dib-la-thā'im. See ALMON-DIBLATHAIM.

DIBON, dī'bon, DIBON-GAD (דִּיבּוֹן, dībḥōn, "washing"; Δαιβόν, Daibōn):

(1) A city of Moab captured by the Amorites (Nu 21 30), and held by them at the invasion by Israel. It was taken and given to the tribe of Gad, whence it is called Dibon-gad (Nu 32 34; 33 45). In Josh 13 17 it is reckoned to Reuben. Along with other cities in the territory N. of the Arnon, Dibon changed hands several times between Moab and Israel. Mesha claims it (MS), and in Jer 48 18.22 it is named among the cities of Moab. The form of the name, Dimon, in Isa 15 9, may have been given to make it resemble the Heb dām, "blood," to support the play upon words in the verse (HDB, s.v.). It is represented by the modern Dhibān, about 4 miles N. of Aroer (Arā'ir), on the line of the old Rom road. The ruins that spread over two adjacent knolls are of no importance: walls, a tower, cistern, etc. Near Dibon the famous Moabite Stone was found.

(2) A town in Judah, occupied after the exile (Neh 11 25). It may be the same as Dimonah (Josh 15 22); unidentified. W. EWING

DIBRI, dib'ri (דִּבְרִי, dībhrī, "eloquent" [?]): A Danite, whose daughter Shelomith married an Egyptian. Their son was "cut off" (stoned) for blasphemy (Lev 24 11).

DICE-PLAYING. See GAMES.

DICTIONARIES, dik'shun-a-riz: A dictionary is a word-book or a list of words arranged in some fixed order, generally alphabetical, for ready reference, and usually with definitions or longer treatises. The vocabulary or glossary is a mere list of words, often without definitions; the Lexicon or dictionary of language (words or concepts) has bare definitions, and the alphabetical encyclopaedia or dictionary of knowledge or information (objects, things, subjects, topics, etc) has longer treatises, but they are all dictionaries: the alphabetical order being the main essential in modern use. There is, however, historically no good reason why the dictionary should not be logical or chronological. The earliest use of the word as quoted by Murray's Dictionary (Joh. de Garlandia, cir 1225) was of a collection of words classified and not alphabetical. So, too, almost the earliest use in Eng. (J. Withal's Dictionary, 1556) was of a book of words classified by subjects. A book like Roget's Thesaurus, which is a list of classified words without definition, or a systematic encyclopaedia of treatises like Coleridge's unfortunate experiment, the Encyclopedia Metropolitana, is a dictionary in the historic sense. The earliest books usually quoted in the lists of Bib. dictionaries were also in fact classified or chronological, and not alphabetical (Eusebius' Onomasticon; Jerome's De viris illustribus). Classified word lists, syllabaries, etc., of pre-alphabetic times, as well as in Chinese and other non-alphabetic languages of today, are of course also non-alphabetic, but strictly dictionaries.

In pre-alphabetic times the dictionaries include, besides the syllabaries in which there were many examples in Assyria, Babylonia, Egypt, Cyprus, etc., and the word lists proper, chronological lists of kings and various classified lists of tribute, and of astronomical or other objects. They include, in short, all the many lists where the material is grouped round a series of catchwords.

The alphabetical dictionary began with the alphabet itself, for this is a list of names of objects. The earlier alphabetical dictionaries were sometimes called alphabets. In a sense the alphabetical acrostics are dictionaries rather than acrostics, and Ps 119, where considerable material is grouped under each letter of the alphabet, comes rather close to the dictionary idea.

So long as the quantity of literary material remained small, there was very little need for the development of the alphabetical dictionary, and the examples are rather few, the Lexicon of Suidas being perhaps the most noteworthy. With the immense increase in literary material there was a rapidly growing appreciation of the advantage of alphabetical arrangement, over the chronological or the systematic, in all cases where the object is to refer to a specific topic, rather than to read a book through or survey many topics with reference to their relation to one another. The number of alphabetical dictionaries of knowledge increased rapidly with the growth of learning from the 13th cent.; now it has become legion and there are few subjects so narrow that they cannot boast their dictionary of information.

The earliest Bible dictionary is usually counted the Onom of Eusebius, a geographical encyclopaedia; then came Jerome's De nominibus

1. Bible Dictionaries (chronological). The more noteworthy steps in the history of Bible dictionaries are represented by the names of Alsted, Calmet, Winer, Kitto, William Smith, Fairbairn, Schenkel. The best recent dictionaries among the larger works are the Encyclopaedia Biblica, standing for the extreme higher critical wing; Hastings, representing the slightly less radical; and this present International Standard Bible Encyclopaedia, which represents a growing distrust of the extreme positions of the 19th cent. higher critics. All of these are on a large scale and stand for the latest and best scholarship, and the same quality is reflected in at least two of the recent single-volume dictionaries, A Standard Bible Dictionary (M. W. Jacobus), and the single-volume Hastings' dictionary. Both of these in tendency stand between Cheyne's Encyclopaedia Biblica and this dictionary, Hastings facing rather toward Cheyne, and Jacobus toward this present work.

The John Crerar Library list of encyclopaedias forms an excellent guide to the lit. of general encyclopaedias within its scope, which includes chiefly technology and physical and social sciences, but includes among its reference books very admirably chosen first-reference dictionaries to language, history, fine arts, and even philosophy and religion.

Kroeger, Alice B. Guide to the Study and Use of Reference Books, 2d ed. Boston, 1908, is an admirable introduction. Its select lists and bibliographical references supplemented by the John Crerar and other reference library lists will give complete orientation.

- Other recent one-vol. dictionaries are: Angus (1907), Bevis (1900), Gamble (1906), Ewing (1910), Hyamson (1907), Percy (1908).

Next in importance for Bible students to the Bible dictionaries are the general dictionaries of religious knowledge. Many of the more recent of these, such as the Hauck ed of RE, the new Sch-Herz, Jew Enc, the Catholic Encyclopaedia, and in general all the larger and some of the smaller recent ones have arts. of real importance for Bible study, often better than some of the specific Bible dictionaries.

GENERAL THEOLOGICAL DICTIONARIES

- Abbott, Lyman. A Dictionary of Religious Knowledge. New York: Harper, 1875.
- Addis, William E. A Catholic Dictionary. New York: Cath. Pub. Soc. Co., 1884; 4th ed, revised, London: Paul, 1893.
- Aschbach. Kirchenlexikon. n.p. 1846-51, 4 vols.
- Benham, William. Dictionary of Religion. London and New York: Cassell, 1887.
- Buchberger. Kirchliches Handlexikon. München, 1907 (short but comprehensive).
- Buck, Charles. A Theological Dictionary. Enlarged by Dr. Henderson. London: Tegg, 1847; Am. ed, revised and enlarged by George Bush; Philadelphia: Desilver, n.d.
- Ceccaroni, A. Dizionario ecclesiastico illustrato. Milano.

- Jackson, S. M. The New Schaff-Herzog. New York: Funk, 1908, sq. (good and modern).
- Jewish Encyclopaedia.* New York, 1901-6, 12 vols (most scholarly).
- Lichtenberger, F. Dict. des sci. eccl. Paris, 1877-82, 15 vols (French Protestant).
- McClintock, John and Strong, James. Cyclopaedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature. 10 vols. New York: Harper, 1867-81. With sup. in 2 vols, 1890.
- Marsden, J. B. A Dictionary of Christian Churches and Sects. London: Bentley, 1857.
- Migne. Encycl. théologique. Paris, 1844-75 (over 100 special lexicons).
- Moroni. Dizionario di erudizione storico-ecclesiastica. Venice, 1840-79, 103 vols, and Index, 6 vols.

Among the older ones the huge encyclopaedia of Migne, which is a classified series of alphabetical dictionaries, and the Moroni, with its 109 vols, are still of great usefulness to the scholar on out-of-the-way topics, not so much for Bib. topics but at least for Bib. related matters.

- Perthes. Handlexikon für evangelische Theol. Gotha, 1890-1901, 3 vols.
- Robinson, John. Theological, Biblical and Ecclesiastical Dictionary. London: Whittaker, 1815; 4th ed, 1835.
- Schaff, Philip and Jackson, Samuel Macauley. A Religious Encyclopaedia. New York: Christian Lit. Co., 1882; 3d ed, New York: Funk, 1891. Together with an Encyclopaedia of Living Divines, etc.

- Staunton, William. An Ecclesiastical Dictionary. New York: Prot. Ep. S. S. U., 1861.
- Vacant and Mangenot. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique. Paris, 1903-.
- Wetzer and Welte. Kirchenlexikon. Freiburg, 1847-60; 2d ed, 1880-91, 13 vols, and index, 1903 (Roman Catholic scientific best).

The monumental dictionary in this class superseding all others is Hastings' Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics, but Forlong has

- served a useful purpose and some of the special dictionaries like Röscher are quite in the same class with Hastings.
- 4. Dictionaries of Comparative Religion

COMPARATIVE RELIGION

- Balfour, E. Cyclopaedia of India, and of E. and So. Asia. 3d ed, London, 1885, 3 vols.
- Beale, Th. W. Oriental Biographical Dictionary. Calcutta, 1881; London, 1894.
- Brewer, E. C. Dictionary of Phrase and Fable. London, 1905.

- Forlong, J. G. R. Faiths of Man; a Cyclopaedia of Religions. London, 1906, 3 vols.
- Hastings, James. Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics. Edinburgh, Clark; New York, Scribner, 1908-.
- Hazlitt, W. C. Faiths and Folklore; a Dictionary of National Beliefs. London, 1905.
- Hughes, T. P. Dictionary of Islam. London, 1885.

The admirable Jewish and Catholic encyclopaedias mentioned above, like the Methodist M'Clintock and Strong, belong rather to general than denominational encyclopaedias, but the Catholic dictionaries of Addis and of Thien are denominational in the same sense as those of the Episcopal, Lutheran, etc. churches, mentioned below, among which perhaps the best executed example is the Lutheran Encyclopaedia of Jacobs.

DICTIONARIES OF DENOMINATIONS

 Stadler and Heim. Heiligenlexikon. 1858-82, 5 vols.
 Wolcott, Mackenzie E. C. Sacred Archaeology. London: Reeve, 1868.

What has been said of general religious encyclopaedias applies almost equally to Bib. articles in the good general encyclopaedias.

6. Universal. Among these the Encyclopaedia Britannica, of which a new ed appeared in 1911, is easily first, and has maintained through its many edd a high standard. The previous ed was edited by Professor Robertson Smith, who gave a peculiarly high quality of scholarship to its Bib. articles, while at the same time rather tingeing them with extreme views.

Among the British encyclopaedias, Chambers' is still kept up to a high standard. The recent American edd include the New International, the Nelson, and the Americana, the former, perhaps, contributing most on Bible matters. The annual supplement to the International gives a useful résumé of the progress of Bib. archaeology during each year.

UNIVERSAL ENCYCLOPAEDIAS

The dictionaries of philosophy often bear on Bible study almost as much as the religious dictionaries. Baldwin's Dictionary of Philosophy and Psychology, which is the most comprehensive work, is also very full in its bibliographical reference, and has in vols III and IV a colossal bibliography of philosophy continued and kept up to date in the Psychological Index. The dictionary of Eisler is on the historical principle and of very great importance in interpreting the doctrines of Bib. theology.

The dictionaries of architecture often treat of Egypt, Bab, and sometimes Palestinian matters.

The dictionaries of painting, engraving, music, etc, have less direct matter but are important and necessary in view of the fact that so large a part of the best work is on Bib. themes.

E. C. RICHARDSON

DIDACHE, did'a-kē. See LITERATURE, SUB-APOSTOLIC.

DIDRACHMA, dī-drak'ma: Two drachmas. See DRACHMA, DRAM.

DIDYMUS, did'i-mus (Δίδυμος, Didymos, i.e. "twin"): The surname of THOMAS (q.v.).

DIE (מָוֶת, mūth, מָוֶת, gāwa'; ἀποθνήσκω, apothnēskō, τελευτάω, teleutāō): "To die," etc, is of very frequent occurrence, and in the OT is generally the tr of mūth, meaning perhaps originally, "to be stretched out" or "prostrate." "To die," should be the consequence of eating the forbidden fruit (Gen 2 17; cf 20 7; 2 K 1 4.6). "Die" is commonly used of natural death (Gen 5 8; 25 8). It is used also of violent death (Gen 26 9.11; Ex 21 20); punitive (Ex 19 12; 21 12.14; 28 43; Nu 4 15; Ezk 3 1 8ff); as the result of wilfulness or indifference (Prov 10 21; 15 10; 19 16). To die "the death of the righteous" is something to be desired (Nu 23 10).

In the NT the word for "to die," etc, is generally apothnēskō, "to die off or away," used of dying in all forms: of natural death (Mt 22 24); of violent death (Jn 11 50.51; 19 7; Acts 25 11); of the death of Christ (Jn 12 33); of death as the consequence of sin (Jn 8 21.24; Rom 8 13); teleutāō, "to end [life]," also occurs several times (Mt 15 4); thnēsko, "to die," occurs once (Jn 11 21), and apōllumi, "to destroy" (Jn 18 14); in Acts 25 16 (TR) we have eis apōleian, "to destruction."

The figurative use of "to die" is not frequent, if indeed it ever occurs. In 1 S 25 37 it may be equivalent to "faint," "His heart died within him, and he became as a stone," Figurative Use but this may be meant literally. In Am 2 2 it is said that Moab "shall die," i.e. perish as a nation. Paul describes the condition of the apostles of Christ as "dying, and behold, we live" (2 Cor 6 9), and says, "I die daily" (1 Cor 15 31), but the references may be to exposure to death. When in Rom 7 9 he says, "When the commandment came . . . I died," he may mean that it rendered him liable to death. In Rom 6 2 we have "we who died to sin," i.e. in Christ, and in our acceptance of His death as representing ours; similarly we read in 2 Cor 5 14, "One died for all, therefore all died" (RV), i.e. representatively, and in Col 2 20 "if ye died with Christ"; 3 3, "for ye died," RV (in Christ). Cf 2 Tim 2 11; 1 Pet 2 24.

Of the changes in RV may be mentioned "abode" for "died" (Gen 25 18, m "or settled, Heb fell"); "he that is to die" for "worthy of death" (Dt 17 6); "died" for "are dead" (Jn 6 49.58, and ARV 5 52.53); "though he die" for "were dead" (Jn 11 25); "many died" for "were dead" (Rom 5 15); "died for nought" for "in vain" (Gal 2 21); "when his end was nigh" for "died" (He 11 22). Of special importance are the changes from "be, are, were, dead" in Rom 6 2.7.8; 2 Cor 5 14; Col 2 20; 3 3; 2 Tim 2 11, and "having died" for "being dead" in 1 Pet 2 24, as bringing out the truth that in the sight of God all men died in Christ. See also DEATH.

DIET, dī'et (אֲרוּחָה, 'ārūhāh, "prescribed"): A daily allowance or portion of food, as that given by King Evil-merodach to Jehoiachin, king of Judah (Jer 52 34 AV; cf 2 K 25 30).

DIG (קַיַּר, kūr, "to dig", קָדַר, hāthar; διόρυσσω, diorússō, "to dig through"): "I have digged and drunk strange waters" (2 K 19 24). In his campaigns on foreign soil, where the enemy had stopped up the watersprings, Sennacherib would at once dig fresh wells for his armies. "They dig through houses" (Job 24 16; cf Mt 6 19.20 m). Walls of eastern houses are often made of mud or clay, and frequently have no windows; and as the threshold of a Syrian house is sacred, the thief breaks in through the wall (see Trumbull, The Threshold Covenant).
M. O. EVANS

DIGNITIES, dig'ni-tiz, DIGNITY, dig'ni-ti (Heb mārôm, s'ēth, g'dhullāh): Rank or position, not nobility or austerity of personal character or bearing, is denoted by this word in its OT occurrences (Gen 49 3; Est 6 3; Eccl 10 6; Hab 1 7). In 2 Pet 2 10; Jude ver 8, "dignities" (δόξαι, dóxai) are angels, lofty spiritual beings, possible objects of blasphemy; cf the context in both passages.

DIKE, dī'kē (δικη, dikē, "justice"): The avenging justice of God personified as a goddess (Acts 28 4). See JUSTICE.

DIKLAH, dik'lā (דִּקְלָה, diklāh, "place of palms"): One of the "sons" of Joktan (Gen 10 27; 1 Ch 1 21). Perhaps a south-Arabian tribal or place-name connected with a palm-bearing district.

DILEAN, dil'ē-an (דִּלְעָן, dil'ān, "cucumber"): A town in the Shephelah of Judah named with Migdal-gad and Mizpeh (Josh 15 38, ERV "Dilan"), which lay probably on the N. of Lachish and Eglon. It has not been identified.

DILIGENCE, dil'i-jens, DILIGENT, DILIGENTLY, dil'i-jent-li: This word is used in various senses in our Eng. Bible.

In Ezr 5 8, "with diligence" means "with care"; in Ezr 6 12; 7 17, "with speed," "speedily"; in Prov 4 23 "watchfulness"; in Dt 4 9; 6 17; 19 18; Ps 77 6; Prov 27 23; Isa 55 2; Mic 7 3, "with care," "scrupulously," "earnestly." Sometimes it means "early," "with haste" (Job 8 5; Prov 8 17). It may mean "industrious," "exact-ing" (Prov 10 4; 12 27; 22 29).

The American revisers have rendered "diligence" for various words in AV, e.g. for "business" in Rom 12 11; "giving diligence" for "endeavoring" (Eph 4 3); "give diligence" for "study" (2 Tim 2 15), for "labor" (He 4 11); "diligently" for "carefully" (Phil 2 28; He 12 17); "be diligent in" for "meditate upon" (1 Tim 4 15). It is well also to remember that the Old Eng. meaning of diligence is "with love," from diligo, "to love."

2. In the NT
G. H. GEBERDING

DILL. See ANISE.

DIMINISH, di-min'ish: RV has retained nearly all passages of AV where "to diminish" is used. Some of these uses have become obsolete: Dt 4 2, "neither shall ye diminish from it." "Diminish" generally means "to reduce," "to lessen." In this sense it is employed in Ezk 5 11 from the Heb גָּרַע, gāra', lit. "to shear." The picture of shearing the beard, expressing degradation and loss of manhood, may underlie this passage.

DIMNAH, dim'nā (דִּמְנָה, dimnāh, "dung"; Δαμνά, Damná): A city of the Merarite Levites in the territory of Zebulun (Josh 21 35). The name is probably a clerical error for Rimmon.

DIMON, di'mon, DIMONAH, di-mō'na. See DIBON.

DINAH, dī'na (דִּינָה, dīnāh, "justice"): The daughter of Jacob and Leah, whose violation by Shechem, son of Hamor, caused her brothers, esp. Simeon and Levi, to slay the inhabitants of Shechem, although they had induced the Shechemites to believe, if they would submit to circumcision, Shechem, the most honored of all the house of his father, would be permitted to have the maiden to whom his soul clave for wife (Gen 34 1-31). The political elements of the story (cf vs 21-23 and 30) suggest a tribal rather than a personal significance for the narrative.
NATHAN ISAACS

DINAITES, dī'na-its (דִּינָיִתַּי, dīnāyē'): A people mentioned in Ezr 4 9, as settled in the city of Samaria by Osnapper (Assurbanipal). The identification is uncertain.

DINHABAH, din'ha-bā, din-hā'ba (דִּנְהָבָה, dīn-hābhāh): The royal city of Bela, son of Beor, king of Edom (Gen 36 32; 1 Ch 1 43). There may be a resemblance in the name of Hodbat et-Teneib, about 8 miles E. of Heshbon; but this is in the land of Moab, and probably much too far to the N. No satisfactory identification has been proposed.

DINNER, din'ēr (ἀριστον, áriston; Mt 22 4; Lk 11 38 [RVm "breakfast"]; 14 12; cf Ruth 2 14; Jn 21 13): In oriental as in classical lands it was customary, anciently, as now, to have but two meals in the day, and the evidence, including that of Jos, goes to show that the second or evening meal was the principal one. The "morning morsel," as the Talm calls it, was in no sense a "meal." The peasant or artisan, before beginning work, might "break [his] fast" (Jn 21 12.15) by taking a bit of barley bread with some simple relish, but to "eat [a full meal] in the morning" was a reproach (Eccl 10 16). The full meal was not to be taken until a little before or after sunset, when the laborers had come in from their work (Lk 17 7; cf the "supper time" of 14 17). The noon meal, taken at an hour when climatic conditions called for rest from exertion (the ariston of the Greeks, rendered "dinner" in EV, Mt 22 4; Lk 11 38, RVm "breakfast"), was generally very simple, of bread soaked in light wine with a handful of parched corn (Ruth 2 14), or of "pottage and bread broken into a bowl" (Bel 33), or of bread and broiled fish (Jn 21 13). Many, when on a journey especially, are content with one meal a day, taken after sunset. In general, eating at other times is casual and informal; evening is the time for the formal meal, or feast. See MEALS.

DIONYSIA, dī-ō-nish'i-a (Διονύσια, Dionúsia, "festivals of Dionysus" [Bacchus]): The rural (vintage) Dionysia were celebrated in the month of Poseideon (19th day), which is roughly our December. The celebration consisted of feasts, processions, songs and (sometimes) scenic performances. The Ascolia formed one of the most prominent features. After sacrificing a goat to the god, they filled the wine-skin with wine, made it slippery on the outside with oil, and then tried to hop on it with one leg. Whoever fell down furnished great sport for the spectators, but if anyone succeeded in maintaining an upright position to the end, he was declared victor. The demarch conducted the festival, the expenses of which were paid by the deme.

The Lenaea were celebrated on the 12th of Gamelion (January) in Athens, and later in Ionia in Asia Minor. At this festival also the new wine was tasted. A procession was formed and they marched through the city, indulging in all sorts of jesting and buffoonery, to attend the pantomimic performances.

The Anthesteria (Flower-Feast) came in the month of Anthesterion (February), when the first flowers appeared. This festival resembled somewhat our Christmas. On the first day (11th of the month) the wine-cask was opened; on the second was the feast of pitchers. Wine was drunk, and contests in trumpet-playing were held. At the drinking contest everybody was permitted to make as much merriment as he pleased. There was also a mystic marriage of the king archon's wife to Dionysus (compare the marriage of the Doges of Venice to the sea). On the third day they offered pots filled with vegetables to Hermes, Conductor of the Dead. This day was sacred to the gods of the nether world and to the spirits of the departed (All Souls' Day); and the people celebrated Persephone's resurrection and reunion with the god.

The Greater, or City Dionysia, were held in Elaphebolion (March) as a spring festival. This is the most important of all the Dionysia (for us), since practically all the great tragedies of Aeschylus, Sophocles and Euripides were performed in conjunction with this festival. All the demes took part. They accompanied the ancient image of Dionysus Eleutherios (from Eleutherae in Boeotia, one of the first places in which the worship of the god was established in Greece), as it was carried in solemn procession from the Lenaeon (the original center of his cult in Athens) to a small temple in the Ceramicus in the northwestern part of the city, while choruses of men and boys sang the dithyrambos (the ancient hymn to Dionysus). Crowned with the vine and dressed in unusual costumes, they greeted the god with loud shouts of joy.

The festival was revived with great pomp by the Pisistratidae. In the theater of Dionysus all the people beheld an imposing rehearsal of their great achievements. Even the poorest and humblest were given an opportunity to see and hear the contests between the professional rhapsodists, who recited Homer, between choruses specially trained to sing the dithyrambs, and between poets, whose great dramatic productions were presented for the first time. The state set aside a special fund for the purchase of tickets for those who were too poor to buy for themselves. Comedies, tragedies and satyr dramas were presented after elaborate preparation and at a great expenditure of money. The prize, a bronze tripod, was erected with an appropriate inscription on the Street of Tripods. The awarding of prizes to the victors concluded the festival.

The quinquennial festival at Brauron in Attica was also celebrated with extraordinary license and merriment. The city of Athens sent delegates regularly to attend the festival.

There were also Dionysiac clubs in Athens at the time of the Peloponnesian War. These had peculiar doctrines and observances. They had their foundation in Orphic mysticism. The members refrained from eating the flesh of animals. They possessed holy scriptures and had peculiar propitiatory rites. The Dionysiac religious observance continued as a state cult down to 366 A.D. See BACCHUS.

DIONYSIUS, dī-ō-nish'i-us (Διονύσιος, Dionūsios, surnamed "the Areopagite"): One of the few Athenians converted by Paul (Acts 17 34). We know nothing further about him (see AREOPAGUS). According to one account he was the first bishop of the church at Athens; according to another he suffered martyrdom in that city under Domitian. We are even told that he migrated to Rome and was sent to Paris, where he was beheaded on Montmartre (Mount of the Martyr). The patron saint of France is St. Denis; cf the French "Denys d'Halicarnasse" (Dionysius of Halicarnassus). The mystical writings which were circulated in the Middle Ages and are still extant, are pronounced by the best authorities to be forgeries, and date from a period not earlier than the 5th cent.

DIONYSUS, dī-ō-ni'sus (BACCHUS) (Διόνυσος, Dionūsos): The youngest of the Gr gods. In Homer he is not associated with the vine. In later Gr legend he is represented as coming from India, as traversing Asia in a triumphal march, accompanied by woodland beings, with pointed ears, snub noses and goat-tails. These creatures were called satyrs. The vine was cultivated among European-Aryans first in Thrace, and here Dionysus is said to have established his worship first in Europe. Then the cult of Dionysus passed down through the Balkan peninsula to Thebes; and in the localized form of the myth the deity was born here—son of Zeus and Semele.

"Offspring of Zeus on high

Thou that carest for all
Who on Bacchus in Italy call
And in Deo's sheltered plain
Of Eleusis lord dost reign,
Whither worshippers repair!
O Bacchus that dwellest in Thebes,
On whose broad and fertile glebes
Fierce warriors from the dragon's teeth rose,
Where Ismenus softly flows,
The city that Semele bare!"

—Sophocles, Antigone.

Among all the Gr deities none appealed more vividly to the imagination than Dionysus. Gr tragedy is a form of worship, the ritual cult of the god of wine, who makes the initiate wise and the ungodly mad. Dionysus speaks most strongly to the sense and to the spirit at the same time. There is nothing monotonous in the Dionysiac legend; it is replete with both joy and sorrow—in some aspects it is a "passion," in others a triumph. All the passion plays of the world (even the Oberammergau Schauspiel) are in the ancient spirit. One Dionysus after another has been substituted, but from the first there has been a desire on the part of the devotee to realize his god vividly with thrilling nearness, to partake of his joys and sorrows and triumphs in his manifold adventures. In the early myths Dionysus was one of the lesser gods; he is mentioned only twice in the Iliad and twice in the Odyssey; but he is always represented as being more nearly akin to man than the great august deities of Olympus. He is a man-god, or god-man. To the inhabitants of the vine-clad slopes of Attica, to which his cult had been brought from Phrygia through Thracian Boeotia, he was particularly dear. At their vintage feasts last year's cask of wine was opened; and when the new year brought life again to the vines, the bountiful god was greeted with songs of joyful praise. The burial of the wine in the dark tomb of the jars through the winter, and the opening of these jars at the spring festival symbolized the great awakening of man himself, the resurrection of the god's worshippers to a fuller and more joyous life. The vine was not the only manifestation of the god—oil and wheat were also his; he was the god of ecstasy, the giver of physical joy and excitement, the god of life, the god of certain laws of Nature, germination and extinction, the external coming into being and the dying away of all things that are, fructification in its widest aspect whether in the bursting of the seed-grain that lies intreaured in the earth, or in the generation of living creatures. Hence the prominence given to the phallus in the solemn processions in honor of the god.

Nicanor (2 Macc 14 33) and Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc 6 7) thought that the cult of Dionysus would not be objectionable to the Jews. Ptolemy Philopator branded the Jews with an ivy-leaf (3 Macc 2 29), which was sacred to Dionysus. See also BACCHUS.

DIOSCORINTHIUS, dī-os-kō-rin'thi-us: A certain (unidentified) month (2 Macc 11 21). See CALENDAR; TIME.

DIOSCURI, dī-os'kū-rī (Διόσκουροι, Diōscouroi; in Acts 28 11, AV Castor and Pollux, RV THE TWIN BROTHERS; in m, "Dioscuri"): The sign of the ship on which Paul sailed from Melita to Syracuse and Rhegium. The Dioscuri (i.e. sons of Zeus), Castor and Pollux, are the two chief stars in the constellation of the Twins. Some 4,000 years BC they served as pointers to mark the beginning of the new year by setting together with the first new moon of springtime. The constellation of the Twins was supposed to be esp. favorable to sailors, hence ships were often placed under the protection of the twin gods. E. W. MAUNDER

DIOTREPES, dī-ot're-fēz (Διοτρεφής, Diotrephēs): A person mentioned in 3 Jn vs 9.10 as contentiously resisting the writer's authority and forbidding others from exercising the Christian hospitality which he himself refused to show. The words "who loveth to have the preëminence, among them" may indicate that he was a church official, abusing his position.

DIP: Priests when offering a sin offering were required to dip a finger into the blood of the sacrificed bullock and "to sprinkle of the blood seven times before Jeh" (cf Lev 4 6, et al.). See also the law referring to the cleansing of infected houses (Lev 14 51) and the cleansing of a leper (Lev 14 16). In all such cases "to dip" is "to moisten," "to besprinkle," "to dip in," the Heb טָבַח, tābhal, or the Gr βάπτω, baptō. See also ASHER. In Ps 68 23 "dipping" is not tr<sup>d</sup> from the Heb, but merely employed for a better understanding of the passage: "Thou mayest crush them, dipping thy foot in blood" (AV "that thy foot may be dipped in the blood"). Rev 19 13 is a very doubtful passage. AV reads: "a vesture dipped in blood" (from baptō, "to dip"); RV following another reading (either rhainō, or rhantizō, both "to sprinkle"), translates "a garment sprinkled with blood." RVm gives "dipped in." See also Sop. A. L. BRESLICH

DIPHATH, dī'fath (דִּיפַת, dīphath): A son of Gomer, son of Japheth, son of Noah (1 Ch 1 6), called RIPHATH (q.v.) in the corresponding genealogy in Gen 10 3.

DISALLOW, dis-a-lou': "To disallow" as used in the Scriptures means either "to oppose," "not permit" (Heb nō', Nu 30 5.8.11), or "to reject" (Gr apodokimázō, lit. "to consider useless," 1 Pet 2 4.7 AV, RV "rejected").

DISANNUL, dis-a-nul'. See ANNUL.

DISAPPOINT, dis-a-point': "To disappoint" may be used transitively or intransitively. In the former case it naturally has a more forceful meaning. Therefore RV changes the tr of AV wherever "disappoint" is used with an object: Job 5 12, "frustrateth"; Ps 17 13, "confront him," RVm "fore-stall"; Jth 16 6, "brought them to nought"; but RV retains "disappoint" where the person who disappoints is not expressed. Cf Prov 15 22.

DISCERN, di-zûrn': Five Heb words are thus tr<sup>d</sup>: bîn, yādha', nākhar, rā'āh and shāma'. It may simply mean "observe" (bîn), "I discerned among the youths" (Prov 7 7); or discriminating knowledge, "A wise man's heart discerneth time and judgment" (Eccl 8 5, yādha'); "He discerned him not, because his hands," etc (Gen 27 23, nākhar); "Then shall ye return and discern between the righteous and the wicked" (Mal 3 18, rā'āh); "So is my lord the king to discern good," etc (2 S 14 17, shāma').

In the NT the words anakrinō, diakrinō and dokimázō are thus tr<sup>d</sup>, expressing close and distinct acquaintance with or a critical knowledge of things. Used in 1 Cor 2 14 AV of "the things of the spirit of God"; in 1 Cor 11 29 of "the [Lord's] body" in the sacrament; in Mt 16 3 of "the face of the heaven"; in He 5 14 of a clear knowledge of good and evil as the prerogative of a full-grown man. See also next art. HENRY E. DOSKER

DISCERNINGS, di-zûrn'inz, OF SPIRITS (διακρίσεις πνευμάτων, diakriseis pneumátōn, "judicial estimation," "through judgment or separation"): Occurs in 1 Cor 12 10 as being one of the gifts of the Spirit. The Gr word occurs in He 5 14; and Rom 14 1: "But him that is weak in faith receive ye, yet not for decision of scruples." This tr scarcely expresses the meaning, which Thayer has freely rendered, "not for the purpose of passing judgment on opinions, as to which one is to be preferred as the more correct." Taking these three passages together it is evident that the Gr term which is rendered "discerning" means a distinguishing or discriminating between things that are under consideration; hence the one who possessed the gift of "discernings of spirits" was able to make distinction between the one who spoke by the Spirit of God and the one who was moved by a false spirit. This gift seems to have been exercised chiefly upon those who assumed the rôle of teachers, and it was esp. important in those days, because there were many false teachers abroad (see 2 Jn ver 7; Acts 20 29.30). See also SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

DISCIPLE, di-sī'p'l:

(1) Usually a subst. (μαθητής, mathētēs, "a learner," from manthánō, "to learn"; Lat discipulus, "a scholar"): The word is found in the Bible only in the Gospels and Acts. But it is good Greek, in use from Herodotus down, and always means the pupil of someone, in contrast to the master or teacher (διδάσκαλος, didaskalos). See Mt 10 24; Lk 6 40. In all cases it implies that the person not only accepts the views of the teacher, but that he is also in practice an adherent. The word has several applications. In the widest sense it refers to those who accept the teachings of anyone, not only in belief but in life. Thus the disciples of John the Baptist (Mt 9 14; Lk 7 18; Jn 3 25); also of the Pharisees (Mt 22 16; Mk 2 18; Lk 5 33); of Moses (Jn 9 28). But its most common use is to designate the adherents of Jesus. (a) In the widest sense (Mt 10 42; Lk 6 17; Jn 6 66, and often). It is the only name for Christ's followers in the Gospels. But (b) esp. the Twelve Apostles, even when they are called simply the disciples (Mt 10 1; 11 1; 12 1, et al.). In the Acts, after the death and ascension of Jesus, disciples are those who confess Him as the Messiah, Christians (Acts 6 1.2.7; 9 36 [fem., mathētria]; 11 26, "The disciples were called Christians"). Even half-instructed believers who had been baptized only with the baptism of John are disciples (Acts 19 1-4).

(2) We have also the vb., μαθητεύω, mathēteuō, "Jesus' disciple" (lit. "was discipled to Jesus," Mt 27 57); "Make disciples of all the nations" (AV "teach," Mt 28 19); "had made many disciples" (AV "taught many," Acts 14 21); "every scribe who hath been made a disciple to the kingdom of heaven" (AV "instructed," Mt 13 52). The disciple of Christ today may be described in the words of Farrar, as "one who believes His doctrines, rests upon His sacrifice, imbibes His spirit, and imitates His example."

The OT has neither the term nor the exact idea, though there is a difference between teacher and scholar among David's singers (1 Ch 25 8), and among the prophetic guilds the distinction between the rank and file and the leader (1 S 19 20; 2 K 6 5).

G. H. TREVER

DISCIPLINE, dis'i-plin (מִצְוָה, mūṣār): In AV only in Job 36 10, where it refers to moral discipline, the strenuous cultivation of the righteous life; RV "instruction." RV in 2 Tim 1 7 has "discipline" for a Gr word (sōphronismós) meaning "sobering"; in 2 Tim 3 16 m, for Gr paideia, "instruction." In classic Gr paideia means "education," mental culture. Through the influence of the LXX, which translates the Heb mūṣār by paideia, the meaning of "chastisement" accompanies paideia in the NT. Cf He 12 5.7.8.11. See CHASTISEMENT; and for ecclesiastical discipline see CHURCH.

DISCOMFIT, dis-kum'fit, DISCOMFITURE, dis-kum'fi-tūr (הָיָה, hūm, מְהִימָה, m'hūmah): These words are now obsolete or at least obsolescent and are confined in Bib. lit. wholly to the OT. The meaning in general is "to annoy," "harass," "confuse," "rout" and "destroy." The most common usage is that based upon the root meaning, "to trouble" or "annoy," sometimes to the point of destruction (Josh 10 10; Jgs 4 15; 1 S 7 10; 2 S 22 15).

The AV errs in the tr in Isa 31 8, where the meaning is obviously "to become subject to task work" or "to place a burden upon one." There seems also to be an unwarranted use of the word in Nu 14 45, where it means rather "to bruise" or "strike." The purest use is perhaps in 1 S 14 20, where the statement is made that "every man's sword was against his fellow, and there was a very great discomfiture." WALTER G. CLIFFINGER

DISCOURSE, dis-kōrs': In RV of Acts 20 7.9, the tr of Gr diálogoi (AV "preach"), elsewhere rendered, according to the implications of the context, "reason" or "dispute," as Acts 17 2; 19 9 (AV "disputing," RV "reasoning"); Jude ver 9.

DISCOVER, dis-kuv'ēr: In modern usage the word "discover" signifies "to get first sight or knowledge of," "to ascertain," or "to explore." Such usage appears in 1 S 22 6 of the discovery of David's hiding-place, where the Heb uses יָדָה, yādha'. In AV the word "discover" often occurs in a sense now archaic or even obsolete. (Note in the cases cited below the Heb word is גָּלָה, gālāh, except Jer 13 26 [הָשַׁף, hāshaph, "to make bare"] and Hab 3 13 [עָרָר, ārār, "to make naked"].) (1) "To exhibit," "uncover" (or "betray"), in which examples ERV also reads with AV "discover"; ARV "uncover" (Ex 20 26; Job 12 22; Isa 57 8 ["discovered thyself" AV and ERV]; Jer 13 26; Lam 2 14; Hos 7 1; Nah 3 5). (2) "To cause to be no longer a covering," "to lay bare" (2 S 22 16 AV). (3) "To bring to light," "disclose" (1 S 14 8.11 [ERV with AV "discover"]). (4) "To unmask" or "reveal oneself" (Prov 18 2 AV). (5) "To take away the covering of" (Isa 22 8 AV). (6) "To lay bare" (Hab 3 13). In Ps 29 9, AV reads: "The voice of the Lord . . . discovereth the forests," where RV reads, "strippeth the forests bare," i.e. "strippeth the forests of their leaves" (Perowne, The Psalms, I, 248); "strippeth bare the forests" (Briggs, Psalms, I, 251, 253).

In the NT (AV), the word "discover" occurs as a tr of the Gr anaphánantes in Acts 21 3, and for katenōon in Acts 27 39, where RV reads in the first instance "had come in sight of," and in the latter case "perceived." W. N. STEARNS

DISCREPANCIES, dis-krep'an-siz, BIBLICAL, bib'li-kal: By this term should be understood substantial disagreements in the statements of Bib. writers. Such disagreements might subsist between the statements of different writers or between the several statements of a single writer. Contradictions of Bib. views from extra-Bib. sources as history, natural science, philosophy, do not fall within the scope of our subject.

Observant Bible readers in every age have noted, with various degrees of insight, that the Scriptures exhibit manifold interior differences

2. Criticism and contrasts. Differences of literary v. Doctrine form and method have ever seemed, of Inerrancy except to those who maintained a mechanical theory of inspiration, wholly natural and fitting. Moreover, that there was progress in the Bib. revelation, esp. that the NT of Jesus Christ signifies a vastly richer revelation of God than the OT, has been universally recognized. In fulfilling the law and the prophets Christ put a marked distance between Himself and them, yet He certainly affirmed rather than denied them. The Christian church has ever held to the essential unity of the Divine library of the Holy Scriptures. Moreover, the evangelical churches have recognized the Bible as "the only and sufficient rule of both faith and practice." Indeed, in the generation following the Reformation, the strictest and most literal theory of inspiration and inerrancy found general acceptance. Over against such a body of presuppositions, criticism, some generations later, began to allege certain errors and discrepancies in the Bible. Of course the orthodox sought to repel all these claims; for they felt that the Bible, whatever the appearances might seem to indicate, must be free from error, else it could not be the word of God. So there came with criticism a long period of sturdy defence of the strictest doctrine of Bib. inerrancy. Criticism, however, kept on its way. It has forced the church to find a deeper and surer ground of confidence in the authority of the Bible as the witness to God's self-revelation to man. In our day the church has for the most part overcome the notion that the certainty of the saving grace of God in Christ stands or falls with the absolute inerrancy of each several statement contained in the Bible. Still there remains, and doubtless ever must remain, a need of a clear understanding of the issue involved in the allegation—along with other "human limitations"—of Bib. discrepancies.

Alleged discrepancies pertain (1) to statements of specific, concrete facts, and (2) to the utterance of principles and doctrines. Under the

3. Synopsis first head fall disagreements respecting the ing numbers, dates, the form and order of historical events, records of spoken words, geography, natural history, etc.

Under the second head fall disagreements respecting moral and religious truths, the "superhistorical" realities and values. Our inquiry resolves itself into three parts: (1) to determine whether there be discrepancies, of either or both sorts, in the Bible; (2) to obtain at least a general understanding of the conditions and causes that may have given rise to the discrepancies, real or apparent; (3) to determine their significance for faith.

As to the first point, it should be observed that apparent inconsistencies may not be real ones; as so often in the past, so again it may come about that the discovery of further data may resolve many an apparent contradiction. On the other hand, the affirmation a priori that there can be and are no real discrepancies in the Bible is not only an outrage upon the human understanding, but it stands also in contradiction to the spirit of freedom that is of faith. Besides, it should not be overlooked that the discoveries of modern historical and archaeological research, which have tended to confirm so many Bib. statements, seem just as surely to reveal error in others. In any event we must bow to reality, and we may do this with fearless confidence in "the God of things as they are." But are there real discrepancies in the Bible? It is no part of the present plan to attempt the impossible and at all events useless task of exhibiting definite statistics of all the alleged discrepancies, or even of all the principal ones. Passing by the childish folly that would find a "discrepancy" in mere rhetorical antitheses, such as that in Prov 26 4,5 ("Answer not a fool," and "Answer a fool according to his folly"), or instances of merely formal contrariety of expression, where the things intended are manifestly congruous (e.g. Mt 12 30; Lk 11 23 contrasted with Mk 9 40; Lk 9 50: "He that is not with me is against me," "He that is not against us is for us"), it will serve our purpose to notice a few representative examples of real or apparent discrepancy. The chronologies of K and Ch are inconsistent (cf CHRONOLOGY OF OT). The genealogies in Gen 46; Nu 26; 1 Ch 2-7 show considerable variations. The two lists of exiles who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2; Neh 7 6ff) show many discrepancies, including a marked difference in the enumeration. The accounts of the creation in Gen 1 and 2 (cf CREATION)—to take an example dependent upon the results of modern criticism—are mutually independent and in important particulars diverse. But the center of interest in our inquiry is the gospel history. Since Tatian and his Diatessaron in the 2d cent., the variations and contrasts in the Gospels have not only been noted and felt, but many have striven to "harmonize" them. After all, however, there remain some irreducible differences. The Gospels, generally speaking, do not give us ipsissima verba of Jesus; in reporting His discourses they show many variations. In so far as the essential meaning is the same in all, no one speaks of discrepancies; but where the variation clearly involves a difference of meaning (e.g. Mt 12 39,40 and Lk 11 29,30), one may say that at least a technical discrepancy exists. In recording sayings or events the evangelists manifestly do not always observe the same chronological order; Lk, e.g. records in wholly different connections sayings which Mt includes as parts of the Sermon on the Mount (e.g. the Lord's Prayer, Mt 6 9ff; Lk 11 1-4; cf JESUS CHRIST; CHRONOLOGY OF NT). We have two distinct genealogies of Jesus (Mt 1 1-16; Lk 3 23ff; cf GENEALOGY). We may even note that Pilate's superscription over the cross of Jesus is given in four distinct forms. Here, however, the discrepancy is not real except in the most technical sense, and is worth mentioning only to show that the evangelists' interest does not lie in a mere objective accuracy. That a perfect agreement as to the significance of an event exists where there are undeniable discrepancies in external details may be illustrated by the two accounts of the healing of the centurion's servant (Mt 8 5ff; Lk 7 1ff). Of enormously greater interest are the various accounts of the appearances of the risen Christ. If a complete certainty as to the form and order of these events is necessary to faith, the case is not a happy one, for the harmonists have been unable to render a perfect account of these matters (cf JESUS CHRIST; RESURRECTION). Turning from the Gospels to apostolic history, we meet some real problems, e.g. how to relate Paul's autobiographical notes in Gal 1 with the accounts in Acts.

The discrepancies thus far noted pertain to historical matters, and not one of them involves the contradiction of a fact in which faith is interested. But are there also real discrepancies in matters of doctrine? Many scholars maintain, for instance, that the ideal of the prophets and that of the priestly class stand in a relative (not absolute) opposition to each other (cf, e.g. Isa 1 11; Mic 6 8 with the ritualism of Lev and Dt). Or, to turn to the NT, some would assert—among them Luther—that James stands in opposition to Paul in respect to faith and works (cf Jas 2 17ff in contrast with Gal 2 16 and many other passages in Paul). But particular interest attaches to the problem of Christ's attitude toward the OT law. His "but I say unto you" (Mt 5 22 and passim) has been interpreted by many as a distinct contradiction of the OT. Another question of acute interest is the agreement of the Johannine picture of Jesus with that of the Synoptists.

It can scarcely require proof that some of these alleged discrepancies are not such at all. For example, Jesus' attitude toward the OT was one of profound reverence and affirmation. He was perfectly conscious that the OT law represented a stage in the Divine education of mankind. His "but I say unto you" was not a denying of the degree of advancement represented by the OT law, but a carrying out of the principle of the law to its full expression (cf LAW; FULFILMENT). Of course, the Divine education of Israel did not mean the mere inculcation of the truth in a fallow and hitherto unoccupied soil. There was much superstition and error to be overcome. If then one should insist that the errors, which revelation was destined to overcome, still manifest themselves here and there in the OT, it may be replied that at all events the one grand tendency of Divine revelation is unmistakably clear. An idea is not "Scriptural" simply by virtue of its having been incidentally expressed by a Biblical writer, but because it essentially and inseparably belongs to the organic whole of the Biblical testimony. In the case of James v. Paul the antithesis is one of emphasis, not of contradiction of a first principle. And as for the variations in the gospel history, these do not deserve to be called real discrepancies so long as the Gospels unite in giving one harmonious picture and testimony concerning the personal life and the work and teaching of Jesus. Even from this point of view, John, though so much more theological, preaches the same Christ as the Synoptists.

As to the conditions under which discrepancies may arise, it may suffice, first, to call attention to the general law that God in revealing Himself to men and in moving men by His Spirit to speak or write, never lifts them out of the normal relations of human intelligence, so far as matters of history or science are concerned. It is their witness to Himself and His will which is the result of revelation and inspiration. Their references to history and Nature are not therefore in any sense superhuman; accordingly they have no direct authority for faith (cf REVELATION; INSPIRATION). On this basis the divergences of human traditions or documents as exhibited in different genealogies, chronologies and the like are natural in the best sense and wholly fitting. As for the rest, errors of copyists have played a part.

Faith, however, has no interest in explaining away the human limitations in God's chosen witnesses. It is God's way to place the heavenly "treasure in earthen vessels" (2 Cor 4 7). It seems that God has purposely led the church to see, through the necessity of recognizing the human limitations of the Bible, just where her faith is grounded. God has made Himself known through His Son. The Scriptures of the NT, and of the OT in preparation for Him, give us a clear and sufficient testimony to the Christ of God. The clearness and persuasive power of that testimony make all questions of verbal and other formal agreement essentially irrelevant. The certainty that God has spoken unto us in His Son and that we have this knowledge through the Scripture testimony lifts us above all anxious concern for the possible errors of the witnesses in matters evidently nonessential.

DISCUS, dis'kus (δίσκος, dískos, "the summons of the discus," 2 Macc 4 14 m, "to the game of the discus," AV "the game of discus"): The discus was a round stone slab or metal plate of considerable weight (a kind of quoit), the contest of throwing which to the greatest distance was one of the exercises in the Gr gymnasia, being included in the pentathlon. It was introduced into Jerus by Jason the high priest in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, 175-164 BC, in the Palaestra he had formed there in imitation of the Gr games. His conduct led to his being described in 2 Macc 4 13.14 as that "ungodly man" through whom even the priests forsook their duties to play at the discus. A statue of a discobolos (discus-thrower) is in the British Museum. From discus we have the words "disc," "dish," "desk." See GAMES.

DISEASE, di-zēz', DISEASES, di-zēz'iz (חֲלָה, halāh, חֲלָי, hōlī; νόσος, nósos): Palestine, from its position and physical conditions, ought to be a healthy country. That it is not so depends on the unsanitary conditions in which the people live and the absence of any attempts to check the introduction or development of zymotic diseases. The number of marshes or pools is fairly small, and the use of active measures to destroy the larvae of mosquitos might easily diminish or abolish the malarial fevers which now prevail all over the country. The freeing of Ismāīlīeh and Port Said from these pests is an object-lesson in sanitation. When one examines the conditions of life in towns and villages all over the country, the evidences of the ravages of these fevers and their sequelae appear on every hand as they affect all ages from infancy to middle age, and one meets but few individuals of extreme old age. The absence of any adequate system of drainage and the pollution of the water supplies are also factors of great importance in preserving this unhealthiness.

In ancient times it was regarded as healthier than Egypt, as it well might be, hence the diseases of Egypt are referred to as being worse than those of Pal (Dt 7 15; 28 60; Am 4 10). The sanitary regulations and restrictions of the PC would doubtless have raised the standard of public health, but it is unlikely that these were ever observed over any large area.

The types of disease which are referred to in the Bible are those that still prevail. Fevers of several kinds, dysentery, leprosy, intestinal worms, plague, nervous diseases such as paralysis and epilepsy, insanity, ophthalmia and skin diseases are among the commonest and will be described under their several names. Methods of treatment are described under MEDICINE; PHYSICIAN. The word "disease" or "diseases" in AV is changed to "sickness" in RV in 2 K 1 2; 8 8; Mt 9 35, and left out in Jn 5 4; while in Mt 8 17 "sicknesses" is replaced by "diseases." RV also changes "infirmity" in Lk 7 21 to "diseases," and in Ps 38 7 "a loathsome disease" is changed to "burning."

DISH: The rendering in EV in some connections of three Heb and one Gr word. The ḵe'ārāh of Ex 25 29; 37 16; Nu 4 7 was apparently a kind of salver, in this case of gold, for holding the loaves of the "presence bread." The same word represents the silver "platters" (Nu 7 13 ff) brought by the princes as a dedication gift. The ṣēphel of Jgs 6 25 was a large bowl, so trd in Jgs 6 38. "Lordly dish" is lit. "bowl of [fit for] nobles." The callahath of 2 K 21 13; Prov 19 24; 26 15 (last two AV "bosom" after LXX) refers probably to the wide, deep dish in which the principal part of the meal was served. Of somewhat similar form may have been the trāblion (LXX for ḵe'ārāh) mentioned in connection with the Passover meal (Mt 26 23; Mk 14 20).

BENJAMIN RENO DOWNER

DISHAN, dī'shan, DISHON, dī'shon (דִּישָׁן, dīshān, דִּישֹׁן, dīshōn, "antelope," "pygarg"): A Horite clan, mentioned as the youngest "son" and elsewhere as the "grandson" of Seir. The form Dishon occurs several times in the list of Horite clans, together with many other totem names (Gen 36 passim; 1 Ch 1 38.41). See Gray, HPN, 89.

DISHONESTY, dis-on'es-ti: Only in 2 Cor 4 2, the AV rendering of Gr aischúnē; AV elsewhere and RV uniformly, "shame."

DISOBEDIENCE, dis-ō-bē'di-ens, DISOBEDIENT (מָרָה, mārāh; ἀπειθέω, apeithēō, παρακούω, parakouō): The word used chiefly in the NT has the general meaning of a lack of regard for authority or rulership. The stronger meaning of actual stubbornness or violence is perhaps conveyed in the OT (1 K 13 26; Neh 9 26; cf 1 K 13 21).

In the NT there seem to be two rather clearly defined uses of the word, one objective and practical, the other ethical and psychological. The first refers more to conduct, the second to belief and one's mental attitude toward the object of disobedience. To the first belong such passages as refer to the overt act of disobedience to one's parents (Rom 1 30; 2 Tim 3 2). Illustrating this more fully, the tr according to the AV of 1 Tim 1 9 is given as "unruly" in the RV. By far the greater emphasis, however, is placed upon the distinctly ethical quality in which disobedience is really an attitude of the mind and finds its essence in a heart of unbelief and unfaithfulness (1 Pet 2 7.8; Eph 2 2; 5 6; Col 3 6). In the latter three references "children [sons] of disobedience" are mentioned, as if one should become the very offspring of such an unhappy and unholy state of mind. The classic phrase of NT lit. (Acts 26 19) contains both the practical and the ethical aspects. Paul's convictions were changed by the vision and his conduct was made to conform immediately to it. WALTER G. CLIPPINGER

DISORDERLY, dis-ôr'dēr-li (ἀτακτος, ataktos): The word is found four times in the Epp. to the Thess (1 Thess 5 14; 2 Thess 3 6.7.11), "Withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh d."; "We behaved not ourselves d."; "We hear of some that walk among you d." The word is a military term and has reference to the soldier who does not keep the ranks (inordinatus, Liv). Then it refers to people who refuse to obey the civil laws, and thus it gets its meaning, "disorderly." It points to members in the early church, who, by their lives, became a reproach to the gospel of Christ (cf 1 Thess 4 11.12). HENRY E. DOSKER

DISPATCH, dis-pach': Occurs Tob 7 8 in the sense of dispatch of business, "Let this business be dispatched" (RV "finished"); 2 Macc 12 18, "before he had dispatched anything" (RV "without accomplishing"); Wisd 11 19 [20] in the sense of finishing, destroying, "dispatch them at once" (RV "consume"); 2 Macc 9 4 "dispatch the journey" (katanélein), which may mean "finish it quickly." RV spells "despatch."

DISPENSATION, dis-pen-sā'shun: The Gr word (oikonomia) so tr<sup>d</sup> signifies primarily, a stewardship, the management or disposition of affairs intrusted to one. Thus 1 Cor 9 17, AV "A dispensation of the gospel is committed unto me," RV "I have a stewardship intrusted to me." The idea is similar in Eph 3 2 || Col 1 25 (RVm "stewardship"). In Eph 1 10 God's own working is spoken of as a "dispensation."

DISPERSION, dis-pûr'shun, THE (διασπορά, diasporá):

The Dispersion is the comprehensive designation applied to Jews living outside of Pal and maintaining their religious observances and customs among the Gentiles. They were and known as the Gōlāh (Aram. Gālūthā), the captivity—an expression describing them in relation to their own land; and the Diaspora, the Dispersion, an expression describing them in relation to the nations among whom they were scattered. On a notable occasion Jesus said, "Ye shall seek me, and shall not find me: and where I am, ye cannot come. The Jews therefore said among themselves, Whither will this man go that we shall not find him? Will he go unto the Dispersion among the Greeks, and teach the Greeks?" (Jn 7 34.35).

In 2 Macc certain priests of Jerus are represented as praying to God: "Gather together our Dispersion, set at liberty them that are in

2. Purpose of the Dispersion 1 1). The thought of such a Dispersion as a punishment for the disobedience of the people finds frequent expression in the Prophets: Hosea (9 3), Jeremiah (8 3; 16 15, etc), Ezekiel (4 13), and Zechariah (10 9). And it appears also in the Deuteronomic Law (Dt 28 25; 30 1). That the Dispersion of the Jews was for the benefit of the Gentiles is a conception to which expression is given in utterances of psalmists and prophets (Ps 67; Mic 5 7, etc). It is found also in the Apoc Bar, a work belonging to the 1st cent. AD: "I will scatter this people among the Gentiles, that they may do good to the Gentiles" (1 7).

The causes of the Dispersion most obvious to the student of OT history were the Assy and Bab

3. Causes of the Dispersion carried Israel away into his own land and placed them in Halah, and in Habor by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes (2 K 17 5 ff); and when in the reign of Nebuchadrezzar, king of Babylon, Judah was carried away into Babylonia (2 K 24 14). See CAPTIVITY. But there were other captivities which helped to scatter the children of Abraham. Ptolemy I of Egypt (322-285 BC) by his expeditions to Pal and his capture of Jerus added largely to the Jewish population of Alexandria. Antiochus the Great of Syria (223-187 BC) removed from the Jewish communities in Mesopotamia and Babylon 2,000 families and settled them in Phrygia and Lydia (Jos, Ant, XII, iii, 4). Pompey after his capture of Jerus in 63 BC carried off hundreds of Jews to Rome, where they were sold as slaves, but, afterward, many of them obtained their freedom and civic rights.

There was, besides, a voluntary emigration of Jewish settlers for purposes of trade and commerce into the neighboring countries, and esp. into the chief cities of the civilized world. The successors of Alexander, and their successors in turn, encouraged immigration into their territories and the mingling of nationalities. They needed colonists for the settlements and cities which they established, and with the offer of citizenship and facilities for trade and commerce they attracted many of the Jewish people.

"In this way," says Philo, "Jerus became the capital, not only of Judaea, but of many other lands, on account of the colonies which it sent out from time to time into the bordering districts of Egypt, Phoenicia, Syria, Coele-Syria, and into the more distant regions of Pamphylia, Cilicia, the greater part of Asia Minor as far as Bithynia, and the remotest corners of Pontus. And in like manner into Europe: into Thessaly, and Boeotia, and Macedonia, and Aetolia, and Attica and Argos, and Corinth, and into the most fertile and fairest parts of the Peloponnesus. And not only is the continent full of Jewish colonists, but also the most important islands, such as Euboea, Cyprus, and Crete. I say nothing of the countries beyond the Euphrates. All of them except a very small portion, and Babylon, and all the satrapies which contain fruitful land, have Jewish inhabitants" (Philo, Leg ad Caium, 36).

About the middle of the 2d cent. BC the Sibylline Oracles could say of the Jewish people: "Every land and every sea is full of thee" (3 271). About the same period the Rom Senate, being anxious to extend protection to the Jews, had a circular letter written in their favor to the kings of Egypt, Syria, Pergamum, Cappadocia and Parthia, and to a great number of provinces, cities and islands of the Mediterranean, where presumably there was a larger or smaller number of Jews (1 Macc 15 15 ff). It is no surprise, therefore, to read that for the Feast of Pentecost at Jerus, there were present after the ascension of Jesus: "Parthians and Medes and Elamites, and the dwellers in Mesopotamia, in Judaea and Cappadocia, in Pontus and Asia, in Phrygia and Pamphylia, in Egypt and the parts of Libya about Cyrene, and sojourners from Rome, both Jews and proselytes, Cretans and Arabians" (Acts 2 9-12).

The Eastern Dispersion, caused by the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities, seems to have increased and multiplied, and to have enjoyed a considerable measure of liberty, and of prosperity. When the return from the captivity took place under Zerubabel, it was only a small proportion of the exiles who sought a home again in the land of their fathers. Nor did the numbers who accompanied Ezra from Babylon greatly diminish the exiles who remained behind. In the time of Christ, Jos could speak of the Jews in Babylonia by "innumerable myriads" (Ant. XI, v, 2). He also tells us of the 2,000 Jewish families whom Antiochus transferred from Babylon and Mesopotamia to Phrygia and Syria. Of the peculiarities of the Jews as a people living apart and observing their own customs and arousing the ill-will of the neighbors, we have a glimpse in the Pers period in the Book of Est (3 8). Babylonia remained a focus of eastern Judaism for centuries, and from the discussions in rabbinical schools there were elaborated the Talm of Jerus in the 5th cent. of our era, and the Talm of Babylon a cent. later. The two chief centers of Mesopotamian Judaism were Nehardea, a town on the Euphrates, and Nisibis on the Mygdonius, an affluent of the Chaboras, which were also centers of Syrian Christianity.

The Egypt Dispersion is of special interest and importance, and recent discoveries have thrown unexpected light upon it. As far back as the days of Shesheng, the Egyptian founder of the 22d Dynasty, the Shishak of 1 K 14 25 f; 2 Ch 12 2 f, who invaded Pal in the 10th cent. BC, and engraved on the S. wall of the great Temple of Karnak the names of many districts and cities he had captured, prisoners of war and hostages may have been carried off to Egypt by the conqueror. At a later time Jewish mercenaries are said to have fought in the expedition of Psammetichus II against Ethiopia, to which expedition belong the famous inscriptions of Abu Simbel (594-589 BC). So we learn from the well-known Letter of Aristeas. But the clearest and best-known example of a settlement of Jews in Egypt is that connected with the prophet Jeremiah. When Gedaliah, the governor of Judaea, after the destruction of Jerus in 586 BC, had been treacherously murdered, the depressed and dispirited remnant under Johanan, the son of Kareah, resolved to take flight into Egypt, against the counsel of Jeremiah. A host of fugitives, including Jeremiah and his friend Baruch, accordingly set out thither, and settled at Migdol and Tahpanhes and Noph (Memphis), and in the country of Pathros in upper Egypt (Jer 43, 44). It was in Egypt with those fugitives that Jeremiah ended his life. Many of the fugitives were taken prisoners by Nebuchadrezzar on one of his latest expeditions to the west, and were transported to Babylon (Jos, Ant. X, ix, 7; cf Jer 43 8 f).

Of this colony of Jews it is natural to see a strong confirmation in the recent discovery of Aram. papyri at Assouan, the Syene of the ancients. The papyri were the contents of a deed box of a member of a Jewish colony in upper Egypt, and the deeds refer to house property in which Jews are concerned. Here then at Assouan, about 470 BC is a colony of Jews who have acquired houses and other property, and have become bankers and money lenders, within a cent. of the death of Jeremiah. In the papyri there is evidence of the existence of a tribunal of the Hebrews, a court where cases could be decided, as fully recognized by law as any of the other courts, Egypt or Pers, for Egypt, "the basest of kingdoms," was then subject to a Pers suzerain. Most significant of all, Jeh is acknowledged as the God of the Jews, and the existence of a chapel and even of an altar of sacrifice is beyond all doubt. Evidently these Jews in Egypt did not consider that an altar of Jeh could not stand anywhere else than at Jerus, or that outside Jerus the worship of the synagogue was the only worship of the God of their fathers. These facts are rendered still more striking when we regard them as a fulfilment of Isaiah's prophecy: "In that day there shall be five cities in the land of Egypt that speak the language of Canaan, and swear to Jehovah of hosts; one shall be called the city of destruction. In that day there shall be an altar to Jehovah in the midst of the land of Egypt, and a pillar at the border thereof to Jehovah" (Isa 19 18, 19). These papyri give information similar to that which the clay tablets discovered at Nippur give regarding the house of Murashu Sons (see CAPTIVITY) about the same time—the time when Ezra was setting out from Babylon to restore at Jerus the worship of the temple which Zerubabel had rebuilt. It was just about a cent. from the time that Jeremiah had gone down to Egypt that we have the first of these deeds, and it was the grandfathers, or great-grandfathers, of the persons concerned whom he had accompanied thither so much against his will.

These papyri were discovered in 1904, and a year or two later, additional papyri were discovered in a mound which stands on the site of the ancient Elephantine or Yeb, an island in the Nile, on the frontier also. One of these papyri contains a petition from the Jewish colony in Elephantine addressed to Bagohi (called Bagoas by Jos, Ant. XI, vii, 7), the Pers governor of Judah, about 408 BC. They ask for assistance to enable them to rebuild the temple of Jeh in Elephantine, which had been destroyed at the instigation of the priests of the ram-headed Egypt god Khnub, who had a temple in the fortress of Yeb or Elephantine. This Jewish temple had been erected to Jeh at least 125 years before and had been spared by Cambyes in 525 BC when he destroyed all the temples erected to the gods of Egypt. The destruction of the temple at Yeb occurred in the 14th year of Darius, 411 BC. It contained an altar for burnt sacrifice, and there were gold and silver vessels in which the blood of sacrifice was collected. The head of the college of priests presenting this petition is Jedoniah, a name found in an abbreviated form in Jadon (Neh 3 7).

An attempt has been made to show that the bearers of these Heb names were descended from the captivity of the Northern Kingdom. It is suggested that they had come into Egypt with the Pers army under Cambyes from their adopted homes in Assyria and the cities of the Medes and had obtained possessions on the southern frontier of Egypt. Names believed to point to the Northern Kingdom, like Hosea and Menahem, occur very frequently, but this is too narrow a foundation for such a theory, and the Israelitish origin of the Syene colonists is not established (JQR [1907], 441 ff). There is more to be said in favor of the view that they were the descendants of a Jewish military colony. That Jewish mercenaries fought in the campaigns of the Pharaohs we have already seen. And that Elephantine was an important garrison town on the frontier is also certain. Jos (Ant. XIV, vi, 2) mentions a Jewish military colony holding a post at Pelusium in the cent. before Christ, and this might be a similar garrison stationed at the opposite extremity of the land in the 5th cent. Such a garrison would attract Jews engaged in business and in the occupations of civil life, and so a distinct Jewish community would be formed. It has even been suggested that the tidings of the destruction of the temple at Jerus furnished the motive to these Egypt Jews to build the temple and rear the altar of burnt offering which the heathen priests of Khnub had destroyed.

While the petition to the religious authorities at Jerus indicates that the priests of Elephantine regarded their temple as dependent upon the temple at Jerus, it is significant that they were also, as is shown in their letter in communication with Delaiah and Shelemiah the sons of Sanballat, the governor of Samaria. That this was Nehemiah's enemy (Neh 4 1; 6 1, etc.) is impossible, for he lived nearly a cent. earlier. But the association with descendants of his, themselves Samaritans, gives a schismatical appearance to the position of the Elephantine temple. The existence of this temple with its priesthood, its altar of sacrifice, and its offerings, from 500 years BC, is an important fact in the history of the Dispersion. It was meant to keep those Jewish exiles true to the religion of their fathers and in religious fellowship with their brethren in Pal. For a like purpose the Temple of Onias at Leontopolis was erected in the early years of the Maccabean struggle. Onias had to flee from Jerus with a number of priests and Levites, and for the aid he rendered to Ptolemy Philometor, the king of Egypt, he received a gift of land upon which he built a temple like to the Temple at Jerus. Professor Flinders Petrie believes he has discovered this temple of Onias IV at Tel el-Yehudiyeh (Hyksos and Israelite Cities, 31). The discovery confirms the account given of the temple by Jos, who is our only authority for its erection (Ant, XIII, iii, 2; XIV, viii, 2).

The Elephantine-Syene papyri have added a new and valuable chapter to OT history. We know now of a Jewish temple in Egypt which certainly reaches 400 years farther into antiquity than the temple of Onias IV at Leontopolis, and we obtain important information as to the relations of its priesthood with the leaders of the Jerus Jews and the Samaritans. We know now from unbiased authorities that the Jewish settlements in the Valley of the Nile are much older than has hitherto been believed. We have valuable confirmation not only of the notices in the Book of Jer, but also of the statements in the later Hellenistic lit. Moreover, it is now shown that the skepticism which has prevailed in some quarters as to the very existence of any considerable Egypt Dispersion before the time of Alexander the Great is unwarranted (Peters, Die jüdische Gemeinde von Elephantine-Syene, 50 f; Schürer, GJV, III, 19f).

What exactly were the fortunes of this Jewish community at a later time, no record has yet been found to tell. Possibly it decayed in course of time, for Herodotus who visited Egypt about 450 BC makes no mention of it and found no Jews in sufficient numbers to attract his attention. It was undoubtedly with the founding of Alexandria in 332 BC that the flourishing period of Judaism in Egypt commenced. Alexander the Great had hastened from the field of victory at Issus 333 BC, through Syria by way of Tyre, the siege of which occupied him some months, showing clemency to the inhabitants of Jerus and severity to the recalcitrant inhabitants of Gaza till by its eastern gate he entered Egypt and took possession of the land of the Pharaohs. The Jews appear to have been friendly to Macedonian conquest, and in Alexander's new city they received the rights of citizenship and two quarters all to themselves. That they were restricted to their own quarters does not appear, and in the time of Philo, at the commencement of the Christian era, they had synagogues and places of prayer in all parts of the city. Alexander died in 323 BC but the favor which he had accorded to the Jews was continued by the Ptolemies who succeeded to his Egypt empire. The first Ptolemy, Lagi or Soter (322-285 BC), increased the Jewish population of Alexandria by raids into Pal on which he brought back a large number of captives, both Jews and Samaritans. Other Jews, hearing of his liberality and of the prosperity of their coreligionists, were attracted to Egypt and settled in Alexandria of their own accord (Jos, Ant, XII, i, 1). Under their own ethnarch they enjoyed great prosperity and had full religious liberty. The principal synagogue of the city was on a scale of great magnificence. In the reign of Ptolemy Philometor (182-146 BC) they were allowed to set up the temple at Leontopolis, as we have already noticed. In the time of Philo the Jewish colony in Egypt was considered to number a million.

It was in Alexandria that the Jews first came so powerfully under the influence of Hellenism, and here that the peculiar Graeco-Jewish philosophy sprang up of which Philo was the most notable representative. The same soil was eminently favorable to early Christianity which had from the end of the 2d cent. onward its greatest teachers and their learned catechetical school. See ALEXANDRIA.

The great monument of Hellenistic Judaism, which had its chief seat in Alexandria, is the LXX tr of the OT, which became such a powerful praeparatio evangelica, and was the Bible of the Apostles and the first Christians, even of the Lord Jesus Christ Himself. It is ascribed in the Letter of Aristaeas to the interest of Ptolemy II Philadelphus (285-247 BC) in a proposal to secure a copy of the Jewish Law in an accessible tr for the famous Royal Library. It is more likely that as familiarity with their Heb tongue diminished in their new surroundings, the need of an intelligible version of the Law to begin with was felt, and Jewish hands were set to work to produce it. In course of time the rest followed, but from the tradition of its being the work of 70 or 72 translators it is known as the LXX. See SEPTUAGINT.

The question has been raised whether too much has not been made of a Jewish community in Alexandria so early, and it has been asserted that we can scarcely speak of a Jewish Dispersion anywhere before the Maccabean period in the second half of the 2d cent. BC. The evidence as we have seen points to the existence of Jewish communities continuously from the days of Jeremiah. Papyri prove the presence of Jews in Egypt, not only in the towns but in country districts from a comparatively early period. A remarkable inscription has recently come to light showing that at Schedia, some 20 miles from Alexandria, there existed a Jewish community which had built a synagogue and dedicated it to the honor of Ptolemy III Euergetes (247-222 BC) and his queen Berenice. If such a community was organized in the little town of Schedia at that date, we can well believe the cosmopolitan city of Alexandria to have had a considerable Jewish community at a still earlier date.

When we turn to Syria, we find large numbers of Jews, notwithstanding the hatred of Greeks and Syrians. Jos (BJ, VII, iii, 3) says that it is the country which has the largest percentage of Jewish inhabitants, and Antioch among the towns of Syria had the preëminence. In Damascus, which seems to have had a Jewish quarter or Jewish bazaars in the days of Ahab (1 K 20 34 and Burney's note ad loc.), the Jewish population was numbered by thousands. From Galilee and Gilead and the region of the Hauran, Judas Maccabaeus and his brother Jonathan brought bodies of Jews, who were settlers among a pagan population, for safety to Judaea (1 Macc 5).

Even in Arabia Judaism had considerable footing. Edward Glaser, who prosecuted valuable archaeological researches in Arabia (see Hilprecht, Recent Researches in Bible Lands, 131 ff), professes to have found Himyaritic inscriptions of the 4th and 5th cents. of our era which are monotheistic and therefore Jewish, but there is still uncertainty as to this. In the beginning of the 6th cent. a Jewish king actually reigned in Arabia, and because of his persecution of the Christians he was attacked and overthrown by the Christian king of Abyssinia.

Of the widespread distribution of the Dispersion in Asia Minor there is abundant testimony, not only in the texts of the apostles, but in classical and early Christian lit. and in the epigraphic lit. which has been accumulating for the last 30 years. At Pergamum, in Lydia, in Karia, at Magnesia, at Tralles, at Miletum, in Cappadocia, Bithynia, and Pontus, considerable Jewish communities existed at the beginning of the Christian era. At Smyrna the Jews played a prominent part in the death of Polycarp 155 AD, being esp. zealous in heaping up fagots upon the fire that consumed the martyr. In his Cities and Bishops of Phrygia Sir William Ramsay mentions numerous indications found on inscriptions of Jewish settlers, and his chapter on "The Jews in Phrygia" focuses the results of his inquiries

(op. cit., 667 ff; cf 649 ff). He has also made it extremely probable that long before St. Paul's day there was a strong body of Jews in Tarsus of Cilicia, and he holds that a Jewish colony was settled there as early as 171 BC. "The Seleucid kings," he says, like the Ptolemies, "used the Jews as an element of the colonies which they founded to strengthen their hold on Phrygia and other countries." But it is difficult to trace out the profound influence they exerted in the development of their country from the fact that they adopted to such an extent Gr and Rom names and manners, and were thus almost indistinguishable. At Laodicea and Hierapolis there have been found many evidences of their presence: for example, at the latter place an inscription on a gravestone tells how the deceased Publius Aelius Glycon mortified a sum of money to provide for the decoration of his tomb every year at the Feast of Unleavened Bread.

The Dispersion among the Greeks proper had attained to considerable dimensions in the time of Christ. Philo, as noticed above, mentions Thessaly, Boeotia, Macedonia, Aetolia, Attica, Argos, Corinth and the fairest and most fertile parts of the Peloponnesus as having Jewish inhabitants. Inscriptions recovered from Delphi and elsewhere relating to the manumission of slaves in the 2d cent. BC contain the names of Jews (Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, 325 f). In Sparta and Sicyon, Jews lived in the days of the Maccabees (1 Macc 15 23). At Philippi we know from Acts 16 16 there was a proseuchē, or place of prayer, and at Thessalonica, Berea, Athens, Corinth there were synagogues in St. Paul's time. On the islands of the Greek archipelago and the Mediterranean there were Jews. Cyprus, the home of Barnabas, had a large Jewish population; and Euboea and Crete are named by Philo as Jewish centers. Rhodes has the distinction of having produced two opponents of Judaism in the first half of the 1st cent. BC. Clearchus of Soli, a disciple of Aristotle, introduces in one of his dialogues a Jew from Coele-Syria, Hellenic not in speech only but in mind, representing him as having come in his travels to Asia Minor and there conversed with Aristotle. Such an experience may have been rare so early; the incident may not be fact, but fiction; yet such as it is it tells a tale of the spread of Judaism.

The relations of Rome with the Jewish people lend special interest to the Dispersion there. Jews do not appear to have been settled in Rome before the Maccabean period. There is a certain pathos in the appeal made to the Rom state by Judas Maccabaeus, amid the difficulties that were gathering round his position, for "a league of amity and confederacy" with the Rom people (1 Macc 8 17-32). His brother and successor, Jonathan, followed this up later (12 1-4.16). And in 140 BC Simon sent a delegation which concluded a treaty, offensive and defensive, with Rome, which was duly intimated by the Senate to their allies in various countries, esp. of the East. During the stay of the mission at Rome its members seem to have made attempts at religious propagandism, and the praetor Hispanus compelled them to return to their homes for attempting to corrupt Rom morals by introducing the worship of Jupiter Sabazius which is no doubt the Rom interpretation of the Lord of Hosts (Jehovah Sabaoth). But ere long in Rome, as in Alexandria, they formed a colony by themselves, occupying Trastevere, the Transtiberine portion of the city, together with an island in the Tiber. Their prosperity grew with their numbers. When Cicero in 59 BC was defending Flaccus he speaks of gold being sent out of Italy, and all the provinces, to Jerus, and there was present among his listeners a large body of Jews interested in the case. When Pompey had captured Jerus in 63 BC, he brought back with him to Rome a number of Jewish captives. They were sold as slaves, but many of them received their freedom and rights to citizenship. When Julius Caesar, who was a great patron and protector of the Jews, was assassinated, they wept over him for nights on end. Augustus protected and encouraged them. Tiberius, however, adopted repressive measures toward them, and 4,000 Jews were deported by him to Sardinia while others were driven out of the city. With the downfall of Sejanus, the unworthy favorite of Tiberius, this repressive policy was reversed and they were allowed to return to Rome. Claudius again devised measures against them (c 50 AD), and they were banished from the city. They had, however, so multiplied and they had attained such influence that it was impossible to get rid of them altogether. Their customs and religious observances brought down upon them the scorn of Juvenal and others, while their faith and worship had attractions for the thoughtful and the superstitious.

"The Jews from the time of the first Caesar," says Sir Samuel Dill, "have worked their way into every class of society. A Jewish prince had inspired Caligula with an oriental ideal of monarchy. There were adherents of Judaism in the household of the great freedmen of Claudius, and their growing influence and turbulence compelled that emperor to expel the race from his capital. The worldly, pleasure-loving Poppaea had, perhaps, yielded to the mysterious charms of the religion of Moses. But it was under the Flavians, who had such close associations with Judaea, that Jewish influences made themselves most felt. And in the reign of Domitian, two members of the imperial house, along with many others, suffered for following the Jewish mode of life" (Roman Society from Nero to Marcus Aurelius, 84).

In recent excavations, which have laid bare much of subterranean Rome, many Jewish tombs have been examined and have yielded much additional knowledge of the conditions of Jewish life in the capital of the Caesars. Probably Jews gracing Pompey's triumph after his Syrian campaign, 61 BC, made the first Rom catacombs similar to those on Jewish hillsides and esp. round Jerus; and in these Jewish catacombs pagans and Christians were never laid.

In Italy, apart from Rom and Southern Italy, where they were widely spread, the number of Jews at the beginning of our era was not large. In Southern Gaul they were numerous and in Spain they were numerous and powerful. In North Africa there were Jewish communities in many centers, and Cyrene was the home of a large and flourishing Jewish population.

It is not easy to form a trustworthy estimate of the Jewish population of the world in the times of Christ. Harnack reckons up four or four and a half millions (Expansion of Christianity, I, 10) within the Rom Empire. The Judaism of the Dispersion would at least be several times more numerous than the Judaism of Pal.

The question has been discussed how far the Jews of the Dispersion recruited their ranks by proselytism. That they should maintain a propaganda on behalf of their ancestral faith would only be in keeping with the character of their religion as a religion of revelation. Although they had to live within "the hedge of the Law" to protect them against the corruptions and idolatries of the Gentiles,

19. Among Greeks Proper
The Dispersion among the Greeks proper had attained to considerable dimensions in the time of Christ. Philo, as noticed above, mentions Thessaly, Boeotia, Macedonia, Aetolia, Attica, Argos, Corinth and the fairest and most fertile parts of the Peloponnesus as having Jewish inhabitants. Such an experience may have been rare so early; the incident may not be fact, but fiction; yet such as it is it tells a tale of the spread of Judaism.

20. The Roman Dispersion
The relations of Rome with the Jewish people lend special interest to the Dispersion there. Jews do not appear to have been settled in Rome before the Maccabean period. There is a certain pathos in the appeal made to the Rom state by Judas Maccabaeus, amid the difficulties that were gathering round his position, for "a league of amity and confederacy" with the Rom people (1 Macc 8 17-32). His brother and successor, Jonathan, followed this up later (12 1-4.16). But ere long in Rome, as in Alexandria, they formed a colony by themselves, occupying Trastevere, the Transtiberine portion of the city, together with an island in the Tiber. Their prosperity grew with their numbers. When Cicero in 59 BC was defending Flaccus he speaks of gold being sent out of Italy, and all the provinces, to there was nevertheless at the heart of Judaism a missionary purpose, as we see from the universalism of the Pss and the Prophets. Judaism was burdened with a message which concerned all men, to the effect that there was one God, holy and spiritual, Creator of heaven and earth, who had committed to the family of Abraham in trust for the world His Law. To witness for the Living God, and to proclaim His Law, was the chief element of the Jewish propaganda in the Rom empire, and their system of proselytism enabled them to gain adherents in numbers. In this the OT Scriptures and the observance of the Sabbath were important factors, and enabled them to win the adherence of intelligent and educated people.

That the Jews of the Dispersion had an internal organization with courts of their own, having considerable jurisdiction, not only in spiritual but in civil affairs, there is no doubt. This would only be in accordance with the analogy of their constitution as seen in the NT, and of their commercial organization in many lands to this day.

In all the lands of their Dispersion the Jews never lost touch with the land of their fathers, or Jerus, the city of the Great King. The bond of unity was maintained by the pilgrimages they made from all the countries where they were scattered to their three great national feasts; by the payment of the half-shekel toward the services of the Temple as long as it stood; and by their voluntary submission, so long as they had a national polity, to the decrees of the great Sanhedrin.

That Judaism was influenced in its Dispersion by contact of the larger world of life and thought in which the Jews had their place outside of Pal we can see by the example of Alexandria. It was there that it felt most powerfully the penetrating and pervasive influence of Gr thought, and the large apocryphal and apocalyptic lit. which sprang up there is one of the most notable results. "The Alexandrian Jew was in reality both a Jew and a Greek; he held the faith of Jeh and sincerely worshipped the God of his fathers, but he spoke the Gr language, had received a Gr education, and had contracted many Gr ideas and habits. Still those in his position were Jews first, and Greeks afterward, and on all 'the fundamentals' were in thorough sympathy with their Palestinian brethren" (Fairweather, From the Exile to the Advent, 109 f).

The Jewish people thus widely distributed over the Rom world with their monotheism, with their Scriptures, and with their Messianic hopes, did much to prepare the way for the advent of the Redeemer who was to be the fulfilment of Jewish expectation and hope. It was due to the strange and unique influence of Judaism and to the circulation of the glowing visions of Israel's prophets among the nations, that there was so widespread an expectation, mentioned by Tacitus, by Suetonius and by Jos, that from Judaea would arise a Ruler whose dominion would be over all. It is now believed that Virgil's conception of the Better Age which was to be inaugurated by the birth of a child was derived from Isaiah's prophecies. And not only did the Jewish Dispersion thus prepare the way for the world's Redeemer in the fulness of the time, but when He had come and suffered and died and risen and ascended, it furnished a valuable auxiliary to the proclamation of the gospel. Wherever the apostles and the first preachers traveled with the good news, they found Jewish communities to whom they offered first the great salvation. The synagogue services lent themselves most effectively to the ministry of St. Paul and his colleagues, and it was to the synagogue that they first repaired in every city they visited. Even to this day this preservation of "the dispersed of Israel" is one of the marvels of the Divine government of the world, proving the truth of the word of God by one of the earliest prophets: "I will sift the house of Israel among all the nations, like as grain is sifted in a sieve, yet shall not the least kernel fall upon the earth" (Am 9 9).

DISPERSION OF NATIONS. See BABEL; DISPERSION; TABLE OF NATIONS.

DISPOSITION, dis-pō-zish'un (διαρᾱτα, diatagat): Only in Acts 7 53, "received the law by the disposition of angels," where it bears the meaning of "administration"; RV "as it was ordained by angels."

DISPUTATION, dis-pū-tā'shun: In Acts 15 2, RV reads "questioning" for AV "disputation" (Gr guzētēsis). In Rom 14 1, AV "doubtful disputations" becomes in RV "decision of scruples" (Gr diakriseis dialogismōn, lit. "discussions of doubts"). The Gr in neither case implies what the word "dispute" has come to mean in modern Eng., but rather "to discuss" or "argue."

DISTAFF, dis'taf (ῥῥῶ, pelekh): This word occurs once in Prov 31 19; "spindle" is found in the same passage. In RV the meanings of the two words have been exchanged. See SPINNING.

DISTIL, dis-til': Only found twice in the Eng. Bible (Dt 32 2; Job 36 27), in both cases in its original meaning of "to fall in drops," as dew or rain (derived through Fr. from Lat de, "down," stillo, "to drop"). It does not occur in its later technical sense, for the process we call distillation was not known in ancient times.

DISTINCTLY, dis-tinkt'li: Only Neh 8 8, "They read in the book, in the law of God, distinctly." Probably the better rendering is RVm "with an interpretation," i.e. translating into Aram. The Heb word is a part. of vb. pārash = "to make distinct." The corresponding Aram. word occurs in Ezr 4 18 = "plainly" AV and RV, better "translated" RVm.

DITCH, dich: The word is used indiscriminately in AV to represent at least three different ideas: a conduit or trench (2 K 3 16); a reservoir or cistern; or simply a pit or hole in the ground. In RV this distinction is observed more carefully. Cf Job 9 31; Ps 7 15 ("pit"), and Isa 22 11 ("reservoir"), the former meaning a pit or any similar place of destruction or corruption; the latter a reservoir or cistern of water. The NT usage (Mt 15 14 AV) corresponds somewhat with the former. See also 2 K 3 16 ("trenches").

DIVERS, dī'vēr, DIVERSE, dī-vūrs', DIVERSITIES, dī-vūrs'i-tiz: "Divers" meaning "various," "different in kind," is now obsolete and used only as a synonym of "several" i.e. more than one. The distinction between "divers" and "diverse" in AV seems to be that the former is the wider term, the latter being restricted to the meaning of "different in kind," while "divers" is also used to express difference of number. RV retains "diverse" in all instances but changes "divers" nearly everywhere, except where it has the meaning "several." Cf Mt 24 7; Lk 21 11; He 9 10, et al. It is hard to understand why RV retains "divers" as a tr of ποικίλος, poikilos, in Mt 4 24; Mk 1 34, et al., because poikilos certainly cannot have the meaning "several" but "different in kind," and the idea expressed in these passages is not that some of the people had several diseases but that different people had different kinds of diseases. The same is true in He 13 9 where "divers" does not refer to number but to various kinds of teaching. He 2 4 and Jas 1 2 rightly change the reading of AV "divers" to "manifold."

In other passages RV changes "divers" to "diverse," and thus renders the idea of the original text "different in kind." Cf Dt 25 13 f; Prov 20 10, 23. Other passages are changed the better to render the original text: Dt 22 9, "two kinds of seed"; Jgs 5 30, "dyed"; 2 Ch 30 11, "certain men"; Mk 8 3 and Acts 19 9, "some." AV reads in all these passages "divers." RV changes AV He 1 1 "at sundry times and in divers manners," an expression often found in Old Eng., to "by divers portions and in divers manners."

"Diversities" is found twice as tr of διασπείσ, diastresis, lit. "distribution" (1 Cor 12 4 ff), but RV changes AV, 1 Cor 12 28, "diversities" to "divers kinds," as tr of γένη, génē, "kinds."

DIVES, dī'vĕz. See LAZARUS.

DIVIDE, di-vīd': It is difficult to decide whether רָאָה, rāgha' (Job 26 12; Isa 51 15; Jer 31 35) should be rendered "to stir up" or "to still." The Heb has both meanings. Some render "He causes the sea to tremble." RV reads "to stir" in text and "to still" in margin, while AV has "to divide" in all three cases. 2 Ch 35 13, "carried them quickly" (AV "divided them speedily"). Since רָאָה, hālāk, may mean either "to distribute" or "to be smooth," Hos 10 2 reads "their heart is divided" in the text, but offers "smooth" in margin (AV "divided"). The Gr ὀρθοτομέω, orthotomēō, means "to cut straight," hence the more lit. tr of 2 Tim 2 15, "handling aright the word of truth" (note "holding a straight course in the way of truth" or "rightly dividing the word of truth"; AV "rightly dividing").

LITERATURE

Divination is the act of obtaining secret knowledge, esp. that which relates to the future, by means within the reach almost exclusively of special classes of men.

1. Definition Of this there are two main species: (1) artificial, (2) inspirational, or, as it was called in ancient times (Cicero, Lord Bacon, etc), natural divination. Artificial divination depends on the skill of the agent in reading and in interpreting certain signs 2. Kinds of Divination called omens. See AUGURY. In inspirational or natural divination the agent is professedly under the immediate influence of some spirit or god who enables the diviner to see the future, etc, and to utter oracles embodying what he sees. Among the Romans artificial divination prevailed almost exclusively, the other having vogue largely among the Greeks, a proof surely of the more spiritual trend of the Gr mind. Yet that great Roman, Cicero, in his memorable treatise on Divination, says he agrees with those who take cognizance of these two distinct kinds of divination. As examples of inspirational divination he instances men dreaming or in a state of ecstasy (De Divinatione, i. 18). But though Cicero arranges diviners according to their pretensions, he does not believe in any superhuman communication. Thus he explains dreams on psychological principles much as modern psychologists would (op. cit. ii.63 ff). As a matter of fact Cicero was an atheist, or at least an agnostic.

The Lat word divinatio was confined almost exclusively to divination by outward signs, though its etymology (deus, "god") suggests that it denoted originally the other kind—that due to the inspiration of superhuman beings. Chrysippus (d. at Athens 207 BC), though himself a Gr philosopher, defines the word in a way which would have commanded the approval of nearly every Rom, including Cicero himself who gives it. "Divination," Cicero makes him say (op. cit. ii.63), is "a power in man which foresees and explains those signs which the gods throw in his way." The Greeks were, on the other hand, a more imaginative and emotional people, and with them inspirational divination held much the larger place. The Gr mantis (μάντις) bears a close resemblance to the OT prophet, for both claimed to be inspired from without and to be superhumanly informed. The Gr term for divination (hē mantikē (= hē mantikē téchnē) has reference to the work of the mantis, and it hardly ever means divination of the lower sort—that by means of signs.

Underlying all methods of divination there lay the belief that certain superhuman spiritual beings (gods, spirits) possess the secret

3. Fundamental Assumption in Divination knowledge desired by men, and that, on certain conditions, they are willing to impart it.

(1) The word "divination" itself, from deus, "god," or divus, "pertaining to god," carries with it the notion that the information obtained came from deity. Similarly the Gr mantikē implies that the message comes to the mantis from gods or spirits by way of inspiration.

(2) Astrology, or astromancy, is but one form of divination and it rests upon the ultimate belief that the heavenly bodies are deities controlling the destinies of men and revealing the future to those who have eyes to see. According to the Weltanschauung or conception of the universe advocated by Hugo Winckler, Alfred Jeremias (see The OT in the Light of the East) and others, terrestrial events are but shadows of the celestial realities (cf Plato's doctrine of ideas). These latter represented the mind of the gods (see ASTROLOGY secs. 1, 2).

(3) On hepatoscopy, or divining from the liver, see below, 6, (2), (c).

(4) It can be proved that among the ancient peoples (Babylonians, Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, etc) the view prevailed that not only oracles but also omens of all kinds are given to men by the gods and express the minds of these gods.

Among the ancient Babylonians, Egyptians, Greeks and Romans the diviner stood in the service of the state and was officially consulted

4. Legitimate and Illegitimate Divination before wars and other great enterprises were undertaken. But among these and other ancient peoples certain classes of diviners were prohibited by the government from exercising their calling, probably because they were supposed to be in league with the gods of other and hostile nations. The gods of a people were in the beliefs of the time the protectors of their people and therefore the foes of the foes of their protégés. It is on this account that witchcraft has been so largely condemned and punished (see WITCHCRAFT). Necromancy is uniformly forbidden in the OT (see Lev 19 31; Dt 18 11; Isa 8 19; 19 3), probably on account of its connection with ancestor worship. But among other ancient peoples it was allowed and largely practised. Note that the Heb words tr<sup>d</sup> (Dt 18 11) "consulter with a familiar spirit" and "wizards" denote alike such persons as seek oracles from the spirits of the dead (see the present writer's Magic, Divination, and Demonology among the Hebrews, 85 ff). The early Fathers believed that in the divination of heathenism we have the work of Satan who wished to discredit the true religion by producing phenomena among pagan races very similar to the prophetic marvels of the chosen people. This of course rests on a view of the OT prophet which makes him a "predicter" and little if anything more. See PROPHECY.

The attitude of the Bible toward divination is on the whole distinctly hostile and is fairly represented by Dt 18 10 f, where the prophet of

5. The Bible and Divination Yahweh is contrasted with diviners of all kinds as the only authorized medium of supernatural revelation. Yet note the following:

(1) Balaam (Nu 22-24) was a heathen diviner whose words of blessing and of cursing were believed to have magical force, and when his services are enlisted in the cause of Yahwism, so that, instead of cursing he blessed Israel, there is not a syllable of disapproval in the narrative.

(2) In Isa 3 2 diviners are ranked with judges, warriors and prophets as pillars of the state. They are associated with prophets and seers in Jer 27 9; 29 8; Ezk 22 28 (cf 13 6-9; 12 24). It is true that the prophets and diviners mentioned in these passages use utter falsehoods, saying peace where there is none; all the same the men called prophets and diviners are classed together as similar functionaries.

Pure Yahwism in its very basal principle is and must ever have been antagonistic to divination of every kind, though inspirational divination has resemblances to prophetism and even affinities with it. Why then does the Bible appear to speak with two voices, generally prohibiting but at times countenancing various forms of divination? In the actual religion of the OT we have a syncretism in which, though Yahwism forms the substructure, there are constituents from the religions of the native aborigines and the nations around. The underlying thought in all forms of divination is that by employing certain means men are able to obtain knowledge otherwise beyond their reach. The religion of Israel made Yahweh the source of that knowledge and the prophet the medium through which it came to men. We have an analogous example of syncretism resulting in the union of opposite elements in ancient Zarathustraism (Zoroastrianism) which, though in its central principle inconsistent with divination by omens, yet took on from the native Turanian cults of Persia certain forms of divination, esp. that by lot (see Lenormant, La Divination, 22 ff). Nor should it be forgotten that the Bible is a library and not a book, and where so many writers, living at widely separated times, have been at work it is natural to look for diversity of teaching, though no one can deny that in fundamental matters Bible authors are wonderfully consistent.

For modes of divination in vogue among the ancient Babylonians, Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, etc., see the relevant works and dictionary articles.

The species of divination spoken of in the Bible may be arranged under two heads: (1) those apparently sanctioned, and (2) those condemned in the Bible.

6. Modes of Divination Mentioned in the Bible

(1) Methods of divination tacitly or expressly sanctioned in the Bible.—(a)

The following are instances of inspirational divination:

(a) The case of Balaam has already been cited. He was a Moabite and therefore a heathen soothsayer. His word of blessing or of curse is so potent that whether he blesses or curses his word secures its own realization. So far is his vocation from being censured that it is actually called into the service of Yahweh (see Nu 22-24).

(β) To dreams the Bible assigns an important place as a legitimate means of revealing the future. Such dreams are of two kinds:

(i) Involuntary or such as come unsought. Even these are regarded as sent for guidance in human affairs. The bulk of the dreams spoken of in the Bible belong to this class: see Gen 20 3-6 (Abimelech); 28 2f; 31 10-14 (Jacob); 37 5-9 (Joseph; see ASTRONOMY, II, 6); 40 5-21 (Pharaoh's butler and baker); 41 1-35 (Pharaoh); Jgs 7 9-14 (Gideon and an unnamed man); Dnl 1 17 (Daniel had understanding of dreams); Dnl 2 1-49 (Nebuchadnezzar's dream and its interpretation by Daniel); Mt 1 20; 2 13 f. 19 f (Joseph, husband of Mary the virgin); 27 19; see also Jer 23 25 ff, where the lawfulness of prophetic dreams is assumed (cf ver 32, where "lying dreams" imply genuine ones). In the document usually ascribed by modern critics to the Elohist (E), dreams bulk largely as the above examples serve to show. Among the Babylonians belief in the significance of dreams gave rise to a science (oneiromancy) so elaborate that only special interpreters called seers (sing. baru) were considered able to explain them (see Lenormant, op. cit., 143, for examples).

(ii) The other species of dreams consists of such as are induced by what is called "incubation," i.e. by sleeping in a sacred place where the god of the place is believed to reveal his secrets to the sleeper. Herodotus (iv.172) says that the Nasamonians, an Egypt tribe, used to practise divination by sleeping in the graves of their ancestors. The dreams which then came to them were understood to be revelations of their deified ancestors. See Herod. i.181 for another instance of incubation in Nineveh. We have a reference to this custom in Isa 65 4 ("that sit among the graves"), where Yahweh enters into judgment with the Jews for their sin in yielding to this superstition. Solomon's dream (1 K 3 5-15) came to him at the high place of Gibeon. See also DREAM, DREAMER.

(b) But the Bible appears in some places to give its approval to some kinds of artificial or (as it may be called) ominal divination.

(a) Sortilege or divination by lot. The use of the lot as a means of ascertaining the will of Deity is referred to at least without expressed censure, and, as the present writer thinks, with tacit approval, in many parts of the Bible. It was by lot that Aaron decided which of the two goats was to be for Yahweh and which for Azazel (Lev 16 7-10). It was by lot that the land of Canaan was divided after the conquest (Nu 26 56 ff; Josh 18, 19). For other Bib. instances see Josh 7 14 (Achan found out by lot); 1 Ch 6 54 ff; 24 5 ff; 25 8 f; 26 13 f; Est 3 7 ("They cast Pur, that is, the lot"; see Century Bible in loc.); Neh 10 34; 11 1; Jon 1 7 ("The lot fell upon Jonah"); Mt 27 35; Acts 1 26. In the URIM AND THUMMIM (q.v.), as explained by modern scholars, the same principle is applied, for these two words, though etymologically still obscure, stand for two objects (pebbles?), one denoting yes or its equivalent, and the other no. Whichever the high priest took from his ephod was believed to be the answer to the question asked. In all cases it is taken for granted that the lot cast was an expression and indication of the Divine will. See AUGURY, IV, 3.

(β) Hydromancy, or divination by water. In Gen 44 5 Joseph is represented as practising this kind of divination and not a word of disapproval is expressed. See AUGURY, IV, 2.

(γ) We read in the OT of other signs or omens which are implicitly approved of, thus Jgs 6 36-40 (Gideon's fleece); 1 S 14 8-13 (Jonathan decides whether or not he is to attack the Philis by the words which he may happen to hear them speak).

(2) Modes of divination condemned.—The following methods of divination are explicitly or implicitly condemned in the OT:

(a) Astromancy (= Astrology). See ASTROLOGY.

(b) Rhabdomancy, or the use of the divining rod, referred to apparently in Hos 4 12 (which may be paraphrased: "My people ask counsel of a bit of wood, and the rod made thereof answers their questions"); Ezk 8 17 ("They put a rod [EV "the branch"] to their nose").

(c) By an examination of the liver of animals; see Ezk 21 21. This mode of divining, hepatoscopy, as it is has been called, was very widespread among the Babylonians, Greeks, Romans, etc., of the ancient world, and it is still in vogue in Borneo, Burmah and Uganda. We have no evidence that it was practised among the Israelites, for in the above passage it is the king of Babylon (Nebuchadnezzar) who is said to have "looked in the liver."

Opinions differ as to how the state of the liver could act as an omen. Jastrow says the liver was considered to be the seat of life, and that where the liver of the animal sacrificed (generally a sheep) was accepted, it took on the character of the deity to whom it was offered. The soul of the animal as seen in the liver became then a reflector of the soul of the god (see EB, XX, 102 f). On the other hand, Alfred Jeremias says that in the view of the ancient Babylonians the lines and forms of the sheep's liver were regarded as reflecting the universe and its history (The OT in the Light of the Ancient East, I, 61). Neither of these explanations is made probable by its advocates.

(d) By teraphim (cf TERAPHIM); see 1 S 15 23; Ezk 21 21; Zec 10 2.

(e) Necromancy, or consulting the dead; see Lev 19 31; 20 6; Dt 18 11; Isa 8 19; 19 3; see above.

(f) Divination through the sacrifice of children by burning (see Dt 18 10). The context makes it almost certain that the words trd "that maketh his son or his daughter to pass through the fire" (EV; but read and render "that burns his son or his daughter in the fire") refer to a mode of obtaining an oracle (cf 2 K 3 27). The Phoenicians and Carthaginians sacrificed their children to Kronos in times of grave national danger or calamity (Porphyrus Apud Euseb. Praep. Ev. iv.64,4; Diod. Sic. xx.14).

These are examined in detail in T. Witton Davies' Magic, Divination, and Demonology among the Hebrews and Their Neighbors. See also will suffice here. (1) קָסַם, qasam, generally rendered "divination," is a general term for divination of all kinds. In Ezk 21 21 [26] it stands for divination by arrows while in 1 S 28 8 it is used of divination through the medium of an 'ōbh ("familiar spirit"). On the derivation of the word see EB, art. "Magic," § 3.

(2) מַעֲנֵן, m'ēnēn, probably from a Sem root (cf Arab. 'anna) which denotes to emit a hoarse nasal sound such as was customary in reciting the prescribed formula (see CHARM). For "oak of the m'ēnīm" see AUGUR'S OAK. Some say the word means one who divines from the clouds, deriving from קָנָן, 'ānān, "a cloud," though nothing in the context suggests this sense, and the same remark applies to the meaning "one who smites with the evil eye," making the term a denominative from 'ayin, "eye." The usual rendering in AV is pl. "observers of times" and in RV "them that practise augury" (Dt 18 10,14).

(3) The vb. נִחֵשׁ, nihēsh, of which לִחֵשׁ, lihēsh, is but a variant, is probably a denominative from נָחָשׁ, nāhāsh, "a serpent" (l and n interchange in Heb), denoting "to hiss," "to whisper" (like a serpent), then "to utter divinatory formulae." As it is used for so many kinds of divination, W. R. Smith concludes that it came to be a general term for divine. The part. of this vb. is trd "enchanter" in Dt 18 10, the cognate vb., "to use enchantments" in Lev 19 26; 2 K 21 6; 2 Ch 33 6, and the corresponding noun "enchantment" in Nu 23 23; 24 1.

(4) גָּזְרִין, gāzērīn, lit. "cutters," i.e. such as kill (in Arab. the cognate vb. = "to slaughter") for the purpose of examining the liver or entrails as omens. Perhaps the etymology implies "sacrifice," animals being sacrificed as an appeal to deity. The word occurs only in Dnl (2 27; 4 7 [4]; 5 7,11), and is trd "soothsayers." Some think they were "astrologers," the etymology in that case referring to the dividing of the heavens with a view, by casting the horoscope, to forecasting the future.

(5) אֲשָׁפֵּה, ashshāph (AV "astrologer," RV "enchanter"), occurs only in Dnl in the Heb (1 20; 2 2) and in the Aram. (2 10; 4 4 [7], etc) parts of the book. The term is probably taken from the Bab and denotes a magician and esp. an exorcist rather than a diviner.

(6) כַּשְׁדָּאִים, kasdā'im, the same word as the Gr Chaldaei (Χαλδαῖοι) (EV "Chaldeans"), denotes in Dnl (1 4, etc) where alone it occurs, not the people so designated but a class of astrologers. This usage (common in classical writers) arose after the fall of the Bab empire, when the only Chaldaeans known were astrologers and soothsayers. See further, MAGIC. For "spirit of divination" (Acts 16 16) see PYTHON; PHILIPPI.

Inspirational divination and OT prophecy have much in common. Both imply the following conditions: (1) the primitive instinct that craves for secret knowledge, esp. that relating to the future; (2) the belief that such knowledge is possessed by certain spiritual beings who are willing on certain terms to impart it; (3) such secret knowledge is imparted generally to special classes of men (rarely women) called diviners or (Bab) seers and prophets.

Many anthropologists (Tylor, Frazer, etc) and OT scholars (Wellhausen, W. Robertson Smith, etc) consider prophecy to be but an outgrowth and higher form of divination. The older theologians almost to a man, and a goodly number of moderns, take precisely the opposite view, that divination is a corruption of prophecy. Probably neither view is strictly true. Sometimes in human life we find evidences of progress from lower to higher. Sometimes the process is the very reverse. It is important to take notice of the differences as well as the resemblances between the diviner and the prophet.

(1) The OT prophet believes in a personal God whose spokesman he considers himself to be. When he spoke or wrote it was because he was, at least professedly, inspired and informed by Yahweh. "Thus says Yahweh," was the usual formula with which he introduced his oracles. The Gr and Rom mantis, on the other hand, worked himself up to the necessary ecstatic state by music, drugs (intoxicants, etc), sacrificial smoke and the like. Sometimes it has been thought a sufficient means of divination to swallow the vital portions of birds and beasts of omen. It was believed that by eating the hearts of crows, or moles, or of hawks, men took into their bodies the presaging soul of the creature (Frazer, Golden Bough<sup>2</sup>, II, 355).

(2) The mantis practised his art as a remunerative occupation, charging high fees and refusing in most cases to ply his calling without adequate remuneration. The local oracle shrines (Delphi, Clavis, etc) were worked for personal and political ends. The OT prophet, on the other hand, claimed to speak as he was bidden by his God. It was with him a matter of conviction as to what lives men ought to live, what state of heart they should cultivate. So far from furthering his own material interests, as he could by saying what kings and other dignitaries wished to hear, he boldly denounced the sins of the time, even when, as often, he had to condemn the conduct of kings and the policy of governments. Look, for example, at Isaiah's fearless condemnation of the conduct of Ahaz in summoning the aid of Assyria (Isa 7 ff), and at the scathing words with which Jeremiah censured the doings of the nation's leaders in his day (Jer 2 36, etc), though both these noble prophets suffered severely for their courage, esp. Jeremiah, who stands out as perhaps the finest recorded example of what, in the face of formidable opposition, the religious teacher ought ever to be. Of Micaiah ben Imlah, King Ahab of Israel said, "I hate him; for he doth not prophesy good concerning me, but evil." What reward did this prophet have for his fidelity to his conscience and his God? Imprisonment (1 K 22 1-35). Had he pleased the king by predicting a happy, prosperous future that was never to be, he would have been clothed in gorgeous robes and lodged in a very palace.

DIVISION, di-vīzh'un: Used in EV in the following senses:

(1) A separate body of people (a) of the tribal divisions of Israel (Josh 11 23; 12 7; 18 10); (b) of sections of a tribe, "the divisions of Reuben" (Jgs 5 15.16 AV; but RV rightly substitutes "the water-courses of Reuben"; in Job 20 17 the same word is rendered "rivers"); (c) of the (late) organization of priests and Levites into classes or families who ministered in the temple in rotation; tr<sup>d</sup> "courses" generally in AV, and always in RV (1 Ch 24 1; 26 1.12.19; Neh 11 36; cf 2 Ch 35 5). Much prominence is given by the Chronicler to the 24 classes of priests, singers, and doorkeepers, who served in turns in the temple (cf Lk 1 5.8).

(2) Separation, distinction: "I will put a division [RVm "sign of deliverance"] between my people and thy people" (Ex 8 23). The Heb word here is pedhuth = "ransom," "redemption" (cf Ps 111 9), but the reading is doubtful. AV and RV follow LXX, Syr and Vulg, which render "set a distinction," perhaps on the basis of a different reading from that of our Heb text.

(3) In the NT, dissension, disunion, schism (Lk 12 51; Rom 16 17; 1 Cor 3 3 AV, omitted in RV; 1 Cor 1 10; 11 18; Gal 5 20).

D. MIAL EDWARDS

DIVORCE, di-vōrs', IN OT: Woman, among the Hebrews, as among most nations of antiquity, occupied a subordinate position. Though

1. Subordinate Position of Woman the Heb wife and mother was treated with more consideration than her sister in other lands, even in other Sem countries, her position nevertheless was one of inferiority and subjection.

The marriage relation from the standpoint of Heb legislation was looked upon very largely as a business affair, a mere question of property. A wife, nevertheless, was, indeed, in most homes in Israel, the husband's "most valued possession." And yet while this is true, the husband was unconditionally and unreservedly the head of the family in all domestic relations. His rights and prerogatives were manifest on every side. Nowhere is this more evident than in the matter of divorce. According to the laws of Moses a husband, under certain circumstances, might divorce his wife; on the other hand, if at all possible, it was certainly very difficult for a wife to put away her husband. Unfortunately a double standard of morality in matters pertaining to the sexes is, at least, as old as Moses (see Ex 21 7-11).

The OT law concerning divorce, apparently quite clear, is recorded most fully in Dt 24 1 ff. A perusal of the commentaries will,

2. Law of Divorce: nevertheless, convince anyone that there are difficulties of interpretation.

Dt 24:1-4 The careful reader will notice that the renderings of the AV and RV differ materially. AV reads in the second part of ver 1: "then let him write a bill," etc, RV has "that he shall write," etc, while the Heb original has neither "then" nor "that," but the simple conjunction "and." There is certainly no command in the words of Moses, but, on the other hand, a clear purpose to render the proceeding more difficult in the case of the husband. Moses' aim was "to regulate and thus to mitigate an evil which he could not extirpate." The evident purpose was, as far as possible, to favor the wife, and to protect her against an unceremonious expulsion from her home and children.

As already suggested, marriage among the Hebrews, as among most Orientals, was more a legal contract than the result of love or

3. Marriage affection. It would be, however, a great mistake to assume that deep love was not often present, for at all times the domestic relations of the Heb married couple have compared most favorably with those of any other people, ancient or modern. In its last analysis it was, nevertheless, a business transaction. The husband or his family had, as a rule, to pay a certain dowry to the parents or guardians of the betrothed before the marriage was consummated. A wife thus acquired could easily be regarded as a piece of property, which, without great difficulty, could be disposed of in case the husband, for any reason, were disposed to rid himself of an uncongenial companion and willing to forfeit the mōhar which he had paid for his wife. The advantage was always with the husband, and yet a wife was not utterly helpless, for she, too, though practically without legal rights, could make herself so intolerably burdensome and hateful in the home that almost any husband would gladly avail himself of his prerogatives and write her a bill of divorce. Thus, though a wife could not divorce her husband, she could force him to divorce her.

The following words of Professor Israel Abrahams, Cambridge, England, before "the Divorce Commission" (London, November 21, 1910), are to the point: "In all such cases where the wife was concerned as the moving party she could only demand that her husband should divorce her. The divorce was always from first to last, in Jewish law, the husband's act." The common term used in the Bible for divorce is שְׁלִיחַ אִשָּׁה, shillūh 'ishshāh, "the sending away of a wife" (Dt 22 19, 29). We never read of "the sending away of a husband." The fem. part., גְּרוּשָׁה, g'rūshāh, "the woman thrust out," is the term applied to a divorced woman. The masc. form is not found.

4. Divorce Applicable Only to Wives

The Mosaic law apparently, on the side of the husband, made it as difficult as possible for him to secure a divorce. No man could un-

5. Process and Ex-ceptions ceremoniously and capriciously dismiss his wife without the semblance of a trial. In case one became dissatisfied with his wife, (1) he had to write her a BILL OF DIVORCE (q.v.) drawn up by some constituted legal authority and in due legal form. In the very nature of the case, such a tribunal would use moral suasion to induce an adjustment; and, failing in this, would see to it that the law in the case, whatever it might be, would be upheld. (2) Such a bill or decree must be placed in the hand of the divorced wife. (3) She must be forced to leave the premises of her former husband. Divorce was denied two classes of husbands: (1) The man who had falsely accused his wife of antenuptial infidelity (Dt 22 13 ff), and (2) a person who had seduced a virgin (Dt 22 28 ff). In addition, a heavy penalty had to be paid to the father of such damsels.

It is probable that a divorced wife who had not contracted a second marriage or had been guilty of adultery might be reunited to her husband. But in case she had married the second time she was forever barred from returning to her first husband, even if the second husband had divorced her or had died (Dt 24 3 f). Such a law would serve as an obstacle to hasty divorces.

Divorces from the earliest times were common among the Hebrews. All rabbis agree that a separation, though not desirable, was quite lawful. The only source of dispute among them was as to what constituted a valid reason or just cause.

The language in Dt 24 1 ff has always been in dispute. The Heb words, שְׁרֵיטָה דָּבָר, 'erwath dā-

6. Grounds of Divorce bhār, on which a correct interpretation depends, are not easy of solution, though many exegetes, influenced possibly by some preconceived notion, pass over them quite flippantly. The Meaning of Dt 24:1 phrase troubled the Jewish rabbis of olden times, as it does Jewish and Christian commentators and translators in our day. AV renders the two words, "some uncleanness," and in the margin, "matter of nakedness." The latter, though a literal tr of the Heb, is quite unintelligible. RV and ARV both have: "some unseemly thing." Professor Driver translates the same words "some indecency." The Ger. RV (Kautzsch) has "etwas Widervärtiges" ("something repulsive"). We know of no modern version which makes 'erwath dābhār the equivalent of fornication or adultery. And, indeed, in the very nature of the case, we are forced to make the words apply to a minor fault or crime, for, by the Mosaic law, the penalty for adultery was death (Dt 22 20 ff). It is, however, a question whether the extreme penalty was ever enforced. It is well known that at, and some time before, the time of our Saviour, there were two schools among the Jewish rabbis, that of Sham-mai and that of Hillel. Shammai and his followers maintained that 'erwath dābhār signified nothing less than unchastity or adultery, and argued that only this crime justified a man in divorcing his wife. Hillel and his disciples went to the other extreme. They placed great stress upon the words, "if she find no favor in his eyes" immediately preceding 'erwath dābhār (Dt 24 1), and contended that divorce should be granted for the flimsiest reason: such as the spoiling of a dish either by burning or careless seasoning. Some of the rabbis boldly taught that a man had a perfect right to dismiss his wife, if he found another woman whom he liked better, or who was more beautiful (Mish, Gittin, 14 10). Here are some other specifications taken from the same book: "The following women may be divorced: She who violates the Law of Moses, e.g. causes her husband to eat food which has not been tithed. . . . She who vows, but does not keep her vows. . . . She who goes out on the street with her hair loose, or spins in the street, or converses [flirts] with any man, or is a noisy woman. What is a noisy woman? It is one who speaks in her own house so loud that the neighbors may hear her." It would be easy to extend the list, for the Mish and rabbinic writings are full of such laws.

From what has been said, it is clear that adultery was not the only valid reason for divorce. Besides, the word adultery had a peculiar significance in Jewish law, which recognized polygamy and concubinage as legitimate. Thus a Hebrew might have two or more wives or concubines, and might have intercourse with a slave or bondwoman, even if married, without being guilty of the crime of adultery (Lev 19 20), for adultery, according to Jewish law, was possible only when a man dishonored the "free wife" of a Hebrew (20 10 ff).

Divorcement, Bill of: This expression, found in Dt 24 1, 3; Isa 50 1; Jer 3 8 is the tr of the Heb שְׁרֵיטָה דָּבָר, sepher k'rithuth. The two words, lit. rendered, signify a document or book of cutting off, i.e. a certificate of divorce given by a husband to a wife, so as to afford her the opportunity or privilege of marrying another man. The Heb term is rendered by the LXX βιβλίον ἀποστασίου, biblion apostasion. This is also found in the NT (Mk 10 4). Mt 5 31 has "writing of divorcement" in EV, but Mt 19 7 AV has "writing," while RV and ARV have "bill." The certificate of divorce is called גֵּט, gēt, pl. גִּטִּין, gittin, in the Talm. There is an entire chapter devoted to the subjects in the Mish. It is not positively known when the custom of writing bills of divorcement commenced, but there are references to such documents in the earliest Heb legislation. The fact that Joseph had in mind the putting away of his espoused wife, Mary, without the formality of a bill or at least of a public procedure proves that a decree was not regarded as absolutely necessary (Mt 1 19). The following was the usual form of a decree:

"On the — day of the week — in the month — in the year — from the beginning of the world, according to the common computation in the province of — I — the son of — by whatever name I may be known, of the town of — with entire consent of mind, and without any constraint, have divorced, dismissed and expelled thee — daughter of — by whatever name thou art called, of the town — who hast been my wife hitherto; But now I have dismissed thee — the daughter of — by whatever name thou art called, of the town of — so as to be free at thy own disposal, to marry whomsoever thou pleasest, without hindrance from anyone, from this day for ever. Thou art therefore free for anyone [who would marry thee]. Let this be thy bill of divorce from me, a writing of separation and expulsion, according to the law of Moses and Israel.

Spiritual application.—The Heb prophets regarded Jeh not only as the father and king of the chosen people, and thus entitled to perfect obedience and loyalty on their part, but they conceived of Him as a husband married to Israel. Isaiah, speaking to his nation, says: "For thy Maker is thy husband; Jehovah of hosts is his name" (54 5). Jeremiah too makes use of similar language in the following: "Return, O backsliding children, saith Jehovah; for I am a husband unto you" (3 14). It is perfectly natural that NT writers should have regarded Christ's relation to His church under the same figure. Paul in 2 Cor says: "I am jealous over you with a godly jealousy: for I espoused you to one husband, that I might present you as a pure virgin to Christ" (11 2); see also Mt 9 15; Jn 3 29; Rev 19 7. Any unfaithfulness or sin on the part of Israel was regarded as spiritual adultery, which necessarily broke off the spiritual ties, and divorced the nation from God (Isa 1 21; Ezk 16 22; Rev 2 22). See also MARRIAGE.

W. W. DAVIES

DIVORCE IN NT (τὸ ἀποστάσιον, tó apostásiou): The Scripture doctrine of divorce is very simple. It is contained in Mt 19 3-12.

We are not called upon to treat of divorce in the Mosaic legislation (Dt 24 1-4). That was passed upon by Jesus in the above discussion and by Him ruled out of existence in His system of religion. After Jesus had spoken as above, the Mosaic permission of divorce became a dead letter. There could not be practice under it among His disciples. So such OT divorce is now a mere matter of antiquarian curiosity.

It may be of interest in passing to note that the drift of the Mosaic legislation was restrictive of a freedom of divorce that had been practised before its enactment. It put in legal proceedings to bar the personal will of one of the parties. It recognized marriage as a social institution which should not be disrupted without reference to the rights of society in it. In this restrictive character "the law is become our tutor to bring us unto Christ" (Gal 3 24). But here, as in numerous other instances, Christ went behind the enactments to primitive original principles whose recognition would make the law of none effect, because no practice was to be permitted under it. Thus the OT is disposed of.

Of course what Jesus said will dominate the New. In fact, Jesus is the only author in the NT who has treated of divorce. It has been thought that Paul had the subject in hand. But we shall find on examination, farther along, that he did not. We need then look nowhere but to this 19th ch of Mt for the Scripture doctrine of divorce.

True, we have other reports of what Jesus said (Mk 10 2-12; Lk 16 18). But in Mt 19 we have the fullest report, containing everything that is reported elsewhere and one or two important observations that the other writers have not included. Lk has but one ver where Mt has ten. Lk's ver is in no necessary connection with context. It seems to be a mere memorandum among others of the spiritual or ethical teachings of Christ. Luke however caught the gist of the whole teaching about divorce in recording the prohibition to put away one wife and marry another. The records in Mt 19 and Mk 10 cover one and the same occasion. But there is nothing in Mk that is not in Mt; and the latter contains nearly a third more of text than the former. There is nothing, however, essential in Mt that is not in Mk, save the clause "except for fornication." That exception will be treated farther along. We seem to be justified then in saying that the total doctrine of the Scripture pertaining to divorce is contained in Mt 19.

Attention must be called to the fact that, in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5 27-32), Jesus treated of divorce, and that in every essential particular it agrees with the elaboration in ch 19. Jesus there as plainly as in the argument with the Pharisees put Moses' permission of divorce under ban; as plainly there declared the putting away of one partner to marry another person to be adultery. This may also be noticed, that the exception to the absolute prohibition is in the text of the Sermon on the Mount.

We have then a summary of the NT doctrine of divorce stated by Christ Himself as follows: "Who-soever shall put away his wife, except for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery" (Mt 19 9). This puts Him in line with the ideal of the monogamic, indissoluble family which pervades the whole of the OT.

It may be well here to treat of the exception which Christ made in His rule to the indissolubility of marriage. It is very widely main-

1. The Family tained in the Christian church that there should be no divorce for any cause whatever. This position is in plain contradiction to Christ's teaching in Mt 5 and 19. One of the grounds adduced for this denial of divorce in case a partner is guilty of adultery is that Lk and Mk do not record the exception. It is a difficult matter to invade the psychology of writers who lived nearly two thousand years ago and tell why they did not include something in their text which someone else did in his. Neither Luke nor Mark were personal disciples of the Lord. They wrote at second hand. Matthew was a personal disciple of Christ and has twice recorded the exception. It will be a new position in regard to judgment on human evidence when we put the silence of absentees in rank above the twice expressed report of one in all probability present—one known to be a close personal attendant.

This may be said: Matthew's record stands in ancient MS authority, Greek and also the Versions. And on this point let it be noted that the testimony of the MSS was up before the English and American Revisers, and they have deliberately reaffirmed the text of 1611 and given us the exception in Christ's rule in each place (Mt 5 32; 19 9). This makes the matter as nearly rēs adjudicata as can be done by human wisdom.

Let us consider the rationality of the exception. That feature has had scant attention from theologians and publicists, yet it will bear the closest scrutiny. In fact it is a key to much that is explanatory of the basic principle of the family. To begin with, the exception is not on its face an afterthought of some transcriber, but was called out by the very terms of the question of the Pharisees: "Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause?" This plainly called for a specification from Jesus of exceptions which he would allow to the rule against divorce. It is fortunate that the Pharisees asked the question in the form they did, for that put on Jesus the necessity of enumerating such exceptions as he would allow. He mentioned one, and but one in reply. That puts the matter of exceptions under the rule in logic: Expressio unius exclusio alterius. All other pretences for divorce were deliberately swept aside by Christ—a fact that should be remembered when other causes are sought to be foisted in alongside this one allowed by Christ. The question may come up, Whose insight is likely to be truest?

Why, then, will reason stand by this exception? Because adultery is per se destructive of monogamic family life. Whoever, married, is guilty of adultery has taken another person into family relation. Children may be born to that relation—are born to it. Not to allow divorce in such case is to force an innocent party in marriage to live in a polygamous state. There is the issue stated so plainly that "the wayfaring man need not err therein," and "he who runs may read," and "he who reads may run."

It is the hand of an unerring Master that has made fornication a ground for divorce from the bond of matrimony and limited divorce to that single cause. Whichever way we depart from strict practice under the Saviour's direction we land in polygamy. The society that allows by its statutes divorce for any other cause than the one that breaks the monogamic bond, is simply acting in aid of polygamy, consecutively if not contemporaneous.

Advocates of the freedom of divorce speak of the above view as "the ecclesiastical." That is an attempt to use the argument ad invidiam. The church of Christ held and holds its views, not because ecclesiastics taught it, but because Christ taught it, and that in His teaching we have a statement out from the righteousness, wisdom, insight and rationality of the all-wise God.

Paul is the only other NT author besides Christ who has been supposed to treat of divorce. But a

2. Paul careful examination of Paul's writing will disclose the fact that he has nowhere discussed the question—for what cause or causes a man might put away his wife, or a woman her husband, with liberty of marriage to another person. If Paul has treated of divorce at all it is in 1 Cor 7. But even a careless reading of that chapter will disclose the fact that Paul is not discussing the question for what causes marriage might be disrupted, but the question of manners and morals in the relation. Paul has not modified Christ in any respect. It has been supposed that in ver 15 Paul has allowed divorce to a believing partner who has been deserted by one unbelieving, and so he has been sometimes understood as adding desertion to the exception Christ made as cause for divorce.

But Paul has not said in that verse or anywhere else that a Christian partner deserted by a heathen may be married to someone else. All he said is: "If the unbelieving departeth, let him depart: the brother or the sister is not under bondage [dedoulōtai] in such cases: but God hath called us in peace." To say that a deserted partner "hath not been enslaved" is not to say that he or she may be re-married. What is meant is easily inferred from the spirit that dominates the whole chapter, and that is that everyone shall accept the situation in which God has called him just as he is. "Be quiet" is a direction that hovers over every situation. If you are married, so remain. If unmarried, so remain. If an unbelieving partner deserts, let him or her desert. So remain. "God hath called us in peace." Nothing can be more beautiful in the morals of the marriage relation than the direction given by Paul in this chapter for the conduct of all parties in marriage in all trials.

Many reasons might be given why Paul could not have given liberty of remarriage, besides the one that he did not in his text; but attention should be called to the fact that such an assumption of authority in divorce would soon have brought him into conflict with the Rom government. Paul's claim that he was a Rom citizen was of some value to himself. Would not some Rom citizen have claimed to scrutinize pretty closely Paul's right to issue a decree of divorce against him because he had "departed" from a wife who had become a Christian? There would be two sides to such divorces. Would not Paul, careful, shrewd, politic as he was, have known that, and have avoided an open rupture with a government that did not tolerate much interference with its laws? That neither Paul nor anyone else ever put such construction upon his language, is evidenced by the fact that there is no record in history of a single case where it was attempted for 400 years after Paul was in his grave, and the Rom Empire had for a century been Christian. Then we wait 400 years more before we find the suggestion repeated. That no use was ever made of such construction of Paul in the whole era of the adjustment of Christianity with heathenism is good evidence that it was never there to begin with. So we shall pass Paul as having in no respect modified the doctrine of divorce laid down by Christ in Mt 19.

In all civilized countries the machinery of legislation and law can always be open for removal or relief of troubles in marriage without proceeding to its annulment. If a father is cruel to his children, we do not abolish the parental relation, but punish the father for his cruelty. If he deserts his children, we need not assist him to rear other children whom he can desert in turn, but we can punish him for his desertion.

What can be done by law in case of parent and child can be done in case of husband and wife. By putting in absolute divorce (frequently for guilty and innocent alike) we invite the very evils we seek to cure. We make it the interest of a dissatisfied party to create a situation that a court will regard as intolerable, and so he or she may go free.

Then by affording an easy way out of the troubles of married life we are inviting carelessness about entering marriage. We say by divorce statutes to a young woman: "If your husband deserts you, you may have another. If he is cruel, you may have another. If he fails to support you, you may have another. If he is drunken, you may have another. If he is incompatible or makes you unhappy, you may have another"—and yet others beyond these. When an easy road is thus made out of marriage, will there be proper caution about entering into marriage? By just as much as a crevice for relief of the miseries of married life is opened by divorce, by so much the flood gates are opened into those miseries. The more solemnly society is impressed that the door of marriage does not swing outward as well as inward the more of happiness and blessing will it find in the institution. See FAMILY.

DI-ZAHAB, dī'za-hab, diz'a-hab (דִּי־זָהָב, dī-zā-hābh; LXX Καταχρύσεα, Katachrūsea, lit. "abounding in gold"): The name occurs in a list apparently intended to fix definitely the situation of the camp of Israel in the plains of Moab (Dt 1 1). No place in the region has been found with a name suggesting this; and there is no other clue to its identification. Some names in the list are like those of stations earlier in the wanderings. Thinking that one of these may be intended Burckhardt suggested Mina edh-Dhahab, a boat harbor between Ras Mohammad and Aqaba. Cheyne gets over the difficulty by accepting a suggestion of Sayce that Di-zahab corresponds to Me-zahab (Gen 36 39); this latter he then transforms into Mitzraim, and identifies it with the North Arabian Muṣṣri (EB s.v.). The changes, however, seem greater than can be justified.

DOCTOR, dok'tēr: In Lk 2 46 (διδάσκαλος, didaskalos) "doctor" is equivalent to "teacher," which latter is the tr of RV. So in Lk 5 17; Acts 5 34, AV and RV "doctors," "doctor," of the law (nomodidaskalos). See EDUCATION; RABBI; SCRIBE.

DOCTRINE, dok'trin: Lat doctrina, from doceo, "to teach," denotes both the act of teaching and that which is taught; now used exclusively in the latter sense.

(1) In the OT for (a) leḳaḥ "what is received," hence "the matter taught" (Dt 32 2; Job 11 4; Prov 4 2; Isa 29 24, ARV "instruction"); (b) sh-mū'āh, "what is heard" (Isa 28 9, RV "message," RVm "report"); (c) mūṣār, "discipline" (Jer 10 8 m, "The stock is a doctrine [RV "instruction"] of vanities," i.e. "The discipline of unreal gods is wood (is like themselves, destitute of true moral force)" (BDB).

(2) In the NT for (i) didaskalia = (a) "the act of teaching" (1 Tim 4 13.16; 5 17; 2 Tim 3 10.16), all in RV "teaching"; (b) "what is taught" (Mt 15 9; 2 Tim 4 3). In some passages the meaning is ambiguous as between (a) and (b). (ii)

didachê, always tr<sup>d</sup> "teaching" in RV, except in Rom 16 17, where "doctrine" is retained in the text and "teaching" inserted in m=(a) the act

1. Meaning of Teaching (Mk 4 2; Acts 2 42, AV of Terms "doctrine"); (b) what is taught (Jn 7 16.17; Rev 2 14.15.24, AV "doctrine"). In some places the meaning is ambiguous as between (a) and (b) and in Mt 7 28; Mk 1 22; Acts 13 12, the manner, rather than the act or matter of teaching is denoted, namely, with authority and power.

The meaning of these words in the NT varied as the church developed the content of its experience into a system of thought, and came to

2. Christ's Teaching regard such a system as an integral part of saving faith (cf the development of the meaning of the term "faith"):

Informal (1) The doctrines of the Pharisees were a fairly compact and definite body of teaching, a fixed tradition handed down from one generation of teachers to another (Mt 16 12, AV "doctrine"; cf Mt 15 9; Mk 7 7). (2) In contrast with the Pharisaic system, the teaching of Jesus was unconventional and occasional, discursive and unsystematic; it derived its power from His personality, character and works, more than from His words, so that His contemporaries were astonished at it and recognized it as a new teaching (Mt 7 28; 22 33; Mk 1 22.27; Lk 4 32). So we find it in the Synoptic Gospels, and the more systematic form given to it in the Johannine discourses is undoubtedly the work of the evangelist, who wrote rather to interpret Christ than to record His ipsissima verba (Jn 20 31).

The earliest teaching of the apostles consisted essentially of three propositions: (a) that Jesus was the Christ (Acts 3 18); (b) that He 3. Apostolic Doctrines was risen from the dead (Acts 1 22; 2 24.32); and (c) that salvation was by faith in His name (Acts 2 38; 3 16). While proclaiming these truths, it was necessary to coördinate them with Heb faith, as based upon OT revelation. The method of the earliest reconstruction may be gathered from the speeches of Peter and Stephen (Acts 2 14-36; 5 29-32; 7 2-53). A more thorough reconstruction of the coördination of the Christian facts, not only with Heb history, but with universal history, and with a view of the world as a whole, was undertaken by Paul. Both types of doctrine are found in his speeches in Acts, the former type in that delivered at Antioch (13 16-41), and the latter in the speeches delivered at Lystra (14 15-17) and at Athens (17 22-31). The ideas given in outline in these speeches are more fully developed into a doctrinal system, with its center removed from the resurrection to the death of Christ, in the epistles, esp. in Gal, Rom, Eph, Phil and Col. But as yet it is the theological system of one teacher, and there is no sign of any attempt to impose it by authority on the church as a whole. As a matter of fact the Pauline system never was generally accepted by the church. Cf James and the Apostolic Fathers.

In the Pastoral and General Epistles a new state of things appears. The repeated emphasis on "sound" or "healthy doctrine" (1 Tim 1 10; 6 3; 2 Tim 1 13; 4 3; Tit 1 9; 2 1), "good doctrine" (1 Tim 4 6) implies that a body of teaching had now emerged which was generally accepted, and which should serve as a standard of orthodoxy. The faith has become a body of truth "once for all delivered unto the saints" (Jude ver 3). The content of this "sound doctrine" is nowhere formally given, but it is a probable inference that it corresponded very nearly to the Rom formula that became known as the Apostles' Creed. See DOGMA.

DOCUS, dō'kus. See DOK.

DODAI, dō'dī, dō'dā-i (1 Ch 27.4). See DODO.

DODANIM, dō'da-nim (דֹּדָנִים, dōdhānīm, "leaders"): In Gen 10 4, the son of Javan, the son of Japheth. This would place the Dodanim among the Ionians. The || passage 1 Ch 1 7, with the LXX and S, has, however, "Rodanim," which is probably the true reading. This identifies the people with the Rhodians (cf on Ezk 27 15 under DEDAN).

DODAVAHU, dō-dav'a-hū (דֹּדָוָהוּ, dōdhāwāhū, "loved of God"; AV Dodavah): Father of Eliezer of Mareshah, a prophet in the days of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 20 37).

DODO, dō'dō, DODAI (דֹּדָי, dōdhō, דֹּדָי, dōdhay, "beloved"):

(1) The grandfather of Tola of the tribe of Issachar, one of the judges (Jgs 10 1).

(2) "The Ahohite," father of Eleazar, one of David's heroes, and (2 S 23 9; 1 Ch 11 12) himself the commander of one of the divisions of the army (1 Ch 27 4).

(3) The Bethlehemite, father of Elhanan, one of David's mighty men (2 S 23 24; 1 Ch 11 26).

DOE, dō. See DEER.

DOEG, dō'eg (דֹּעַג, dō'ēgh, "anxious," "cared for"): "The Edomite," a servant of Saul, who watched David's intercourse with the priest Ahimelech, then denounced the priest to the king, and later executed his command to slay the priests at Nob. The position he held is described as that of "the mightiest" of S.'s herdsmen (1 S 21 7 m). LXX reads: "tending the mules." Rabbinical legends speak of him as the greatest scholar of his time. The traditional title of Ps 52 associates the composition of that Ps with the events that led to the slaying of the priests (1 S 21 7; 22 9.18.22).

DOG (כֶּלֶב, keleb; [cf Arab. kelb, "dog"]; κύων, kūōn; and dimin. κυνάριον, kundrion): References to the dog, both in the OT and in the NT, are usually of a contemptuous character. A dog, and esp. a dead dog, is used as a figure of insignificance. Goliath says to David (1 S 17 43): "Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves?" David says to Saul (1 S 24 14): "After whom dost thou pursue? after a dead dog, after a flea." Mephibosheth says to David (2 S 9 8): "What is thy servant, that thou shouldest look upon such a dead dog as I am?" The same figure is found in the words of Hazael to Elisha (2 K 8 13). The meaning, which is obscure in AV, is brought out well in RV: "But what is thy servant, who is but a dog, that he should do this great thing?" The characteristically oriental interrogative form of these expressions should be noted.

Other passages express by inference the low esteem in which dogs are held. Nothing worse could happen to a person than that his body should be devoured by dogs (1 K 14 11; 16 4; 21 19, 23, etc.). Job 30 1 says of the youth who deride him that he disdained to set their fathers with the dogs of his flock. In Phil 3 2 and Rev 22 15, dogs are coupled with evil-workers, sorcerers, etc. In Mt 7 6 we read: "Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast your pearls before the swine."

Job 30 1 (cited above) refers to the use of dogs to guard flocks; and the comparison of inefficient watchmen with dumb dogs (Isa 56 10) implies that at least some dogs are useful. In the apocryphal Book of Tob, Tobias' dog is his companion on his travels (Tob 5 16; 11 4; on this see Expos T, XI, 258; HDB, IV, 989; Geiger, Civilization of E. Iranians, I, 85 ff.).

There is further the reference to the greyhound (Prov 30 31 EV) as one of the four things which are "stately in their going." But the rendering, "greyhound," rests solely upon inference, and is contrary to the LXX and Vulg. which have respectively alékôr and gallus, i.e. "cock," AVm "horse." The Heb has zarzir mothnayim, which AVm renders "girt in the loins." RVm has "war-horse." Heb "well girt [or, well knit] in the loins." In support of the meaning, "girt," for zarzir, there is the word zër, which, with zarzir, is assigned to the obs root zārār and the Arab. zīr, "button," from zarr, "to button," "to compress." Further, to render zarzir by "cock" logically requires a change in the text, for mothnayim, "loins," becomes superlative and inappropriate (see EB, s.v. "Cock"). On the other hand, the Arab. zarzûr is a starling (cf Arab. zarzar, "to utter cries," said of birds; garzar, "to cry out"; garzûr, "cockroach," or "cricket"). Also, according to EB (s.v. "Cock"), the Talmudic zarzir . . . means some bird (a kind of raven). If the text stands, there appears to be no better rendering than "girt in the loins," which might fairly be taken to refer to a war horse or to a greyhound. The Pers greyhound would in that case be understood, a hairy race, which, according to the Royal Natural History, is less fleet than the Eng. breed and is used in coursing gazelles and in hunting the wild ass, and which according to Doughty (Arabia Deserta) is kept by the Bedawin. "These dogs are said to be sometimes girdled by their owners to prevent them from over-eating and becoming fat" (L. Fletcher, British Museum [Natural History]).

Domestic dogs have probably been derived from various species of wolves and jackals. In this connection, it is noteworthy that the dogs of certain regions greatly resemble the wolves of those regions. The pariah dogs of Syria and Pal resemble the jackals, esp. in color and in the tail, differing in their greater size and in the shape of muzzle and ears. It is fair to assume that they are much the same as existed in Bible times. They are in general meek and harmless creatures, and are valuable as scavengers, but disturb the night with their barking. Each quarter of the city has its own pack of dogs, which vigorously resents any invasion of its territory. A dog which for any reason finds itself in foreign territory goes home as quickly as possible, and is lucky if it does not have to run the gauntlet of a pack of vicious foes. The pariah dog is sometimes brought up to be a sheep dog, but the best shepherd dogs are great wolfish creatures, which are usually obtained from Kurdistan.

ALFRED ELY DAY

DOGMA, dog'ma (δόγμα, dôgma, from δοκέω, dokéō, "that which seems," "an opinion," particularly the opinion of a philosopher): In the decadent period of Gr philosophy, the opinion, or ipse dixit, of the master of a philosophical school came to be quoted as authoritative truth; also, the opinion of a sovereign imposed as law upon his subjects: a decree or ordinance of the civil authority. The word never appears in EV, although it is used 5 t in the Gr NT, but with the one exception of Acts 16 4, in a sense widely different from that which ecclesiastical usage has given to it from the 2d cent. downward. "Dogma" is used in the NT, (1) of Rom laws: "a decree [Gr dogma] from Caesar Augustus" (Lk 2 1); "the decrees of Caesar" (Acts 17 7)=the whole body of Rom law; (2) of ordinances of religious law: "the law of commandments contained in ordinances" (Eph 2 15); "the bond written in ordinances" (Col 2 14)=the Mosaic ordinances as expressing the moral law which condemned the sinner, and whose enmity Christ abolished by His death. It is a significant revelation of the spirit of Gr theology that all the Gr commentators understood by ordinances in these two places, the gospel as a body of dogmas which had removed the commandment or bond that was against us (see Lightfoot, Col, ad loc.); (3) of the decrees of the Council of Jerus (Acts 15 20), which Paul and his companions delivered to the gentile churches (Acts 16 4). Here we have one element that entered into the later ecclesiastical meaning of the word. These dogmas were decisions on religious matters, imposed by a more or less authoritative council of the church as a condition of admission to its membership.

There is however one important difference. These decrees relate to moral and ceremonial matters, but from the 2d cent. downward, dogma means esp. a theological doctrine. Formulated In Gr theology "doctrine" and "dog-Teaching ma" meant the same thing. Each had its origin in the opinion of some great teacher; each rested upon revelation and claimed its authority; each meant an exposition of a particular truth of the gospel, and of the whole Christian truth, which the church adopted as the only right exposition. Each word might be used for the teaching of a philosopher, or of a heretic, although for the latter, "heresy" became the regular term. On the one side stood the doctrines or dogmas of the majority or the "Catholic" church, and on the other side, those of the heretics. So long as the "Catholic" ideal of orthodoxy and uniformity of belief held the field, there was no room for the distinction now made between "doctrine," as a scientific and systematic expression of the truth of the Christian religion, and "dogma," as those truths "authoritatively ratified as expressing the belief of the church." This distinction could only arise when men began to think that various expressions of Christian truth could coexist in the church, and is therefore quite modern and even recent. Dogma in this sense denotes the ancient conception of theology as an authoritative system of orthodoxy, and doctrine, the modern conception, outside the dogmatic churches, where theology is regarded as a scientific exposition of truth.

DOK, dôk (Δόκ, Dôk, Δαγών, Dagôn): A small fortress, "little stronghold" near Jericho (1 Macc 16 15), built by Ptolemy, son of Abubus, where he entertained and murdered his father-in-law Simon Maccabaeus and his two sons. Jos (Ant, XIII, viii, 1; BJ, I, ii, 3) calls the place Dagon and places it above Jericho. The name persists in Ain Duk with its copious springs of excellent water about 4 miles N.W. of Jericho. Some ancient foundations in the neighborhood are possibly those of Ptolemy's fortress, but more probably of a Templars' station which is known to have stood there as late as the end of the 13th cent. For its importance in earlier Jewish history, see Smith, HGHL, 250, 251.

J. HUTCHISON

DOLEFUL, dôl'fôol (ᾄδων, 'dôh, "howling"): The "doleful creatures" referred to in Isa 13 21 are probably "jackals," although some have suggested

"leopard," or "hyaena." The older EV gives "great owls." The word rendered "doleful lamentation" in Mic 2 4 (nih'yāh) is simply a form of the word ordinarily tr<sup>d</sup> "wailing" (n'hī). Cf AVm.

DOLPHIN, dol'fin. See BADGER.

DOMINION, dō-min'yun: In Eph 1 21; Col 1 16 the word so tr<sup>d</sup> (κυριότης, kuriōtēs) appears to denote a rank or order of angels. The same word is probably to be so interpreted in Jude ver 8 (AV and RV "dominion"), and in 2 Pet 2 10 (AV "government," RV "dominion"). See ANGEL.

DOOM, dōm: Occurs only once in AV (2 Esd 7 43), "The day of doom shall be the end of this time" (RV "the day of judgement"); but RV gives it as the rendering of עֶרְבָּה, ʿēphrah, in Ezk 7 7. 10 (AV "the morning," RVm "the turn" or "the crowning time"; but the meaning is not yet quite certain); and in 1 Cor 4 9 (ἐπιθανάτιος, epithanátios, "as men doomed to death," AV "appointed [originally "approved"] unto death"). Our word "doom" is connected with the word "deem," and signifies either the act of judging or (far more often) the sentence itself or the condition resulting therefrom (cf "Deemster" of Isle of Man and Jersey). Generally, but not always, an unfavorable judgment is implied. Cf Dryden, Coronation of Charles II, i, 127:

"Two kingdoms wait your doom, and, as you choose,
This must receive a crown, or that must lose."

J. R. VAN PELT

DOOR, dōr: Most commonly the rendering of Heb pethah, "doorway," deleth, "door" proper (the two distinguished in Gen 19 6), or of Gr thúra, thúra, which represents both meanings. The door proper was usually of wood, frequently sheeted with metal, sometimes of one slab of stone, as shown in excavations in the Hauran. It turned on pivots (the "hinges" of Prov 26 14) working in sockets above and below, and was provided with a bolt (2 S 13 17) or with lock and key (Jgs 3 23). The doorway was inclosed by the stone threshold (1 K 14 17), the two doorposts on either side, and the lintel above (Ex 12 7). Doors were frequently two-leaved, and folding ones are mentioned in connection with the temple (1 K 6 34). Where "door" is used in connection with city gates (Neh 3 1 ff) it refers to the door proper which swings on its hinges as distinguished from the whole structure. The custom of fastening to the doorposts small cases containing a parchment inscribed with the words of Dt 6 4-9; 11 13-21 had its origin in the command there given. See also GATE; HOUSE.

Figurative: (1) Christ is "the door" into the gospel ministry (Jn 10 1.2.7); ministers must receive their authority from Him, and exercise it in His spirit. (2) "Through faith in Him also both shepherds and sheep enter into the kingdom of God (ver 9), and find all their spiritual needs supplied." (3) The fig. in Rev 3 20 is expressive of Christ's patient, persistent and affectionate appeal to men. (4) Elsewhere also of opportunity (Mt 25 10; Acts 14 27; 1 Cor 16 9; 2 Cor 2 12; Rev 3 8). (5) Of freedom and power (Col 4 3). See also ACHOR; SHEPHERD. BENJAMIN RENO DOWNER

DOORKEEPER, dōr'kēp-ēr (שֹׁרֵץ, shō'ēr): The gates of an oriental city and of the temple courts so closely resembled the door of a house that the same Heb word was used for doorkeeper and gatekeeper. It is often tr<sup>d</sup> by the less definite word "porter" (q.v.).

In the preëxilic writings (2 S 18 26; 2 K 7 10. 11) reference is made to porters at the gates of the cities Mahanaim and Samaria. In these early writings there is also mention of a small number of "keepers of the threshold" of the temple, whose duties included the gathering of money from the people for temple purposes, and the care of the sacred vessels (2 K 12 9; 22 4; 23 4). They held an honorable position (2 K 25 18), and occupied chambers in the temple (Jer 35 4). The same term is used to describe officers in the household of the king of Persia (Est 2 21; 6 2).

Differing from these "keepers of the threshold" in some respects are the doorkeepers or porters mentioned in Ch, Ezr and Neh. These formed a numerous sacred order (1 Ch 9 22; 23 5) from the time of David. Their duties and the words describing them in two passages, "keepers of the thresholds" (1 Ch 9 19) and "porters of the thresholds" (2 Ch 23 4), connect them in some measure with the "keeper of the threshold" referred to above. They guarded the gates of the house of Jeh (1 Ch 9 23), closing and opening them at the proper times (ver 27) and preventing the unclean from entering the sacred inclosure (2 Ch 23 19); they had charge of the sacred vessels and of the free-will offerings (2 Ch 31 14), and dwelt in the chambers about the temple (1 Ch 9 27). They were Levites, and came in from the Levitical villages every seventh day for service in their turn (1 Ch 9 25). Their office was honorable, ranking with the singers, after the priests and Levites (Ezr 2 42; 1 Ch 15 18).

In Ps 84 10, "I had rather be a d. in the house of my God," the word is not used in its technical sense. RVm gives "stand [AVm "sit"] at the threshold," to an eastern mind a situation of deep humility (cf title of the Ps and 1 Ch 9 19).

In the NT the order of temple doorkeepers is not referred to. But a doorkeeper (θυρωρός, thurōrós) is mentioned in connection with a private house (Mk 13 34), with the high priest's house (Jn 18 16.17), and with sheep-folds (Jn 10 3), a maid serving as doorkeeper in some cases (Acts 12 13).

DOORPOST, dōr'pōst. See HOUSE.

DOPHKAH, dof'ka (דֹּפְקָה, dophkāh, "drover"): A desert camp of the Israelites, the first after leaving the wilderness of Sin (Nu 33 12.13). See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

DOR, dōr, DORA, dō'ra (דֹּר, dō'r, דֹּר, dōr, "habitation," "circle"; Δόρα, Dōr; Jos, Δόρα, Dōra; mod. Tantūrah): A town of the coast of Pal, S. of Carmel (CAp, II, 10; Vita, 8), about 8 miles N. of Caesarea. It was occupied in the earliest times by the Canaanites and probably belonged to Phoenicia, tradition saying that it was a Sidonian colony. It furnished an abundance of the shell-fish so valuable for the manufacture of the Tyrian purple, and this would have led the Phoenicians to occupy the site. In the 12th cent. BC, the region was occupied by the northern people who raided the whole Syrian coast and Egypt. They were driven back by the Egyptians, but renewed the attack, and the weakness of Egypt in the middle of the cent. enabled them to settle in the coast region S. of Carmel; a tribe of them occupied Dor, and others the territory to the limits of the desert of Sinai, and became the Philii people so well known by their contests with the Hebrews. Naphoth-dor, "the heights of Dor," may be the slopes of Carmel inland from Tantūrah. Dor fell within the territory assigned to Manasseh (Josh 17 11; cf Ant, V, i, 22). It was the seat of a king who possessed other towns on the heights back of the coast. He was one of the allies of Jabin of Hazor in the conflict with Joshua (Josh 11 2) and was conquered by him (12 23), but Dor was not occupied by the Israelites (17 11; Jgs 1 27).

The inhabitants of Dor were at enmity with the Phoen towns and it would seem that the Sidonians seized it to obtain its rich supplies of shell-fish, and this probably caused the war of retaliation waged by the Philis, under the lead of Ashkelon, against Sidon in the middle of the 11th cent. Sidon was besieged by land, and the inhabitants were compelled to flee to Tyre. Dor seems to have been occupied by Solomon since he placed one of his purveyors in the town (1 K 4 11), and Tiglath-pileser III reduced it and set a governor over it (Rawl., Phoen., 84). Here Tryphon was besieged by Antiochus, but escaped to Apamea (1 Macc 15 11.13.25; Ant., XIII, vii, 2). It was made free by Pompey, and joined to the province of Syria (XIV, iv, 4). The youths of the place set up a statue of Tiberius in the Jewish synagogue, an outrage that was reported to Publius Petronius by Agrippa, and reparation was made (XIX, vi, 3). It does not seem to have been of much importance in later times, though the fortifications still remaining on the ruined site, from the period of the Middle Ages, show that it was then occupied. It is now only a miserable village nestled in the ruins.

DORCAS, dōr'kas (Δορκάς, Dorkás, the Gr equivalent of Aram. tabītha, "a gazelle"): The name was borne by a Christian woman of Joppa. She is called a disciple (mathētria: Acts 9 36, the only place in the NT where the fem. form is used). She seems to have had some means and also to have been a leader in the Christian community. Dorcas was beloved for the manner in which she used her position and means, for she "was full of good works, and almsdeeds which she did." Among her charities was the clothing of the poor with garments she herself made (ver 39), and by following her example, numerous "Dorcās societies" in the Christian church perpetuate her memory. There is a local memorial in the "Tabitha School" in Jaffa devoted to the care and education of poor girls.

Her restoration to life by Peter is recorded. At the time of her death Peter was in Lydda where he had healed Aeneas. Being sent for, he went to Joppa, and, by the exercise of the supernatural powers granted to him, "he presented her alive" to the mourning community. In consequence of this miracle "many believed on the Lord" (ver 42).

DORYMENES, dō-rim'e-nēz (Δορυμένης, Dorumenēs): -Father of Ptolemy Macron (1 Macc 3 38; 2 Macc 4 45); probably the same man who fought against Antiochus the Great (Polyb. v.61).

DOSITHEUS, dō-sith'ē-us (Δοσίθεος, Dositheos):

(1) A captain of Judas Maccabaeus (2 Macc 12 19-25); along with Sosipater he captured Timotheus after the battle of Carnion, but granted him his life and freedom on the representation that "he had in his power the parents of many of them and the brethren of some," who, if they put him to death, should "be disregarded."

(2) A soldier in the army of Judas Maccabaeus (2 Macc 12 35); he made a special attack upon Gorgias, governor of Idumaea, the opposing general, and would have taken the "accursed man" prisoner but for the interference of a Thracian horseman.

(3) A Jew, son of Drimylus (3 Macc 1 3) who rescued Ptolemy Philopator from a plot of Theodotus. He afterward proved an apostate from Judaism.

(4) A Levite priest who "in the 4th year of the reign of Ptolemy and Cleopatra" carried the tr of the Book of Est to Alexandria (Ad Est 11 1).

DOTAEA, dō-tē'a (AV, incorrectly, Judea; Δωταία, Dōtāia): Another form of the name DOTHAN (q.v.).

NOTE, dōt: "To dote" means either "to be weakminded" or "to be foolishly fond." In the latter sense it is employed in Ezk 23 5 ff; in the former, in Jer 50 36 AV (RV "shall become fools"); AV Sir 25 2 (RV "lacking understanding"), and AV 1 Tim 6 4 (RVm "to be sick"; AVm "a fool").

DOTHAIM, dō'thā-im: Mentioned in Jth 4 6 and frequently in connection with the invasion of Holofernes. See next art.

DOTHAN, dō'than (דוֹתָן, dōthayin, דוֹתָן, dōthān, "two wells," "double feast"; Δωθαιμ, Dōthaim): A place to the N. of Shechem whither Jacob's sons went for pasture for the flocks; where Joseph who followed them was sold to the Ishmaelites, after having been imprisoned in a "pit" (Gen 37 17 ff).

Dothan.

Here in later days the eyes of Elisha's servant were opened to see the mountain "full of horses and chariots of fire," guarding his master from the encircling Syrians (2 K 6 13 ff). This is certainly to be identified with Tell Dōthān, which lies on the E. of the ancient road leading from Gilead across Esdraelon to the seacoast, and thence to Egypt. It is about 5 miles to the S.W. of Jenīn. There are some traces of old buildings, two cisterns—Dōthayin or Dōthayim—"two cisterns" or "pits"—and one copious spring. Excellent pasture is found in the surrounding plain, and on the adjoining slopes.

DOUBLE, dub'l (דָּבָל, shānāh, "to repeat," as in counting; קָפַל, kāphal, "to fold over," or "double," as a cloth): A word used quite frequently in the OT. Jacob ordered his sons to take double money in their hands, i.e. twice the necessary amount (Gen 43 12.15). If a thief be caught with a living animal he was to restore double (Ex 22 4); if property be stolen out of the house of one to whom it is intrusted he was to restore double (Ex 22 7.9). The firstborn was to receive a double portion of the inheritance (Dt 21 17). Likewise also by a beautiful symbol Elisha asked for a double portion of Elijah's spirit to fall upon him (2 K 2 9). Degrees of punishment or sufferings were also expressed by the idea of a doubling (Isa 61 7; Jer 16 18; 17 18; Zec 9 12). The use of the second Heb form in Job 11 6 and 41 13 seems quite confusing in its tr. AV translates it simply "double," but RV gives it its expanded and derived meaning, "manifest in understanding," and "who shall come within his jaws," respectively, "manifest" in the first instance meaning multiplied, and "jaws" doubtless meaning the double row of teeth. The classic phrases in the NT are those used by James to represent instability and a wavering disposition, διδυχοῦς, dipsuchos, lit. "doubleminded" (Jas 1 8; 4 8).

WALTER G. CLIPPINGER

DOUBT, dout: This word, found only a score of times in the Bible, translates nevertheless about half as many different Heb and Gr originals with a corresponding variety of meanings.

In Gen 37 33 "without doubt" is to be taken in the common sense of "certainly"; in Job 12 2 in the sarcastic sense of "indeed!" In Dnl 5 12.16, it is used as a difficult problem or mystery to be explained, and these are the only cases of its employment in the OT.

In the NT it is about equally used to translate διαπορέω, diaporēō, and διακρίνω, diakrinō, and their cognates. The first means "to be without resource," "utterly at a loss," "nonplussed"; and the second, "to judge diversely." For the first, see Jn 13 22; Acts 2 12 AV; 5 24 AV; 10 17 AV; 25 20 AV; and Gal 4 20 AV. For the second see Mt 21 21; Mk 11 23; Acts 10 20; Rom 14 23. The last-named is deserving of particular attention. "He that doubteth is condemned [AV "damned"] if he eat," means that in a case of uncertainty as to one's Christian liberty, it were better to err on the side of restraint. In Lk 12 29 "to be of doubtful mind" (μετεωρίσω, meteōrizō, lit. "to suspend"; vide Thayer, s.v.), means "to be driven by gusts," or "to fluctuate in mid-air."

Here, as in Mt 14 31, "doubt" does not indicate a lack of faith, but rather "a state of qualified faith": its weakness, but not its absence.

In Jn 10 24 "doubt" translates ἀρω ψυχῆν, arō psuchēn, which lit. means "to lift up the soul," or "to keep one in suspense"; so RV. See also DISPUTATION.

DOUGH, dō. See BREAD.

DOVE, duv (דּוֹבָה, dōr, דּוֹבָה, yōnāh; περιστέρα, peristerā; Lat Zenaidura carolinensis): A bird of the family Columbidae. Doves and pigeons are so closely related as to be spoken and written of as synonymous, yet there is a distinction recognized from the beginning of time. It was esp. marked in Pal, because doves migrated, but pigeons remained in their chosen haunts all the year. Yet doves were the wild birds and were only confined singly or in pairs as caged pets, or in order to be available for sacrifice. Pigeons, without question, were the first domesticated birds, the record of their conquest by man extending if anything farther back than ducks, geese and swans. These two were the best known and the most loved of all the myriads of birds of Pal. Doves were given preference because they remained wild and were more elusive. The thing that escapes us is usually a little more attractive than the thing we have. Their loving natures had been noted, their sleek beautiful plumage, their plump bodies. They were the most precious of anything offered for sacrifice. Their use is always specified in preference to pigeons if only one bird was used; if both, the dove is frequently mentioned first. Because of their docility when caged, their use in sacrifice, and the religious superstition concerning them, they were allowed to nest unmolested and, according to species, flocked all over Pal. The turtle-dove nested in gardens and vineyards, and was almost as tame as the pigeons. The palm turtle-dove took its name from its love of homing in palm trees, and sought these afield, and in cities, even building near the temple in Jerus. It also selected thorn and other trees. It has a small body, about ten inches in length, covered with bright chestnut-colored feathers, the neck dappled with dark, lustrous feathers. The rock dove swarmed over, through, and among the cliffs of mountains and the fissures of caves and ravines. The collared turtle-dove was the largest of the species. It remained permanently and homed in the forests of Tabor and Gilead, around the Dead Sea, and along the Jordan valley. This bird was darker than the others and took its name from a clearly outlined collar of dark feathers encircling the neck, and was esp. sought for caged pets on account of its size and beauty.

In all, the dove is mentioned about fifty times in the Bible. Many of these references are concerning its use in sacrifice and need not all be mentioned. The others are quoted and explained from a scientific standpoint and in accordance with the characteristics and habits of the birds. The first reference to the dove occurs in Gen 8 8-12, in the history of the flood; then follows its specified use in sacrifice; note of its migratory habits is made, and then in poetry, prophecy, comparison, simile and song, it appears over and over throughout the Bible.

In Gen 8 8-12, we read, "And he sent forth a dove from him, to see if the waters were abated." Noah first sent out a raven, because it was a strong, aggressive bird and would return to its mate. But the raven only flew over the water and returned to perch on the ark. This was not satisfactory, so Noah in looking for a bird better suited to his purpose, bethought him of the most loving and tender bird he knew—the dove. It not only would return to the ark, but would enter and go to the cage of its mate, and if it found green food it would regurgitate a portion for her or its young, or if not nesting he could tell by its droppings if greenery had been eaten and so decide if the waters were going down. And this is precisely what happened. The dove came back, and the watching Noah saw it feed its mate little green olive leaves, for the dove never carries food in the beak, but swallows and then regurgitates it to mate and young. This first reference to birds was made on account of the loving, tender characteristics of the species; the next, because they were the most loved by the people, and therefore chosen as most suitable to offer as sacrifice (Gen 15 9). In Lev 1 14 f, doves are mentioned as sacrifice: "And the priest shall bring it unto the altar, and wring off its head, and burn it on the altar; and the blood thereof shall be drained out on the side of the altar." In Lev 5 7 the proper preparation of the sacrifice is prescribed. For method of handling sacrifice see vs 8.9.10. In Lev 12 6 the law for a sacrifice for a mother is given, and ver 8 of same ch provides that if she be too poor to offer a lamb, doves or pigeons will suffice. In Lev 14 4-8 the reference for the sacrifice of a leper is merely to "birds," because it is understood that they are pigeons and doves, and it contains the specification that if the victim is too poor to afford so elaborate a sacrifice, a smaller one will suffice. The birds are named in ver 22: "Two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, such as he is able to get; and the one shall be a sin-offering, and the other a burnt-offering" (cf Lev 15 14.29; Nu 6 10). When David prayed for the destruction of the treacherous, he used the dove in comparison, and because he says he would "lodge in the wilderness" he indicates that he was thinking of the palm turtle.

"And I said, Oh that I had wings like a dove!
Then would I fly away, and be at rest" (Ps 55 6).

In chanting a song of triumph, David used an exquisite thought.

"When ye lie among the sheepfolds,
It is as the wings of a dove covered with silver,
And her pinions with yellow gold" (Ps 68 13).

He referred to the rock dove because the metallic luster on its neck would gleam like gold in sunshine, and the soft grayish-white feathers beneath the wings as he would see the bird above him in flight would appear silver-like. By this quotation David meant that in times of peace, when men slept contentedly at home among their folds, their life was as rich with love and as free in peace as the silver wing of the dove that had the gold feathers and was unmolested among the inaccessible caves and cliffs. In Ps 74 19 the term "turtle-dove" is used to indicate people whom the Almighty is implored to protect: "Oh deliver not the soul of thy turtle-dove unto the wild beast: forget not the life of thy poor for ever."

Solomon uses the dove repeatedly in comparison or as a term of endearment. In Cant 1 15; 4 1; 5 12, he compares the eyes of his bride full, tender, beautiful, with those of a dove. In 2 12 he uses the voice of the dove as an indication of spring. In 2 14 he addresses the bride as a rock dove. In 5 2 is another term of endearment, this time used in the dream of the bride (cf 6 9). Isa 38 14 has reference to the wailing, mournful dove note from which the commonest species take the name "mourning dove." The reference in Isa 60 8 proves that the prophet was not so good an observer, or so correct in his natural history as David, who may have learned from the open. As a boy, David guarded the flocks of his father and watched the creatures around him. When exulting over the glory of the church in the numerous accessions of Gentiles, Isaiah cried, "Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows?" This proves that he confounded pigeons and doves. Doves were wild, mostly migratory, and had no "windows." But the clay cotes of pigeons molded in squares so that one large cote sheltered many pairs in separate homes had the appearance of latticed windows and were used as a basis in estimating a man's wealth. This reference should be changed to read, "and as pigeons to their windows." In Jer 8 7 the fact is pointed out that doves were migratory; and in 48 28 people are advised to go live in solitary places and be peaceable, loving and faithful, like the rock doves. See also Ezk 7 16: "But those of them that escape shall escape, and shall be on the mountains like doves of the valleys, all of them moaning, every one in his iniquity." This merely means that people should be driven to hide among the caves and valleys where the rock doves lived, and that the sound of their mourning would resemble the cry of the birds. It does not mean, however, that the doves were mourning, for when doves coo and moan and to our ears grow most pitiful in their cries, they are the happiest in the mating season. The veneration cherished for doves in these days is inborn, and no bird is so loved and protected as the dove—hence it is unusually secure and happy and its mournful cry is the product of our imagination only. The dove is the happiest of birds. Hos 7 11 and 11 11 each compares people with doves; the first, because the birds at times appear foolishly trusting; the second, because, while no bird is more confiding, none is more easily frightened. "And Ephraim is like a silly dove, without understanding: they call unto Egypt, they go to Assyria" (7 11). "They shall come trembling as a bird out of Egypt, and as a dove out of the land of Assyria; and I will make them to dwell in their houses, saith Jeh" (11 11). The reference in Nah 2 7 is to the voice of the birds.

Turtle-Dove (Turtur auritus).

NT references will be found in a description of the baptism of Jesus (Mt 3 16). People are admonished to be "harmless as doves" (10 16). "And Jesus entered into the temple of God, and cast out all them that sold and bought in the temple, and overthrew the tables of the money-changers, and the seats of them that sold the doves" (Mt 21 12). This proves that these birds were a common article of commerce, probably the most used for caged pets, and those customarily employed for sacrifice.

Dove's Dung (דֹּבָהּ יוֹנִים, hārī yōnīm, Kethibh for דִּבְחֵי יוֹנִים, dibhyōnīm): 2 K 6 25: "And there was a great famine in Samaria: and, behold, they besieged it, until an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a kab of dove's dung for five pieces of silver." This seems so repulsive that some commentators have tried to prove the name applied to the edible root of a plant, but the history of sieges records other cases where matter quite as offensive was used to sustain life. The text is probably correct as it stands.

DOWRY, dou'ri: In all Heb marriages, the dowry held an important place. The dowry sealed the betrothal. It took several forms. The bridegroom presented gifts to the bride. There was the מֹהָר, mōhar, "dowry" as distinguished from מַתָּן, matān, "gifts to the members of the family" (cf Gen 24 22.53; Gen 34 12). The price paid to the father or brothers of the bride was probably a survival of the early custom of purchasing wives (Gen 34 12; Ex 22 17; 1 S 18 25; cf Ruth 4 10; Hos 3 2). There was frequently much negotiation and bargaining as to size of dowry (Gen 34 12). The dowry would generally be according to the wealth and standing of the bride (cf 1 S 18 23). It might consist of money, jewelry or other valuable effects; sometimes, of service rendered, as in the case of Jacob (Gen 29 18); deeds of valor might be accepted in place of dowry (Josh 15 16; 1 S 18 25; Jgs 1 12). Occasionally a bride received a dowry from her father; sometimes in the shape of land (Jgs 1 15), and of cities (1 K 9 16). In later Jewish history a written marriage contract definitely arranged for the nature and size of the dowry.

EDWARD BAGBY POLLARD

DOXOLOGY, dok-sol'ō-jī (δοξολογία, doxologia, "a praising," "giving glory"): A hymn or liturgical formula expressive of praise to God, as the Gloria in Excelsis (an expansion of Lk 2 14), sometimes called the Greater Doxology, and the Gloria Patri ("Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, world without end, Amen") also known as the Lesser Doxology.

The clause, "as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be," was probably added to the original simple formula to emphasize the church's dissent from the Arian conception of Christ.

The term is applied in particular to the concluding paragraph of the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6 13 m, "For thine is the kingdom," etc; cf 1 Ch 29 11, and see LORD'S PRAYER).

To the same general class belong Ps 41 13; 72 18 f; 89 52; Rom 16 27; Eph 2 20; 1 Tim 1 17; Jude ver 25; Rev 5 13 f; 19 1-3, and the modern stanza beginning "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow." M. O. EVANS

DRACHMA, drak'ma, DRAM (δραχμή, drachmē): The word is used in the LXX as the rendering of בֶּקֶשׁ, beka', "half-shekel," which must refer to the light standard for the shekel, as its weight was about 62 grains. In the NT the word occurs only in Lk 15 8.9, where it is rendered "a piece of silver" (m "drachma"). It was commonly taken as equivalent to the Rom denarius, though not strictly so.

DRAGON, drag'un (תַּנִּינִי, tannin, pl. תַּנִּינִים, tannīm, תַּנְנֹת, tannōth; δράκων, drakōn):

Tannin and the pl. tannīm occur 14 t, and in EV are variously rendered "dragon," "whale," "serpent" or "sea-monster"; but Lam 4 3, AV "sea-monster," AVm "sea calves," RV "jackals." Tannin occurs 12 t, and is rendered "dragons," RV "jackals," except in Ezk 29 3, where AV has "dragon" (ARV "monster"), and in Ezk 32 2, where AV has "whale" and ERV and AVm "dragon" (ARV "monster"). Tannōth occurs once, in Mal 1 3, where it is rendered "dragons," RV "jackals." Drakōn occurs 12 t in Rev 12, 13, 16, and 20, where it is uniformly rendered "dragon." (Cf Arab. ṭannīn, the constellation, Draco.) Tannōth (LXX δράκων dōmata, "dwellings") is a fem. pl. form as if from tannāh, but it suits the context to give it the same meaning as tannīm.

In Ex 7 9.10.12, tannin is used of the serpents which were produced from Aaron's rod and the rods of the Egypt magicians, whereas in Ex 4 3 and 7 15, for the serpent produced from Aaron's rod, we find nāhāsh, the ordinary word for serpent. In two passages we find "whale," RV "sea-monster": Gen 1 21: "And God created the great sea-monsters, and every living creature that moveth"; Job 7 12: "Am I a sea, or a sea-monster, that thou settest a watch over me?" Other passages (ERV and AV) are Dt 32 33: "Their wine is the poison of dragons [ARV "serpents"], and the cruel venom of asps"; Neh 2 13: "And I went out by night by the valley gate, even toward the dragon's [ARV "jackals'"] well" (AV "dragon well"); Ps 91 13: "Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder: the young lion and the serpent [AV "dragon"] shalt thou trample under foot"; Ps 148 7: "Praise Jeh from the earth, ye sea-monsters [ARV "dragons"], and all deeps"; Jer 51 34: "Nebuchadrezzar the king of Babylon hath devoured me, . . . like a monster" (AV "dragon"). Here also two tannīm passages; Ezk 29 3: "Thus saith the Lord Jeh: Behold, I am against thee, Pharaoh king of Egypt, the great monster [AV "dragon"] that lieth in the midst of his rivers, that hath said, My river is mine own, and I have made it for myself"; and Ezk 32 2: "Son of man, take up a lamentation over Pharaoh king of Egypt, and say unto him, Thou wast likened unto a young lion of the nations; yet art thou as a monster [ERV "dragon," AV "whale"] in the seas; and thou didst break forth with thy rivers, and troubledst the waters with thy feet, and fouledst their rivers."

The foregoing passages offer no especial difficulties in the interpretation of the word tannin. All may fairly be understood to refer to a serpent or sea-monster or some imaginary creature, without invoking any ancient myths for their elucidation. The same may be said of the passages in Rev. A dragon is taken as the personification of Satan, as of Pharaoh in the passages in Ezk. It is of course true that ancient myths may more or less distantly underlie some of these dragon and serpent references, and such myths may be demonstrated to throw additional light in certain cases, but at least the passages in question are intelligible without recourse to the myths. This however is not equally true of all the tannin passages. In Ps 74 12 we read: "Yet God is my King of old, working salvation in the midst of the earth. Thou didst divide the sea by thy strength: thou brakest the heads of the sea-monsters [AV "dragons"] in the waters." Cf Isa 27 1; 51 9 f.

The three passages just cited seem to denote each some particular act, and are referred by Canon Cheyne (EB s.v. "Dragon") to the old Bab myth of the conflict of Marduk and Tiāmat in the Assyrian creation-legend (thus Gunkel, etc.). Indeed he refers to that myth not only these passages, but also Jer 51 34; Ezk 29 3-6; 32 2-8 and Job 7 12, which have been cited above. In translating the last two passages, Canon Cheyne uses the definite article, "the dragon," instead of "a" as in RV, which makes a great difference in the meaning. In Ps 87 4, it is clear that Rahab is a country, i.e. Egypt. Isa 30 7 is to the same point. In Isa 51 9.10, "that didst cut Rahab in pieces" and "that didst pierce the monster" (AV "dragon"), are two coördinate expressions of one idea, which is apparently the defeat of the Egyptians, as appears in the reference to the passage of the Red Sea. In Isa 27 1, "leviathan the swift serpent" and "leviathan the crooked serpent" and "the monster [AV and ERV "dragon"] that is in the sea" have been identified with Babylon, Persia and Egypt (EB s.v. "Dragon," 4). It is more probable that the first two expressions are coördinate, and amount to "leviathan the swift and crooked serpent," and that the verse may therefore refer to Babylonia and Egypt. Ps 74 12-15 is more in line with the idea of the art. in EB, but it is nevertheless susceptible of an explanation similar to that of the other two passages.

Tannīm, "dragons" (RV "jackals") occurs in Job 30 29; Ps 44 19; Isa 13 22; 34 13; 35 7; 43 20; Jer 9 11; 10 22; 14 6; 49 33; 51 37; tannōth, "dragons" (RV "jackals") is found in Mal 1 3. In all these passages, "jackal" suits the context better than "dragon," "sea-monster" or "serpent." An exception to the rendering of "dragon" or "serpent" or "sea-monster" for tannin is found in Lam 4 3: "Even the jackals draw out the breast, they give suck to their young ones." AV has "sea-monster," AVm "sea calves." A mammal is indicated, and RV apparently assumes that tannin is an error for tannīm. Two other exceptions are in Ezk 29 3 and 32 2, where EV renders tannīm by "dragon," since in these two passages "jackal" obviously will not suit. See JACKAL.

DRAUGHT, draft (ἀφ'εδράων, aphedrōn; Mt 15 17; Mk 7 19): "Closet," "sink" or "privy" (Rheims), lit. "place for sitting apart" (cf 2 K 10 27, "draught-house," and Mish "water-house"). According to the Mish Jehu turned the temple of Baal in Samaria into public latrines, "water-houses." Mk adds here (7 19) that by this saying Jesus cleansed all articles of food, i.e., declared them to be clean.

DRAWER, drō'ēr, OF WATER (שֹׁאֵב מַיִם, shō'ēbh mayim, from שָׁאָב, shā'abh, "to bale up" water): In Syria and Pal, outside of Mt. Lebanon and the Anti-Lebanon, the springs of water are scarce and the inhabitants of these less favored places have always depended upon wells and cisterns for their water supply. This necessitates some device for drawing the water. In the case of a cistern or shallow well, an earthenware water jar or a bucket made of tanned goats' skin is lowered into the water by a rope and then raised by pulling up the rope hand over hand (probably the ancient method), or by running the rope over a crude pulley fixed directly over the cistern or well. In the case of deep wells, the rope, attached to a larger bucket, is run over a pulley so that the water may be raised by the drawers walking away from the well as they pull the rope. Frequently animals are hitched to the rope to do the pulling.

In some districts where the water level is not too deep, a flight of steps leading down to the water's edge is constructed in addition to the opening vertically above the water. Such a well is pointed out near Haran in Mesopotamia as the one from which Rebekah drew water for Abraham's servant. In Gen 24 16 we read that Rebekah "went down to the fountain, and filled her pitcher, and came up."

The deep grooves in their curbs, worn by the ropes as the water was being raised, attest to the antiquity of many of the wells of Pal and Syria. Any one of the hundreds of grooves around a single well was many years in being formed. The fact that the present method of drawing water from these wells is not making these grooves, shows that they are the work of former times.

St. Mary's Well at Nazareth.

The drawing of water was considered the work of women or of men unfit for other service (Gen 24 11.13.43; 1 S 9 11; Jn 4 7). In Syria, today, a girl servant willingly goes to draw the daily supply of water, but seldom is it possible to persuade a boy or man to perform this service. When the well or fountain is at a distance, or much water is needed, tanned skins or earthen jars are filled and transported on the backs of men or donkeys.

Water drawing was usually done at evening time (Gen 24 11), and this custom has remained unchanged. There is no sight more interesting than the daily concourse at a Syrian water source. It is bound to remind one of the Bible stories where the setting is a wellside (Gen 24; Jn 4).

The service of water drawing was associated, in early times, with that of hewer of wood (Dt 29 11). Joshua made the Gibeonites hewers of wood and drawers of water in exchange for their lives (Josh 9 21.23.27). The inhabitants of Nineveh were exhorted to draw water and fill the cisterns of their fortresses in preparation for a siege (Nah 3 14).

Figurative: Water drawing is mentioned in the metaphor of Isa 12 3, "Ye draw water out of the wells of salvation."

DREAM, drēm, DREAMER, drēm'ēr (חֲלֹם, ḥālōm, חֲלֹם, ḥēlem; ὄναρ, ónar): In all time dreams and their interpretation have been the occasion of much curious and speculative inquiry. Because of the mystery by which they have been enshrouded, and growing out of a natural curiosity to know the future, much significance has been attached to them by people esp. of the lower stages of culture. Even the cultured are not without a superstitious awe and dread of dreams, attaching to them different interpretations according to local color and custom.

Naturally enough, as with all other normal and natural phenomena for which men could assign no scientific and rational explanation, they would be looked upon with a certain degree of superstitious fear.

"Dreams,
Which are the children of an idle brain,
Begot of nothing but vain fantasy,
Which is as thin of substance as the air
And more inconstant than the wind."
—Shakespeare.

While a fully satisfactory theory of dreams has not yet been established and while it is hardly possible that there will ever be a satisfactory explanation for each individual

1. Physio-logical and Psychological Ground—dream, yet through the rapid discoveries of physiological psychology in the recent decade or more, much new light is thrown on the subject. With the contribution modern psychology has made to our knowledge of the association of ideas through the connected relation of certain cortical centers and areas, it has come to be pretty well established that the excitation of certain bodily organs or surfaces will stimulate certain brain areas. Conversely the stimulation of certain cortical areas will produce a response in certain bodily regions over which these centers or areas preside. Connecting thought processes are therefore dependent upon the proper correlation of ideas through what are known physiologically as the association centers. If then it comes to pass that, as occurs in dreams, only fragmentary ideas or loosely connected trains of thought occur, and if, as frequently happens, there is momentary connection, but little connection with normal waking experience, it will easily be seen that the excitation of certain centers will awaken certain trains of thought which are but poorly related to the balance of one's thinking processes. Much is being said about the dissociation of ideas and the disturbance of personality of which dreams are one of several forms. Others are hallucinations, trances, visions, etc. Dreams are abnormal and sometimes pathological. Sleep is a normal experience. Perfect and natural sleep should be without dreams of any conscious occurrence. Perhaps psychologically there can be no such thing as perfectly dreamless sleep. Such a condition would probably be death itself. Nature doubtless has her silent vigils, keeping watch in the chambers of the soul during the deepest sleep. The only difference is that they do not come to the threshold of consciousness. Thus, dreams are to the sleeping state what visions and hallucinations are to the waking state, and like them have their ground in a distorted image-making function. While the source of the materials and the excitant may not be the same in each case, yet functionally they are the same.

The stimuli of dreams may be of two kinds. First, they may be physical and objective, or they may be due to suggestions and the association of ideas. They may be due to some physical disorder, such as imperfect digestion or circulation, improper ventilation or heating, or an uncomfortable position. Since by the very nature of the case dreams do not occur in a conscious state, the real cause cannot easily be discoverable and then only after the subject is entirely awakened through the effects of it. They may also be due to the association of ideas. Suggestion plays a large part. The vividness and recency of a conscious impression during the waking state may be thrown up from the subconscious region during the sleeping hours. The usual distorted aspect of dreams is doubtless due to the uncoupling of groups of ideas through the uncoupling of the cortical association areas, some of them being less susceptible than others to the existing stimulus.

The materials of dreams need not be recent; they may have been furnished by the conscious processes a long time before, but are brought to the threshold only by means of some train of ideas during a semi-conscious state. It is interesting to note that while time and space seem quite real in dreams, the amount covered in a single dream may occupy but a moment of time for the dreamer.

Dreams have always played an important part in the lit. and religion of all peoples. They have furnished mythologies; they have been the sources of systems of necromancy; they have become both the source and the explanation of otherwise inexplicable acts of Providence. Growing out of them we have a theory of nightmares and demonology. They have become the working material of the prophet both Bib. and pagan. Mediaeval civilization is not without its lasting effects of dreams, and modern civilization still clings with something of reverence to the unsolved mystery of certain dreams. While we have almost emerged from anything like a slavish adherence to a superstitious belief in dreams, we must still admit the possibility of the profound significance of dreams in the impressions they make upon the subject.

The Bible, contrary to a notion perhaps too commonly held, attaches relatively little religious significance to dreams. Occasionally, however, reference is made to communications from God through dreams (Gen 20 6; 1 K 3 5; Mt 1 20; 2 12, 13, 19, 22). It recognizes their human relations more frequently. In the OT lit. dreams play but little part except in the books of Gen and Dnl, in which there are abundant references to them. For their moral bearings the most important ones perhaps are those referred to in Gen 37 5-10. An uncritical attitude will give to them a lifeless and mechanical interpretation. A sympathetic and rational explanation gives them beauty, naturalness and significance. Joseph was the youngest and most beloved son of Jacob. He was just in the prime of adolescence, the very period of day dreaming. He was perhaps inordinately ambitious. This was doubtless heightened by the attentions of a doting father. The most natural dream would be that suggested by his usual waking state, which was one of ambition and perhaps unhealthy rivalry (see ASTRONOMY, II, 6). The source of Pharaoh's dreams and his solicitude are likewise capable of interpretation on somewhat natural grounds (Gen 41 7-32). The significance of them was given by Joseph.

Another illustration of the psychological exposition preceding is the dream of Solomon (1 K 3 5. 11-15). In this narrative, after Solomon had done what pleased Jeh and had offered a most humble prayer on an occasion which to him was a great crisis and at the same time a moment of great ecstasy in his life, he doubtless experiences a feeling of sweet peace in consequence of it. His sleep would naturally be somewhat disturbed by the excitement of the day. The dream was suggested by the associations and naturally enough was the approving voice of Jeh.

Dreaming and the prophetic function seem to have been closely associated (Dt 13 1, 3, 5). Whether from a coldly mechanical and superstitious, a miraculous, or a perfectly natural point of view, this relation is consistent. The prophet must be a seer, a man of visions and ideals. As such he would be subject, as in his waking states, so in his sleeping states, to extraordinary experiences. The remarkable dreams of Nebuchadnezzar, who stands out as an exceptional example, afford an illustration of what may be styled a disturbed personality (Dnl 2 3-45; 4 5-19). The effort made by the magicians, the enchanters, the Chaldeans, and the soothsayers, according to the best skill of the Orientals, was unavailing. Daniel, whether by extraordinary intellectual insight or by Divine communication, was able by his interpretation and its moral to set before the king a powerful lesson.

The NT gives still less place and importance to dreams than the OT. There are only six references and one citation to dreams or dreamers. It is significant that all these references are by Mt, and still more significant that Jesus nowhere refers to dreams, evidently attaching little if any importance to them. The references in Mt are confined entirely to warnings and announcements (Mt 1 20; 2 12, 13, 19, 22; 27 19). Once a citation (Acts 2 17) is used for illustrative purposes (cf Joel 2 28). See also AUGURY, IV, 5; DIVINATION, VI, 1, 1(b); MAGIC; REVELATION.

Whether God communicates directly or indirectly by dreams is still unsettled. With our present knowledge of spirit communication it would not seem unreasonable to assume that He may reveal Himself directly; and yet on the other hand the safest and perhaps surest explanation for our own day and experience is that in dream states the mind is more impressionable and responsive to natural causes through which God speaks and operates. That dreams have been and are valuable means of shaping men's thoughts and careers cannot be denied, and as such, have played an important part in the social and moral life of individuals and of society. A valuable modern illustration of this is the dream of Adoniram Judson Gordon (see How Christ Came to Church), through the influence of which his entire religious life and that of his church were completely transformed.

DREDGE, drej: A mixture of oats and barley (Job 24 6 AVm; AV "corn"; RV "provender"). The Heb word is כִּלְכִּיל, kilkil, usually "mixed grain," ZDMG, XLVIII, 236: grain not ground and boiled in water. Cf Job 6 5; Isa 30 24.

DREGS, dregs: The "sediments," "lees," "grounds of liquor"; only in pl. In AV it stands for: (1) Heb kubba'ath, "bowl," "chalice," found only in Isa 51 17, 22: "the dregs of the cup of trembling"; "the dregs of the cup of my fury." RV correctly changes "dregs" into "bowl." (2) Heb sh'mārim, "sediments" or "dregs," esp. lees of wine. "The dregs thereof, all the wicked of the earth shall wring [ARV "drain"] them out and drink them" (Ps 75 8), i.e. God gives to the wicked the cup of wrathful judgment, which they must drink to the last drop.

DRESS: In the Heb and Gr there is a wonderful wealth of terminology having to do with the general subject of dress among the ancient Orientals. This is reflected in the numerous synonyms for "dress" to be found in EV, "apparel," "attire," "clothes," "raiment," "garments," etc. But the words used in the originals are often greatly obscured through the inconsistent variations of the translators. Besides there are few indications even in the original Heb or Gr of the exact shape or specific materials of the various articles of dress named, and so their identification is made doubly difficult. In dealing with the subject, therefore, the most reliable sources of information, apart from the meaning of the terms used in characterization, are certain well-known facts about the costumes and dress-customs of the orthodox Jews, and others about the forms of dress worn today by the people of simple life and primitive habits in modern Pal. Thanks to the ultra-conservatism and unchanging usages of the nearer

East, this is no mean help. In the endeavor to discover, distinguish and deal with the various oriental garments, then, we will consider: 1. The Meaning of Terms; 2. The Materials; 3. The Outer Garments; 4. The Inner Garments; 5. The Headdress; 6. The Foot-gear; 7. The Dress of Jesus and His Disciples.

There was originally a sharp distinction between classical and oriental costume, but this was palpably lessened under the cosmopolitanism of the Rom Empire. This of course had its effect both in the modification of the fashions of the day and upon the words used for articles of clothing in the NT.

(1) The terms most used for clothes in general were, in the OT, sādhīn, simlāh, salmāh, and in the NT himation (Mt 21 7; 24 18; 26 65; Lk 8 27) and énduma (Mt 22 11 f; cf 7 15), pl., though the oldest and most widely distributed article of human apparel was probably the "loin-cloth" (Heb 'ezōr), entirely different from "girdle" (Gr zōnē). Bib. references for clothes are nearly all to the costume of the males, owing doubtless to the fact that the garments ordinarily used indoors were worn alike by men and women.

(2) The three normal body garments, the ones most mentioned in the Scriptures, are sādhīn, a rather long "under garment" provided with sleeves; k'ithōneth (Gr chiton), a long-sleeved tunic worn over the sādhīn, likewise a shirt with sleeves (see Masterman, DCG, art. "Dress"); and simlāh (Gr himation), the cloak of AV and RV, used in the pl. for "garments" in general; and the "girdle" (Gr zōnē; Arab. zunnar). The "headdress" (two types are now in use, the "turban" and the "kufiyeh") is never definitely named in the Bible, though we know it was the universal custom among ancient Orientals to cover the head.

(3) The simlāh (Gr himation) signifies an "outer garment" (see below), a "mantle," or "cloak" (see lexicons). A kindred word in the Gr himatismós, (tr<sup>d</sup> "raiment" in Lk 9 29, "garments" in Mt 27 35, and "vesture" in Jn 19 24) stands in antithesis to himation. The Gr chiton, Heb k'ithōneth, the "under garment," is tr<sup>d</sup> "coat" in Mt 5 40, "clothes" in Mk 14 63. The Heb word mē'il, Gr stolē, Lat stola, stands for a variety of garment used only by men of rank or of the priestly order, rendered RV "robe." It stands for the long garments of the scribes rendered "long robes" (Mk 12 38; Lk 20 46) and "best robe" in the story of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15 22). (For difference between mē'il and simlāh, see Kennedy, one-vol HDB, 197.) Oriental influences led to the adoption of the long tunic in Rome, and in Cicero's time it was a mark of effeminacy. It came to be known in its white form as tunica alba, or "white tunic," afterward in English "alb."

Other NT terms are πορφύραν, porphūran, the "purple" (Lk 16 19); the purple robe of Jesus is called himation in Jn 19 2; lention, "the towel" with which Jesus girded himself (13 4.5); then othōnion, "linen cloth" (Lk 24 12; Jn 19 40); sindōn, "linen cloth" (Mt 27 59); and bißsos, "fine linen" (Lk 16 19).

The primitive "aprons" of Gen 3 7, made of "sewed fig-leaves," were quite different from the "aprons" brought to the apostles in Acts 19 12. The latter were of a species known among the Romans as semicinctium, a short "waist-cloth" worn esp. by slaves (Rich, Dict. of Rom and Gr Antiq.).

Anthropology, Scripture and archaeology all witness to the use by primitive man of skins of animals as dress material (Gen 3 21, "coats of skin"; cf He 11 37, "went about in sheepskins, in goatskins").

Even today the traveler will occasionally see in Pal a shepherd clad in "a coat of skin." Then, as now, goat's hair and camel's hair supplied the materials for the coarser fabrics of the poor. John the Baptist had his raiment, enduma, of camel's hair (lit. "of camel's hairs," Mt 3 4). This was a coarse cloth made by weaving camel's hairs. There is no evidence that coats of camel's skin, like those made of goat's skin or sheep's skin have ever been worn in the East, as imagined by painters (see Meyer, Bleek, Weiss and Broadus; but of HDB, art. "Camel"). The favorite materials, however, in Pal, as throughout the Orient, in ancient times, were wool (see Prov 27 26, "The lambs are for thy clothing") and flax (see Prov 31 13, where it is said of the ideal woman of King Lemuel, "She seeketh wool and flax, and worketh willingly with her hands"). The finest quality of ancient "linen" seems to have been the product of Sculpture on Behistun Rock.

Egypt (see LINEN). The "silk" of Prov 31 22 AV is really "fine linen," as in RV. The first certain mention of "silk" in the Bible, it is now conceded, is in Rev 18 12, as the word rendered "silk" in Ezk 16 10.13 is of doubtful meaning.

(1) We may well begin here with the familiar saying of Jesus for a basal distinction: "If any man would go to law with thee, and take away thy coat [Gr chitōn], let him have thy cloak [himation] also" (Mt 5 40). Garments Here the "coat" (Heb k'thōneth) was the ordinary "inner garment" worn by the Jew of the day, in which he did the work of the day (see Mt 24 18; Mk 13 16). It resembled the Roman "tunic," corresponding most nearly to our "long shirt," reaching below the knees always, and, in case it was designed for dress occasions, reaching almost to the ground. Sometimes "two coats" were worn (Lk 3 11; cf Mt 10 10; Mk 6 9), but in general only one. It was this garment of Jesus that is said by John (19 23) to have been "without seam, woven from the top throughout."

(2) The word himation, here rendered "cloak," denotes the well-known "outer garment" of the Jews (see Mt 9 20.21; 14 36; 21 7.8; but cf also 9 16; 17 2; 24 18; 26 65; 27 31.35). It appears in some cases to have been a loose robe, but in most others, certainly, it was a large square piece of cloth, like a modern shawl, which could be wrapped around the person, with more or less taste and comfort. Now these two, with the "girdle" (a necessary and almost universal article of oriental dress), were commonly all the garments worn by the ordinary man of the Orient. The "outer garment" was frequently used by the poor and by the traveler as his only covering at night, just as shawls are used among us now.

(3) The common Heb name for this "outer garment" in the OT is as above, simlāh or salmāh. In most cases it was of "wool," though sometimes of "linen," and was as a rule certainly the counterpart of the himation of the Gr (this is its name throughout the NT). It answered, too, to the pallium of the Romans. It belonged, like them, not to the should be returned before sunset—"for that is his only covering, it is his raiment for his skin: wherein shall he sleep? . . . for I am gracious" (Ex 22 27). The Jewish tribunals would naturally, therefore, allow the "inner garment" to be taken by legal process, rather than the outer one (Mt 5 40; Lk 6 29); but Jesus virtually teaches that rather than have difficulty or indulge animosity one would better yield one's rights in this, as in other matters; cf 1 Cor 6 7.

Some identify the simlāh of the ancient Hebrews with modern aba, the coarse blouse or overcoat worn today by the Syrian peasant (Nowack, Benzinger, Mackie in HDB); but the distinction between these two garments of the Jews, so clearly made in the NT, seems to confirm the conclusion otherwise reached, that this Jewish "outer garment" closely resembled, if it was not identical with, the himation of the Greeks (see Jew Enc, art. "Clope") and 1-vol HDB, "Dress," 197; but cf Masterman, DCG, art. "Dress," 499, and Dearmer, DCG, art. "Clope"). In no respect has the variety of renderings in our EV done more to conceal from Eng. readers the meaning of the original than in the case of this word simlāh. For instance it is the "garment" with which Noah's nakedness was covered (Gen 9 23); the "clothes" in which the Hebrews bound up their kneading-troughs (Ex 12 34); the "garment" of Gideon in Jgs 8 25; the "raiment" of Ruth (3 3); just as the himation of the NT is the "cloak" of Mt 5 40, the "clothes" of Mt 24 18 AV (RV "cloak"), the "garment" (Mk 13 16 AV, RV "cloak").

(1) In considering the under garments, contrary to the impression made by EV, we must begin with the "loin-cloth" (Heb 'ēzōr), which

4. The unlike the "girdle" (see GIRDLE), was Under always worn next to the skin. The Garments figurative use made of it in Isa 11 5, and Jer 13 11, e.g. will be lost unless this is remembered. Often it was the only "under-garment," as with certain of the prophets (Elijah, 2 K 1 8; cf John the Baptist, Mt 3 4; Isaiah, 20 2, and Jeremiah, 13 1 ff). In later times it was displaced among the Hebrews by the "shirt" or Painting at Beni Hassan.

1. Fringed Skirt; 2 and 3. Tunics.

endūmata, or garments "put on," but to the periblēmata, or garments "wrapped around" the body. It was concerning this "cloak" that the Law of Moses provided that, if it were taken in pawn, it

"tunic" (see TUNIC). The universal "sign of mourning" was the girding of the waist with an 'ēzōr or "hair-cloth" (EV "sack-cloth"). A "loincloth" of "linen" was worn by the priests of early times and bore the special name of 'ēphōdh (1 S 2 18; cf 2 S 6 14 ff).

(2) The ordinary "under garment," later worn by all classes—certain special occasions and individuals being exceptions—was the "shirt" (Heb k'thōneth) which, as we have seen, reappears as chiton in Gr, and tunica in Lat. It is uniformly rendered "coat" in EV, except that RVm has "tunic" in Jn 19 23. The well-known piece of Assyrian sculpture, representing the siege and capture of Lachish by Sennacherib, shows the Jewish captives, male and female, dressed in a moderately tight garment, fitting close to the neck (cf Job 30 18) and reaching almost to the ankles; which must represent the k'thōneth, or kuttōneth of the period, as worn in towns at least. Probably the kuttōneth of the peasantry was both looser and shorter, resembling more the modern kamis of the Syrian fellah (cf Lat camisa, and Eng. "chemise").

(3) As regards sleeves, they are not expressly mentioned in the OT, but the Lachish tunics mentioned above have short sleeves, reaching half-way to the elbows. This probably represents the prevailing type of sleeve among the Hebrews of the earlier period. An early Egypt picture of a group of Sem traders (c 2000 BC) shows a colored tunic without sleeves, which, fastened on the left shoulder, left the right bare. Another variety of sleeves, restricted to the upper and wealthy classes, had long and wide sleeves reaching to the ground. This was the tunic worn by Tamar, the royal princess (2 S 13 18, "A garment of divers colors upon her; for with such robes were the king's daughters that were virgins apparelled"), "the tunic of [i.e. reaching to] palms and soles" worn by Joseph, familiarly known as the "coat of many colors" (Gen 37 3), a rendering which represents now an abandoned tradition (cf Kennedy, HDB). The long white linen tunic, which was the chief garment of the ordinary Jewish priest of the later period, had sleeves, which, for special reasons, were tied to the arms (cf Jos, Ant, III, vii, 2).

(4) Ultimately it became usual, even with the people of the lower ranks, to wear an under "tunic," or "real shirt" (Jos, Ant, XVII, vi, 7; Mish, passim, where it is called hālūk). In this case the upper tunic, the kuttōneth proper, would be removed at night (cf Cant 5 3, "I have put off my garment").

The material for the tunic might be either (1) woven on the loom in two pieces, and afterward put together without cutting (cf Dict. of Rom and Gr Antiq., art. "Tunica"), or (2) the garment might be woven whole on a special loom, "without seam," i.e. so as to require no sewing, as we know from the description given in Jn 19 23, and from other sources, was the chiton worn by Our Lord just before His crucifixion. The garments intended by the Heb (Dnl 3 21-27), rendered "coats" AV, have not been certainly made out. The AVm has "mantles," the ERV "hosen," ARV "breeches" (see Hosen). For "coat of mail" (1 S 17 5) see ARMOR.

When the Hebrews first emerged into view, they seem to have had no covering for the head except on special demand, as in case of war, when a leather-helmet was worn (see Headdress ARMOR). Ordinarily, as with the fellah of Pal today, a rope or cord served as a fillet (cf 1 K 20 32, and Virgil, Aeneid [Dryden], iv.213: "A golden fillet binds his awful brows"). Such "fillets" may be seen surviving in the representation of Syrians on the monuments of Egypt. Naturally, in the course of time, exposure to the Syrian sun in the tropical summer time would compel recourse to some such covering as the modern kufiyeh, which lets in the breeze, but protects in a graceful, easy way, the head, the neck and the shoulders. The head-gear of Ben-hadad's tribute-carriers (see above) resembles the Phrygian cap.

Modern Druse Headdress.

The head covering, however, which is best attested, at least for the upper ranks of both sexes, is the turban (Heb ṣānīph, from a root meaning to "wind round"). It is the ladies' "hood" of Isa 3 23, RV "turban"; the "royal diadem" of Isa 62 3, and the "mitre" of Zec 3 5, RVm "turban" or "diadem." Ezekiel's description of a lady's head-dress: "I bound thee with attire of fine linen" (Ezk 16 10 m), points to a turban. For the egg-shaped turban of the priests see BONNET (RV "head-tires"). The hats of Dnl 3 21 (RV "mantles") are thought by some to have been the conical Bab headdress seen on the monuments. According to 2 Macc 4 12 RV the young Jewish nobles were compelled by Antiochus Epiphanes to wear the pétasos, the low, broad-brimmed hat associated with Hermes. Other forms of headdress were in use in NT times, as we learn from the Mish, as well as from the NT, e.g. the suddar (σουδάριον, soudárium) from Lat sudarium (a cloth for wiping off perspiration, sudor) which is probably the "napkin" of Jn 11 44; 20 7, although there it appears as a kerchief, or covering, for the head. The female captives from Lachish (see above) wear over their tunics an upper garment, which covers the forehead and falls down over the shoulders to the ankles. Whether this is the garment intended by the Heb in Ruth 3 15, rendered "vail" by AV and "mantle" by RV, and "kerchiefs for the head" (Ezk 13 18 RV), we cannot say. The "veil" with which Rebekah and Tamar "covered themselves" (Gen 24 65; 38 14) was most likely a large "mantle" in which the whole body could be wrapped, like the šādhin (see above). But is seems impossible to draw a clear distinction between "mantle" and "veil" in the OT (Kennedy). The case of Moses (Ex 34 33) gives us the only express mention of a "face-veil."

The ancient Hebrews, like Orientals in general, went barefoot within doors. Out of doors they usually wore sandals, less frequently

6. Footgear shoes. The simplest form of sandal then, as now, consisted of a sole of untanned leather, bound to the foot by a leather thong, the shoe-latchet of Gen 14 23 and the latchet of Mk 1 7, etc. In the obelisk of Shalmanezzer, however, Jehu's attendants are distinguished by shoes completely covering the feet, from the Assyrians, who are represented as wearing sandals fitted with a heel-cap. Ladies of Ezekiel's day wore shoes of "sealskin" (Ezk 16 10 RV). The soldiers' "laced boot" may be intended in Isa 9 5 (RVm). Then, as now, on entering the house of a friend, or a sacred precinct (Ex 3 5; Josh 5 15), or in case of mourning (2 S 15 30), the sandals, or shoes, were removed. The priests performed their offices in the Temple in bare feet (cf the modern requirement on entering a mosque).

In general we may say that the clothes worn by Christ and His disciples were of the simplest and least sumptuous kinds. A special interest must attach even to the clothes that Jesus wore. These consisted, it seems quite certain, not of just five separate articles (see Edersheim, LTJM, I, 625), but of six. In His day it had become customary to wear a linen shirt (hālūk) beneath the tunic (see above). That Our Lord wore such a "shirt" seems clear from the mention of the laying aside of the upper garments (himátia, pl.), i.e. the "mantle" and the "tunic," before washing His disciples' feet (Jn 13 4). The tunic proper worn by Him, as we have seen, was "woven without seam" throughout, and was of the kind, therefore, that fitted closely about the neck, and had short sleeves. Above the tunic would naturally be the linen girdle, wound several times about the waist. On His feet were leather sandals (Mt 3 11). His upper garment was of the customary sort and shape, probably of white woolen cloth, as is suggested by the details of the account of the Transfiguration (Mk 9 3), with the four prescribed "tassels" at the corners. As to His head-dress, we have no description of it, but we may set it down as certain that no Jewish teacher of that day would appear in public with the head uncovered. He probably wore the customary white linen "napkin" (sudarum), wound round the head as a turban, with the ends of it falling down over the neck. The dress of His disciples was, probably, not materially different.

In conclusion it may be said that, although the dress of even orthodox Jews today is as various as their lands of residence and their languages, yet there are two garments worn by them the world over, the tallith and the 'arba' kan'phōth (see DCG, art. "Dress," col. 1). Jews who affect special sanctity, esp. those living in the Holy Land, still wear the tallith all day, as was the common custom in Christ's time. As the earliest mention of the 'arba' kan'phōth is in 1350 AD, it is clear that it cannot have existed in NT times.

DRINK. See FOOD; DRINK, STRONG.

DRINK OFFERING. See SACRIFICE IN OT AND NT.

DRINK, STRONG (שָׁכָר, shēkhār; σίκερα, síkera; from שָׁכַח, shākhār, "to be or become drunk"; probably from the same root as sugar, saccharine): With the exception of Nu 28 7, "strong drink" is always coupled with "wine." The two terms are commonly used as mutually exclusive, and as together exhaustive of all kinds of intoxicants.

Originally shēkhār seems to have been a general term for intoxicating drinks of all kinds, without reference to the material out of which they were made; and in that sense, it would include wine. Reminiscences of this older usage may be found in Nu 28 7 (where shēkhār is clearly equivalent to wine, as may be seen by comparing it with ver 14, and with Ex 29 40, where the material of the drink offering is expressly designated "wine").

When the Hebrews were living a nomadic life, before their settlement in Canaan, the grape-wine was practically unknown to them, and there would be no need of a special term to describe it. But when they settled down to an agricultural life, and came to cultivate the vine, it would become necessary to distinguish it from the older kinds of intoxicants; hence the borrowed word yayin ("wine") was applied to the former, while the latter would be classed together under the old term shēkhār, which would then come to mean all intoxicating beverages other than wine (Lev 10 9; Nu 6 3; Dt 14 26; Prov 20 1; Isa 24 9). The exact nature of these drinks is not clearly indicated in the Bible itself. The only fermented beverage other than grape-wine specifically named is pomegranate-wine (Cant 8 2: "the juice of my pomegranate," RVm "sweet wine of my pomegranate"); but we may infer that other kinds of shēkhār besides that obtained from pomegranates were in use, such as drinks made from dates, honey, raisins, barley, apples, etc. Probably Jerome (c 400 AD) was near the mark when he wrote, "Sikera in the Heb tongue means every kind of drink which can intoxicate, whether made from grain or from the juice of apples, or when honey-combs are boiled down into a sweet and strange drink, or the fruit of palm oppressed into liquor, and when water is coloured and thickened from boiled herbs" (Ep. ad Nepotianum). Thus shēkhār is a comprehensive term for all kinds of fermented drinks, excluding wine.

Probably the most common sort of shēkhār used in Bib. times was palm- or date-wine. This is not actually mentioned in the Bible, and we do not meet with its Heb name yēn temārim ("wine of dates") until the Talmudic period. But it is frequently referred to in the Assyrian-Bab contract tablets (uneiform), and from this and other evidence we infer that it was very well known among the ancient Sem people. Moreover, it is known that the palm tree flourished abundantly in Bib. lands, and the presumption is therefore very strong that wine made of the juice of dates was a common beverage. It must not be supposed, however, that the term shēkhār refers exclusively to date-wine. It rather designates all intoxicating liquors other than grape-wine, while in a few cases it probably includes even wine.

There can be no doubt that shēkhār was intoxicating. This is proved (1) from the etymology of the word, it being derived from shākhār, "to be or become drunk" (Gen 9 21; Isa 29 9; Jer 25 27, etc); of the word for drunkard (shikkār), and for drunkenness (shikkārōn) from the same root; (2) from descriptions of its effects: e.g. Isaiah graphically describes the stupefying effect of shēkhār on those who drink it excessively (28 7.8). Hannah defended herself against the charge of being drunk by saying, "I have drunk neither wine nor strong drink," i.e. neither wine nor any other intoxicating liquor (1 S 1 15). The attempt made to prove that it was simply the unfermented juice of certain fruits is quite without foundation. Its immoderate use is strongly condemned (Isa 5 11.12; Prov 20 1; see DRUNKENNESS). It was forbidden to ministering priests (Lev 10 9), and to Nazirites (Nu 6 3; Jgs 13 4.7.14; cf Lk 1 15), but was used in the sacrificial meal as drink offering (Nu 28 7), and could be bought with the tithe-money and consumed by the worshipper in the temple (Dt 14 26). It is commended to the weak and perishing as a means of deadening their pain; but not to princes, lest it might lead them to pervert justice (Prov 31 4-7).

DROMEDARY, drum'ē-dā-ri, drom'ē-dā-ri. See CAMEL.

DROP, DROPPING: "To drop" expresses a "distilling" or "dripping" of a fluid (Jgs 5 4; Prov 3 20; Cant 5 5.13; Joel 3 18; Am 9 13; cf 1 S 14 26, "the honey dropped" [m "a stream of honey"]); Job 29 22 and Isa 45 8 read "distil" (AV "drop"). The continuous "drippings" of rain through a leaking roof (roofs were usually made of clay in Pal, and always liable to cracks and leakage) on a "very rainy day" is compared to a contentious wife (Prov 19 13; 27 15); "What is described is the irritating, unceasing, sound of the fall, drop after drop, of water through the chinks in the roof" (Plumptre loc. cit.); cf also AV Eccl 10 18 (RV "leaketh").

DROPSY, drop'si (ὕδρωπικός, hudrōpikós, "a man afflicted with húdrops or dropsy"): Both forms of this disease occur in Pal, that in which the limbs and body are distended with water called anasarca, depending generally on cardiac or renal disease, and the form confined to the abdomen, usually the result of liver affection. The latter is the commoner, as liver disease is a frequent result of recurrent attacks of malarial fever. The man was evidently able to move about, as he had entered into the Pharisee's house (Lk 14 2).

DROSS, dros (רֵץ, ṣīgh): The refuse of smelting of precious metal (Prov 25 4; 26 23); used figuratively of what is base or worthless (Isa 1 22.25; Ezk 22 18.19; Ps 119 119).

DROUGHT, drout. See FAMINE.

DROVE, drōv. See CATTLE.

DROWNING, droun'ing. See PUNISHMENTS.

DRUM, drum (τύμπανον, týmpanon): This was the Heb tōph, "tabret" or "timbrel," a hand-drum, consisting of a ring of wood or metal covered with a tightly drawn skin, with small pieces of metal hung around the rim, like a tambourine. It was raised in the one hand and struck with the other, usually by women, but sometimes also by men, at festivities and on occasions of rejoicing. See 1 Macc 9 39, RV "timbrels."

DRUNKENNESS, drunk'n-nes (רָוַח, rāweh, שִׁכְכָּרוֹן, shikkārōn, שְׁתִּי, she'thī; μέθη, méthē):

I. Its Prevalence.—The Bible affords ample proof that excessive drinking of intoxicants was a common vice among the Hebrews, as among other ancient peoples. This is evident not only from individual cases of intoxication, as Noah (Gen 9 21), Lot (Gen 19 33.35), Nabal (1 S 25 36), Uriah made drunk by David (2 S 11 13), Amnon (2 S 13 28), Elah, king of Israel (1 K 16 9), Benhadad, king of Syria, and his confederates (1 K 20 16), Holofernes (Jth 13 2), etc, but also from frequent references to drunkenness as a great social evil. Thus, Amos proclaims judgment on the voluptuous and dissolute rulers of Samaria "that drink wine in [large] bowls" (Am 6 6), and the wealthy ladies who press their husbands to join them in a carousal (4 1); he also complains that this form of self-indulgence was practised even at the expense of the poor and under the guise of religion, at the sacrificial meals (2 8; see also Isa 5 11.12.22; 28 1-8; 56 11f). Its prevalence is also reflected in many passages in the NT (e.g. Mt 24 49; Lk 21 34; Acts 2 13.15; Eph 5 18; 1 Thess 5 7). Paul complains that at Corinth even the love-feast of the Christian church which immediately preceded the celebration of the Eucharist, was sometimes the scene of excessive drinking (1 Cor 11 21). It must, however, be noted that it is almost invariably the well-to-do who are charged with this vice in the Bible. There is no evidence to prove that it prevailed to any considerable extent among the common people. Intoxicants were then an expensive luxury, beyond the reach of the poorer classes. See DRINK, STRONG.

II. Its Symptoms and Effects.—These are most vividly portrayed: (1) some of its physical symptoms (Job 12 25; Ps 107 27; Prov 23 29; Isa 19 14; 28 8; 29 9; Jer 25 16); (2) its mental effects: exhilaration (Gen 43 34), jollity and mirth (1 Esd 3 20), forgetfulness (1 Esd 3 20), loss of understanding and balance of judgment (Isa 28 7; Hos 4 11); (3) its effects on man's happiness and prosperity: its immediate effect is to make one oblivious of his misery; but ultimately it "biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder," and leads to woe and sorrow (Prov 23 29-32) and to poverty (Prov 23 21; cf 21 17; Eccles 19 1); hence wine is called a "mockery" deceiving the unwise (Prov 20 1); (4) its moral and spiritual effects: it leads to a maladministration of justice (Prov 31 5; Isa 5 23), provokes anger and a contentious, brawling spirit (Prov 20 1; 23 29; 1 Esd 3 22; Eccles 31 26.29 f), and conduces to a profligate life (Eph 5 18; "riot," lit. profligacy). It is allied with gambling and licentiousness (Joel 3 3), and indecency (Gen 9 21 f). Above all, it deadens the spiritual sensibilities, produces a callous indifference to religious influences and destroys all serious thought (Isa 5 12).

III. Attitude of the Bible to the Drink Question.

—Intemperance is condemned in uncompromising terms by the OT and the NT, as well as by the semi-canonical writings. While total abstinence is not prescribed as a formal and universal rule, broad principles are laid down, esp. in the NT, which point in that direction.

In the OT, intemperance is most repugnant to the stern ethical rigorism of the prophets, as well as to the more utilitarian sense of propriety of the "wisdom" writers. As might be expected, the national conscience was but gradually quickened to the evil of immoderate drinking. In the narratives of primitive times, excessive indulgence, or at least indulgence to the point of exhilaration, is mentioned without censure as a natural thing, esp. on festive occasions (as in Gen 43 34 RVm). But a conscience more sensitive to the sinfulness of over-indulgence was gradually developed, and is reflected in the denunciations of the prophets and the warning of the wise men (cf references under I and II, esp. Isa 5 11f.22; 28 1-8; Prov 23 29-33). Nowhere is the principle of total abstinence inculcated as a rule applicable to all. In particular cases it was recognized as a duty. Priests while on duty in the sanctuary were to abstain from wine and strong drink (Lev 10 9; cf Ezk 44 21). Nazirites were to abstain from all intoxicants during the period of their vows (Nu 6 3f; cf Amos 2 12), yet not on account of the intoxicating qualities of wine, but because they represented the simplicity of the older pastoral life, as against the Canaanite civilization which the vine symbolized (W. R. Smith, Prophets of Israel, 84f). So also the Rechabites abstained from wine (Jer 35 6.8.14) and social conveniences, because they regarded the nomadic life as more conducive to Jeh-worship than agricultural and town life, with its temptations to Baal-worship. In Daniel and his comrades we have another instance of voluntary abstinence (Dnl 1 8-16). These, however, are isolated instances. Throughout the OT the use of wine appears as practically universal, and its value is recognized as a cheering beverage (Jgs 9 13; Ps 104 15; Prov 31 7), which enables the sick to forget their pains (Prov 31 6). Moderation, however, is strongly inculcated and there are frequent warnings against the temptation and perils of the cup.

In Apoc, we have the attitude of prudence and common sense, but the prophetic note of stern denunciation is wanting. The path of wisdom is the golden mean. "Wine is as good as life to men, if thou drink it in its measure; . . . wine drunk in season and to satisfy is joy of heart, and gladness of soul: wine drunk largely is bitterness of soul, with provocation and conflict" (Ecclus 31 27-30 RV). A vivid picture of the effects of wine-drinking is given in 1 Esd 3 18-24. Stronger teaching on the subject is given in the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs. The use of wine is permitted to him who can use it temperately, but abstinence is enjoined as the wiser course (XII P, Jud 16 3).

In the NT, intemperance is treated as a grave sin. Only once, indeed, does Our Lord explicitly condemn drunkenness (Lk 21 34), though

3. In the NT it is implicitly condemned in other passages (Mt 24 49=Lk 12 45). The meagerness of the references in Our Lord's teaching is probably due to the fact already mentioned, that it was chiefly prevalent among the wealthy, and not among the poorer classes to whom Our Lord mainly ministered. The references in Paul's writings are very numerous (Gal 5 21; Eph 5 18, et al.). Temperance and sobriety in all things are everywhere insisted on (e.g. Acts 24 25; Gal 5 23; 2 Pet 1 6). A bishop and those holding honorable position in the church should not be addicted to wine (1 Tim 3 2f; Tit 1 7f; 2 2f). Yet Jesus and His apostles were not ascetics, and the NT gives no rough-and-ready prohibition of strong drink on principle. In contrast with John the Baptist, who was a Nazirite from birth (Lk 1 15), Jesus was called by His enemies a "wine-bibber" (Mt 11 19). He took part in festivities in which wine was drunk (Jn 2 10). There are indications that He regarded wine as a source of innocent enjoyment (Lk 5 38f; 17 8). To insist on a distinction between intoxicating and unfermented wine is a case of unjustifiable special pleading. It must be borne in mind that the drink question is far more complex and acute in modern than in Bib. times, and that the conditions of the modern world have given rise to problems which were not within the horizon of NT writers. The habit of excessive drinking has spread enormously among the common people, owing largely to the cheapening of alcoholic drinks. The fact that the evil exists today in greater proportions may call for a drastic remedy and a special crusade. But rather than defend total abstinence by a false or forced exegesis, it were better to admit that the principle is not formally laid down in the NT, while maintaining that there are broad principles enunciated, which in view of modern conditions should lead to voluntary abstinence from all intoxicants. Such principles may be found, e.g. in Our Lord's teaching in Mt 16 24f; Mk 9 42f, and in the great Pauline passages—Rom 14 13-21; 1 Cor 8 8-13.

IV. Drunkenness in Metaphor.—Drunkenness very frequently supplies Bib. writers with striking metaphors and similes. Thus, it symbolizes intellectual or spiritual perplexity (Job 12 25; Isa 19 14; Jer 23 9), bewilderment and helplessness under calamity (Jer 13 13; Ezk 23 33). It furnishes a figure for the movements of sailors on board ship in a storm (Ps 107 27), and for the convulsions of the earth on the day of Jeh (Isa 24 20). Jeh's "cup of staggering" is a symbol of affliction, the fury of the Lord causing stupor and confusion (Isa 51 17-23; cf Isa 63 6; Jer 25 15f; Ezk 23 33; Ps 75 8). The sword and the arrow are said to be sodden with drink like a drunkard with wine (Dt 32 42; Jer 46 10). In the Apocalypse, Babylon (i.e. Rome) is portrayed under the figure of a "great harlot" who makes kings "drunken with the wine of her fornication"; and who is herself "drunken with the blood of the saints, and . . . of the martyrs of Jesus" (Rev 17 2.6).

D. MIALl EDWARDS
DRUSILLA, drōo-sil'a (Δρούσιλλα, Drouisilla, or Δρουσιλλα, Drouisilla): Wife of Felix, a Jewess, who along with her husband "heard [Paul] concerning the faith in Christ Jesus" during Paul's detention in Caesarea (Acts 24 24). β text gives the rendering "Drusilla the wife of Felix, a Jewess, asked to see Paul and to hear the word." The fact that Drusilla was a Jewess explains her curiosity, but Paul, who was probably acquainted with the past history of her and Felix, refused to satisfy their request in the way they desired, and preached to them instead concerning righteousness and self-restraint and the final judgment. At this "Felix was terrified" (Acts 24 25). β text states that Paul's being left in bonds on the retirement of Felix was due to the desire of the latter to please Drusilla (cf Acts 24 27). Probably this explanation, besides that of the accepted text, was true also, as Drusilla, who was a member of the ruling house, saw in Paul an enemy of its power, and hated him for his condemnation of her own private sins.

The chief other source of information regarding Drusilla is Jos. Drusilla was the youngest of the three daughters of Agrippa I, her sisters being Bernice and Mariamne. She was born about 36 AD and was married when 14 years old to Azizus, king of Emeza. Shortly afterward she was induced to desert her husband by Felix, who employed a Cyprian sorcerer, Simon by name, to carry out his purpose. She was also influenced to take this step by the cruelty of Azizus and the hatred of Bernice who was jealous of her beauty. Her marriage with Felix took place about 54 AD and by him she had one son, Agrippa, who perished under Titus in an eruption of Mt. Vesuvius. The mention by Jos of "the woman" who perished along with Agrippa (Ant. XX, vii, 2) refers probably not to his mother Drusilla but to his wife. C. M. KERR

DUALISM, dū'al-iz'm. See PHILOSOPHY.

DUE, dū. See DUTY.

DUKE, dūk: The rendering in AV in Gen 36 15 ff; Ex 15 15, and 1 Ch 1 51 ff of מַלְכִּים, 'al-lūph (ARV and ERV "chief"), and in Josh 13 21 of נְשִׁיכְחִים ("dukes," RV "princes"). It occurs also, as the rendering of stratēgōs, in 1 Macc 10 65 (RV "captain"). Elsewhere נְשִׁיכְחִים is tr'd "princes" or "principal men." The fact that with two exceptions the term is applied in EV only to the chiefs of Edom has led to the impression that in the family of Esau the chiefs bore a special and hereditary title. But 'allūph was a general term for tribal chief or prince (cf Zec 9 7; 12 5.6; RV "chieftains," AV "governors").

Moreover, at the time the AV was made the word "duke" was not used as a title in England: the term had the same general force as dux, the word employed in the Vulg. So Sir T. Elyot (d. 1546) speaks of "Hannibal, duke of Carthage" (The Governour, II, 233); Shakespeare, Henry V, III, 2, 20, "Be merciful, great duke, to men of mould" (cf Midsummer Night's Dream, I, 1, 21); Sylvester (1591) Du Bartas, "The great Duke, that (in dreadful aw) Upon Mt. Horeb learn'd th' eternal law." In a still earlier age Wiclif uses the word of the Messiah (Mt 2 6); and in Select Works, III, 137, "Jesus Christ, duke of oure batel."

Yet in all probability the Heb word was more specific than "chief" or "duke" in the broad sense. For if 'allūph is derived from 'eleph, "thousand," "tribe," the term would mean the leader of a clan, a "chiliarch" (cf LXX, Zec 9 7; 12 5.6). ARV has eliminated the word "duke." See CHIEF.

DULCIMER, dul'si-mēr. See MUSIC under Nebhel and Sumphonia.

DUMAH, dū'ma (דִּמְיָה, dūmāh, "silence"): This word occurs in the OT with the following significations: (1) the land of silence or death, the grave (Ps 94 17; 115 17); (2) a town in the highlands of Judah between Hebron and Beersheba, now ed-Daume (Josh 15 52); (3) an emblematical designation of Edom in the obscure oracle (Isa 21 11.12); (4) an Ishmaelite tribe in Arabia (Gen 25 14; 1 Ch 1 30). According to the Arab. geographies this son of Ishmael founded the town of Dūmat-el-Jandal, the stone-built Dūmah, so called to distinguish it from another D. near the Euphrates. The former now bears the name of the Jawf ("belly"), being a depression situated half-way between the head of the Persian Gulf and the head of the gulf of Akaba. Its people in the time of Mohammed were Christians of the tribe of Kelb. It contained a great well from which the palms and crops were irrigated. It has often been visited by European travelers in recent times. See Jour. Royal Geog. Soc., XXIV (1854), 138-58; W. G. Palgrave, Central and Eastern Arabia, ch ii. It is possible that the oracle in Isa (no. 3 above) concerns this place.

THOMAS HUNTER WEIR

DUMB, dum (אֵילָם, 'ālam, אֵילֵם, 'illēm, lit. "tied in the tongue"; κωφός, kōphós): Used either as expressing the physical condition of speechlessness, generally associated with deafness, or figuratively as meaning the silence produced by the weight of God's judgments (Ps 39 2-9; Dnl 10 15) or the oppression of external calamity (Ps 38 13). As an adj. it is used to characterize inefficient teachers destitute of spirituality ("dumb dogs," Isa 56 10). The speechlessness of Saul's companions (Acts 9 7) was due to fright; that of the man without the wedding garment was because he had no excuse to give (Mt 22 12). Idols are called dumb, because helpless and voiceless (Hab 2 18.19; 1 Cor 12 2). The dumbness of the sheep before the shearer is a token of submission (Isa 53 7; Acts 8 32).

Temporary dumbness was inflicted as a sign upon Ezekiel (3 26; 24 27; 33 22) and as a punishment for unbelief upon Zacharias (Lk 1 22). There are several cases recorded of Our Lord's healing the dumb (Mt 15 30; Mk 7 37; Lk 11 14, etc). Dumbness is often associated with imbecility and was therefore regarded as due to demoniac possession (Mt 9 32; 12 22). The evangelists therefore describe the healing of these as effected by the casting out of demons. This is esp. noted in the case of the epileptic boy (Mk 9 17). The deaf man with the impediment in his speech (Mk 7 32) is said to have been cured by loosening the string of his tongue. This does not necessarily mean that he was tongue-tied, which is a condition causing lisping, not stammering; he was probably one of those deaf persons who produce babbling, incoherent and meaningless sounds. I saw in the asylum in Jerus a child born blind and deaf, who though dumb, produced inarticulate noises.

In an old 14th-cent. psalter "dumb" is used as a vb. in Ps 39: "I dumbled and maked and was full stille." ALEX. MACALISTER

DUNG, dung, DUNG GATE (תְּשֻׁנָּה, 'ashpōth, דֹּמֶן, dōmen, פֶּרֶשׁ, peresh; σκύβαλον, skūbalon, etc): Nine different words occurring in the Heb have been tr'd "dung" in the OT. The word used to designate one of the gates of Jerus ('ashpōth, Neh 2 13; 3 14) is more general than the others and may mean any kind of refuse. The gate was probably so named because outside it was the general dump heap of the city. Visitors in recent years riding outside the city walls of Jerus, on their way to the Mt. of Olives or Jericho, may have witnessed such a dump against the wall, which has existed for generations.

The first mention made of dung is in connection with sacrificial rites. The sacred law required that the dung, along with what parts of the animal were not burned on the altar, should be burned outside the camp (Ex 29 14; Lev 4 11; 8 17; 16 27; Nu 19 5).

The fertilizing value of dung was appreciated by the cultivator, as is indicated by Lk 13 8 and possibly Ps 83 10 and Isa 25 10.

Dung was also used as a fuel. Ezk 4 12.15 will be understood when it is known that the dung of animals is a common fuel throughout Pal and Syria, where other fuel is scarce. During the summer, villagers gather the manure of their cattle, horses or camels, mix it with straw, make it into cakes and dry it for use as fuel for cooking, esp. in the winter when wood or charcoal or straw are not procurable. It burns slowly like peat and meets the needs of the kitchen. In Mesopotamia the writer saw it being used with forced draft to fire a steam boiler. There was no idea of uncleanness in Ezekiel's mind, associated with the use of animal dung as fuel (Ezk 4 15).

Figuratively: Dung was frequently used figuratively to express the idea (a) of worthlessness, esp. a perishable article for which no one cares (1 K 14 10; 2 K 6 25; 9 37; Job 20 7; Ps 83 10; Jer 8 2; 9 22; 16 4; 25 33; Zeph 1 17; Phil 3 8 [ARV "refuse"]). Dunghill was used in the same way (1 S 2 8; Ezr 6 11; Ps 113 7; Isa 25 10; Dnl 2 5; 3 29; Lk 14 35; Lam 4 5); (b) as an expression of disgust (2 K 18 27; Isa 36 12); (c) of rebuke (Mal 2 3).

DUNGEON, dun'jun. See PRISON.

DUNGHILL, dung'hil (תְּשֻׁנָּה, 'ashpōth, 1 S 2 8, מִדְּמֶנָה, madhmēnāh, etc, with other words; κοπρία, kopria, Lk 14 35): Dung heap, or place of refuse. To sit upon a dunghill (1 S 2 8; Ps 113 7; Lam 4 5) is significant of the lowest and most wretched condition. To turn a house into a dunghill (Dnl

2 5; 3 29), or be flung upon a dunghill (Lk 14 35), marks the extreme of ignominy. See also DUNG.

DURA, dū'ra (דּוּרָא, dūrā): The name of the plain on which Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, set up the great golden image which all his subjects were ordered to worship (Dnl 3 1). Oppert placed it to the S.E. of Babylon, near a small river and mounds bearing the name of Douair or Dûair, where, also, was what seemed to be the base of a great statue (Expéd. scientifique en Mésopotamie, I, 238 f). Others have believed that name to indicate a portion of the actual site of Babylon within the great wall (dûru) of the city—perhaps the rampart designated dûr Šu-anna, “the rampart [of the city] Lofty-defense,” a name of Babylon. The fact that the plain was within the city of Babylon precludes an identification with the city Dûru, which seems to have lain in the neighborhood of Erech (Hommel, Grundriss, 264, n. 5). It is noteworthy that the LXX substitutes Δεειρά, Deeirá, for Dura, suggesting that the Gr translators identified it with the Bab Dêru, a city which apparently lay toward the Elamite border. It seems to have been called also Dâr-îli, “god’s rampart.” That it was at some distance is supported by the list WAI, IV, 36 [38], where Dûru, Tutul and Gudua (Cuthah), intervene between Dêru or Dâr-îli and Tindir (Babylon). “The plain of the dûr” or “rampart” within Babylon would therefore seem to be the best rendering.

DURE, dūr (πρόσκαιρος, próskaïros): Used for “endure” (q.v.), AV Mt 13 21 (RV “endureth”).

DUST, dust (דָּפָן, ‘āphār; κονιοπρός, koniortós, χούς, choús): Small particles of earth. The word has several figurative and symbolic meanings: (1) Dust being the material out of which God is said to have formed man (Gen 2 7), it became a symbol of man’s frailty (Ps 103 14, “For he knoweth our frame; he remembereth that we are dust”; cf Gen 18 27; Job 4 19, etc), and of his mortality (Gen 3 19, “Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return”; cf Job 34 15; Ps 104 29; Eccl 3 20; 12 7, etc). Hence it is used figuratively for the grave (Ps 22 15.29; 30 9; Dnl 12 2). (2) Such actions as to lie in the dust, to lick the dust, to sprinkle dust on the head, are symbols expressive of deep humiliation, abasement or lamentation (e.g. Job 2 12; 42 6, Ps 72 9; Isa 2 10; 47 1; 49 23; Lam 2 10; 3 29; Ezk 27 30; Mic 7 17; Rev 18 19). Hence such expressions as “He raiseth up the poor out of the dust,” i.e. out of their state of lowliness (1 S 2 8; Ps 113 7). (3) Throwing dust was an act expressive of execration. Thus Shimei “cursed” David and “threw stones at him, and cast dust,” lit. “dusted [him] with dust” (2 S 16 13). So the crowd which Paul addressed at Jerus manifested their wrath against him by tossing about their garments and casting dust into the air (Acts 22 23). (4) Shaking the dust off one’s feet against anyone (Mt 10 14; Mk 6 11; Lk 9 5; 10 11; Acts 13 51) is symbolic of renunciation, as we would say “washing one’s hands of him,” an intimation that all further intercourse was at an end. It was practised by the Pharisees on passing from gentile to Jewish soil, it being a rabbinical doctrine that the dust of a heathen land defiles. (5) It is also used fig. for an innumerable multitude (e.g. Gen 13 16; 28 14; Job 27 16; Ps 78 27). (6) The expression “Jeh will make the rain of thy land powder and dust” (Dt 28 24) means the dust in consequence of the drought shall fall down instead of rain on the dry ground. In Judaea and vicinity during a sirocco, the air becomes filled with sand and dust, which are blown down by the wind with great violence.

DUTY, dū'ti (דָּבָר, dābhār; ὀφείλω, opheilō): The word d. occurs only three times in the OT and twice in the NT. In the OT it is the tr of dābhār, which, meaning originally “speech,” or “word,” came to denote any particular “matter” that had to be attended to. In the two places where it is rendered “duty” (2 Ch 8 14; Ezr 3 4) the reference is to the performance of the Temple services—praise and sacrifice—and it is probably from these passages that the phrase “taking duty” in church services is derived. In other passages we have different words employed to denote the priests’ dues: AV Lev 10 13.14, hōk (“statutory portion”); Dt 18 3, mishpāt (“judgment”). In Prov 3 27, we have a reference to d. in the moral sense, “With-hold not good from them to whom it is due,” ba'al (i.e. as in AVm, “from the owners thereof”). In Ex 21 10 we have the “duty of marriage” (‘ōnāh), that which was due to the wife.

In the NT “duty” is expressed by opheilō, “to owe,” “to be due.” In Lk 17 10, we have “Say, . . . we have done that which it was our duty to do,” and in Rom 15 27 AV, it is said of the Gentiles with reference to the Jewish Christians, “Their duty is also to minister unto them in carnal things,” ARV “they owe it.” In Mt 13 34 we have “till he should pay all that was due” (opheilō, “owing”), and in 1 Cor 7 3 AV, “Render unto the wife due [opheilē] benevolence,” ARV “her due.” See also ETHICS.

DWARF, dwōrf: The rendering in EV of Heb דָּל, dal, “thin,” “small,” in Lev 21 20, where a list is given of physical failings which forbade a man of the seed of Aaron to officiate at the altar, though he might partake of the sacrificial gifts. The precise meaning of the Heb word here is uncertain; elsewhere it is used of the lean kine (Gen 41 3) and blasted ears (ver 23) of Pharaoh’s dream; of the grains of manna (Ex 16 14), of the still, small voice (1 K 19 12), of dust (Isa 29 5), etc. LXX and Vulg suggest defective eyes; but “withered” would perhaps best express the meaning. See PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

DWELL, dwel:

(1) In the OT “dwell” tr<sup>s</sup> 9 words, of which by far the most frequent is יָשָׁב, yāshabh, “to sit down,” tr<sup>d</sup> “dwell” over 400 times (Gen 4 20; Josh 20 4; 1 Ch 17 1.4.5, etc); also very frequently “sit,” and sometimes “abide,” “inhabit,” “remain.” Another word often rendered “dwell” is שָׁכַן or שָׁכַן, shākhan or shākhēn (“to settle down”), from which is derived the rabbinic word שְׁכִינָה, sh’khīnāh (lit. “that which dwells”), the light on the mercy-seat which symbolized the Divine presence (Ex 25 8, etc). In order to avoid appearing to localize the Divine Being, wherever God is said to “dwell” in a place, the Tg renders that He “causes His Shekinah to dwell” there.

(2) In the NT “dwell” most frequently stands for οἰκῶ, oikēō, or one of its compounds; also σκηνοῶ, skēnōō, and (chiefly in the Johannine writings) μένω, ménō, which, however, is always tr<sup>d</sup> “abide” in RV, and generally in AV. Mention may be made of the mystical significance of the word in some NT passages, of the indwelling of the Father or of the Godhead in Christ (Jn 14 10; Col 1 19; 2 9), of the believer in Christ (Jn 6 56 AV; Eph 3 17), and in God (1 Jn 4 15 AV; cf Ps 90 1; 91 1), and of the Holy Spirit or God in the believer (Jn 14 17; AV 1 Jn 3 24; 4 15 f).

me'oddām, found in Ex 25 5; 26 14; 35 7; 36 19; 39 34; (b) hāmūc (RVm "crimsoned") (Isa 63 1); (c) ṭbhūl (Ezk 23 15). Ṭbhūl is probably more correctly rendered "flowing turban," as in the RV of the above vs (BDB); (d) ṣebha, "dyed" is so tr<sup>d</sup> in ARV of Jgs 5 30 (BDB); cf Arab. sabagh. The above references and other color words mentioned elsewhere (see COLOR) indicate that the Israelites were acquainted with dyed stuffs, even if they themselves did not do the dyeing. An analysis of the various Bib. references shows but four colors which were produced on cloth by dyeing, namely, purple, blue (violet), crimson and scarlet. Of these, purple is the one best known because of the many historical references to it. It was the symbol of royalty and luxury. Because of its high price, due to the expensive method of obtaining it, only royalty and the rich could afford purple attire. One writer tells us that the dyestuff was worth its weight in silver. Probably it was because of its scarcity, and because it was one of the very limited number of dyes known, rather than for any remarkable beauty of color, that the purple was so much sought after. If Pliny's estimate is to be accredited, then "in the dye the smell of it was offensive and the color itself was harsh, of a greenish hue and strongly resembling that of the sea when in a tempestuous state."

The purple and blue dyes were extracted from shellfish. The exact process used by the ancients is still a question in spite of the attempts of early writers to describe it. Tyre and Sidon were noted as the suppliers of these colors, hence the name "Tyrian purple." The inhabitants of these cities were at first simply dealers in the purple (Ezk 27 7, 24), but they afterward became the manufacturers, as the heaps of the emptied shells of the Murex trunculus, which still exist in the vicinity of these cities, testify. The pigment was secreted by a gland in the lining of the stomach. The shell was punctured and the fish removed in order to secure the dye. The juice, at first whitish, changed on exposure to yellowish or greenish and finally to red, amethyst or purple, according to the treatment. A modified color was obtained by first dipping the textile in a cochineal bath and then in the purple. Tyrian purple was considered most valuable when it was "exactly the color of clotted blood and of a blackish hue" (Pliny). See also LYDIA; THYATIRA. Besides the shellfish above mentioned, several other species are noted by different writers, namely, Murex branderis, Murex erinaceus, Murex buccinum (purpura haemastoma). This latter species is still used by the dwellers on the shores where it is found. Various species of the murex are found today at Haifa (Syria), about the Gr isles and on the N. coast of Africa. The purple color has been produced from them by modern chemists, but it is of historical interest only, in the light of the discovery of modern artificial dyes with which it could not compete commercially.

Two words have been used in the Heb Bible to describe the colors from shellfish: (a) 'argāmān (Gr porphúra). This has been tr<sup>d</sup> "purple"; (b) ṭkheleth which was probably a shade of violet, but has been tr<sup>d</sup> "blue" in both AV and RV.

As indicated elsewhere (see COLORS), three Heb words have been rendered crimson or scarlet: (a) karmāl (cf Arab. ķirmiz and Eng. "carmine"), (b) tōla', and (c) shānī. We know nothing further about the method of producing these colors than that they were both obtained from the kermes insect which feeds on a species of live oak growing in Southern Europe and Turkey in Asia. The modern dyer can obtain several shades from the cochineal insect by varying the mordants or assistants used with the dye. Pliny mentions the same fact as being known by the ancient Egyptians. Some of the Syrian dyers still use the kermes, commonly called dūd ("worms"), although most of them have resorted to the artificial European dyes which they indiscriminately call dūd frangy ("foreign worms").

The "rams' skins dyed red" mentioned in Ex 25 are still made in Syria. After the ram's skin has been tanned in sumac, it is laid out on a table and a solution of the dye, made by boiling dūd in water, is rubbed on. After the dye is dry, the skin is rubbed with oil and finally polished. No native product is more characteristic of the country than the slippers, Beduin shoes, and other leather articles made from "rams' skins dyed red" (see TANNER).

Other dyes probably known were:

(1) Madder.—In Jgs 10 1, we read that "after Abimelech there arose to save Israel Tola the son of Puah." These were probably names

3. Other of clans. In the Heb they are also color words. Tōlā' is the scarlet dye and pū'āh, if, as is probable, it is the same as the Arab. fūwah, means "madder." This would add another dyestuff. Until the discovery of alizarin, which is artificial madder, the growing of fūwah was one of the industries of Cyprus and Syria. It was exported to Europe and was also used locally for producing "Turkey red" on cotton and for dyeing dull reds on wools for rug making (see THYATIRA). It was the custom near Damascus for a father to plant a new madder field for each son that was born. The field began to yield in time to support the boy and later become his inheritance. Madder is mentioned in the Talm and by early Lat writers. A Saracenic helmet and a shield of similar origin, in the possession of the writer, are lined with madder-dyed cotton.

(2) Indigo.—Another dye has been discovered among the Egypt mummy cloths, namely, indigo. Indigo blue was used in weaving to form the borders of the cloths. This pigment was probably imported from India.

(3) Yellows and browns of doubtful origin have also been found in the Egypt tombs.

The Jews acquired from the Phoenicians the secret of dyeing, and later held the monopoly in this trade in some districts. A Jewish guild of purple dyers is mentioned on a tombstone in Hieropolis. In the 12th cent. AD Jews were still dyers and glass workers at Tyre. Akhissar, a Jewish stronghold in Asia Minor, was famous as a dyeing city. See also ATTIRE, DYED.

DYSENTERY, dis'en-ter-i (δυσεντερία, dysenteria): In Acts 28 8 RV uses this word in place of the phrase "bloody flux" of AV to describe the disease by which the father of Publius was affected in Malta at the time of St. Paul's shipwreck. The acute form of this disease is often attended with a high temperature, hence Luke speaks of it as "fever and dysentery" (puretois kai dysenteria). The disease is still occasionally epidemic in Malta where there have been several bad outbreaks among the garrison in the last cent., and it has proved to be an intractable and fatal disease there. It is due to a parasitic microbe, the Bacillus dysenteriae. In 2 Ch 21 19 there is reference to an epidemic of a similar nature in the days of Jehoram. The malady, as predicted by Elisha, attacked the king and assumed a chronic form in the course of which portions of the intestine sloughed. This condition sometimes occurs in the amoebic form of dysentery, cases of which sometimes last over two years.

EAGLE, ʿg'l (נֶשֶׁךְ, nesher; ἄετός, aetós; Lat aquila): A bird of the genus aquila of the family falconidae. The Heb nesher, meaning "to tear with the beak," is almost invariably tr'd "eagle," throughout the Bible; yet many of the most important references compel the admission that the bird to which they applied was a vulture. There were many large birds and carrion eaters flocking over Pal, attracted by the offal from animals slaughtered for tribal feasts and continuous sacrifice. The eagle family could not be separated from the vultures by their habit of feeding, for they ate the offal from slaughter as well as the vultures. One distinction always holds good. Eagles never flock. They select the tallest trees of the forest, the top-most crag of the mountain, and pairs live in solitude, hunting and feeding singly, whenever possible carrying their prey to the nest so that the young may gain strength and experience by tearing at it and feeding themselves. The vultures are friendly, and collect and feed in flocks. So wherever it is recorded that a "flock came down on a carcass," there may have been an eagle or two in it, but the body of it were vultures. Because they came in such close contact with birds of prey, the natives came nearer dividing them into families than any birds. Of perhaps a half-dozen, they recognized three eagles, they knew three vultures, four or five falcons, and several kites; but almost every Bib. reference is tr'd "eagle," no matter how evident the text makes it that the bird was a vulture. For example, Mic 1 16: "Make thee bald, and cut off thy hair for the children of thy delight: enlarge thy baldness as the eagle[m "vulture"]; for they are gone into captivity from thee." This is a reference to the custom of shaving the head when in mourning, but as Pal knew no bald eagle, the text could refer only to the bare head and neck of the griffon vulture. The eagles were, when hunger-driven, birds of prey; the vultures, carrion feeders only. There was a golden eagle (the osprey of AV), not very common, distinguished by its tan-colored head; the imperial eagle, more numerous and easily identified by a dark head and white shoulders; a spotted eagle; a tawny eagle, much more common and readily distinguished by its plumage; and the short-toed eagle, most common of all and especially a bird of prey, as also a small hooded eagle so similar to a vulture that it was easily mistaken for one, save that it was very bold about taking its own food.

The first Bib. reference to the eagle referred to the right bird. Ex 19 4: "Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagles' wings, and brought you unto myself." This "bare you on eagles' wings" must not be interpreted to mean that an eagle ever carried anything on its back. It merely means that by strength of powerful wing it could carry quite a load with its feet and frequently was seen doing this. Vultures never carried anything; they feasted and regurgitated what they had eaten to their young. The second reference is found in Lev 11 13 and repeated in Dt 14 12, the lists of abominations. It would seem peculiar that Moses would find it necessary to include eagles in this list until it is known that Arab mountaineers were eating these birds at that time. The next falls in Dt 28 49: "Jeh will bring a nation against thee from far, from the end of the earth, as the eagle flieth; a nation whose tongue thou shalt not understand." This also refers to the true eagle and points out that its power of sustained flight, and the speed it could attain when hastening to its hunger-clamoring young, had been observed. The next reference is in Dt 32 11:

"As an eagle that stirreth up her nest,
That fluttereth over her young,
He spread abroad his wings, he took them,
He bare them on his pinions."

This is good natural history at last. Former VSS made these lines read as if the eagle carried its young on its wings, a thing wholly incompatible with flight in any bird. Samuel's record of the lamentation of David over Saul and Jonathan is a wonderful poetic outburst and contains reference to this homing flight of the eagle (2 S 1 23). In Job 9 26 the arrow-like downward plunge of the hunger-driven eagle is used in comparison with the flight of time. In Job 39, which contains more good natural history than any other chapter of the Bible, will be found everything concerning the eagle anyone need know:

"Is it at thy command that the eagle mounteth up,
And maketh her nest on high?
On the cliff she dwelleth, and maketh her home,
Upon the point of the cliff, and the stronghold.
From thence she spieth out the prey;
Her eyes behold it afar off.
Her young ones also suck up blood:
And where the slain are, there is she" (vs 27-30).

Ps 103 5 is a reference to the long life of the eagle. The bird has been known to live to an astonishing age in captivity; under natural conditions, the age it attains can only be guessed.

"Who satisfieth thy desire with good things,
So that thy youth is renewed like the eagle."

Prov 23 5 compares the flight of wealth with that of an eagle; 30 17 touches on the fact that the eye of prey is the first place attacked in eating, probably because it is the most vulnerable point and so is frequently fed to the young.

Ver 19:

"The way of an eagle in the air;
The way of a serpent upon a rock;
The way of a ship in the midst of the sea;
And the way of a man with a maiden."

This reference to the eagle is to that wonderful power of flight that enables a bird to hang as if frozen in the sky, for long periods appearing to our sight immovable, or to sail and soar directly into the eye of the sun, seeming to rejoice in its strength of flight and to exult in the security and freedom of the upper air.

The word "way" is here improperly translated. To the average mind it always means a road, a path. In this instance it should be translated:

The characteristics of an eagle in the air;
The habit of a serpent upon the rock;
The path of a ship in the midst of the sea;
And the manner of a man with a maid.

Each of these lines stood a separate marvel to Agur, and had no connection with the others (but cf Wisd 5 10.11, and see WAY).

Isa 40 31 is another flight reference. Jer 49 16 refers to the inaccessible heights at which the eagle loves to build and rear its young. Ver 22 refers to the eagle's power of flight. Ezk 1 10 recounts a vision of the prophet in which strange living creatures had faces resembling eagles. The same book (17 3) contains the parable of the eagle: "Thus saith the Lord Jeh: A great eagle with great wings and long pinions, full of feathers, which had divers colors, came unto Lebanon, and took the top of the cedar." Hos 8 1 is another flight reference. Ob ver 4 is almost identical with Jer 49 16. The next reference is that of Micah, and really refers to the griffon vulture (Mic 1 16). In Hab 1 8 the reference is to swift flight. Mt 24 28 undoubtedly refers to vultures. In Rev 4 7 the eagle is used as a symbol of strength. In Rev 8 13 the bird is represented as speaking: "And I saw, and I heard an eagle [AV "angel"], flying in mid heaven, saying with a great voice, Woe, woe, woe, for them that dwell on the earth, by reason of the other voices of the trumpet of the three angels, who are yet to sound." The eagle makes its last appearance in the vision of the woman and the dragon (Rev 12 14).

EANES, ē'a-nēz (1 Esd 9 21): RV MANES (q.v.), RVM "Harim."

EAR, ēr (אֵר, 'ōzen; οὖς, οὐς, ὠτίον, ὠτίον, the latter word [lit. "earlet"] in all the Gospels only used of the ear of the high priest's servant, which was cut off by St. Peter: Mt 26 51; Mk 14 47; Lk 22 51 [not 22 50]; Jn 18 10.26):

(1) The physical organ of hearing which was considered of peculiar importance as the chief instrument by which man receives information and commandments. For this reason the ear of the priest had to be specially sanctified, the tip of the right ear being touched with sacrificial blood at the consecration (Lev 8 23). Similarly the ear of the cleansed leper had to be rededicated to the service of God by blood and oil (Lev 14 14.17.25.28). The ear-lobe of a servant, who preferred to remain with the family of his master rather than become free in the seventh year, was to be publicly bored or pierced with an awl in token of perpetual servitude (Ex 21 6). It has been suggested that Ps 40 6 should be interpreted in this sense, but this is not probable (see below). The cutting off of the ears and noses of captives was an atrocious custom of war frequently alluded to in oriental lit. (Ezk 23 25). The phrase "to open the ear," which originally means the uncovering of the ear by partially removing the turban, so as to permit a clearer hearing, is used in the sense of revealing a secret or of giving important (private) information (1 S 9 15; 20 2.12.13; 2 S 7 27; 1 Ch 17 25; also Ps 40 6), and the NT promises similarly that "things which eye saw not, and ear heard not" are to be revealed by the reconciled God to the heart that in gladsome surrender has come to Him to be taught by His spirit (1 Cor 2 9).

(2) The inner ear, the organ of spiritual perception. If the ear listens, the heart willingly submits, but often the spiritual ear is "hardened" (Isa 6 10; Zec 7 11; Mt 13 15; Acts 28 27), or "heavy" (Isa 6 10; also Dt 29 4), either by self-seeking obstinacy or by the judgment of an insulted God. Such unwilling hearers are compared to the "deaf adder . . . which hearkeneth not to the voice of charmers, charming never so wisely" (Ps 58 4.5; cf also Prov 21 13; 28 9; Acts 7 57). The expression "He that hath ears to hear let him hear" is frequent in the Synoptic Gospels, occurring 7 or 8 times: Mt 11 15; 13 9.43; Mk 4 9.23 (7 16 RV omits); Lk 8 8; 14 35, and while not found in the Fourth Gospel, it occurs seven times in Rev 2 and 3. "Itching ears," on the other hand, are those that have become tired of the sound of oft-repeated truth and that long for new though deceitful teaching (2 Tim 4 3). Ears may "tingle" at startling news, esp. of disaster (1 S 3 11; 2 K 21 12; Jer 19 3).

(3) God's ears are often mentioned in the anthropopathic style of Scripture, signifying the ability of God to receive the petitions of His people, for "He that planted the ear, shall he not hear?" (Ps 94 9; also Ps 10 17; 34 15; 130 2; Isa 59 1; 1 Pet 3 12). But God also hears the murmurings of the wicked against Him (Nu 11 1; 2 K 19 28; Wisd 1 10; Jas 5 4); still it lies in His power to refuse to hear (Ezk 8 18; Lam 3 8; cf also ver 56).

H. L. E. LÜERING

EARING, ē'ring (חָרִישׁ, hārish): The Heb word is twice trd "earring" in AV (Gen 45 6; Ex 34 21). The RV rendering is "plowing": "There shall be neither plowing nor harvest." See also Dt 21 4; 1 S 8 12; Isa 30 24.

EARLY, ū'r'li (ἄρῃος, órthros, and related words; πρωτ, prōt): The word generally refers to the day, and means the hour of dawn or soon after (Gen 19 2; 2 Ch 36 15; Hos 6 4; Lk 24 22). Sometimes it refers to the beginning of the season, e.g. the early rain (Ps 84 6; Jas 5 7; see RAIN). It may also have the sense of "speedily" (Ps 46 5). The early morning is frequently commended as the hour for prayer. See examples of Jesus (Mk 1 35; Lk 21 38; Jn 8 2); also Abraham (Gen 19 27), Jacob (Gen 28 18), Gideon (Jgs 6 38), Samuel (1 S 15 12), David (1 S 17 20).

G. H. GERBERDING

EARNEST, ū'r'nest (ἀρραβών, arrhabōn): Found three times in the NT: The "earnest of our inheritance" (Eph 1 14); "the earnest of the Spirit" (2 Cor 1 22; 5 5). It has an equivalent in Heb 'ērābhōn (found in Gen 38 17.18.20), in Lat arabo, Fr. arrhes and the OE arles. The term is mercantile and comes originally from the Phoenicians. Its general meaning is that of a pledge or token given as the assurance of the fulfilment of a bargain or promise. It also carries with it the idea of forfeit, such as is now common in land deals, only from the obverse side. In other words, the one promising to convey property, wages or blessing binds the promise with an advance gift or pledge partaking of the quality of the benefit to be bestowed. If the agreement be about wages, then a part of the wages is advanced; if it be about land, then a clod given to the purchaser or beneficiary may stand as the pledge of final and complete conveyance of the property.

Figurative: In the spiritual sense, as used in the passages above named, the reference is to the work of the Spirit of God in our hearts being a token and pledge of a perfect redemption and a heavenly inheritance. There is more than the idea of security in the word as used, for it clearly implies the continuity and identity of the blessing.

EARRING, ē'r'ing: An ornamental pendant of some kind hanging from the ears has been worn by both sexes in oriental lands from the earliest times. Among the Greeks and Romans, as with western peoples in general, its use was confined to females. The ears in the statue of the Medicean Venus are pierced and probably were originally ornamented with earrings. It is clear, however, that among the Hebrews and related oriental peoples earrings were worn by both sexes. Abraham's servant "put the earring upon [Rebekah's] face, and the bracelets upon her hands" (Gen 24 47 AV), in accordance with custom, evidently, but it is implied that it was customary for men also to wear earrings, in that the relatives and friends of Job "every one [gave him] an earring of gold" (Job 42 11 AV). Such ornaments were usually made of gold, finely wrought, and often set with precious stones, as archaeology has shown. Such jewels were worn in ancient times for protective as well as for decorative purposes. RV renders "amulets" for AV "earrings" in Isa 3 20, the Heb word (l̥p̥hāshīm) being elsewhere associated with serpent-charming; but the earrings of Gen 35 4, also, were more than mere ornaments, so the AV and RV may both be right in their renderings here (Kennedy). The influence of Egypt, where amulets of various kinds were worn by men and gods, by the living and the dead, is shown by recent excavations at Gezer, Taanach and Megiddo. See AMULET; ORNAMENT.

EARTH, ūrth (אֶרֶץ, 'ādhāmāh, עֵרֶץ, 'ereṣ, אֶפְרַיִם, 'āphār; γῆ, gē, οἰκουμένη, oikoumenē): In a hilly limestone country like Pal, the small amount of iron oxide in the rocks tends to be oxidized, and thereby to give a prevailing reddish color to the soil. This is esp. the case on relatively barren hills where there is little organic matter present to prevent reddening and give a more blackish tinge.

'Ādhāmāh (cf 'ādhām, "a man," and Adam) is from 'ādhām, "to be red," and is used in the senses: "earth" (Ex 20 24), "land" (Ps 105 35), a "land" or country (Isa 14 2), "ground" (Gen 4 11), "the earth" (Gen 7 4).

The word most in use is 'ereṣ, undoubtedly from a most ancient root occurring in many languages, as Eng. "earth," Ger. Erde, Arab. 'arḍ. It is used in most of the senses of 'ādhāmāh, but less as "soil" and more as "the earth" as a part of the universe; frequently with shāmayim, "heavens," as in Gen 1 1: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth."

'Āphār and its root word and derivatives are closely paralleled in the Arab., and refer mainly to "dust" or "dry earth" (cf Arab. 'aḥḥ, "to be of the color of dust"; 'aḥḥ, "dust"; ya'fūr, "a gazelle"; Heb 'ōpher, "a gazelle"). Cf Gen 2 7: "Jehovah God formed man of the dust of the ground"; Job 2 12: "... sprinkled dust upon their heads"; Ps 104 29: "... they die, and return to their dust"; Gen 18 27: "dust and ashes."

In the LXX and NT, gē is used in nearly all cases, oikoumenē being used a few times for the "habitable earth," as in Lk 21 26 AV. See further ANTHROPOLOGY; ASTRONOMY; EVOLUTION; WORLD.

EARTH, CIRCLE OF THE. See ASTRONOMY, III, 1, 3.

EARTH, CORNERS OF THE: The "corners" or "ends" of the earth are its "wings" (kanephōth hā-'āreṣ), i.e. its borders or extremities. The word in general means a wing, because the wing of a bird is used as a covering for its young, and from this meaning it acquires that of the extremity of anything stretched out. It is thus used in Dt 22 12: "Thou shalt make thee fringes upon the four borders [wings] of thy vesture, wherewith thou coverest thyself." It thus also means the coasts or boundaries of the land surface of the earth; its extremities. It is tr<sup>d</sup> "corners" in Isa 11 12; "ends" in Job 37 3 and 38 13. The "four corners" of the earth (Isa 11 12) or "land" (Ezk 7 2) are therefore simply the extremities of the land in the four cardinal directions. See also ASTRONOMY, III, 3.

EARTH, PILLARS OF THE. See ASTRONOMY, III, 2.

EARTH, THE NEW. See ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT, IX; HEAVENS (NEW).

EARTH, VAULT, vōlt, OF THE: In one passage God is said to have "founded his vault [āghuddāh] upon the earth" (Am 9 6). It is not quite certain whether this dome or vault refers to the earth itself, or to the heavens arched above it. The latter is the usual interpretation, but in either case the reference is rather to the strength of the structure than to its form; the word implying something that is firmly bound together and hence an arch or dome because of its stability. See also ASTRONOMY, III, 2.

EARTHEN, ūrth'n, VESSELS (הָרֶשֶׁת, heres, יָצֵר, yeṣer; ὀστράκινος, ostrákinos): These vessels were heat-resisting and were used for cooking and for boiling clothes (Lev 6 28; 11 33; 14 5.50). They were probably non-porous and took the place of the kidri or ma'ajin used in Syria today. A traveler in the interior of Pal may still meet with the hospitality showed to David (2 S 17 28). The generous natives brought not only gifts of food but the necessary vessels in which to cook it. An earthen vessel was used to preserve a land deed (Jer 32 14).

Figurative: In Jer 19 1 breaking of an earthen vessel was symbolical of the destruction of Jerus. These vessels were also used to symbolize the commonness (Lam 4 2) and frailness of our bodies (2 Cor 4 7). See POTTERY. JAMES A. PATCH

EARTHLY, ūrth'li (ἐπιγῆιος, epigeios, "existing upon the earth," "terrestrial," from ἐπὶ, epi, "upon" and γῆ, gē, "earth"; Vulg terrenus): Of or pertaining to the earth, or to the present state of existence. The word epigeios is not found in LXX, but occurs in classical Gr from Plato down. In Plutarch Mor. 566 D, it occurs in the remarkable phrase, "that which is earthly of the soul." Its meaning is primarily merely local ("being on the earth"). The word gē ("earth") has not in itself an ethical significance, and does not carry a suggestion of moral taint, such as the word kósmos ("world") has, esp. in the Johannine writings, and sárx ("flesh"), esp. in Paul. It does, however, suggest a certain limitation or frailty; and in some passages, the context gives the adj. epigeios an ethical color, though in the NT the purely local meaning is never lost sight of. It is tr<sup>d</sup> "earthly" in the following passages: (1) Jn 3 12, "if I told you earthly things," i.e. things which are realized on earth, things within the circle of human observation, truths of subjective experience (e.g. the new birth); in contrast to "heavenly things," the objective truths which, as not directly realizable in human experience, must be revealed from above (the mysteries of the Divine purpose and plans). Clearly "earthly" here implies no moral contrast to the heavenly or spiritual. (2) 2 Cor 5 1, "the earthly house of our tabernacle," i.e. the body with which we are clothed on earth, in contrast to the spiritual resurrection-body, "which is from heaven" (ver 2). Here again the word has a merely local, not an ethical, significance. (3) Phil 3 19, "whose glory is in their shame, who mind earthly things," i.e. whose thoughts rest on earth, on the pleasures of life here below. (4) Jas 3 15, "This wisdom is not a wisdom that cometh down from above, but is earthly," i.e. it is on the plane of life on earth, merely human, incapable of ascending to the level of Divine wisdom. In the last two passages, the literal local meaning is still evident, but the word shades off into the moral and suggests that which is opposed to the spiritual in character. The same word is tr<sup>d</sup> "terrestrial" in 1 Cor 15 40, and "things in [RV "on"] earth" in Phil 2 10. AV has "earthly" in Jn 3 31, where it translates ek tēs gēs=lit. "out of the earth," the reference being to the character and mission of the Baptist as partaking of the limitations of his earthly (human) origin, in contrast to the Messiah "that cometh from heaven." The AV rendering is somewhat misleading, for it introduces a confusion with the "earthly" of ver 12 (vide Westcott in loc.). RV rightly renders "of the earth."

"Earthly" is to be distinguished from "earthy" =made of earth or clay (choikós, from choús, "earth dug out," 1 Cor 15 47 ff). D. MIALLE EDWARDS

EARTHQUAKE, ârth'kwāk (עָרָשׁ, ra'ash; σεισμός, seismós): The last earthquake which worked any damage in Pal and Syria occurred in 1837, and destroyed the village of

1. Earthquakes in Palestine

Safed, near Mt. Hermon, and was felt even to Hebron. Since that time a few feeble shocks have been felt but no damage was done. The region is just on the edge of the great earthquake circle whose center is in Armenia, and is liable to earthquakes. The large number of references in the Bible to earthquakes, and the evident fear in the minds of the people of those times, would seem to indicate that they were more frequent in Bible times than recently.

There are three main causes of earthquakes:

(1) Earthships.—In the slow process of cooling, the crust of the earth tends to wrinkle and fold as it contracts. This causes a stress to be set up in the strata composing the crust. If the strata are too rigid to bend there must come after a time a break or fault. The shock caused by the break, which is usually several miles below the surface of the earth, is an earthquake, and it spreads in the form of earth waves from the break as center. Seismographs in all parts of the world are now adjusted to receive the waves even though the origin is on the opposite side of the earth.

(2) Explosion of steam or gases under the surface.—Some earthquakes, especially those underneath the sea, are thought to be caused by water seeping through the soil and rocks and finding its way to the heated masses below. Steam is formed and if there is no escape for it, an explosion takes place whose force is felt on the surface.

(3) Volcanic.—As earthquakes are of common occurrence in volcanic regions it seems likely that there is some connection between the two, but the relation has not been fully traced. It may be that the second cause is the origin of both the volcano and earthquake. See further, DELUGE OF NOAH.

Many destructive earthquakes have been recorded in the history of Syria, but they have been mostly in the north, in the region of Aleppo. Jerus itself has seldom been affected by earthquakes. The Hauran beyond the Jordan is covered with volcanic remains and signs of violent shocks, and the cities on the coast have suffered much, but Jerus on the higher ground between has usually escaped with little destruction.

3. Earthquakes in Jerusalem

A number of earthquakes are mentioned in the Scriptures: (1) At Mount Sinai (Ex 19 18); (2) Korah and companions destroyed in fissure and sinking ground (Nu 16 31; Ant, IV, iii, 3); (3) in the Phil camp in the days of Saul (1 S 14 15); (4) after Elijah's flight (1 K 19 11); (5) in the reign of Uzziah, between 790 and 740 BC (Am 1 1); Zec 14 5 probably refers to the same (Ant, IX, x, 4); (6) at Christ's death (Mt 27 51-54); (7) at Christ's resurrection (Mt 28 2); (8) at Philippi when Paul and Silas were freed from prison (Acts 16 26). Most of these shocks seem to have been slight and caused little loss of life. Jos mentions one in the reign of Herod, "such as had not happened at any other time, which was very destructive to men and cattle" (Ant, XV, v, 2). Professor G. A. Smith in his recent work on Jerusalem is of the opinion that earthquakes were sufficiently frequent and strong to account for the appearance and disappearance of Nehemiah's Fountain (Jerus, I, 74). The Heb ra'ash is commonly used to mean a great noise. Large earthquakes are sometimes accompanied by a rumbling noise, but as a rule they come silently and without warning.

In the Scriptures earthquakes are mentioned as tokens of God's power (Job 9 6) and of His presence and anger (Ps 68 8; 18 7; Isa 13 13). (5) Symbolic 13): "She shall be visited of Jeh of Use hosts . . . with earthquake, and great noise" (Isa 29 6); also as a sign of Christ's "coming, and of the end of the world" (Mt 24 3-7). EASE, ēz (עָנָה, sha'anān, עָנָה, shal'anān, chiefly, "at ease"): Used 19 t in the OT and once in the NT, most frequently meaning tranquillity, security or comfort of mind; in an ethical sense, indicating carelessness or indifference with reference to one's moral or religious interests. The prophet Jeremiah used the phrase as an indication of national or tribal indifference: "Moab hath been at e. from his youth" (Jer 48 11); "I am very sore displeased with the nations that are at e." (Zec 1 15). Frequent allusions are made also by various prophets to individuals or groups of individuals, as "Woe to them that are at e. in Zion" (Am 6 1); "Rise up, ye women that are at e." (Isa 32 9), and "Tremble, ye women that are at e." (ver 11).

The word in another form is used also in a verbal sense and to apply to physical ease and comfort, as "My couch shall e. my complaint" (Job 7 13; cf esp. 2 Ch 10 4, 9). Simple mental tranquillity or peace of mind is also expressed by it (Jer 46 27).

The single instance of its use in the NT is illustrative of its figurative but most common usage in the OT, where it refers to moral indifference in the parable of the Rich Fool: "Soul . . . take thine e., eat, drink, be merry" (Lk 12 19).

EAST, ēst, CHILDREN OF THE (מִזְרָה, miz-rāh, מִזְרָה, kedhem, מִזְרָה, kēdhem, and other derivatives of the same root; ἀνατολή, anatolē): Mizrāh is the equivalent of the Arab. meshrik, "the orient" or "place of sunrise." In the same way ma'arābh, "west," corresponds to the Arab. maghrib, and both mizrāh and ma'arābh occur in Ps 103 12: "As far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed our transgressions from us." Kādhām, "to precede" (whence kēdhem, "east"), and its derivatives correspond closely to the Arab. kādhām, except that the Arab. derivatives do not include the signification "east." In the majority of cases "east" and other words of direction require no explanation, but the expressions "the children of the east" (b'nē kedhem), "the land of the children of the east" ('ereḡ b'nē kedhem), and "the east country" ('ereḡ kedhem), belong to a different category. In the story of Gideon (Jgs 6 3.33; 7 12; 8 10), we find several times the expression "the Midianites and the Amalekites and the children of the east." In Jgs 8 24 it is said of the same host: "For they had golden earrings, because they were Ishmaelites." In Jer 49 28.29: "Go up to Kedar, and destroy the children of the east. Their tents and their flocks shall they take." In Gen 25 6: "But unto the sons of the concubines, that Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts; and he sent them away from Isaac his son, while he yet lived, eastward, unto the east country." Now Ishmael is the son of Abraham and Hagar, Midian of Abraham and Keturah, Kedar the son of Ishmael, and Amalek the grandson of Esau, dwelling in Edom. It is evident that we have to do with the Syrian desert and in a general way with Arabia, esp. its northern part, and with peoples like the modern Bedawin who kept camels and dwelt in tents, "houses of hair" (buyūt sha'r), as they are called by the Arabs of today.

A striking passage is Gen 29 1: "Then Jacob went on his journey, and came to the land of the children of the east." As one journeys eastward through the country E. of the Jordan he traverses first a region of towns and villages with fields of grain, and then the wide desert where the Bedawin wander with their herds. The line is a sharp one. Within a very few hours he passes from the settled part where the rain, though scanty, is sufficient to bring the grain to maturity, to the bare desert.

Job was "the greatest of all the children of the east" (Job 1 3). These desert people had a name for wisdom as we see from 1 K 4 30, "Solomon's wisdom excelled the wisdom of all the children of the east, and all the wisdom of Egypt"; and from Mt 2 1: "Now when Jesus was born . . . Wise-men from the east came." ALFRED ELY DAY

EAST COUNTRY, kun'tri (אֶרֶץ מִזְרָח, 'ereḡ miz-rāḥ): Lit. "country of the sunrise" over against the "country of the sunset" (Zec 8 7). The two together form a poetical expression indicating the whole earth.

EAST GATE. See GATE, THE EAST.

EAST (EASTERN, ʾēs'tērn) SEA (Zec 14 8). See DEAD SEA.

EAST WIND. See WIND.

EASTER, ʾēs'tēr (πάσχα, páscha, fr Aram. פֶּסַח, paṣḥā, and Heb פֶּסַח, peṣaḥ, the Passover festival): The Eng. word comes from the AS Eastre or Estera, a Teutonic goddess to whom sacrifice was offered in April, so the name was transferred to the paschal feast. The word does not properly occur in Scripture, although AV has it in Acts 12 4 where it stands for Passover, as it is rightly rendered in RV. There is no trace of Easter celebration in the NT, though some would see an intimation of it in 1 Cor 5 7. The Jewish Christians in the early church continued to celebrate the Passover, regarding Christ as the true paschal lamb, and this naturally passed over into a commemoration of the death and resurrection of Our Lord, or an Easter feast. This was preceded by a fast, which was considered by one party as ending at the hour of the crucifixion, i.e. at 3 o'clock on Friday, by another as continuing until the hour of the resurrection before dawn on Easter morning. Differences arose as to the time of the Easter celebration, the Jewish Christians naturally fixing it at the time of the Passover feast which was regulated by the paschal moon. According to this reckoning it began on the evening of the 14th day of the moon of the month of Niṣān without regard to the day of the week, while the gentile Christians identified it with the first day of the week, i.e. the Sunday of the resurrection, irrespective of the day of the month. This latter practice finally prevailed in the church, and those who followed the other reckoning were stigmatized as heretics. But differences arose as to the proper Sunday for the Easter celebration which led to long and bitter controversies. The Council of Nice, 325 AD, decreed that it should be on Sunday, but did not fix the particular Sunday. It was left to the bishop of Alexandria to determine, since that city was regarded as the authority in astronomical matters and he was to communicate the result of his determination to the other bishops. But this was not satisfactory, esp. to the western churches, and a definite rule for the determination of Easter was needed. By some it was kept as early as March 21, and by others as late as April 25, and others followed dates between. The rule was finally adopted, in the 7th cent., to celebrate Easter on the Sunday following the 14th day of the calendar moon which comes on, or after, the vernal equinox which was fixed for March 21. This is not always the astronomical moon, but near enough for practical purposes, and is determined without astronomical calculation by certain intricate rules adopted by ecclesiastical authority. These rules involve the Dominical Letters, or the first seven of the alphabet, representing the days of the week, A standing for the first day of the year and the one on which Sunday falls being called the Dominical for that year. There are also involved the Golden Numbers and the Epacts, the first being the numbers from 1 to 19, the cycle of the moon when its phases recur on the same days of the year, the first of the cycle being that in which the new moon falls on January 1. The Epacts indicate the moon's age at the beginning of each year. Easter was thus fixed by these rules, but another difficulty arose when the Gregorian calendar was adopted in 1582, the difference between it and the Julian being then 10 days. This of course affected the determination of Easter, and its celebration by the Gr church, which has never admitted the Gregorian calendar, occurs usually at a different time from that followed by the western churches. This difference may be as much as five weeks and it may occur as late as April 30, while in the West it cannot occur later than April 25 nor earlier than March 22. Occasionally the two come together but this is rare, since the difference between the two calendars is now 13 days. The Easter feast has been and still is regarded as the greatest in the Christian church, since it commemorates the most important event in the life of its Founder. H. PORTER

EBAL, ʾē'bal (עִיבָל, 'ēbhāl, "bare") or OBAL (עִיבָל, 'ēbhāl):

(1) A people and region of Joktanite, Arabia. See Dillmann, Gen, and Glaser, Skizze, II, 426. The latter form of the name is that given in Gen 10 28, the former in 1 Ch 1 22 and in the Sam text of Gen 10 28.

(2) A son of Shobal, son of Seir, the Horite (Gen 36 23; 1 Ch 1 40).

EBAL, ʾē'bal, MOUNT (הַר עִיבָל, har 'ēbhāl; Γαῖβάλ, Gaibál): Rises N. of the vale of Shechem, over against Mt. Gerizim on the S. The mountain (Arab. el-Islamiyeh) reaches a height of 1,402 ft. above the floor of the valley, and 3,077 ft. above the level of the Mediterranean. The Samaritans feign that Gerizim is the higher; but it is more than 200 ft. lower than Ebal. These two mountains overhang the pass through which runs the main artery of intercourse between E. and W., the city of Nāblus lying in the throat of the valley to the W. The ancient Shechem probably stood farther to the E. The lower slopes of Ebal as one ascends from Nāblus are covered with gardens and orchards, the copious streams from the fountains under Gerizim washing its foot, and spreading fertility and beauty. The vine, the fig and the olive grow luxuriantly. Higher up we scramble over rough rocky terraces, where grow only the ubiquitous thistles and prickly shrubs.

Mount Ebal.

From the broad summit a view of surpassing interest and beauty rewards the climber's toil. Westward beyond the hills and the plain of Sharon with its coast line of yellow sand running from Jaffa to Carmel, stretch the blue waters of the Mediterranean. From Carmel to Gilboa, Little Hermon and Tabor, roll the fruitful breadths of Esdraelon: the uplands of Galilee, with Nazareth showing on the brow above the plain, rise away to the butresses of Lebanon in the N. From the snowy peak of Hermon the eye ranges over the Jaulān and Mount Gilead to the Mountain of Bashan in the E., with the steep eastern wall of the Jordan valley in the foreground. The land of Moab is visible beyond the Dead Sea; and the heights around Jerus close the view on the S.

Round this splendid mountain, seen from afar on all sides, religious associations have gathered from old time. The Moslem Weley on the top—the usual white-domed sanctuary—where it is said the head of the Baptist is buried, is doubtless the modern representative of some ancient seat of worship. The ruins of a church show that Christians also came under the spell of the hill.

The slopes of Ebal toward Gerizim played their part in that memorable scene, when, having conquered the central region of Pal, Joshua led the people hither, erected an altar of unhewn stones, wrote upon the stones—either engraving on the stone itself, or impressing on plaster placed there for the purpose—a copy of the law, and then, as Moses the servant of the Lord had commanded, placed half the tribes on the slope of Gerizim, and half on those of Ebal, and the ark with the priests and Levites in the center. Then with dramatic responses from the two divisions of the people, the blessings and the cursings of the law were read (Josh 8 30 ff; cf Dt 27 11 ff). In all the future, therefore, this mountain, towering aloft in the very heart of the land, would remind beholders far and near of their people's covenant with God. It has sometimes been questioned if the reading of the law could be heard by the people in the way described. The formation of the sides of the valley at the narrowest part, and the acoustics, which have been tested more than once, leave no reasonable doubt as to the possibility.

The importance of the mountain from a military point of view is illustrated by the ruins of a massive fortress found on the summit. W. EWING

EBED, ē'bed (עֶבֶד, 'ebhedh, "servant"):

(1) Father of Gaal, who rebelled against Abimelech (Jgs 9 26-35).

(2) A companion of Ezra in his return (Ezr 8 6) = Obeth (1 Esd 8 32).

EBED-MELECH, ē-bed-mē'lek, eb-ed-mē'lek (עֶבֶד-מֶלֶךְ, 'ebhedh-melekh, "servant of the king" or "of [god] Melek"): An Ethiopian eunuch in the service of King Zedekiah, who interceded with the king for the prophet Jeremiah and rescued him from the dungeon into which he had been cast to die (Jer 38 7-13). For this, the word of Jeh through Jeremiah promised Ebed-melech that his life should be spared in the fall of Jerus (Jer 39 15-18).

EBEN-BOHAN. See BOHAN.

EBEN-EZEL. See EZEL.

EBEN-EZER, eb-en-ē'zēr (אֶבֶן-עֶזֶר, 'ebhen hā-'ezer, "stone of the help"; Ἀβενέζερ, Abenēzer):

(1) Here Israel was defeated by the Philis, 4,000 men falling in the battle (1 S 4 1 ff). It appears also to have been the scene of the disaster when the ark of God was captured (vs 3 ff). The place is not identified. It was over against Aphek; but this site is also unknown (cf Josh 12 18). Onom places it between Jerus and Ascalon, in the neighborhood of Beth-shemesh. Conder suggests Deir Abān, fully 2 miles E. of 'Ain Shems (PEF, III, 24).

(2) A stone set up by Samuel to perpetuate the memory of the signal victory granted to Israel over the Philis in answer to his prayer (1 S 7 12). It stood between Mizpeh and Shen. The latter is probably identical with 'Ain Sinia, N. of Bethel. This defines the district in which it may be found; but no identification is yet possible. W. EWING

EBER, ē'bēr (עֵבֶר, 'ebher; Ἑβραῖ, Éber, in Gen; Ὠβέδ, Ōbēd, in Ch):

(1) Occurs in the genealogies (Gen 10 21.25; 11 14 ff) as the great-grandson of Shem and father of Peleg and Joktan. The word means "the other side," "across," and the form "Hebrew," which is derived from it, is intended to denote the people or tribe who came "from the other side of the river" (i.e. the Euphrates), from Haran (Gen 11 31), whence Abraham and his dependents migrated to Canaan.

(2) A Gadite (1 Ch 5 13).

(3) (4) Two Benjamites (1 Ch 8 12.22).

(5) The head of a priestly family (Neh 12 20).

A. C. GRANT

EBEZ, ē'bez (עֵבֶז, 'ebhez, meaning unknown; Ῥέβες, Rhēbes; Ἀβέζ, Abēz): One of the 16 cities in Issachar (Josh 19 20). The name seems to be cognate to that of the judge Ibzan (Jgs 12 8-10). All else concerning it is conjecture.

EBIASAPH, ē-bī'a-saf: A descendant of Kohath the son of Levi (1 Ch 6 37). See ABIASAPH.

EBIONISM, ē'bi-ō-niz'm, EBIONITES, ē'bi-ō-nīts (Ἐβωναῖοι, Ebionatoī, from עֲבִיּוֹנִים, 'ebhyō-nīm, "poor people"):

The Ebionites were a sect of heretics frequently mentioned by the early Fathers. In regard to their opinions, as in regard to those of most early heretical sects, there is the difficulty that to a large extent we are dependent for our information on their opponents. These opponents were not generally very careful to apprehend exactly the views of those whose opinions they undertook to refute. It adds to the difficulty in the present case that there is a dubiety as to the persons designated by the title. Sometimes, it is admitted, the name was used to designate all Jewish Christians irrespective of their opinions; at other times it denotes a sect akin to the Gnostics, who ascribed a purely human origin to Our Lord. There are, however, certain works, the Clementine writings, which from statements of the Fathers may be assumed to represent the views of this sect, but as these represent views to some extent divergent, it is difficult to decide which is the truly Ebionitic. There are also certain apocalyptic books which present affinities with Ebionism. The quotations from the Gospel according to the Hebrews—the only gospel the Ebionites received—likewise afford means of appreciating their views. This gospel has come down to us only in isolated quotations, for the accuracy of which we have no guarantee. Finally, it has to be borne in mind that no sect can persist through centuries of changing circumstances, and not in turn undergo change.

1. Origin of the Name.—Tertullian and Epiphanius assume the sect to have received its name from a certain Ebion or Hebion. Others

1. The Poor Ones of the Fathers, without affirming it, use language which seems to imply the belief in a person called Ebion. This, however, is generally now regarded as a mistake. No trace of the existence of such a person is to be found. The sect in question seems to have assumed the name Ebionites, "the poor ones," from the first Beatitude (Mt 5 3), claiming to be the continuation into the new dispensation of the "poor and needy" of the Pss, e.g. 69 33; 70 5; 74 21.

It has been mooted that the sect may have had a leader who assumed the title "the poor man." Besides that we have no trace of his existence, the name would almost certainly have been treated as an Aram. word and put in the status emphaticus as Ebiona, which in Gr would have become Ebionas.

The ordinary view of the origin of the name has the advantage of analogy in its favor. The pre-Reformation Protestants of the 12th and 13th cents. in France called themselves "the poor men" (of Lyons). The fact that the apostle James in his Epistle implies a natural union between poverty and piety (2 5), "Did not God choose them that are poor as to the world to be rich in faith . . . ?" would confirm the Jewish Christians in their use of the name.

Some have been inclined to press unduly a play on the name in which some of the Fathers indulge, as if the poor views of this sect as to the person of Christ had led to their receiving this name from without.

II. Authorities for the Opinions of the Ebionites.—As indicated above, the main authorities for these are Irenaeus, Tertullian and

1. Irenaeus, Hippolytus.

Tertullian The characteristics of the Ebionites and noted by them were, first, the negative one that they did not, like the other Gnostics, distinguish between the Supreme God and the Creator of the world—the demiurge—who was identified with the God of the Jews. With them Jeh was the Supreme God—the God of Israel and the Creator of the heavens and the earth. The second characteristic, also negative, was that they denied the supernatural birth of Our Lord. He was the son of Joseph and Mary in the ordinary sense of the word. The third was that they, along with the Cerinthians and Carpocratians, affirmed that a Divine power came down on Jesus at His baptism—the reward of His perfect holiness. According to one form of the theory, the Holy Ghost was the eternal Son of God. Another view was that the power which descended upon Him was the Divine wisdom, the Logos. By the influence of this Divine power He performed miracles and taught with superhuman wisdom. But this Divine influence deserted Jesus on the Cross, hence the cry of being forsaken (Mt 27 46). The Divine power, however, raised Him from the dead and caused Him to ascend on high. Hippolytus brings the Ebionites into close connection with the Elkasaites and with a certain Alcibiades, whose views he had to combat in Rome. The last claimed to found his views on a work of Elkasai.

From two other sources we derive further information: Origen and Jerome both notify the fact that the Ebionites trad 'almāh "young woman" (it is rendered "virgin" in our AV and RV). This tr, so far as the mere word is concerned, is indubitably correct. There is another point in which both afford us information. The first says (Contra Celsum, v.61) that there are two classes of Ebionites, one of which denies the miraculous conception and birth of Our Lord, the other of which affirms it. Jerome, in his letter to Augustine, not only asserts the same thing but calls the one class, those affirming the miraculous birth, Nazareans, and the other Ebionites. Origen in his second book against Celsum speaks as if the only distinction between the Ebionites and other Christians was their obedience to the Mosaic law, and by their example rebuts the assertion that the Jews in becoming Christians deserted the law of their fathers. Another feature of Ebionism presented to us by Jerome (In Jesaiam, lxvi.24) is their chiliastic view—the personal reign of Our Lord for 1,000 years as the Jewish Messiah.

The writer who gives the most voluminous account of the Ebionites—"Ebionaeans" as he calls them—is Epiphanius. With him it is at once heresy No. X and heresy No. XXX. Before discussing the Ebionites he takes up the closely related sect of the Nazareans as heresy No. XXIX. He had already in a more compendious way considered a similarly named sect, numbering it No. XVIII. It, however, is Jewish while this is Christian. The Jewish sect is distinguished by eating no animal food and offering no sacrifices. They have thus an affinity with the Essenes. They have a peculiarity that, while they honored the patriarchs, they rejected the Pent which related their history. These Nazareans dwell E. of the Jordan in Gilead and Bashan. Heresy No. XXIX is the Christian Nazareans. This name had been at first applied to all Christians. Epiphanius identifies them with the Essenes and declares their distinguishing peculiarity to be the retention of circumcision and the ceremonial law. They use the Gospel of Mt but without considering the Ebionites. Heresy No. XXX he proceeds to have been a man, and calls him a "polymorphic portent," and asserts that he was connected with the Samaritans, the Essenes, the Cerinthians and Carpocratians, yet desired to be regarded a Christian. The heresy originated after the flight of the church to Pella. They denied the miraculous birth of Our Lord, but maintained that a Divine influence came down upon Him at His baptism. This Divine wisdom had inspired, and in a sense dwelt, in all the patriarchs. In some sense the body of Jesus was regarded as that of Adam revived. This body was crucified and rose again. They receive only the Gospel of Mt in the form the Cerinthians use it, i.e. the Gospel according to the Hebrews. Epiphanius gives some account of this gospel and its defects. They use also other books; one which he esp. describes, The Journeyings of Peter, appears to be in the main identical with the Clementine Homilies. He connects the Ebionites, as does Hippolytus, with Elkasai; from him they learned that the heavenly Christ was 96 miles high and 24 broad, and that the Holy Ghost had a female form of similar dimensions, only invisible. Although he connects the Ebionites with the Essenes he mentions that, unlike the Essenes of Jos and Philo, the Ebionites not only permitted but enjoined matrimony on young men. Epiphanius adds as an especial enormity that the Ebionites permit second, third and even seventh marriages. Although they enjoin marriage they have a low opinion of women, crediting Eve with originating heathenism, in this agreeing with the Essenian opinion of the sex. Mysteriously Epiphanius represents the Ebionites as not only rejecting the prophets in a body but deriding them. He also mentions the rejection of St. Paul by the Ebionites. It is exceedingly difficult to form a clear, self-consistent view of the doctrines of the Ebionites from the statements of Epiphanius, yet there are points in which his information is of value.

Though Justin Martyr does not name the Ebionites in his dialogue with Trypho the Jew (47), he mentions two classes of Jewish Christians: (a) those who not only themselves observe the law but would compel the gentile believers also to be circumcised and keep the whole law, and will hold no communion with those who refuse to become Jews; (b) those who, observing the Mosaic law themselves, enter into communion with uncircumcised gentile believers. The former appear to be an early form of Ebionites. It is to be noted that Justin does not ascribe to them any doctrinal divergence from the orthodox views. In the following ch he mentions some that denied the divinity of Our Lord, but these were Gentiles (hēmetērōu génous) "of our race."

III. Literature of the Ebionites.—One thing of importance we do owe to Epiphanius—the indication of the lit. produced by the Ebionites, from which we may get their views at first hand. This includes the Gospel according to the Hebrews, the Clementines (Homilies and Recognitions); to which we would add the Ascension of Isaiah and the Odes of Solomon. It may be remarked that this lit. appears to represent the opinion of different classes of the Ebionites. We shall merely consider here the bearing these works have on the Ebionites.

The Gospel according to the Hebrews we know only through quotations. We can have no certainty that these quotations are accurate. The quotations may have been interpolated, and further the book from which the quotations have been made has probably passed through several recensions. The discussion of the question of the relation of this book to the canonical Gospel of Mt is considered elsewhere (see Apocryphal Gospels). One thing is clear, there were at least two recensions of this gospel, one nearer and the other farther from the canonical Gospel; the former, the Nazarean, differed only by omitting the genealogy from the First Gospel of the Canon. The other was more strictly Ebionite and omitted all mention of the miraculous birth. The Ebionite recension began, as Epiphanius tells us, abruptly with the calling of the Apostles. The assertion of Epiphanius that the Ebionites rejected the prophets is supported by a quotation from the Gospel according to the Hebrews in Jerome (Adv. Pelag., III.2): "In the prophets, after they were anointed by the Spirit, sin was found." The change from akridas ("locusts") to egkridas (lit. "cakes of honey and oil"; cf Ex 16 31; Nu 11 8) in the account of the food of John may be due to the avoidance of animal food attributed to this sect. One passage, which appears to be a denunciation of wealth in itself, is an addition of a second rich man to the story of the young ruler of the synagogue. A singular verse, quoted from this gospel both by Origen and Jerome, deserves special notice for several reasons: "My mother, the Holy Ghost, took me by one of my hairs and bore me to the great mountain Tabor." The designation of the Holy Ghost as "my mother" is unexampled. It implies a materialistic view of the doctrine of the Trinity after the form of a human family. It is a note of geographical ignorance to call Tabor a "great" mountain. It is only some 2,000 ft. high and behind it are the mountains of the hill country of Galilee rising up to 4,000 ft. in Jebel Jermuk, and behind that the white top of Hermon, 10,000 ft. It is difficult to understand anyone resident in Pal calling Tabor a "great" mountain. Rising from the plain of Esdraelon it is prominent, but with the higher mountains behind it, it could not even seem great. In a quotation by Jerome (Adv. Pelag., III.2) Our Lord declares Himself unwilling to be baptized by John as unconscious of sin. This suits the representation of Ebionite views which we find in Irenaeus that it was His sinlessness that made Jesus capable of receiving the Holy Ghost.

The Clementine lit. attributed by Epiphanius to the Ebionites is a more important source of information for their opinions. It has
2. The come down to us complete in three or Clementines four forms, the Homilies, the Recognitions, and two Epitomes which, however, differ less than the two larger works. They all seem to be recensions of an earlier work which has disappeared. The foundation of all of these is a species of religious novel on which are grafted sermons of Peter and his discussions with Simon Magus. Clement, a young Roman orphan of rank in search of a religion, meets Barnabas, who tells him of Christ, describing Him as the "Son of God," and says that He had appeared in Judaea. To learn more about Jesus, Clement proceeds to Caesarea, where he meets Peter. He thereafter accompanies Peter to the various places whither the apostle pursues Simon Magus, and in course of his journeyings he meets and recognizes his father, his brother and his mother; hence the title Recognitions. It is in the discourses of Peter that the Ebionism appears. Its theology is fundamentally Jewish and Essenian. That it is Judaizing is evidenced by the covert hostility to the apostle Paul. There are elements that are not those of orthodox Judaism. The Messiah is coequal, or nearly so, with the devil; in other words, the position is a modification of Parseeism (Hom., III, 5). If the discourse of Barnabas is excluded, Our Lord is always called the "prophet" (Hom.), the "Teacher" (Recog.). He is never asserted nor assumed to be Divine. Nothing is said of His miraculous birth. At the same time in the Recognitions He is regarded as not merely man. It is said He "assumed a Jewish body" (Recog., I, 60). This agrees with what Epiphanius says of the Ebionite idea that it was as the body of Adam that the Christ appeared. The apostle Peter, who is represented as the model Christian, eats only herbs and practises frequent ablutions, quite in the manner of the Essenes. In his discourses Peter declares that the true prophet "quenches the fire of altars and represses war." These are Essenian peculiarities, but he "sanctions marriage," against Essenism as we find it in Philo and Jos. The phrase implies an opposition to some who not only did not sanction, but forbade, marriage (Hom., III, 26).

If the ignoring of the work and apostleship of St. Paul be regarded as the criterion of the Judaizers, that is to say, the Ebionites, then in
lyptic which we can draw information as to Literature views. The Ascension of Isaiah was one of the earliest of these books to be recovered in modern times. The writer refers to the martyrdom of Peter in Rome, but makes no mention of Paul (IV, 3). The description of elders and shepherds hating one another (III, 29), "lawless elders and unjust shepherds who will ravage their sheep" (III, 24), seems a view of the church's state as it appeared to a Judaizer when the Pauline view was prevailing. Notwithstanding this not only is the Divine dignity maintained, but the doctrine of the Trinity, "They all glorified the Father of all and His beloved Son and the Holy Spirit" (VIII, 18), is affirmed. As to the person of Christ, He descended through the successive heavens to the earth to be born (IX, 13; X, 8-31). The virginity of Mary is affirmed (X, 12), and the child is born without pain, miraculously (XI, 8-14). A similar view of the birth of Christ is to be found in the Odes of Solomon (XIX, 7).

IV. History of Ebionism.—All authorities combine in asserting a close connection between the Ebionites and the Essenes. At first

1. Ebionites sight there are serious points of difference, principally these, the Ebionites and Essenes enjoined marriage, while the Essenes, if we may believe Philo and Jos, forbade it. This forbiddal, however, appears to have been true only of the coenobites of Engedi. Moreover, some of the Judaizers, that is Ebionites, are charged with forbidding to marry (1 Tim 4 3). The Essenes in all their varieties seem to have come over to Christianity on the fall of the Jewish state and the retreat of the church to Pella. When they joined the believers in their exile the Parsee elements began a ferment in the church and Ebionism was one of the products. This probably is the meaning of the statement that Ebion began to teach his doctrines at Pella. If we may judge from the statements of Scripture and from the earliest of the non-canonical apocalypses, the Ebionites were not at first heretical in their Christology. Only they maintained the universal obligation of the ceremonial law, holding that believers of gentile descent could be received into the church only if they were first circumcised. The keen dialectic of Paul forced them from this position. The abrogation of the Law was closely connected in Paul's reasonings with the Divinity of Our Lord; consequently some of them may have felt that they could maintain their views more easily by denying His supreme Divinity and the reality of the incarnation. The phenomena of His life rendered it impossible for anyone to declare Him to be merely man. Hence the complex notion of a Divine influence—an aeon, coming down upon Him. If, however, His birth were miraculous, then the supreme greatness of Moses would be impugned, consequently they were led to deny the virgin birth.

Not till Theodotus appeared was the purely humanitarian view of Our Lord's person maintained. All the Heb Christians, however, did not pursue the above course. A large section remained at each general stage, and to the end one portion, the Nazareans, maintained their orthodox doctrinal position, and at the same time obeyed the requirements of the Law. The dualism which is found in the Clementines is an endeavor to explain the power of evil in the world and the function of Satan. The Clementines confirm the statement of the Fathers that the Ebionites used only the Gospel of Mt, for there are more quotations from Mt than from all the other books of the NT put together: These quotations are, however, all from chapters after the 3d. There are, it is to be noted, several unmistakable quotations from the Fourth Gospel. In the Clementines as noticed above there is an avoidance of attributing Divinity to Our Lord. He is the Teacher, the Prophet; only in the discourse ascribed to Barnabas is He called the Son of God. This, we are aware, is the reverse of the ordinarily received idea of the historic succession of beliefs. It is thought that, beginning with the belief in the purely ordinary nature of Our Lord's birth, these Jewish believers gradually added feature after feature until He was regarded as a Divine person, the Divine Logos made flesh by miraculous conception and birth. The abstract possibility of such being the course of events is not denied, but we do say that what evidence we have tends in the direction we have taken. There are elements kindred to Ebionism in the Epistle of Jas, the prominence given to the poor, the little prominence given to the Divinity of Our Lord or to the doctrines of grace all tend in that direction. Yet there is no developed Ebionism; the Divinity of Christ, if not stated in terms, is implied. Schweigler, followed in more recent times by Dr. Campbell of Dundee, finds a strong Ebionite bias in the Gospel of Lk, in which certainly there is no lessening of Our Lord's supreme Divinity. All that it amounts to is a prominence given to the poor. The identification of the poor with the righteous has not come down to us as a tenet of the Ebionites; it has been ascribed to them from their name. As already stated in the Ascension of Isaiah, the Divinity of the Messiah is strongly asserted. The farther down the stream of history we go more and more clearly do the Ebionite features appear, till by the time when Alcibiades, the follower of Elkasaï, appeared in Rome, we have something widely removed from the Ebionism of the Clementines, far as that is from the simple position occupied by the Nazareans.

The Jewish Christians appear to have formed an organization of their own, separate from the church

2. Organization of Ebionites Catholic. The places where they assembled they did not call ekklesiai, "churches," but synagōgai, "synagogues." If we may believe the Clementine Homilies they had evolved a complete episcopal system for themselves. We, however, must not think that every variation of faith had a separate organization for itself. Strict Jewish ceremonial allowed no Jew to eat with any other not a Jew. The "love-feasts" of the early church implied this eating in common. If gentile Christians were present the Ebionites could not join, hence the need of a separate church. All Jewish Christians who revered the law could meet together and partake of the "love-feast," whatever their belief as to the person of Christ. In short, Ebionism was a thing of individuals, whose opinion ran through the whole gamut of faith, from the Nazareans, who differed from the orthodox simply in remaining Jews, to those whose Judaism alone prevented them from becoming followers of Theodotus of Byzantium, and who therefore sank back into pure Judaism.

V. Evidence from Ebionism for the Doctrine of the Primitive Church.—In dealing with this branch

1. Christology of the Early Church of our subject we have to consider that the tendency of those who in the early days wrote against heresy was to exaggerate the difference between the heretics and the orthodox. On the other hand we have to consider the psychological difficulty involved in a person recognizing that anyone whom he daily met, whom he saw eating and sleeping like other men, was more than man, was Divine. This difficulty, great to all, was doubly so to the Jew. Yet again we have to consider what the origin of Christian theology was. It was an attempt to give a reasoned and systematic explanation of the phenomenon of Jesus Christ. Christ's character, His deeds and His claims had to be explained. The orthodox explanation which gradually became more definite as time rolled on was that He was the second person of the Trinity become incarnate, and the purpose of this incarnation that He might save many from their sins. This purpose He accomplished by dying on the cross and rising again. The primitive church owed its theology to Paul and John. Repugnant as much of this was to the Jews, yet the Ebionites, earnest, prejudiced Jews as they were, could not affirm in the presence of the facts of His career that Jesus was merely a man. They had to imagine a Divine influence coming down upon Him at His baptism, setting Him apart from all others. We have no trace of this at first: it stands at the end of a process of degradation of the ideal concerning the person of Christ. It was only when the effect of His personality had somewhat faded that men began to doubt His Divinity. The division of the personality seems to emerge at the same time. The earlier Ebionites, like the rest of the 1st-cent. believers, regarded Christ as one person; only later do they reach the notion of a heavenly aeon separate from Jesus. The Ebionites seem to have held under varying forms a doctrine of the Trinity, and their holding it is an evidence that the church at large held it, not of course in that definiteness it assumed later, but essentially.

To some extent the same may be said in regard to the Pauline doctrine of redemption. It is to be observed that both writers, he of the 2. Paulin- Homilies as well as the writer of the ism of the Recognitions, dislike and ignore Paul,

Early even if they do not attempt to pillory
Church him under the image of Simon Magus, as many have thought that they do.

What, however, is also to be observed, is that they do not venture to denounce him by name. Paul and his teachings must have been, in the early part of the 2d cent., held in such deep reverence that no one could hope to destroy them by direct assault; the only hope was a flank attack. This reverence for Paul implies the reception of all he taught. All the specially Pauline doctrines of original sin, of redemption through the sacrificial death of Christ, and all the cognate ideas must have been held strongly by the early church or the Ebionites would have denounced Paul in the Clementines by name. Schwegler would argue that Justin Martyr was an Ebionite because he neither mentions nor quotes Paul. To this it may be answered that as the emperors to whom he addressed his apologies were heathens, and Trypho, with whom he had his dialogue, was a Jew, he naturally did not name one whose authority would be valueless to those he was addressing. He is equally silent as to Peter, James and John. If he does not quote Paul there are several indubitable echoes of his phrases and his thoughts.

In the face of the recent discoveries made in Egypt one cannot despair of MSS turning up which may throw needed light on this heresy. Were the Gospel according to the Hebrews to be found, or a MS of Hegesippus, we should be in a better position to decide a number of questions.

EBONY, eb'-o-ni (הֶבֶנִּים, hobhnīm [pl. only], vocalization uncertain; cf Arab. ābnūs): Mentioned (Ezk 27 15) along with ivory as merchandise of Tyre brought by the men of Dedan. This is the heavy, black, heart-wood of various species of Diospyros, natives of Southern India and Ceylon; the best kind is obtained from D. ebenum. The sap-wood, being white and valueless, is cut away, but the trunks are sufficiently large to leave blocks of heart-wood 2 ft. in diameter and 10 or more ft. long. Ebony was used by the ancient Egyptians, Greeks and Romans, as well as the Phoenicians, for various purposes; it was frequently inlaid with ivory. In Europe it has been a favorite for cabinet-making down to recent times.

ECCE HOMO, ek'sē hō'mō (Ἰδοὺ ὁ ἄνθρωπος, idou ho anthrōpos, "Behold, the man!" Jn 19 5): Pilate's statement regarding Jesus during His trial. While the significance of this statement is somewhat debatable, yet there is little doubt, as judged from his attitude and statement immediately following, that Pilate was endeavoring to appeal to the accusers' sympathies and to point out to them the manly qualities of Jesus. The ordinary punctuation which places an exclamation point after "Behold" and a period after "the man" is evidently incorrect if the grammatical structure in the Gr is to be observed, which gives to the second and third words the nominative form, and which therefore admits of a mild exclamation, and therefore of the emphasis upon "the man." Some, however, hold the contrary view and maintain that the utterance was made in a spirit of contempt and ridicule, as much as to say, "Behold here a mere man." See esp. on this view Marcus Dods in Expositor's Gr Test. It would seem, however, that the former of the two views would be sustained by the chief facts in the case.

LITERATURE

Reading this book one soon becomes aware that it is a discussion of certain difficult problems of human life. It begins with a title

1. Structure of the Book

(1 1), followed by a preface (vs 2-11). It has a formal conclusion (12 8-13). Between the preface and the conclusion the body of the book is made up of materials of two kinds—first a series of “I” sections, sections uttered in the 1st per. sing., a record of a personal experience; and second, an alternating series of gnomic sections, sections made up of proverbs (say 4 5.6.9-12; 5 1-12; 7 1-14.16-22; 8 1-8; 9 7-10; 10 1-4; 10 8-12 7). These may be called the “thou” sections, as most of them have the pronoun of the 2d per. sing. The idea of the vanity of all things characterizes the record of experience, but it also appears in the “thou” sections (e.g. 9 9). On the other hand the proverb element is not wholly lacking in the “I” sections (e.g. 4 1-3).

In the preface the speaker lays down the proposition that all things are unreal, and that the results of human effort are illusive (1 2.3).

2. The Contents

Human generations, day and night, the wind, the streams, are alike the repetition of an unending round (vs 4-7). The same holds in regard to all human study and thinking (vs 8-11). The speaker shows familiarity with the phenomena which we think of as those of natural law, of the persistence of force, but he thinks of them in the main as monotonously limiting human experience. Nothing is new. All effort of Nature or of man is the doing again of something which has already been done.

After the preface the speaker introduces himself, and recounts his experiences. At the outset he had a noble ambition for wisdom and discipline, but all he attained to was unreality and perplexity of mind (vs 12-18). This is equally the meaning of the text, whether we translate “vanity and vexation of spirit” or “vanity and a striving after wind,” (“emptiness, and struggling for breath”), though the first of these two translations is the better grounded.

Finding no adequate satisfaction in the pursuits of the scholar and thinker, taken by themselves, he seeks to combine these with the pursuit of agreeable sensations—alike those which come from luxury and those which come from activity and enterprise and achievement (2 1-12). No one could be in better shape than he for making this experiment, but again he only attains to unreality and perplexity of spirit. He says to himself that at least it is in itself profitable to be a wise man rather than a fool, but his comfort is impaired by the fact that both alike are mortal (vs 13-17). He finds little reassurance in the idea of laboring for the benefit of posterity; posterity is often not worthy (vs 18-21). One may toil unremittingly, but what is the use (vs 22.23)?

He does not find himself helped by bringing God into the problem. ‘It is no good for a man that he should eat and drink and make his soul see good in his toil’ (vs 24-26, as most naturally translated), even if he thinks of it as the gift of God; for how can one be sure that the gift of God is anything but luck? He sees, however, that it is not just to dismiss thus lightly the idea of God as a factor in the problem. It is true that there is a time for everything, and that everything is “beautiful in its time.” It is also true that ideas of infinity are in men’s minds, ideas which they can neither get rid of nor fully comprehend (3 1-18). Here are tokens of God, who has established an infinite order. If we understood His ways better, that might unravel our perplexities. And if God is, immortality may be, and the solution of our problems may lie in that direction. For a moment it looks as if the speaker were coming out into the light, but doubt resumes its hold upon him. He asks himself, “Who knoweth?” and he settles back into the darkness. He has previously decided that for a man to “eat and drink, and make his soul enjoy good” is not worth while; and now he reaches the conclusion that, unsatisfactory as this is, there is nothing better (vs 19-22).

And so the record of experiences continues, hopeful passages alternating with pessimistic passages. After a while the agnosticism and pessimism recede somewhat, and the hopeful passages become more positive. Even though “the poor man’s wisdom is despised,” the speaker says, “the words of the wise heard in quiet are better than the cry of him that ruleth among fools” (9 17). He says “Surely I know that it shall be well with them that fear God” (8 12), no matter how strongly appearances may indicate the contrary.

The gnomic sections are mostly free from agnosticism and pessimism. The book as a whole sums itself up in the conclusion, “Fear God, and keep his commandments” (12 13).

Of course the agnostic and pessimistic utterances in Eccl are to be regarded as the presentation of one side of an argument. Disconnect them and they are no part of the moral and religious teaching of the book, except in an indirect way. At no point should we be justified in thinking of the author as really doubting in regard to God or moral obligation. He delineates for us a soul in the toils of mental and spiritual conflict. It is a delineation which may serve for warning, and which is in other ways wholesomely instructive; and in the outcome of it, it is full of encouragement.

In some passages the speaker in Eccl has in mind the solution of the problems of life which we are accustomed to call Epicurean (e.g. 5 18-20; 7 16. 17; 8 15; but not 2 24)—the solution which consists in avoiding extremes, and in getting from life as many agreeable sensations as possible; but it is not correct to say that he advocates this philosophy. He rather presents it as an alternative.

His conclusion is the important part of his reasoning. All things are vanity. Everything passes away. Yet (he says) it is better to read and use good words than bad words. Therefore because the Great Teacher is wise, he ever teaches the people knowledge, and in so doing he ever seeks good words, acceptable words, upright words, words of truth. “The words of the wise are as goads; and as nails well fastened” (“climbed at the back”) (12 11). Such are the words of all the great masters. So (he ends) my son, be warned! There are many books in this world. Choose good ones. And his conclusion is: Reverence the Mighty Spirit. Keep to good principles. That is the whole duty of man. For everything at last becomes clear; and “good” stands out clearly from “evil.”

We have noticed that our book has “I” sections and “thou” sections. Certainly these are structural marks, but as such they are capable of being interpreted in various ways. Partitional hypotheses can easily be formed, and perhaps there is no great objection to them; but there are no phenomena which cannot be accounted for by the hypothesis that we have here just the work of one author, who sometimes quotes proverbial utterances, either his own or those of other men. As proving the integrity of the book three points present themselves. First, in some cases (e.g. 7 14b-16) the experience matter and the gnomic matter are closely combined in sense and in grammatical construction. Second, it is possible to interpret all the gnomic sections as a part of the continuous argument. Third, if we so interpret them the book is a unit, the argument moving forward continuously out of the speculative into the practical, and out of the darkness into the light.

The speaker in Eccl calls himself Kōheleth (1 1. 2.12 and other places), rendered "the Preacher" in the EV. The word does not occur

4. Koheleth elsewhere, although it is from a stem that is in common use. Apparently it has been coined for a purpose by the author of Eccl. In form it is a fem. participle, though it denotes a man. This is best explained as a case of the using of an abstract expression for a concrete, as when in Eng. we say "Your Honor," "Your Majesty." The other words of the stem are used of people gathering in assemblies, and the current explanation is to the effect that Koheleth is a person who draws an audience whom he may address. To this there are two objections: First, the participle is intransitive; its natural implication is that of a person who participates in an assembly, not of one who causes the participants to assemble. Second, the assembly distinctively indicated by the words of this stem is the official assembly for the transaction of public business. Worked out on this basis Koheleth seems to mean citizenship, or concretely, a citizen—a citizen of such respectability that he is entitled to participate in public assemblies. It is in the character of citizen-king that the speaker in Eccl relates his experiences and presents his ideas.

This word for "assembly" and its cognates are in the Gr often tr'd by ekklesia and its cognates (e.g. Dt 4 10; 9 10; Jgs 20 2; 21 5.8). So we are not surprised to find Kōheleth rendered by the Gr Ekklesiastēs, and this Latinized into Ecclesiastes.

The speaker in Eccl speaks not only in the character of Koheleth, but in that of "the son of David, king in Jerus" (1 1). So far as 5. "King in this clause is concerned the king in Jerusalem" question might be either Solomon or any other king of the dynasty, or might be a composite or an ideal king. He is represented (1 12—2 11) as "king over Israel," and as distinguished for wisdom, for his luxuries, for his great enterprises in building and in business. These marks fit Solomon better than any other king of the dynasty, unless possibly Uzziah. Possibly it is not absurd to apply to Solomon even the phrase "all that were before me over Jerus," or "in Jerus" (1 16; 2 7.9; cf 1 Ch 29 25; 1 K 3 12; 2 Ch 1 12). It is safer, however, to use an alternative statement. The speaker in Eccl is either Solomon or some other actual or composite or ideal king of the dynasty of David.

If it were agreed that Solomon is the citizen king who, in Eccl, is represented as speaking, that would not be the same thing as agreeing that

6. Date and Authorship Solomon is the author of the book. No one thinks that Sir Galahad is the author of Tennyson's poem of that name. Koheleth the king is the character into whose mouth the author of Ecclesiastes puts the utterances which he wishes to present, but it does not follow that the author is himself Koheleth.

The statement is often made that Jewish tradition attributes the writing of Eccl to Solomon; but can anyone cite any relatively early tradition to this effect? Is this alleged tradition anything else than the confusing of the author with the character whom he has sketched? The well-known classic tradition in Bābhā' Bathrā' attributes Eccl to "Hezekiah and his company," not to Solomon. And the tradition which is represented by the order in which the books occur in the Heb Bibles seems to place it still later. Concerning this tradition two facts are to be noted: First, it classes Eccl with the 5 miscellaneous books (Cant, Ruth, Lam, Eccl, Est) known as the five m'ghillōth, the five Rolls. Second, in the count of books which makes the number 22 or 24 it classes Eccl as one of the last 5 books (Eccl, Est, Dan, Ezr-Neh, 1 and 2 Ch). That the men who made this arrangement regarded the books of this group as the latest in the Bible is a natural inference.

This agrees with the internal marks which constitute the principal evidence we have on this point.

7. Linguistic Peculiarities The grammatical character and the vocabulary of Eccl are exceptionally peculiar, and they strongly indicate that the book was written in the same literary period with these other latest books of the OT. The true date is not much earlier or later than 400 BC (see CHRONICLES), though many place it a cent. or a cent. and a half later. Details concerning these phenomena may be found in Driver's Introduction or other Introductions, or in commentaries. Only a few of the points will be given here, with barely enough illustrative instances to render the points intelligible.

In Eccl the syntax of the vb. is peculiar. The imperfect with waw consecutive, the ordinary Heb narrative tense, occurs—for example, "And I applied my heart" (1 17)—but it is rare. The narrator habitually uses the perfect with waw (e.g. 1 13; 2 11.12.14.15 bis. 17). In any Eng. book we should find it very noticeable if the author were in the habit of using the progressive form of the vb. instead of the ordinary form—if instead of saying "And I applied my heart" he should say "And I was applying my heart," "And I was looking on all the works," "And I was turning" (1 13; 2 11.12), and so on. Another marked peculiarity is the frequent repeating of the pronoun along with the vb.: 'I said in my heart, even I'; 'And I was hating, even I, all my labor' (2 1.18 and continually). The use of the pronoun as copula is abnormally common in Eccl as compared with other parts of the Heb Bible (e.g. 4 2). The abbreviated form of the relative pronoun is much used instead of the full form, and in both forms the pronoun is used disproportionately often as a conjunction. In these and many similar phenomena the Heb of Eccl is affiliated with that of the later times.

The vocabulary presents phenomena that have the same bearing. Words of the stem tākan appear in Eccl (1 15; 7 13; 12 9) and in the Aram. of Dnl (4 36), and not elsewhere in the Bible; they are frequent in the Talm. Words of the stem zāman (3 1) are used only in Eccl, Ezr, Neh, Dnl, Est. Words of the stem shālāt, the stem whence comes our word "sultan," are frequent in Eccl—words which are used elsewhere only in the avowedly post-exilic books and in Gen 42 6, though a different word of this stem appears in the history of the time of David. Only in Eccl and Est are found the vb. kāsher, "to be correct" (whence the modern Jewish kosher) and its derivative kishrōn. The Pers word pardēs, "park" (2 5), occurs elsewhere only in Neh and Cant, and the Pers word piṭhām, "official decision" or "record" (8 11), only in Est 1 20, and in the Aram. parts of Ezr and Dnl. Eccl also abounds in late words formed from earlier stems—for example, sekel and ṣikkēlūth, "folly" (10 6; 2 3, et al.); or m'dhīnāh, "province" (5 8), frequent in the latest books, but elsewhere found only in one passage in 1 K (20 14.15.17.19). Esp. common are new derivatives that end in n, for example, yithrōn, "profit"; inyān, "travail"; hegrōn, "that which is missing"; ra'yōn, "vexation" (1 3.13.15.17 and often). To these add instances of old words used in new meanings, and the various other groups of phenomena that are usual in such cases. No parts of the book are free from them.

The arguments for a later date than that which has been assigned are inconclusive. The Heb of Eccl is more like the language of the Talmuds than is that of the Chronicler or Dnl or even Est; but if one infer that Eccl is therefore later than the others the inference will prove Inconclusive to be in various ways embarrassing. Arguments The differences are better accounted for by the fact that Eccl belongs to a different type of lit. from the others.

Various passages have local color (e.g. 11 1), or make the impression of being allusions to specific events (e.g. 4 13-16; 6 2.3; 9 13-18), but the difficulty lies in locating the events. Dr. Kleinert argues plausibly for the writing of the book in Egypt in the time of the Ptolemies, but other equally probable hypotheses might be devised.

It is alleged that Eccl copies from Ecclus, but it is more probable that the latter copied from the former. It is alleged that the Wisd controverts Eccl; if it does, that does not prove that the two are contemporary. It is alleged that the writer is familiar with the philosophy of Epicurus, and therefore must have lived later than Epicurus, who died 270 BC, or even later than Lucretius of the 1st cent. BC. If there were proof that this was a case of borrowing, Epicurus or Lucretius might have been the borrowers; but there is no such proof; the selfishness which constitutes the nucleus of Epicureanism has exhibited itself in human lit. from the beginning. The strong resemblances between Eccl and Omar Khayyám have no weight to prove that the Heb author was later than the Pers. Eccl presents a perfectly distinct doctrine of immortality, whether it affirms the doctrine or not; but that proves a relatively early date for the doctrine, rather than a late date for Eccl. At every point the marks of Eccl are those of the Pers period, not of the Gr.

In the early Christian cents., as in all the cents. since, there have been disputes concerning the canonicity of Eccl. It was not questioned that Eccl belonged to the canon as traditionally handed down. No question of admitting it to the canon was raised. But it was challenged because of the agnostic quality of some of its contents, and, every time, on close examination, the challenge was decided in its favor.

LITERATURE.—There are volumes on Eccl in all the great commentaries, and treatments of it in the volumes on Introduction. A few of the many separate commentaries are those of Moses Stuart, Andover, 1864; H. Grätz, Leipzig, 1871; G. Wildeboer, Tübingen, 1898; E. H. Plumptre, Cambridge, 1881. Other works are those of J. F. Genung, Eccl, and Omar Khayyám, 1901, Words of Koheleth, 1904, and The Hebrew Lit. of Wisdom in the Light of Today, 1906; C. H. H. Wright, Book of Koheleth, 1883; S. ED (עֵד, 'ēdh, "witness"): The name of the altar erected by the trans-Jordanic tribes upon finally taking possession of Gilead (Josh 22 10.11.34); probably E. of the Jordan opposite Jericho. But neither the MT nor the LXX contained the word. Both the AV and RV, however, insert the word on the authority of a few MSS. It has been suggested that it is the final 'ēdh in Gal'ēdh, the name given by Laban and Jacob to the memorial heap of stones erected by them in the vicinity (Gen 31 47.48). According to the MT, the name of the altar is the entire sentence: "It is a witness between us that Jeh is God." The opposition of the ten tribes to the erection of this altar was on the score that it was built after the pattern of the great altar of burnt offering (Josh 22 11.29), which was a horned altar forbidden in ordinary lay sacrifice. There is in it, therefore, no indication of a general opposition to lay sacrifices on altars of earth or unhewn stone (see Wiener, EPC, 198).

EDEN, ē'd'n (עֵדֶן, 'ēdhen, "delight"; "Εδεν, Edem):

(1) The land in which "Jeh God planted a garden," where upon his creation "he put the man whom he had formed" (Gen 2 8). In the Assyir inscriptions ēdinu (Accadian ēdin) means "plain" and it is from this that the Bib. word is probably derived. Following are the references to Eden in the Bible, aside from those in Gen 2 and 3: Gen 4 16; Isa 51 3; Ezk 28 13; 31 9.16.18; 36 35; Joel 2 3. The Garden of Eden is said to be "eastward, in Eden" (Gen 2 8); where the vegetation was luxurious (2 9) and the fig tree indigenous (3 7), and where it was watered by irrigation. All kinds of animals, including cattle, beasts of the field and birds, were found there (2 19.20). Moreover the climate was such that clothing was not needed for warmth. It is not surprising, therefore, that the pl. of the word has the meaning "delights," and that Eden has been supposed to mean the land of delights, and that the word became a synonym for Paradise.

The location of Eden is in part to be determined from the description already given. It must be where there is a climate adapted to the production of fruit trees and of animals capable of domestication, and in general to the existence of man in his primitive condition. In particular, its location is supposed to be determined by the statements regarding the rivers coursing through it and surrounding it. There is a river (nāhār) (Gen 2 10) which was parted and became four heads (ro'shīm), a word which (Jgs 8 16; Job 1 17) designates main detachments into which an army is divided, and therefore would more properly signify branches than heads, permitting Jos and others to interpret the river as referring to the ocean, which by the Greeks was spoken of as the river (ōkeanós) surrounding the world. According to Jos, the Ganges, the Tigris, the Euphrates and the Nile are the four rivers, being but branches of this one river. Moreover it is contended by some, with much show of reason, that the word p'rāth tr<sup>d</sup> Euphrates is a more general term, signifying "the broad" or "deep" river, and so may here refer to some other stream than the Euphrates, possibly to a river in some other region whose name is perpetuated in the present Euphrates, as "the Thames" of New England perpetuates the memory of the Thames of Old England. In ancient times there was a river Phrath in Persia, and perhaps two. It is doubtful whether the phrase "eastward, in Eden" refers to the position with reference to the writer or simply with reference to Eden itself. So far as that phrase is concerned, therefore, speculation is left free to range over the whole earth, and this it has done.

Columbus when passing the mouth of the Orinoco surmised that its waters came down from the Garden of Eden. It is fair to say, however, that he supposed himself to be upon the E. coast of Asia. The traditions of its location somewhere in Central Asia are numerous and persistent. Naturalists have, with Quatrefages, pretty generally fixed upon the portion of Central Asia stretching E. from the Pamir, often referred to as the roof of the world, and from which flow four great rivers—the Indus, the Tarim, the Sur Daria (Jaxartes), and the Amu Daria (Oxus)—as the original cradle of mankind. This conclusion has been arrived at from the fact that at the present time the three fundamental types of the races of mankind are grouped about this region. The Negro races are, indeed, in general far removed from the location, but still fragments of them both pure and mixed are found in various localities both in the interior and on the seashore and adjacent islands where they would naturally radiate from this center, while the yellow and the white races here meet at the present time in close contact. In the words of Quatrefages, "No other region of the globe presents a similar union of extreme human types distributed round a common center" (The Human Species, 176).

Philology, also, points to this same conclusion. On the E. are the monosyllabic languages, on the N. the polysyllabic or agglutinative languages, and on the W. and S. the inflectional or Aryan languages, of which the Sanskrit is an example, being closely allied to nearly all the languages of Europe. Moreover, it is to this center that we trace the origin of nearly all our domesticated plants and animals. Naturally, therefore, the same high authority writes, "There we are inclined to say the first human beings appeared and multiplied till the populations overflowed as from a bowl and spread themselves in waves in every direction" (ib, 177). With this conclusion, as already said, a large number of most eminent authorities agree. But it should be noted that if, as we believe, there was a universal destruction of antediluvian man, the center of dispersion had in view by these naturalists and archaeologists would be that from the time of Noah, and so would not refer to the Eden from which Adam and Eve were driven. The same may be said of Haeckel's theory that man originated in a submerged continent within the area of the Indian Ocean.

Dr. William F. Warren has with prodigious learning attempted to show that the original Eden was at the North Pole, a theory which has too many considerations in its support to be cast aside unceremoniously, for it certainly is true that in preglacial times a warm climate surrounded the North Pole in all the lands which have been explored. In Northern Greenland and in Spitzbergen abundant remains of fossil plants show that during the middle of the Tertiary period the whole circumpolar region was characterized by a climate similar to that prevailing at the present time in Southern Europe, Japan, and the southern United States (see Asa Gray's lectures on "Forest Geography and Archaeology" in the American Journal of Science, CXVI, 85-94, 183-96, and Wright, Ice Age in North America, 5th ed, ch xvii). But as the latest discoveries have shown that there is no land within several hundred miles of the North Pole, Dr. Warren's theory, if maintained at all, will have to be modified so as to place Eden at a considerable distance from the actual pole. Furthermore, his theory would involve the existence of "Tertiary man," and thus extend his chronology to an incredible extent, even though with Professor Green (see ANTEDILUVIANS) we are permitted to consider the genealogical table of Gen 5 as sufficiently elastic to accommodate itself to any facts which may be discovered.

Much also can be said in favor of identifying Eden with Armenia, for it is here that the Tigris and Euphrates have their origin, while

3. Armenia two others, the Aras (Araxes) emptying into the Caspian Sea and the Choruk (thought by some to be the Phasis) emptying into the Black Sea, would represent the Gihon and the Pishon. Havilah would then be identified with Colchis, famous for its golden sands. But Cush is difficult to find in that region; while these four rivers could by no possibility be regarded as branches of one parent stream.

Two theories locate Eden in the Euphrates valley. Of these the first would place it near the head of the Pers Gulf where the Tigris and Euphrates after their junction form the Shatt el-'Arab which bifurcates into the eastern and the western arm before reaching the Gulf. Calvin considered the Pishon to be the eastern arm and the Gihon the western arm. Other more recent authorities modify the theory by supposing that Gihon and Pishon are represented by the Karum and the Kerkhah rivers which come into the Shatt el-'Arab from the east. The most plausible objection to this theory is that the Bib. account represents all these branches as down stream from the main river, whereas this theory supposes that two of them at least are up stream. This objection has been ingeniously met by calling attention to the fact that 2,000 years before Christ the Pers Gulf extended up as far as Eridu, 100 miles above the present mouth of the river, and that the Tigris and the Euphrates then entered the head of the Gulf through separate channels, the enormous amount of silt brought down by the streams having converted so much of the valley into dry land. In consequence of the tides which extend up to the head of the Gulf, the current of all these streams would be turned up stream periodically, and so account for the Bib. statement. In this case the river (nāhār) would be represented by the Pers Gulf itself, which was indeed called by the Babylonians nar marratum, "the bitter river." This theory is further supported by the fact that according to the cuneiform inscriptions Eridu was reputed to have in its neighborhood a garden, "a holy place," in which there grew a sacred palm tree. This "tree of life" appears frequently upon the inscriptions with two guardian spirits standing on either side.

The other theory, advocated with great ability by Friedrich Delitzsch, places Eden just above the site of ancient Babylon, where the Tigris and Euphrates approach to within a short distance of one another and where the country is intersected by numerous irrigating streams which put off from the Euphrates and flow into the Tigris, whose level is here considerably lower than that of the Euphrates—the situation being somewhat such as it is at New Orleans where the Mississippi River puts off numerous streams which empty into Lake Pontchartrain. Delitzsch supposes the Shatt el-Nil, which flows eastward into the Tigris, to be the Gihon, and the Pallacopas, flowing on the W. side of the Euphrates through a region producing gold, to be the Pishon. The chief difficulties attending this theory pertain to the identification of the Pishon with the Pallacopas, and the location of Havilah on its banks. There is difficulty, also, in all these theories in the identification of Cush (Ethiopia), later associated with the country from which the Nile emerges, thus giving countenance to the belief of Jos and many others that that river represented the Gihon. If we are compelled to choose between these theories it would seem that the one which locates Eden near the head of the Pers Gulf combines the greater number of probabilities of every kind.

EDER, ʿēdēr (עֲדֵר, 'ēdher, "flock"):

(1) One of the "uttermost cities" of Judah in the Negeb ("South") near the border of Edom (Josh 15 21), possibly Kh. el 'Adar, 5 miles S. of Gaza, but probably this is too far west.

(2) Eder (AV Edar) or better Migdal Eder, מִגְדַּל-עֲדֵר, mighdal 'ēdher, "the tower of the flock"; Iādēp, Gāder. After Rachel died and was buried "in the way to Ephrath (the same is Bethlehem) . . . Israel journeyed, and spread his tent beyond the tower of Eder" (Gen 35 19.21). In ver 27 he is described as proceeding to Hebron. This "tower of the flock," which may have been only a tower and no town, must therefore be looked for between Bethlehem and Hebron. Jerome says that it was one Rom mile from Bethlehem. In the LXX, however, vs 16 and 21 are transposed, which suggests that there may have been a tradition that Migdal Eder was between Bethel and Bethlehem. There must have been many such towers for guarding flocks against robbers. Cf "tower of the watchman" (2 K 18 8, etc). The phrase "Migdal Eder" occurs in Mic 4 8 where Jerus is compared to such a tower. E. W. G. MASTERMAN

EDGE, ej: Very frequently occurs in the phrase "the edge of the sword" (Josh 10 28, et al.) from the Heb עֵקֶב, peh, "lip," or שִׁפְהָא, sāphāh, "lip." Ex 28 7 and 39 4 read "ends," from קֶצֶה, kācāh, "end" (AV "edge"), and Josh 13 27 has "uttermost part" for the same Heb word (AV "edge"). In Jer 31 29 and Ezk 18 2, "The children's teeth are set on edge" (קָהָה, kāhāh, "to be blunt"), i.e. set hard one against another.

EDIFICATION, ed-i-fi-kā'shun, EDIFY, ed'i-fi: The Gr words οἰκοδομέω, oikodomēō, "to build," οἰκοδομή, oikodomē, "the act of building," are used both lit. and fig. in the NT; "edify," "edifying," "edification," are the tr of AV in some 20 passages, all in the fig. sense of the promotion of growth in Christian character. RV in 2 Cor 10 8; 13 10; Eph 4 12.16; 1 Thess 5 11 renders "build up," "building up," making the force of the figure clearer to the Eng. reader. In 1 Tim 1 4 the Gr text followed by RV has οἰκονομία, oikonomía, "dispensation," instead of οἰκοδομία, oikodomía, "edifying" (AV). F. K. FARR

EDNA, ed'na (עֲדָנָה, 'Edna): Wife of Raguel and mother of Sarah who married Tobias (Tob 7 2, etc; 10 12; 11 1). E. in Heb means "pleasure" and corresponds to Lat Anna.

EDOM, ʿēdum, EDMITES, ʿēdum-its (עֲדֻמִּים, 'ēdhōm, "red"; 'Εδωμ, Eddōm): The boundaries of Edom may be traced with some approach to accuracy. On the E. of the 'Arabah the northern border ran from the Dead Sea, and was marked by Wādy el-Kurāhī, or Wādy el-Hasā. On the E. it marched with the desert. The southern border ran by Elath and Ezion-geber (Dt 2 8). On the W. of the 'Arabah the north boundary of Edom is determined by the south border of Israel, as indicated in Nu 34 3 f: a line running from the Salt Sea southward of the Ascent of Akkrabbim to Zin and Kadesh-barnea. This last, we are told, lay in the "uttermost" of the border of Edom (Nu 20 16). The line may be generally indicated by the course of Wādy el-Fikrah. How much of the uplands W. of the 'Arabah southward to the Gulf of 'Akāba was included in Edom it is impossible to say.

The land thus indicated varies greatly in character and features. S. of the Dead Sea in the bottom of the valley we have first the stretch of salt marsh land called ester Sebkhā; then, beyond the line of white cliffs that crosses the valley diagonally from N.W. to S.E., a broad depression strewn with stones and sandhills, the débris of an old sea bottom, rises gradually, and 60 miles to the S. reaches a height of about 700 ft. above the level of the Red Sea, 2,000 ft. above that of the Dead Sea. From this point it sinks until it reaches the shore of the Gulf of 'Akāba, 45 miles farther S. The whole depression is known today as Wādy el-'Arabah (cf Heb hā-'ārābhāh, Dt 2 8 RV, etc). On either side the mountains rise steeply from the valley, their edges carved into many fantastic shapes by the deep wadys that break down from the interior (see ARABAH). The northern part of the plateau on the W. forms the spacious grazing ground of the 'Aẓā-zimeh Arabs. The mountains rise to a height of from about 1,500 ft. to a little over 2,000 ft. This district was traversed by the ancient caravan road to South Pal; and along the eastern side traces of the former civilization are still to be seen. The desert region to the S. is higher, reaching to as much as 2,600 ft. The mountain range E. of the 'Arabah is generally higher in the S. than in the N. Jebel Harūn, beside Petra, is 4,780 ft. above sea-level; while E. of 'Akāba, Jebel el-Hismā may be as much as 5,900 ft. in height. Limestone, porphyry and Nubian sandstone are the prevailing formation; but volcanic rocks are also found. The range consists mainly of rough rocky heights with many almost inaccessible peaks separated by deep gorges. But there are also breadths of fertile land where wheat, grapes, figs, pomegranates and olives are grown to advantage. The northern district is known today by the name el-Jebāl, corresponding to the ancient Gebal. Seir is the name applied to the eastern range in Gen 36 8; Dt 2 1.5; 2 Ch 20 23. It is also called Edom, and the Mount of Esau (Ob vs 8 f). Seir, however, is used for the western highlands in Dt 33 2. This seems to be its meaning also in Jgs 5 4, where it appears as the equivalent of "the field of Edom." With this same phrase, however, in Gen 32 3 it may more fitly apply to the eastern range. See illustration under DESERT.

The name Edom, "red," may have been derived from the red sandstone cliffs characteristic of the country. It was applied to Esau because of the color of his skin (Gen of Name 25 25), or from the color of the pottage for which he sold his birthright (ver 30). In Gen 36 8 Esau is equated with Edom as dwelling in Mt. Seir; and he is described as the father of Edom (ver 9, Heb). The name however is probably much older. It may be traced in the records of the Twelfth Dynasty in Egypt. In the Am Tab (Brit Mus No. 64) Udumu, or Edom, is named; and in Assyrian inscriptions the name Udumu occurs of a city and of a country. The latter may have been named from the former: this again may have been derived from a deity, Edom, who may be traced in such a name as Obed-edom (2 S 6 10).

The children of Esau are said to have "destroyed" the Horites who dwelt in Seir before them (Gen 14 6; Dt 2 22). This only means that the Horites were subdued. Esau married the daughter of Anah, a Horite (Gen 36 20—in ver 2 he is called a Hivite); and the lists in this chapter show that the races intermingled. The Horite government was in the hands of "dukes" (Gen 36 29 f, RV "chiefs"). They were succeeded by dukes of the house of Esau (vs 40 ff). This form of government gave way to that of an elective monarchy (vs 31 ff); and this had existed some time before Israel left the wilderness. The then reigning king would not permit Israel to pass through the land (Nu 20 14 ff; 21 4). Israel was forbidden to "abhor an Edomite," on the ground that he was a brother; and children of the third generation might enter the assembly of the Lord (Dt 23 7 f). War with Edom was out of the question.

Some thirty years after the Exodus, Ramses III "smote the people of Seir." The Israelites could not have been far off. We first hear of war between Israel and Edom under Saul (1 S 14 47). David prosecuted the war with terrific energy, slaying 18,000 Edomites (so read instead of "Syrians") in the Valley of Salt (2 S 8 13 f); Joab remaining for six months in the country, which was garrisoned by Israelites, "until he had cut off every male in Edom" (1 K 11 15 f). Hadad of the blood royal of Edom escaped to Egypt, and later became a source of trouble to Solomon (vs 14 ff. 25). The conquest of Edom opened to Israel the ports of the Red Sea, whence the expeditions of Solomon and Jehoshaphat set out. In Jehoshaphat's time the king is called a "deputy" (22 47). Its king acknowledged the supremacy of Judah (2 K 3 9, etc). Under Jehoram son of Jehoshaphat, Edom revolted. Jehoram defeated them at Zair, but was unable to quell the rebellion (8 20 ff). Amaziah invaded the country, slew 10,000 in the Valley of Salt, and took Sela which he named Joktheel (14 7). Uzziah restored the Edomite port of Elath (14 22). In the Syrian war Rezin regained Elath for Syria, and cast out the Jews. It was then permanently occupied by Syrians—here also probably we should read Edomites (16 6). From the cuneiform inscriptions we learn that when Tiglath-pileser subdued Rezin, among the kings from whom he received homage at Damascus was Qaus-malaka of Edom (736 BC). Later Malik-ram paid homage to Sennacherib. To Ezarhaddon also they were compelled to render service. They gave what help they could to Nebuchadnezzar, and exulted in the destruction of Jerus, stirring the bitterest indignation in the hearts of the Jews (Lam 4 21; Ezk 25 12; 35 3 ff; Ob vs 10 ff). The Edomites pressed into the now empty lands in the S. of Judah. In 300 BC Mt. Seir with its capital Petra fell into the hands of the Nabataeans. West of the 'Arabah the country they occupied came to be known by the Gr name Idumaea, and the people

5. Idumaea as Idumaeans. Hebron, their chief and the city, was taken by Judas Maccabaeus Idumaeans in 165 BC (1 Macc 4 29.61; 5 65).

In 126 BC the country was subdued by John Hyrcanus, who compelled the people to become Jews and to submit to circumcision. Antipater, governor of Idumaea, was made procurator of Judaea, Samaria and Galilee by Julius Caesar. He paved the way to the throne for his son Herod the Great. With the fall of Judah under the Romans, Idumaea disappears from history.

The names of several Edomite deities are known: Hadad, Qaus, Kozé, and, possibly, Edom; but of the religion of Edom we are without information. The language differed little from Heb.

(1) One of the cities of Og, not far from Ashtaroth, where the power of his kingdom received its death-blow from the invading Israelites (Josh 12 4; Nu 21 33 ff, etc). It seems to mark the western limit of Bashan as against Salecah on the E. (Dt 3 10). It was given to Machir, son of Manasseh (Josh 13 31). Onom places it 24 Rom miles from Bostra. The most probable identification is with Der'ah, a town of between 4,000 and 5,000 inhabitants, on the southern lip of Wādī Zeideh, about 29 miles as the crow flies E. of the Sea of Galilee. It is the center of an exceedingly fruitful district. The accumulated rubbish in the town covers many remains of antiquity. It is, however, chiefly remarkable for the extraordinary subterranean city, as yet only partially explored, cut in the rock under the town. This is certainly very ancient, and was doubtless used by the inhabitants as a refuge in times of stress and peril. For a description see Schumacher, Across the Jordan, 121 ff.

(2) A place not identified, between Kedesh and En-hazor (Josh 19 37).

LITERATURE

1. Education Defined.—By education we understand the sum total of those processes whereby society transmits from one generation to the next its accumulated social, intellectual and religious experience and heritage. In part these processes are informal and incidental, arising from participation in certain forms of social life and activity which exist on their own account and not for the sake of their educative influence upon the rising generation. The more formal educative processes are designed (1) to give the immature members of society a mastery over the symbols and technique of civilization, including language (reading and writing), the arts, the sciences, and religion, and (2) to enlarge the fund of individual and community knowledge beyond the measure furnished by the direct activities of the immediate environment (cf Dewey, art. on "Education" in Monroe's CE; cf Butler, ME).

Religious education among ancient and modern peoples alike reveals clearly this twofold aspect of all education. On its informal side it consists in the transmission of religious ideas and experience by means of the reciprocal processes of imitation and example; each generation, by actually participating in the religious activities and ceremonies of the social group, imbibing as it were the spirit and ideals of the preceding generation as these are modified by the particular economic and industrial conditions under which the entire process takes place. Formal religious education begins with the conscious and systematic effort on the part of the mature members of a social group (tribe, nation, or religious fellowship) to initiate the immature members by means of solemn rites and ceremonies, or patient training, or both, into the mysteries and high privileges of their own religious fellowship and experience. As regards both the content and form of this instruction, these will in every case be determined by the type and stage of civilization reflected in the life, occupations, habits and customs of the people. Among primitive races educational method is simpler and the content of formal instruction less differentiated than on higher culture levels (Ames, PRE). All education is at first religious in the sense that religious motives and ideas predominate in the educational efforts of all primitive peoples. The degree to which religion continues preëminent in the educational system of a progressive nation depends upon the vitality of its religion and upon the measure of efficiency and success with which from the first that religion is instilled into the very bone and sinew of each succeeding generation. Here lies the explanation of the religious-educational character of Heb national life, and here, too, the secret of Israel's incomparable influence upon the religious and educational development of the world. The religion of Israel was a vital religion and it was a teaching religion (Kent, GTJC).

II. Education in Early Israel (from Patriarchal Times to the Exile).—In their social and national development the Hebrews passed through several clearly marked cultural stages which it is important to note in connection with their educational history. At the earliest point at which the OT gives us any knowledge of them, they, like their ancestors, were nomads and shepherds. Their chief interest centered in the flocks and herds from which they gained a livelihood, and in the simple, useful arts that seem gradually to have become hereditary in certain families. With the settlement of the Heb tribes in Pal and their closer contact with Canaanitish culture, a more established agricultural life with resulting changes in social and religious institutions gradually superseded the nomadic stage of culture. A permanent dwelling-place made possible, as the continual warfare of gradual conquest made necessary, a closer federation of the tribes, which ultimately resulted in the establishment of the monarchy under David (W. R. Smith, RS; Davidson, HE).

In these earliest cultural periods, both the nomadic and the agricultural, there was no distinct separation between the spheres of

of filial obedience and loyalty, and on Yahweh's part reciprocal parental care over them as His people. The family was the social unit and its head the person in whom centered also religious authority and leadership. The tribal head or patriarch in turn combined in himself the functions which later were differentiated into those of priest and prophet and king. Education was a matter of purely domestic interest and concern. The home was the only school and the parents the only teachers. But there was real instruction, all of which, moreover, was given in a spirit of devout religious earnestness and of reverence for the common religious ceremonies and beliefs, no matter whether the subject of instruction was the simple task of husbandry or of some useful art, or whether it was the sacred history and traditions of the tribe, or the actual performance of its religious rites. According to Jos (Ant, IV, viii, 12) Moses himself had commanded, "All boys shall learn the most important parts of the law since such knowledge is most valuable and the source of happiness"; and again he commanded (Apion, II, 25) to teach them the rudiments of learning (reading and writing) together with the laws and deeds of the ancestors, in order that they might not transgress or seem ignorant of the laws of their ancestors, but rather emulate their example. Certain it is that the earliest legislation, including the Decalogue, emphasized parental authority and their claim on the reverence of their children: "Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long in the land which Jeh thy God giveth thee" (Ex 20 12); "And he that smiteth his father, or his mother, shall be surely put to death. And he that curseth his father or his mother, shall surely be put to death" (Ex 21 15.17); while every father was exhorted to explain to his son the origin and significance of the great Passover ceremony with its feast of unleavened bread: "And thou shalt tell thy son in that day, saying, It is because of that which Jeh did for me when I came forth out of Egypt" (Ex 13 8).

The period of conquest and settlement developed leaders who not only led the allied tribes in battle, but served as judges between their people, and were active in the maintenance of the ancestral religion. In time, sufficient coöperation was obtained to make possible the organization of strong intertribal leagues and, finally, the kingship. "This increasing political unification," says Ames, "was accompanied by a religious consciousness which became ultimately the most remarkable product of the national development" (Ames, PRE, 174 f). The establishment of the kingdom and the beginnings of city and commercial life were accompanied by more radical cultural changes, including the differentiation of religious from other social institutions, the organization of the priesthood, and the rise and development of prophecy. Elijah, the Tishbite, Amos, the herdsman from Tekoa, Isaiah, the son of Amoz, were all champions of a simple faith and ancient religious ideals as over against the worldly-wise diplomacy and sensuous idolatry of the surrounding nations. Under the monarchy also a new religious symbolism developed. Yahweh was thought of as a king in whose hands actually lay the supreme guidance of the state: "Accordingly the organization of the state included provision for consulting His will and obtaining His direction in all weighty matters" (W. R. Smith, RS, 30). Under the teaching of the prophets the ideal of personal and civic righteousness was moved to the very forefront of Heb religious thought, while the prophetic ideal of the future was that of a time when "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of Jeh, as the waters cover the sea" (Isa 11 9), when all "from the least of them unto the greatest of them" shall know him (Jer 31 34). Concerning the so-called "schools of the prophets" which, in the days of Elijah, existed at Bethel, Jericho and Gilgal (2 K 2 3.5; 4 38 f), and probably in other places, it should be noted that these were associations or brotherhoods established for the purpose of mutual edification rather than education. The Bible does not use the word "schools" to designate these fraternities. Nevertheless we cannot conceive of the element of religious training as being entirely absent.

Shortly before the Bab captivity King Josiah gave official recognition and sanction to the teachings of the prophets, while the Deuter-

3. Deuteronomic Legislation onomic legislation of the same period strongly emphasized the responsibility of parents for the religious and moral instruction and training of their children. Concerning the words of the law Israel is admonished: "Thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thy house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up" (Dt 6 7; 11 19). For the benefit of children as well as adults the law was to be written "upon the door-posts" and "gates" (6 9; 11 20), and "very plainly" upon "great stones" set up for this purpose upon the hilltops and beside the altars (Dt 27 1-8). From the Deuteronomic period forward, religious training to the Jew became the synonym of education, while the word Tōrah, which originally denoted simply "Law" (Ex 24 12; Lev 7 1; 26 46), came to mean "religious instruction or teaching," in which sense it is used in Dt 4 44; 5 1, "This is the law which Moses set before the children of Israel: . . . Hear, O Israel, the statutes and the ordinances which I speak in your ears this day, that ye may learn them, and observe to do them"; and in Prov 6 23,

"For the commandment is a lamp; and the law is light; And reproofs of instruction are the way of life."

(Cf Ps 19 8; Prov 3 1; 4 2.)

With the development and reorganization of the ritual, priests and Levites, as the guardians of the law, were the principal instructors of the people, while parents remained in charge of the training of the children.

4. Reading and Writing In families of the aristocracy the place of the parents was sometimes taken by tutors, as appears from the case of the infant Solomon, whose training seems to have been intrusted to the prophet Nathan (2 S 12 25). There is no way of determining to what extent the common people were able to read and write. Our judgment that these rudiments of formal education in the modern sense were not restricted to the higher classes is based upon such passages as Isa 29 11, 12, which distinguishes between the man who "is learned" (lit. "knoweth letters") and the one who is "not learned," and Isa 10 19, referring to the ability of a child "to write," taken together with such facts as that the literary prophets Amos and Micah sprang from the ranks of the common people, and that "the workman who excavated the tunnel from the Virgin's Spring to the Pool of Siloam carved in the rock the manner of their work" (Kennedy in HDB). It should be added that the later Jewish tradition reflected in the Talm, Tg and Midr, and which represents both public, elementary and college education as highly developed even in patriarchal times, is generally regarded as altogether untrustworthy.

III. Education in Later Israel (from the Exile to the Birth of Christ).—The national disaster that befell the Heb people in the downfall of Jerus and the Bab captivity was not without its compensating, purifying and stimulating influence upon the religious and educational development of the nation. Under the pressure of adverse external circumstances the only source of comfort for the exiled people was in the law and covenant of Yahweh, while the shattering of all hope of immediate national greatness turned the thought and attention of the religious leaders away from the present toward the future. Two types of Messianic expectation characterized the religious development of the exilic period. The first is the priestly, material hope of return and restoration reflected in the prophecies of Ezekiel. The exiled tribes are to return again to Jerus; the temple is to be restored, its ritual and worship purified and exalted, the priestly ordinance and service elaborated. The second is the spiritualized and idealized Messianic expectation of the Second Isaiah, based on teachings of the earlier prophets. For the greatest of Heb prophets Yahweh is the only God, and the God of all nations as well as of Israel. For him Israel is Yahweh's servant, His instrument for revealing Himself to other nations, who, when they witness the redemption of Yahweh's suffering Servant, will bow down to Yahweh and acknowledge His rule. "Thus the trials of the nation lead to a comprehensive universalism within which the suffering Israel gains an elevated and ennobling explanation" (Ames, PRE, 185). In the prophetic vision of Ezekiel we must seek the inspiration for the later development of Jewish ritual, as well as the basis of those eschatological hopes and expectations which find their fuller expression in the apocalypse of Dnl and the kindred lit. of the later cents. The prophecies of the Isaiahs and the Messianic hope which these kindled in the hearts of the faithful prepared the way for the teachings of Jesus concerning a Divine spiritual kingdom, based upon the personal, ethical character of the individual and the mutual, spiritual fellowship of believers.

The educational significance of the prophetic writings of this as of the preceding periods is that the prophets themselves were the real religious leaders and representative men (Kulturträger) of the nation. In advance of their age they were the heralds of Divine truth; the watchmen on the mountain tops whose clear insight into the future detected the significant elements in the social and religious conditions and tendencies about them, and whose keen intellect and lofty faith grasped the eternal principles which are the basis of all individual and national integrity and worth. These truths and principles they impressed upon the consciousness of their own and succeeding generations, thereby giving to future teachers of their race the essence of their message, and preparing the way for the larger and fuller interpretation of religion and life contained in the teachings of Jesus. The immediate influence of their teaching is explained in part by the variety and effectiveness of their teaching method, their marvelous simplicity and directness of speech, their dramatic emphasis upon essentials and their intelligent appreciation of social conditions and problems about them.

The immediate bond of union, as well as the textbook and program of religious instruction, during the period of the captivity and subsequently, was the Book of the Law, which the exiles carried with them to Babylon. When in 458 BC a company of exiles returned to Pal, they, along with their poorer brethren who had not been carried away, restored the Jewish community at Jerus, and under the suzerainty of Persia, founded a new nationalism, based, even more than had been the earlier monarchy, upon the theocratic conception of Israel's relation to Yahweh. During this period it was that writings of poets, lawgivers, prophets and sages were brought together into one sacred collection of scrolls, known later as the OT canon, of which the Torah (the law) was educationally the most significant. The recognized teachers of this period included, in addition to the priests and Levites, the "wise men," or "sages" and the "scribes" or šōphrīm (lit. "those learned in Scriptures").

Whether or not the sages and scribes of the later post-exilic times are to be regarded as one and the same class, as an increasing number of scholars are inclined to believe, or thought of as distinct classes, the wise men clearly antedate, not only the šōphrīm, but in all probability all forms of book learning as well. Suggestions of their existence and function are met with in earliest times both in Israel and among other nations of the East. As illustrations of their appearance in preëxilic OT history may be cited the references in 2 S 14 1-20; 1 K 4 32; Isa 29 10. It is no lesser personage than King Solomon who, both by his contemporaries and later generations as well, was regarded as the greatest representative of this earlier group of teachers who uttered their wisdom in the form of clever, epigrammatic proverbs and shrewd sayings. The climax of Wisdom-teaching belongs, however, to the later post-exilic period. Of the wise men of this later day an excellent description is preserved for us in the Book of Eccles (39 3.4.8.10; cf 1 1-11):

2. The Book of the Law

3. Wise Men or Sages

"He seeks out the hidden meaning of proverbs,
And is conversant with the subtillies of parables,
He serves among great men,
And appears before him who rules;
He travels through the land of strange nations;
For he hath tried good things and evil among men.

He shows forth the instruction which he has been taught,
And glories in the law of the covenant of the Lord.

Nations shall declare his wisdom,
And the congregation shall tell out his praise."

Of the pedagogic experience, wisdom and learning of these sages, the Book of Prov forms the Bib. repository. Aside from the Torah it is thus the oldest handbook of education. The wise men conceive of life itself as a discipline. Parents are the natural instructors of their children:

"My son, hear the instruction of thy father,
And forsake not the law of thy mother."

—Prov 1 8.

(Cf 4 1-4 ff; 6 20; 13 1.) The substance of such parental teaching is to be the 'fear of Yahweh' which "is the beginning of wisdom"; and fidelity in the performance of this parental obligation has the promise of success:

"Train up a child in the way he should go,
And even when he is old he will not depart from it."

—Prov 22 6.

In their training of children, parents are to observe sternness, not hesitating to apply the rod of correction, when needed (cf 23 13.14), yet doing so with discretion, since wise reproof is better than "a hundred stripes" (17 10). Following the home training there is provision for further instruction at the hands of professional teachers for all who would really obtain unto "wisdom" and who can afford the time and expense of such special training. The teachers are none other than the wise men or sages whose words "heard in quiet" (Eccl 9 17) are "as goads, and as nails well fastened" (12 11). Their precepts teach diligence (Prov 6 6-11), chastity (7 5), charity (14 21), truthfulness (17 7) and temperance (21 17; 23 20.21.29-35); for the aim of all Wisdom-teaching is none other than

"To give prudence to the simple,
To the young man knowledge and discretion:
That the wise man may hear, and increase in learning;
And that the man of understanding may attain unto sound counsels."—Prov 1 4.5.

The šōphērīm or "men of book learning" were editors and interpreters as well as scribes or copyists of ancient and current writings. As

5. Scribes and Levites a class they did not become prominent until the wise men, as such, stepped into the background, nor until the exigencies of the situation demanded more teachers and teaching than the ranks of priests and Levites, charged with increasing ritualistic duties, could supply. Ezra was both a priest and a šōphēr (Ezr 7 11; Neh 8 1 f), concerning whom we read that he "set his heart to seek the law of Jeh, and to do it, and to teach in Israel statutes and ordinances" (Ezr 7 10). Likewise the Levites often appear as teachers of the law, and we must think of the development of sopherism (scribism) as a distinct profession as proceeding very gradually. The same is true of the characteristic Jewish religious-educational institution, the synagogue, the origin and development of which fell within this same general period (cf SYNAGOGUE). The pupils of the šōphērīm were the Pharisees (p'rūšīm or "separatists") who during the Maccabean period came to be distinguished from the priestly party or Sadducees.

The conquest of Persia by Alexander (332 BC) marks the rise of Gr influence in Pal. Alexander himself visited Pal and perhaps Jerus

6. Greek and Roman Influences (Jos, Ant, X, i, 8), befriended the Jews and granted to them the privilege of self-government, and the maintenance of their own social and religious customs, both at home and in Alexandria, the new center of Gr learning, in the founding of which many Jews participated (see ALEXANDRIA). During the succeeding dynasty of the Ptolemies, Gr ideas and Gr culture penetrated to the very heart of Judaism at Jerus, and threatened the overthrow of Jewish social and religious institutions. The Maccabean revolt under Antiochus Epiphanes (174-164 BC) and the reestablishment of a purified temple ritual during the early part of the Maccabean period (161-63 BC) were the natural reaction against the attempt of the Seleucidae forcibly to substitute the Gr gymnasium and theater for the Jewish synagogue and temple (Felten, NZ, I, 83 f; cf 1 Macc 1, 3, 9, 13 and 2 Macc 4-10). The end of the Maccabean period found Phariseism and strict Jewish orthodoxy in the ascendancy with such Hellenic tendencies as had found permanent lodgment in Judaism reflected in the agnosticism of the aristocratic Sadducees. The establishment of Rom authority in Pal (63 BC) introduced a new determining element into the environmental conditions under which Judaism was to attain its final distinguishing characteristics. The genius of the Romans was practical, legalistic and institutional. As organizers and administrators they were pre-eminent. But their religion never inspired to any exalted view of life, and education to them meant always merely a preparation for life's practical duties. Hence the influence of Rom authority upon Judaism was favorable to the development of a narrow individualistic Phariseism, rather than to the fostering of Gr idealism and universalism. With the destruction of Jerus by the Romans a little more than a cent. later (70 AD) and the cessation of the temple worship, the Sadducees as a class disappeared from Judaism, which has ever since been represented by the Pharisees devoted to the study of the law. Outside of Jerus and Pal, meanwhile, the Jewish communities at Alexandria and elsewhere were much more hospitable to Gr culture and learning, at the same time exerting a reciprocal, modifying influence upon Gr thought. It was, however, through its influence upon early Christian theology and education that the Hellenistic philosophy of the Alexandrian school left its deeper impress upon the substance and method of later Christian education.

IV. Education in New Testament Times (from the birth of Christ to the end of the 1st cent.).—Elementary schools: Jewish education in the time of Christ was of the orthodox traditional type and in the hands of scribes, Pharisees and learned rabbis. The home was still the chief institution for the dispensation of elementary instruction, although synagogues, with attached schools for the young, were to be found in every important Jewish community. Public elementary schools, other than those connected with the synagogues, were of slower growth and do not seem to have been common until, some time after Joshua ben Gamala, high priest from 63-65 AD, ordered that teachers be appointed in every province and city to instruct children having attained the age of 6-7 years. In the synagogue schools the hazzān, or attendant, not infrequently served as schoolmaster (cf SCHOOL; SCHOOLMASTER).

As in earlier times the Torah, connoting now the sacred OT writings as a whole, though with emphasis still upon the law, furnished the subject-matter of instruction. To this were added, in the secondary schools (colleges) of the rabbis, the illustrative and parabolical rabbinical interpretation of the law (the haggādāh) and its application to daily life in the form of concise precept or rule of conduct (the halākhāh). Together the haggādāh and halākhāh furnish the content of the Talm (or Talmuds), as the voluminous collections of orthodox Jewish teachings of later cents. came to be known.

As regards teaching method the scribes and rabbis of NT times did not improve much upon the practice of the šōphrīm and sages of earlier cents. Memorization, the exact reproduction by the pupil of the master's teaching, rather than general knowledge or culture, was the main objective. Since the voice of prophecy had become silent and the canon of revealed truth was considered closed, the intellectual mastery and interpretation of this sacred revelation of the past was the only aim that education on its intellectual side could have. On its practical side it sought, as formerly, the inculcation of habits of strict ritualistic observance, obedience to the letter of the law as a condition of association and fellowship with the selected company of true Israelites to which scribes and Pharisees considered themselves to belong. The success with which the teachings of the scribes and rabbis were accompanied is an evidence of their devotion to their work, and more still of the psychological insight manifested by them in utilizing every subtle means and method for securing and holding the attention of their pupils, and making their memories the trained and obedient servants of an educational ideal. The defects in their work were largely the defects in that ideal. Their theory and philosophy of education were narrow. "Their eyes were turned too much to the past rather than the present and future." They failed to distinguish clearly the gold from the dross in their inherited teachings, or to adapt these to the vital urgent needs of the common people. In its struggle against foreign cults and foreign culture, Judaism had incased itself in a shell of stereotyped orthodoxy, the attempt to adapt which to new conditions and to a constantly changing social order resulted in an insincere and shallow casuistry of which the fantastic conglomerate mass of Talmudic wisdom of the 4th and 6th cents. is the lasting memorial.

Nevertheless, "Jewish education, though defective both in matter and in method, and tending to fetter rather than to free the mind, achieved four valuable results: (1) it developed a taste for close, critical study; (2) it sharpened the wits, even to the point of perversity; (3) it encouraged a reverence for law and produced desirable social conduct; and (4) it formed a powerful bond of union among the Jewish people." To these four points of excellence enumerated by Davidson (HE, 80) must be added a fifth which, briefly stated, is this: (5) Jewish education by its consistent teaching of lofty monotheism, and its emphasis, sometimes incidental and sometimes outstanding, upon righteousness and holiness of life as a condition of participation in a future Messianic kingdom, prepared the way for the Christian view of God and the world, set forth in its original distinctness of outline and incomparable simplicity in the teachings of Jesus.

Jesus was more than a teacher; but He was a teacher first. To His contemporaries he appeared as a Jewish rabbi of exceptional influence and popularity. He used the teaching methods of the rabbis; Jesus as a gathered about Him, as did they, a group of chosen disciples (learners) whom He trained and taught more explicitly with a view to perpetuating through them His own influence and work. His followers called Him Rabbi and Master, and the scribes and Pharisees conceded His popularity and power. He taught, as did the rabbis of His time, in the temple courts, in the synagogue, in private, and on the public highway as the exigencies of the case demanded. His textbook, so far as He used any, was the same as theirs; His form of speech (parable and connected discourse), manner of life and methods of instruction were theirs. Yet into His message and method He put a new note of authority that challenged attention and inspired confidence. Breaking with the traditions of the past He substituted for devotion to the letter of the law an interest in men, with boundless sympathy for their misfortune, abiding faith in their worth and high destiny and earnest solicitude for their regeneration and perfection. To say that Jesus was the world's greatest and foremost example as a teacher is to state a fact borne out by every inquiry, test and comparison that modern educational science can apply to the work and influence of its great creative geniuses of the past. Where His contemporaries and even His own followers saw only "as in a glass, darkly," He saw clearly; and His view of God and the world, of human life and human destiny, has come down through the ages as a Divine revelation vouchsafed the world in Him. Viewed from the intellectual side, it was the life philosophy of Jesus that made His teachings imperishable; esthetically it was the compassionate tenderness and solicitude of His message that drew the multitudes to Him; judged from the standpoint of will, it was the example of His life, its purpose, its purity, its helpfulness, that caused men to follow Him; and tested by its immediate and lasting social influence, it was the doctrine, the ideal and example of the human brotherliness and Divine sonship, that made Jesus the pattern of the great teachers of mankind in every age and generation. With a keen, penetrating insight into the ultimate meaning of life, He reached out, as it were, over the conflicting opinions of men and the mingling social and cultural currents of His time backward to the fundamental truths uttered by the ancient prophets of His race and forward to the ultimate goal of the race. Then with simple directness of speech He addressed Himself to the consciences and wills of men, setting before them the ideal of the higher life, and with infinite patience sought to lift them to the plane of fellowship with Himself in thought and action.

It remained for the disciples of Jesus to perpetuate His teaching ministry and to organize the new forces making for human betterment.

5. Educational Work In this work, which was distinctly religious-educational in character, some of the found a field of labor among their own Jewish kinsmen, and others, like Paul, among the needy Gentiles (Gal 1 16; 2 7; 1 Tim 2 7). As regards a division of labor in the apostolic church, we read of apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers (1 Cor 12 28; Eph 4 11). The apostles were the itinerant leaders and missionaries of the entire church. Their work was largely that of teaching, Paul insisting on calling himself a teacher as well as an apostle (2 Tim 1 11; 1 Cor 4 17). The prophets were men with a special message like that of Agabus (Acts 21 10.11). The evangelists were itinerant preachers, as was Philip (8 40), while the pastors, also called bishops, had permanent charge of individual churches. The professional teachers included both laymen and those ordained by the laying on of hands. Their work was regarded with highest honor in the church and community. In contrast with the itinerant church officers, apostles and evangelists, they, like the pastors, resided permanently in local communities. With this class the author of the Epistle of Jas identifies himself, and there can be little doubt that the epistle which he wrote reflects both the content and form of the instruction which these earliest Christian teachers gave to their pupils. Before the close of the 1st cent. the religious educational work of the church had been organized into a more systematic form, out of which there developed gradually the catechumenate of the early post-apostolic period (see CATECHIST). In the Did. or Teachings of the Apostles, there has been reserved for us a textbook of religious instruction from this earlier period (Kent, GTJC). Necessarily, the entire missionary and evangelistic work of the apostolic church was educational in character, and throughout this earliest period of church history we must think of the work of apostles, evangelists and pastors, as well as that of professional teachers, as including a certain amount of systematic religious instruction. EDUTH, ʿduth (עֲדוּת, ʿdḥūth, "testimony," a technical term for the Ten Commandments or for the Law): In Ps 60 title, "set to Shushan Eduth" (lit. "a lily [is] the testimony"); 80 title, "set to Shoshannim Eduth" (lit. "lilies [is] the testimony"). The Heb words appear to be intended to designate a melody by the first few words ordinarily associated with it. See PSALMS.

EFFECT, ʿfektʹ, EFFECTUAL, ʿfektʹtū-al: In the OT, RV renders "fulfilment" for "effect" in Ezk 12 23 (Heb dābhār, "matter"); and in Jer 48 30 "His boastings have wrought nothing" for the vaguer "His lies shall not so effect" of AV. In AV of the NT, "make of none effect" occurs repeatedly: as the tr of Gr akurōō, "render void" (Mt 15 6; Mk 7 13); of katargēō, "annul" (Rom 3 3 [AV "make without effect"]; 4 14; Gal 3 17); and of kenōō, "make empty" (1 Cor 1 17). RV renders "make of none effect" in Rom 3 3; Gal 3 17; "make void" in the other cases, with no apparent reason for the lack of uniformity. Gr energēō is the opposite in meaning of katargēō above. Its derivative energēs, "effective," is rendered "effectual" by EV in 1 Cor 16 9; Philem ver 6. RV dispenses with "effectual," "effectually," in the other cases where AV has used these words as auxiliary in the tr of energēō or of enérgeia, "working" (2 Cor 1 6; Gal 2 8; Eph 3 7; 4 16; 1 Thess 2 13; Jas 5 16). F. K. FARR

EGG (בִּרְיָה, bēṣāh; ὄν, ōn; Lat ovum): An oval or spheroid body produced by birds, fishes and reptiles, from which their young emerge when incubated or naturally developed. The fertile egg of a bird consists of the yolk, a small disk from which the embryo develops, the albuminous white, and a calcareous shell. The most ancient records prove that eggs have been used as an article of diet ever since the use of the flesh of fowl began. Chickens were unknown in Pal in the days of Job, so that his query concerning the taste of the white of an egg might have referred to those of pigeons, ducks, eggs taken from the nests of geese or swans, game birds or ostriches. "Can that which hath no savor be eaten without salt? Or is there any taste in the white of an egg?" (Job 6 6, RVm "the juice of purslain"). In Lk 11 12 there is every possibility that the egg of our common domestic fowl is referred to, as "chickens" (q.v.) had been imported and were numerous in Pal at that time. "Or if he shall ask an egg, will he give him a scorpion?" The reference in Isa 59 5 is to the egg of a serpent, and is figurative of the schemes of evil men: "They hatch adders' eggs, and weave the spider's web: he that eateth of their eggs dieth; and that which is crushed breaketh out into a viper." GENE STRATTON-PORTER

EGLAH, eg'la (עֵגְלָה, ʿeghlāh, "heifer"): Wife of David and mother of Ithream (2 S 3 5 || 1 Ch 3 3).

EGLAIM, eg'lā-im (אֶגְלַיִם, ʿeghlāyim; Ἀγαλέμ, Agaleim): A place named in Isa 15 8, possibly in the S. of Moab. Onom identifies it with Agallim, a village 8 Rom miles S. of Areopolis. It cannot now be identified.

EGLATH-SHELISHIYAH, eg'lath-shel-i-shī'ya (עֵגְלַת שְׁלִישִׁיָּה, ʿeghlath shēlīshīyāh): Found in Isa 15 5; Jer 48 34 (Heb) in oracles against Moab. AV trs "an heifer of three years old"; RV takes it as the name of a place, but ARVm has "a heifer three years old," acc. to LXX. In the former case strong and unconquered cities; Zoar and Horonaim, are compared to the heifer not yet broken to the yoke. Such use of "heifer" is not infrequent (cf Jer 46 20; Hos 10 11, etc). The majority of scholars, however, take it as a place-name. Some would read "the third Eglath," as if there were three towns of that name. No probable identification has been suggested. W. EWING

EGLON, eg'lon (עֵגְלוֹן, ʿeghlōn, "circle"): A king of Moab in the period of the Judges who, in alliance with Ammon and Amalek, overcame Israel and made Jericho his capital, presumably driven across the Jordan by the turmoil in his own kingdom which at that time was probably being used as a battle ground by Edom and the desert tribes (cf Gen 36 35). After 18 years of servitude the children of Israel were delivered by Ehud the Benjamite, who like so many other Benjamites (cf Jgs 20 16) was left-handed. Under the pretext of carrying a present to the tyrant, he secured a private interview and assassinated him with a two-edged sword which he had carried concealed on his right side (Jgs 3 19-22). Ehud made his escape, rallied the children of Israel about him and returned to conquer the Moabites (Jgs 3 30). ELLA DAVIS ISAACS

EGLON, eg'lon (עֶגְלוֹן, 'eghlōn; Ὀδολλάμ, Odollām): A royal Canaanite city whose king joined the league headed by Adonizedek of Jerus against the Gibeonites, which suffered overwhelming defeat at the hands of Joshua (Josh 10). Joshua passed from Libnah to Lachish, and from Lachish to Eglon on his way to Hebron (vs 31 ff). It was in the Shephelah of Judah (15 39). The name seems to be preserved in that of Khirbet 'Ajlān, about 10 miles W. of Beit Jibrin. Professor Petrie, however, thinks that the site of Tell Nejileh better suits the requirements. While Khirbet 'Ajlān is a comparatively modern site, the city at Tell Nejileh must have been contemporary with that at Tell el-Hesi (Lachish). It lies fully three miles S.E. of Tell el-Hesi. Egypt (מִצְרַיִם, miṣrayim; ἡ Αἴγυπτος, hē Aiguptos): Usually supposed to represent the dual of Misr, referring to "the two lands," as the Egyptians called their country. This dualism, however, has been denied by some.

1. The Country.—Though Egypt is one of the earliest countries in recorded history, and as regards its continuous civilization, yet it is a late country in its geological history and in its occupation by a settled population. The whole land up to Silsileh is a thick mass of Eocene limestone, with later marls over that in the lower districts. It has been elevated on the E., up to the mountains of igneous rocks many thousand ft. high toward the Red Sea. It has been depressed on the W., down to the Fayum and the oases below sea-level. This strain resulted in a deep fault from N. to S. for some hundreds of miles up from the Mediterranean. This fault left its eastern side about 200 ft. above its western, and into it the drainage of the plateau poured, widening it out so as to form the Nile valley, as the permanent drain of Northeast Africa. The access of water to the rift seems to have caused the basalt outflows, which are seen as black columnar basalt S. of the Fayum, and brown massive basalt at Khankah, N. of Cairo.

The gouging out of the Nile valley by rainfall must have continued when the land was 300 ft.

higher than at present, as is shown by the immense falls of strata into collapsed caverns which were far below the present Nile level. Then, after the excavations of the valley, it has been submerged to 500 ft. lower than at present, as is shown by the rolled gravel beds and deposits on the tops of the water-worn cliffs, and the filling up of the tributary valleys—as at Thebes—by deep deposits, through which the subsequent stream beds have been scoured out. The land still had the Nile source 30 ft. higher than it is now within the human period, as seen by the worked flints in high gravel beds above the Nile plain. The distribution of land and water was very different from that at present when the land was only 100 ft. lower than now. Such a change would make the valley an estuary up to S. of the Fayum, would submerge much of the western desert, and would unite the Gulf of Suez and the Mediterranean. Such differences would entirely alter the conditions of animal life by sea and land. And as the human period began when the water was considerably higher, the conditions of climate and of life must have greatly changed in the earlier ages of man's occupation.

The earliest human remains belonging to the present condition of the country are large palaeolithic flints found in the side valleys

3. Earliest Human Remains at the present level of the Nile. As these are perfectly fresh, and not rolled or altered, they show that palaeolithic man lived in Egypt under the present conditions.

The close of this palaeolithic age of hunters, and the beginning of a settled population of cultivators, cannot have been before the drying up of the climate, which by depriving the Nile of tributary streams enfeebled it so that its mud was deposited and formed a basis for agriculture. From the known rate of deposit, and depth of mud soil, this change took place about 10,000 years ago. As the recorded history of the country extends 7,500 years, and we know of two prehistoric ages before that, it is pretty well fixed that the disappearance of palaeolithic man, and the beginning of the continuous civilization must have been about 9,000 to 10,000 years ago. For the continuation of this subject see the section on "History" below.

The climate of Egypt is unique in the world. So far as solar heat determines it, the condition is tropical; for, though just N. of the

4. The Climate tropic which lies at the boundary of Egypt and Nubia, the cloudless condition fully compensates for higher latitude. So far as temperature of the air is concerned, the climate is temperate, the mean heat of the winter months being 52° and of the summer about 80°, much the same as Italy. This is due to the steady prevalence of north winds, which maintain fit conditions for active, strenuous work. The rainlessness and dry air give the same facility of living that is found in deserts, where shelter is only needed for temperature and not for wet; while the inundation provides abundant moisture for the richest crops.

The primitive condition—only recently changed—of the crops being all raised during five cool months from November to April, and the inundation covering the land during all the hot weather, left the population free from labor during the enervating season, and only required their energies when work was possible under favorable conditions. At the same time it gave a great opportunity for monumental work, as any amount of labor could be drawn upon without the smallest reduction in the produce of the country. The great structures which covered the land gave training and organization to the people, without being any drain upon the welfare of the country. The inundation covering the plain also provided the easiest transport for great masses from the quarries at the time when labor was abundant. Thus the climatic conditions were all in favor of a great civilization, and aided its production of monuments. The whole mass of the country being of limestone, and much of it of the finest quality, provided material for construction at every point. In the south, sandstone and granite were also at hand upon the great waterway.

The Nile is the great factor which makes life possible in Northeast Africa, and without it Egypt would only be a desolate corner of the Sahara. The union of two essentially different streams takes place at Khartum. The White or light Nile comes from the great plains of the Sudan, while the Blue or dark Nile descends from the mountains of Abyssinia. The Sudan Nile from Gondokoro is filtered by the lakes and the sudd vegetation, so that it carries little mud; the Abyssinian Nile, by its rapid course, brings down all the soil which is deposited in Egypt, and which forms the basis for cultivation. The Sudan

First Cataract of the Nile.

Nile rises only 6 ft. from April to November; while the Abyssinian Nile rises 26 ft. from April to August. The latter makes the rise of the inundation, while the Sudan Nile maintains the level into the winter. In Egypt itself the unchecked Nile at Aswan rises 25 ft. from the end of May to the beginning of September; while at Cairo, where modified by the irrigation system, it rises 16 ft. from May to the end of September. It was usually drained off the land by the beginning of November, and cultivation was begun. The whole cultivable land of Egypt is but the dried-up bed of the great river, which fills its ancient limits during a third of the year. The time taken by a flush of water to come down the Nile is about 15 days from 400 miles above Khartum to Aswan, and about 6 days from Aswan to Cairo, or 80 to 90 miles a day, which shows a flow of 3 to 3½ miles an hour when in flood.

The fauna has undergone great changes during the human period. At the close of the prehistoric age there are represented the giraffe, elephant, wild ox, lion, leopard, stag, long-necked gazelle and great dogs, none of which are found in the historic period. During historic times various kinds of antelopes have been exterminated, the hippopotamus was driven out of the Delta during Rom times, and the crocodile was cleared out of Upper Egypt and Nubia in the last century. Cranes and other birds shown on early sculptures are now unknown in the country. The animals still surviving are the wolf, jackal, hyaena, dogs, ichneumon, jerboa, rats, mice, lizards (up to 4 ft. long) and snakes, besides a great variety of birds, admirably figured by Whymper, Birds of Egypt. Of tamed animals, the ox, sheep, goat and donkey are ancient; the cat and horse were brought in about 2000 BC, the camel was not commonly known till 200 AD, and the buffalo was brought to Egypt and Italy in the Middle Ages.

The cultivated plants of Egypt were numerous. In ancient times we find the maize (durrah), wheat, barley and lentil; the vine, currant, date

8. The palm, dum palm, fig, olive and pome-
Flora granate; the onion, garlic, cucumber, melon and radish; the sont acacia, sycamore and tamarisk; the flax, henna and clover; and for ornament, the lotus, convolvulus and many others. The extension of commerce brought in by the Gr period, the bean, pea, sesame, lupin, helbeh, colocasia and sugar-cane; also the peach, walnut, castor-oil and pear. In the Rom and Arab. ages came in the chick pea, oats, rice, cotton, orange and lemon. In recent times have come the cactus, aloe, tomato, Indian corn, lebbek acacia and beetroot. Many European flowering and ornamental plants were also used in Egypt by the Greeks, and brought in later by the Arabs.

The original race in Egypt seems to have been of the steatopygous type now only found in South Africa. Figures of this race are known

9. The in the caves of France, in Malta, and Prehistoric later in Somaliland. As this race was Races still known in Egypt at the beginning of the neolithic civilization, and is there represented only by female figures in the graves, it seems that it was being exterminated by the newcomers and only the women were kept as slaves.

The neolithic race of Egypt was apparently of the Libyan stock. There seems to have been a single type of the Amorites in Syria, the prehistoric Egyptians and the Libyans; this race had a high, well-filled head, long nose slightly aquiline, and short beard; the profile was upright and not prognathous, the hair was wavy brown. It was a better type than the present south Europeans, of a very capable and intelligent appearance. From the objects found, and the religious legends, it seems that this race was subdued by an eastern, and probably Arabian race, in the prehistoric age.

II. The History.—The founders of the dynastic history were very different, having a profile with nose and forehead in one straight line, and rather thick, but well-formed lips. Historically the indications point to their coming from about Somaliland by water, and crossing into Egypt by the Koptos road from the Red Sea. The 11d Dynasty gave place to some new blood, probably of Sudany origin. In the VIth and VIIth Dynasties foreigners poured in apparently from the N., perhaps from Crete, judging by their foreign products. The XVth and XVIth Dynasties were Hyksos, or Sem "princes of the desert" from the E. The XVIIth and XVIIIth Dynasties were Berber in origin. The XIXth Dynasty was largely Sem from Syria. The XXIIId Dynasty was headed by an eastern adventurer Sheshenq, or Shusinak, "the man of Susa." The XXVth Dynasty was Ethiopian. The XXVth Dynasty was Libyan. The Greeks then poured into the Delta and the Fayum, and Hellenized Egypt. The Roman made but little change in the population; but during his rule the Arab began to enter the eastern side, and by 641 AD the Arab conquest swept the land, and brought in a large part—perhaps the majority—of the ancestors of the present inhabitants. After 3 cents. the Tunisians—the old Libyans—conquered Egypt again. The later administrations by Syrians, Circassians, Turks and others probably made no change in the general population. The economic changes of the past cent. have brought in Greeks, Italians and other foreigners to the large towns; but all these only amount to an eightieth of the population. The Copts are the descendants of the very mixed Egyptians of Rom age, kept separate from the Arab invaders by their Christianity. They are mainly in Upper Egypt, where some villages are entirely Coptic, and are distinguished by their superior cleanliness, regularity, and the freedom of the women from unwholesome seclusion. The Copts, though only a fifteenth of the population, have always had a large share of official posts, owing to their intelligence and ability being above that of the Muslim.

In dealing with the history, we here follow the dating which was believed and followed by the Egyptians themselves. All the monumental remains agree with this, so far as they can check it; and the various arbitrary reductions that have been made on some periods are solely due to some critics preferring their internal sense to all the external facts. For the details involved in the chronology, see Historical Studies, II (British School of Archaeology in Egypt). The general outline of the periods is given here, and the detailed view of the connection with OT history is treated in later sections.

1st Age.—The prehistoric age begins probably about 8000 BC, as soon as there was a sufficient amount of Nile deposit to attract a settled population. The desert river valley of Egypt was probably one of the latest haunts of steatopygous palaeolithic man of the Bushman type. So soon as there was an opening for a pastoral or agricultural people, he was forced away by settlers from Libya. These settlers were clad in goatskins, and made a small amount of pottery by hand; they knew also of small quantities of copper, but mainly used flint, of which they gradually developed the finest working known in any age. They rapidly advanced in civilization. Their pottery of red polished ware was decorated with white clay patterns, exactly like the pottery still made in the mountains of Algeria. The forms of it were very varied and exquisitely regular, although made without the wheel. Their hardstone vases are finer than any of those of the historic ages. They adopted spinning, weaving and wood-work.

2d Age.—Upon these people came in others probably from the E., who brought in the use of the Arab face-veil, the belief in amulets, and the Pers lapis lazuli. Most of the previous forms of pottery disappear, and nearly all the productions are greatly altered. Copper became common, while gold, silver and lead were also known. Heliopolis was probably a center of rule.

3d Age.—About 5900 BC a new people came in with the elements of the art of writing, and a strong political ability of organization. Before 5800 BC they had established kings at Abydos in Upper

Egypt, and for 3 cents. they gradually increased their power. On the carved slates which they have left, the standards of the allied tribes

2. 3d Age: are represented; the earliest in style 1st and 2d shows the standard of Koptos, the next Dynasties has a standard as far N. as Hermopolis, and the latest bears the standard of Letopolis, and shows the conquest of the Fayum, or perhaps one of the coast lakes. This last is of the first king of the 1st Dynasty, Mena.

The conquest of all Egypt is marked by the beginning of the series of numbered dynasties beginning with Mena, at about 5550 BC. The civilization rapidly advanced. The art was at its best under the third king, Zer, and thence steadily declined. Writing was still ideographic under Mena, but became more syllabic and phonetic toward the end of the dynasty. The work in hardstone was at its height in the vases of the early part of the 1st Dynasty, when an immense variety of beautiful stones appear. It greatly fell off on reaching the 11d Dynasty. The tombs were all of timber, built in large pits in the ground.

4th Age.—The 11d Dynasty fell about 5000 BC, and a new power rapidly raised the art from an almost barbarous state to its highest 3. 4th Age: triumphs by about 4750 BC, when the 11d-VIth pyramid building was started. Khufu, Dynasties the builder of the Great Pyramid in the IVth Dynasty, was one of the greatest rulers of Egypt. He organized the administration on lines which lasted for ages. He reformed the religious system, abolishing the endowments, and substituting models for the sacrifice of animals. He trained the largest body of skilled labor that ever appeared, for the building of his pyramid, the greatest and most accurate structure that the world has ever seen. The statuary of this age is more lifelike than that of any later age. The later reigns show steady decay in the character of work, with less dignity and more superficiality in the art.

Great Pyramid of Khufu.

5th Age.—By about 4050 BC, the decline of Egypt allowed of fresh people pressing in from the N., probably connected with Crete. There are

4. 5th Age: few traces of these invaders; a curious VIIth- class of barbaric buttons used as seals XIVth are their commonest remains. Dynasties ably the so-called "Hyksos sphinxes" and statues are of these people, and belong to the time of their attaining power in Egypt. By 3600 BC, the art developed into the great ages of the XIth to the XIIth Dynasties which lasted about 2 cents. The work is more scholastic and less natural than before; but it is very beautiful and of splendid accuracy. The exquisite jewelry of Dahshur is of this age. After some centuries of decay this civilization passed away.

6th Age.—The Sem tribes had long been filtering into Egypt, and Bab Semites even ruled the land until the great migration of the Hyksos took place about 2700 BC. These tribes were ruled by kings entitled "princes of the desert," like

5. 6th Age: the Sem Absha, or Abishai, shown in the tomb of Beni-hasan, as coming to settle in Egypt. By 1700 BC the Berbers who had adopted the Egypt civilization pressed down from the S., and ejected the Hyksos rule. This opened the most flourishing period of Egypt history, the XVIIIth Dynasty, 1587-1328 BC. The profusion of painted tombs at Thebes, which were copied and popularized by Gardner Wilkinson, has made the life of this period very familiar to us. The immense temples of Karnak and of Luqsor, and the finest of the Tombs of the Kings have impressed us with the royal magnificence of this age. The names of Sheshenq I (Shishak) in 952 BC, the founder of the XXIIId Dynasty. His successors gradually decayed till the fall of the XXIIIId Dynasty in 721 BC. The Ethiopian XXVIth Dynasty then held Egypt as a province of Ethiopia, down to 664 BC.

7th Age.—It is hard to say when the next age began—perhaps with the Ethiopians; but it rose to importance with the XXVIth Dynasty under Psamtek (Psammitichos I), 664-610 BC, and continued under the well-known names of Necoh, Hophra and Amasis until overthrown by the Persians in 525 BC. From 405 to 342 the Egyptians were independent; then the Persians again crushed them, and in 332 they fell into the hands of the Macedonians by the conquest of Alexander.

OBELISK OF THOTHMES I.

Thothmes I and III, of the great queen Hatshepsut, of the magnificent Amenhotep III, and of the monotheist reformer Akhenaton are among those best known in the history. Their foreign connections we shall notice later.

The XIXth and XXth Dynasties were a period of continual degradation from the XVIIIth. Even in the best work of the 6th Age there is hardly ever the real solidity and perfection which is seen in that of the 4th or 5th Ages. But under the Ramessides cheap effects and showy imitations were the regular system. The great Rameses II was a great advertiser, but inferior in power to half a dozen kings of the previous dynasty. In the XXth Dynasty one of the royal daughters married the high priest of Amen at Thebes; and on the unexpected death of the young Rameses V, the throne reverted to his uncle Rameses VI, whose daughter then became the heiress, and her descendants, the high priests of Amen, became the rightful rulers. This priestly rule at Thebes, beginning in 1102 BC, was balanced by a purely secular rule of the north at Tanis (Zoan). These lasted until the rise of

The Macedonian Age of the Ptolemies was one of the richest and most brilliant at its start, but soon faded under bad rulers till it fell hopelessly to pieces and succumbed to the Rom subjection in 30 BC. From that time Egypt was ground by taxation, and steadily impoverished. By 300 AD it was too poor to keep even a copper currency in circulation, and barter became general. Public monuments entirely ceased to be erected, and Decius in 250 AD is the last ruler whose name was written in the old hieroglyphs, which were thenceforward totally forgotten. After three more cents. of increasing degradation and misery, the Arab invasion burst upon the land, and a few thousand men rode through it and cleared out the remaining effete garrisons of the empire in 641 AD.

8th Age.—The Arab invasion found the country exhausted and helpless; repeated waves of tribes poured in, and for a generation or two

7. 8th Age: there was no chance of a settlement. Arabic Gradually the majority of the inhabitants were pressed into Islam, and by about 800 AD a strong government was established from Bagdad, and Egypt rapidly advanced. In place of being the most impoverished country it became the richest land of the Mediterranean. The great period of mediaeval Egypt was under the guidance of the Mesopotamian civilization, 800-969 AD. The Tunisian dominion of the Fatimites, 969-1171, was less successful. Occasionally strong rulers arose, such as Salah-ed-Din (Saladin), but the age of the Mamlukes, 1250-1577, was one of steady decline. Under the Turkish dominion, 1517, Egypt was split up into many half-independent counties, whose rulers began by yielding tribute, but relapsed into ignoring the Caliphate and living in continual internal feuds. In 1771 Aly Bey, a slave, succeeded in conquering Syria. The French and British quarrel left Muhamed Aly to rise supreme, and to guide Egypt for over 40 years. Again Egypt conquered Syria, 1831-39, but was compelled by Europe to retreat. The opening of the Suez Canal (1869) necessarily led to the subjection of Egypt to European direction.

The foreign connections of Egypt have been brought to light only during the last 20 years. In 8. Early Foreign Connections. In place of supposing that Egypt was isolated until the Gr conquest, we now see that it was in the closest commercial relation with the rest of the world throughout its history. We have already noted the influences which entered by conquest. During the periods of high civilization in Egypt, foreign connections came into notice by exploration and by trade. The lazuli of Persia was imported in the prehistoric age, as well as the emery of Smyrna. In the 1st Dynasty, Egypt conquered and held Sinai for the sake of the turquoise mines. In the IIIrd Dynasty, large fleets of ships were built, some as much as 160 ft. long; and the presence of much pottery imported from Crete and the north, even before this, points to a Mediterranean trade. In the Vth Dynasty, King Unas had relations with Syria. From the XIIth Dynasty comes the detailed account of the life of an Egyptian in Pal (Sanehat); and Cretan pottery of this age is found traded into Egypt.

III. Old Testament Connections.—The Hyksos invasion unified the rule of Syria and Egypt, and

1. Semitic Connections. Syrian pottery is often found in Egypt of this age. The return of the wave, when Egypt drove out the Hyksos, and conquered Syria out to the Euphrates, was the greatest expansion of Egypt. Tahutmes I set up his statue on the Euphrates, and all Syria was in his hands. Tahutmes III repeatedly raided Syria, bringing back plunder and captives year by year throughout most of his reign. The number of Syrian artists and of Syrian women brought into Egypt largely changed the style of art and the standard of beauty. Amenhotep III held all Syria in peace, and recorded his triumphs at the Euphrates on the walls of the temple of Soleb far up in Nubia. His monotheist son, Amenhotep IV, took the name of Akhenaton, "the glory of the sun's disc," and established the worship of the radiant sun as the Aton, or Adon of Syria. The cuneiform letters from Tell el-Amarna place all this age before us in detail. There are some from the kings of the Amorites and Hittites, from Naharain and even Babylonia, to the great suzerain Amenhotep III. There is also the long series describing the gradual loss of Syria under Akhenaton, as written by the governors and chiefs, of the various towns. The main letters are summarized in the Students' History of Egypt, II, and full abstracts of all the letters are in Syria and Egypt, arranged in historical order.

Pal was reconquered by Seti I and his son Rameses II, but they only held about a third of the extent which formerly belonged to Amenhotep III. Merenptah, son of Rameses, also raided Southern Pal. After that, it was left alone till the raid of Sheshenq in 933 BC. The only considerable assertion of Egypt power was in Necho's two raids up to the Euphrates, in 609 and 605 BC. But Egypt generally held the desert and a few minor points along the south border of Pal. The Ptolemies seldom possessed more than that, their aspirations in Syria not lasting as permanent conquests. They were more successful in holding Cyprus.

Seti I.

We now come to the specific connections of Egypt with the OT. The movement of the family of

2. Abram. Abram from Ur in the south of Mesopotamia up to Haran in the north (Gen 11 31) and thence down Syria into Egypt (Gen 12 5, 10) was like that of the earlier Sem "princes of the desert," when they entered Egypt as the Hyksos kings about 2600 BC. Their earlier dominion was the XVth Dynasty of Egypt, and that was followed by another movement, the XVIth Dynasty, about 2250 BC, which was the date of the migration of Terah from Ur. Thus the Abramic family took part in the second Hyksos movement. The cause of these tribal movements has been partly explained by Mr. Huntington's researches on the recurrence of dry periods in Asia (Royal Geogr. Soc., May 26, 1910: The Pulse of Asia). Such lack of rain forces the desert peoples on to the cultivated lands, and then later famines are recorded. The dry age which pushed the Arab tribes on to the Mediterranean in 640 AD was succeeded by famines in Egypt during 6 cents. So as soon as Abram moved into Syria a famine pushed him on to Egypt (Gen 12 10). To this succeeded other famines in Canaan (Gen 26 1), and later in both Canaan and Egypt (Gen 41 56; 43 1; 47 13). The migration of Abram was thus conditioned by the general dry period, which forced the second Hyksos movement of which it was a part. The culture of the Hyksos was entirely nomadic, and agrees in all that we can trace with the patriarchal culture pictured in Gen.

Circumcision was a very ancient mutilation in Egypt, and is still kept up there by both Muslim and Christian. It was first adopted

3. Circumcision. by Abram for Ishmael, the son of the Egypt Hagar (Gen 16 3; 17 23), before Isaac was promised. Hagar married Ishmael to an Egyptian (Gen 21 21), so that the Ishmaelites, or Hagarenes, of Gilead and Moab were three-quarters Egyptian.

At Gerar, in the south of Pal, Egyptian was the prevailing race and language, as the general of Abimelech was Phichol, the Egypt name Pa-khal, "the Syrian," showing that the Gerarites were not Syrians.

The history of Joseph rising to importance as a capable slave is perfectly natural in Egypt at that time, and equally so in later periods down to our own days. That this occurred during the

4. Joseph Hyksos period is shown by the title given to Joseph—Abrek, (Abhrek) (Gen 41 43) which is Abarakhu, the high Bab title. The names Zaphnath-paaneah, Asenath, and Potipherah have been variously equated in Egyptian, Naville seeing forms of the XVIIIth Dynasty in them, but Spiegelberg, with more probability, seeing types of names of the XXIIId Dynasty or later. The names are most likely an expansion of the original document; but there is not a single feature or incident in the relations of Joseph to the Egyptians which is at all improbable from the history and civilization that we know. See JOSEPH.

The descent into Egypt and sojourn there are what might be expected of any Sem tribe at this time.

The allocation in Goshen (Gen 47 27) was the most suitable, as that was on the eastern border of the Delta, at the mouth of the Wady Tumilat, and was a district isolated from the general Egypt population. The whole of Goshen is not more than 100 sq. miles, being bounded by the deserts, and by the large Egypt city of Budastis on the W. The accounts of the embalming for 40 days and mourning for 70 days (Gen 50 3), and putting in a coffin (Gen 50 26) are exact. The 70 days' mourning existed both in the Ist Dynasty and in the XXth.

The oppression in Egypt began with a new king that knew not Joseph. This can hardly be other than the rise of the Berber conquerors who took the Delta from the Hyksos at the beginning of the XVIIIth Dynasty, 1582 BC, and expelled the Hyksos into Syria. It could not be later than this, as the period of oppression in Egypt is stated at 4 cents. (Gen 15 13; Acts 7 6), and the Exodus cannot be later than about 1220 BC, which leaves 360 years for the oppression. Also this length of oppression bars any much earlier date for the Exodus. The 360 years of oppression from 430 of the 7. The Historic Position Tumilat, both built by Rameses II as frontier defences. It is evident then that the serving with rigor was under that king, probably in the earlier part of his long reign of 67 years (1300–1234 BC), when he was actively campaigning in Pal. This is shown in the narrative, for Moses was not yet born when the rigor began (Ex 1; 2 2), and he grew up, slew an Egyptian, and then lived long in Midian before the king of Egypt died (Ex 2 23), perhaps 40 or 50 years after the rigorous servitude began, for he is represented as being 80 at the time of the Exodus (Dt 34 7). These numbers are probably not precise, but as a whole they agree well enough with Egypt history. After the king died, Moses returned to Egypt, and began moving to get his kin away to the eastern deserts, with which he had been well acquainted in his exile from Egypt. A harsher servitude ensues, which might be expected from the more vigorous reign of Merenptah, after the slackness of the old age of Rameses. The campaign of Merenptah against Israel and other people in Pal would not make him any less severe in his treatment of Semites in Egypt.

The plagues are in the order of usual seasonal troubles in Egypt, from the red unwholesome Nile in June, through the frogs, insects, hail and rain, locusts, and sandstorms in March. The death of the firstborn was in April at the Passover.

The date of the Exodus is indicated as being about 1200 BC, by the 4 cents. of oppression, and by the names of the land and the city of Rameses (Gen 47 4; cf Ex 1 11). The historical limit is that the Egyptians were incessantly raiding Pal down to 1194 BC, and then abandoned it till the invasion of Shishak. As there is no trace of these Egypt invasions during all the ups and downs of the age of the Judges, it seems impossible to suppose the Israelites entered Canaan till after 1194 BC. The setting back of the Exodus much earlier has arisen from taking three simultaneous histories of the Judges as consecutive, as we shall notice farther on. The facts stated above, and the length of all three lines of the priestly genealogies, agree completely with the Egypt history in putting the Exodus at about 1220 BC, and the entry into Canaan about 1180 BC.

The route of the Exodus was first a concentration at Raamses or Tell Rotab, in the Wady Tumilat, followed by a march to Succoth, a general name for the region of Bedawy booths; from there to Etham in the edge of the wilderness, about the modern Nefisheh. Thence they turned and encamped before Pi-hahiroth, the Egypt Pa-qaheret, a Serapeum. Thus turning S. to the W. of the Red Sea (which then extended up to Tell el-Maskhuta), they had a Migdol tower behind them and Baal-zephon opposite to them. They were thus "entangled in the land." Then the strong east wind bared the shallows, and made it possible to cross the gulf and reach the opposite shore. They then went "three days in the wilderness," the three days' route without water to Marah, the bitter spring of Hawara, and immediately beyond reached Elim, which accords entirely with the Wady Gharandel. Thence they encamped by the Red Sea. All of this account exactly agrees with the traditional route down the W. of the Sinaitic peninsula; it will not agree with any other route, and there is no reason to look for any different location of the march. See EXODUS, I.

The numbers of the Israelites have long been a difficulty. On the one hand are the census lists (Nu 1, 2 and 26), with their summaries of 600,000 men besides children and a mixed multitude (Ex 12 37, 38; 38 26; Nu 1 46; 11 21). On the other hand there are the exact statements of there being 22,273 firstborn, that is, fathers of families (Nu 3 43), and that 40,000 armed men entered Canaan with Joshua (Josh 4 13), also the 35,000 who fought at Ai (Josh 8 3, 12), and the 32,000 who fought against Midian (Jgs 7 3). Besides these, there are the general considerations total sojourn in Egypt, leaves 70 years of freedom there. As Joseph died at 110 (Gen 50 26), this implies that he was over 40 when his family came into Egypt, which would be quite consistent with the history.

that only 5,000 to 10,000 people could live in Goshen, that the Amalekites with whom the Israelites were equally matched (Ex 17 11) could not have exceeded about 5,000 in Sinai, that Moses judged all disputes, and that two midwives attended all the Israelite births, which would be 140 a day on a population of 600,000. Evidently the statements of numbers are contradictory, and the external evidence is all in accord with lesser numbers. Proposals to reduce arbitrarily the larger numbers have been frequent; but there is one likely line of misunderstanding that may have originated the increase. In the census lists of the tribes, most of the hundreds in the numbers are 400 or 500, others are near those, and there are none whatever on 000, 100, 800 or 900. Evidently the hundreds are independent of the thousands. Now in writing the statements, such as "Reuben, 46,500," the original list would be 46 'eleph, 5 hundred people, and 'eleph means either "thousands" or else "groups" or "families." Hence a census of 46 tents, 500 people, would be ambiguous, and a later compiler might well take it as 46,500. In this way the whole census of 598 tents, 5,550 people, would be misread as 603,550 people. The checks on this are, that the number per tent should be reasonable in all cases, that the hundreds should not fluctuate more than the tents between the first and last census, and that the total should correspond to the known populations of Goshen and of Sinai; these requirements all agree with this reading of the lists. The ulterior details apart from the Egyptian period are dealt with in Egypt and Israel, 45, 55. See Exodus, IV.

Two points need notice here as incidentally bearing on the Egypt connections: (1) the Israelites in Pal before the Exodus, indicated by 12. Israel Merenptah triumphing over them there in Canaan before 1230 BC, and the raids during the Egypt residence (1 Ch 7 21); (2) the triple history of the Judges, west, north, and east, each totaling to 120 years, in accord with the length of the four priestly genealogies (1 Ch 6 4-8.22-28.33-35.39-43.44-47), and showing that the dates are about 1220 BC the Exodus, 1180 BC the entry to Canaan, 1150 BC the beginning of Judges, 1030 BC Saul (Egypt and Israel, 52-58).

The connections with the monarchy soon begin.
 David and Joab attacked Edom (2 S 8 14), and Hadad, the young king, was carried

13. Hadad off by his servants to Egypt for safety.
 The Pharaoh who received and supported him must have been Siamen, the king of Zoan, which city was then an independent capital apart from the priest kings of Thebes (1 K 11 15-22). Hadad was married to the Egypt queen's sister when he grew up, probably in the reign of Pasebkhanu II.

The Pharaoh whose daughter was married to Solomon must have been the same Pasebkhanu; he reigned from 987-952 BC, and the marriage was about 970 in the middle of the reign. Another daughter of Pasebkhanu was Karamat, who was the wife of Shishak. Thus Solomon and Shishak married two sisters, and their aunt was queen of Edom. This throws light on the politics of the kingdoms. Probably Solomon had some child by Pharaoh's daughter, and the Egyptians would expect that to be the heir. Shishak's invasion, on the death of Solomon, was perhaps based upon the right of a nephew to the throne of Judah.

The invasion of Shishak (Egypt, Sheshenq) took place probably at the end of his reign. His troops were Lubim (Libyans), Sukkim (men 15. Shishak of Succoth, the east border) and Kushim (Ethiopians). The account of the war is on the side of the great fore-court at Karnak, which shows long lists of places in Judah, agreeing with the subjugation recorded in 1 K 14 25.26, and 2 Ch 12 2-4.

Zerakh, or Usarkon, was the next king of Egypt, the son of Karamat, Solomon's sister-in-law. He invaded Judah unsuccessfully in 903

16. Zerakh BC (2 Ch 14 9) with an army of Libyans and Sudanis (2 Ch 16 8). A statue of the Nile, dedicated by him, and naming his descent from Karamat and Pasebkhanu, is in the British Museum.

After a couple of cents. the Ethiopian kings intervened. Shabaka was appointed viceroy of Egypt by his father Piankhy, and is described

17. The by the Assyrians as Sibe, commander-Ethiopians in-chief of Muzri, and by the Hebrews as Sua or So, king of Egypt (2 K 17

4). Tirhakah next appears as a viceroy, and Hezekiah was warned against trusting to him (2 K 19 9). These two kings touch on Jewish history during their vicerealties, before their full reigns began. Necho next touches on Judah in his raid to Carchemish in 609 BC, when he slew Josiah for opposing him (2 K 23 29.30; 2 Ch 35 20-24).

After the taking of Jerus, for fear of vengeance for the insurrection of Ishmael (2 K 25 25.26; Jer

18. Tah- 40, 41, 42), the remnant of the Jews
 panhes fled to the frontier fortress of Egypt, Tahpanhes, Tehaphnehes, Gr Daphnae, mod. Defenneh, about 10 miles W. of the present Suez Canal (Jer 43 7-13). The brick pavement in front of the entrance to the fortress there, in which Jeremiah hid the stones, has been uncovered and the fortress completely planned. It was occupied by Greeks, who there brought Gr words and things into contact with the traveling Jews for a couple of generations before the fall of Jerus.

The prophecy that Hophra would be delivered to them that sought his life (Jer 44 30) was fulfilled, as he was kept captive by his successor,

19. Hophra Amasis, for 3 years, and after a brief attempt at liberty, he was strangled.

The account of the Jews settled in Egypt (Jer 44) is singularly illustrated by the Aram. Jewish papyri found at Syene (Aswan). These show the use of Aram. and of oaths by Yahu, as stated of 5 cities in Egypt (Isa 19 18). The colony at Syene was well-to-do, though not rich; they were householders who possessed all their property by regular title-deeds, who executed marriage settlements, and were fully used to litigation, having in deeds of sale a clause that no other deed could be valid. The temple of Yahu filled the space between two roads, and faced upon 3 houses, implying a building about 60 or 70 ft. wide. It was built of hewn stone, with stone columns, 7 gates, and a cedar roof. It was destroyed in 410, after lasting from before Cambyes in 525 BC, and a petition for rebuilding it was granted in 407.

The most flourishing period of the Jews in Egypt was when Oniah IV, the son of the rightful high priest

21. The New Jerusalem of Oniah Oniah, was driven from Jerus by the abolition of Jewish worship and ordinances under Antiochus. In 170 BC he fled to Egypt, and there established a new Jerus with a temple and sacrifices as being the only way to maintain the Jewish worship.

Oniah IV was a valiant man, general to queen Cleopatra I; and he offered to form the Jewish community into a frontier guard on the E. of Egypt, hating the Syrians to the uttermost, if the Jews might form their own community. They so dominated the eastern Delta that troops of Caesar could not pass from Syria to Alexandria without their assent. The new Jerus was 20 miles N. of Cairo, a site now known as Tell el-Yehudiyeh. The great mound of the temple still remains there, with the Passover ovens beneath it, and part of the massive stone fortifications on the front of it. This remained a stronghold of free Judaism until after Titus took Jerus; and it was only when the Zealots tried to make it a center of insurrection, that at last it was closed and fell into decay. Jos is the original authority for this history (see Egypt and Israel, 97-110).

The Jew in Egypt followed a very different development from the Bab Jew, and this Egypt type largely influenced Christianity. In the

22. The Egyptian Jew colony at Syene a woman named "Trust Yahveh" had no objection to swearing by the Egypt goddess Seti when making an Egypt contract; and in Jer 44 15-

19, the Jews boasted of their heathen worship in Egypt. Oniah had no scruple in establishing a temple and sacrifices apart from Jerus, without any of the particularism of the Maccabean zealots. Philo at Alexandria labored all his life for the union of Jewish thought with Gr philosophy. The Hermetic books show how, from 500 to 200 BC, religious thought was developing under eclectic influence of Egypt, Jewish, Pers, Indian and Gr beliefs, and producing the tenets about the second God, the Eternal Son, who was the Logos, and the types of Conversion, as the Divine Ray, the New Birth, and the Baptism. Later the Wisdom lit. of Alexandria, 200-100 BC, provided the basis of thought and simile on which the Pauline Epp. were built. The great wrench in the history of the church came when it escaped from the Bab-Jewish formalism of the Captivity, which ruled at Jerus, and grew into the wider range of ideas of the Alexandrian Jews. These ideas had been preserved in Egypt from the days of the monarchy, and had developed a great body of religious thought and phraseology from their eclectic connections. The relations of Christianity with Egypt are outside our scope, but some of them will be found in Egypt and Israel, 124-41.

The Egypt cities, places and peoples named in the OT may briefly be noted. AVEN (Ezk 30 17) or

23. Cities and Places Alphabetically ON (Gen 41 45) is the 'An of Egyptian, the Gr Heliopolis, now Matarieh, 7 miles N. of Cairo. It was the seat of prehistoric government, the royal emblems were kept there as the sacred relics of the temple, and its high priest was "the great seer," one of the greatest of the religious officials. The schools of Heliopolis were celebrated, and it seems to have always been a center of learning. The site is now marked by the great inclosure of the temple, and one obelisk of Senusert (XIIth Dynasty). It was here that the Egypt kings had at their installation to come and bathe in the lake in which the sun bathes daily, the 'Ainesh-Shems, or "Lake of the Sun" of the Arabs, connected with the fresh spring here which Christian tradition attributes to the visit of the Virgin and Child. The great sycamore tree here is the successor of that under which the Virgin is said to have rested.

BAAL-ZEPHON was a shrine on the eastern site of the head of the Red Sea, a few miles S. of Ismailiyeh; no trace is now known of it (Ex 14 2).

CUSHIM or Ethiopians were a part of the Egypt army of Shishak and of Usarkon (2 Ch 12 3; 16 8). The army was in 4 brigades, that of Ptah of Memphis, central Egypt; that of Amen of Thebes, Southern Egypt and Ethiopia; that of Set of the eastern frontier (Sukkim); and that of Ra, Heliopolis and the Delta.

GOSHEN was a fertile district at the west end of the Wady Tumilat, 40 to 50 miles N.E. of Cairo. It was bounded by the deserts on the N. and S.E., and by the Egypt city of Bubastis on the W. Its area was not over 100 sq. miles; it formerly supported 4,000 Bedawin and now about 12,000 cultivators.

LUBIM, the Libyans who formed part of the Egypt army as light-armed archers, from very early times.

MIGDOL is the name of any tower, familiar also as Magdala. It was applied to some watchtower on the W. of the Red Sea, probably on the high land above the Serapeum.

No is Thebes, in Assyr Nia, from the Egypt Nu, "the city." This was the capital of the XIIth Dynasty, and of the XVIIth-XXIst Dynasties. Owing to the buildings being of sandstone, which is not of much use for reworking, they have largely remained since the desolation of the city under Ptolemy X. The principal divisions of the site are: (1) Karnak, with the temple of the XIIth Dynasty, built over by all the successive kings of the XVIIIth Dynasty, and enlarged by Seti I and Ramesses II, and by Shishak, Tirhakah, and the Ptolemies. The whole temple of Amon and its subsidiary temples form the largest mass of ruins that is known. (2) Luqsor, the temple to commemorate the divine birth of Amenhotep III (1440 BC), added to by Ramesses II. (3) The funerary temples, bordering the western shore, of the kings of the XVIIIth to XXth Dynasties. These have mostly been destroyed, by the unscrupulous quarrying done by each king on the work of his predecessors; the only temple in fair condition is that of Ramesses III, which is left because no later king required its material for building. (4) The great cemetery, ranging from the splendid rock halls of the Tombs of the Kings, covered with paintings, down to the humblest graves. For any detailed account see either Baedeker's or Murray's Guides, or Weigall's Guide to Antiquities.

NOPH, the Egypt Men-nofer, Gr Memphis, now Mitraheny, 12 miles S. of Cairo. This was the capital from the foundation at the beginning of the dynasties. Thebes and Alexandria shared its importance, but it was the seat of government down to the Arab invasion. In Rom times it was as large as London N. of the Thames. The outlying parts are now all buried by the rise of the soil, but more than a mile length of ruins yet remains, which are now being regularly worked over by the British School. The heart of the city is the great metropolitan temple of Ptah, nearly all of which is now under 10 feet of soil, and under water most of the year. This is being excavated in sections, as it is all private property. At the north end of the ruins is the palace mound, on which has been cleared the palace of Apries (Hophra). Other temples have been located, as well as the foreign quarter containing early Gr pottery and the temple of Proteus named by Herodotus (see Memphis, I, II, III).

PATROS is the usual name for Upper Egypt in the prophets. It is the Egypt Pa-ta-res, "the south land."

PIBSETH is the Egypt Pa-Bast, Gr Bubastis, at the eastern side of the Delta, the city of the cat-headed goddess Bast. The ruins are still large, and the temple site has been excavated, producing sculptures from the IVth Dynasty onward.

PITHOM is the Egypt Pa-Tum, the city of the Sun-god Tum or Atmu, who was worshipped on the E. of the Delta. The site has remains of the fortress of Rameses II, built by the Israelites, and is now known as Tell el-Maskhuta, 11 miles W. of Ismailia.

RAAMES is the other city built by the Israelites, now Tell Rotāb, 20 miles W. of Ismailia. A walled camp existed here from early times, and the temple of Rameses was built on the top of the older ruins. A large part of the temple front is now at Philadelphia, excavated by the British School.

SIN is the Gr Pelusium, Assyri Siinu, Arab. Tineh, now some desolate mounds at the extreme E. coast of Egypt.

SUCCOTH was the district of "booths," the eastern part of the Wady Tumilat. It was written in Egypt Thuku and abbreviated to Thu in which form it appears as a Rom name. The people of Succoth were Sukkim, named in the army of Shishak (2 Ch 12 3).

SYENE, Heb Šwēnēh, mod. Aswan, the southern border town of Egypt at the Cataract. The greater part of the old town was on the island of Elephantine. There the Jewish papyri were found, and that was probably the Jewish settlement with the temple of Yahu. The town on the eastern bank—the present Aswan—was of less importance.

TAHPANES, TEHAPHNEES, Gr Daphnae, Arab. Tell Defeneh. This was the first station on the Syrian road which touched the Nile canals, about 10 miles W. of Kantara on the Suez Canal. It seems to have been founded by Psammetichus about 664 BC, to hold his Gr mercenaries. The fort, built by him, abounded in Gr pottery, and was finally desolated about 566 BC, as described by Herodotus. The fort and camp have been excavated; and the pavement described by Jeremiah (ch 43), as opposite to the entrance, has been identified.

ZOAN, Gr Tanis, Arab. San, is about 26 miles from the Suez Canal, and slightly more from the coast. The ruins of the temple are surrounded by the wall of Pasebckhanu, 80 ft. thick of brickwork, and a ring of town ruins rises high around it. The temple was built in the VIth Dynasty, adorned with many statues in the XIIth and XIIIth Dynasties, and under Rameses II had many large granite obelisks and statues, esp. one colossus of the king in red granite about 90 ft. high. It is probable that the Pharaoh lived here at the time of the Exodus.

IV. The Civilization.—We now turn to some outline of the civilization of the Egyptians. The lan-

1. Language—The language had primitive relations with the Sem and the Libyan. Perhaps one common stock has separated into three languages—Sem, Egypt and Libyan.

But though some basal words and grammar are in common, all the bulk of the words of daily life were entirely different in the three, and no one could be said to be derived from the other. Egypt, so far as we can see, is a separate language without any connection as close as that between the Indo-European group. From its proximity to Syria, Sem loan words were often introduced, and became common in the XVIIIth Dynasty and fashionable in the XIXth. The language continually altered, and decayed in the later periods until Coptic is as different from it as Italian is from Latin.

The writing was at first ideographic, using a symbol for each word. Gradually, signs were used phonetically; but the symbol, or some

2. Writing—emblem of the idea of the word, continued to be added to it, now called a determinative. From syllabic signs purely alphabetic signs were produced by clipping and decay, so that by 1000 to 500 BC the writing was almost alphabetic. After that it became modified by the influence of the short Gr alphabet, until by 200 AD it was expressed in Gr letters with a few extra signs. The actual signs used were elaborate pictures of the objects in the early times, and even down to the later periods very detailed signs were carved for monumental purposes. But as early as the Ith Dynasty a very much simplified current hand had been started, and during the pyramid period this became hardly recognizable from the original forms. Later on this current hand, or hieratic, is a study by itself and was written much more fully than the hieroglyphs on monuments, as its forms were so corrupt that an ample spelling was needed to identify the word. By about 800 BC begins a much shortened set of signs, still more remote from their origins, known as demotic, which continued as the popular writing till Rom times. On public decrees the hieroglyphic and demotic are both given, showing that a knowledge of one was useless for reading the other, and that they were separate studies.

The literature begins during the pyramid period, before 4000 BC, with biographies and collections of maxims for conduct; these show well-

3. Literature—regulated society, and would benefit any modern community in which they were followed. In the XIIth Dynasty tales appear, occupied with magic and foreign travel and wonders. A long poem in praise of the king shows very regular versification and system, of the type of Ps 136, the refrain differing in each stanza and being probably repeated in chorus, while the independent lines were sung by the leader. In the XVIIIth Dynasty, tales of character begin to develop and show much skill, long annals were recorded, and in the XIXth Dynasty there is an elaborate battle poem describing the valor of Rameses II. At about 700 BC there is a considerable tale which describes the quarrels of the rival chiefs, and the great fight regulated like a tournament by which the differences were settled. Such are the principal literary works apart from business documents.

The religion of Egypt is an enormous subject, and that by which Egypt is perhaps most known. Here

4. Four Views of Future Life—we can only give an outline of the growth and subdivisions of it. There never was any one religion in Egypt during historic times. There were at least four religions, all incompatible, and all believed in at once in varying degrees. The different religions can best be seen apart by their incongruity regarding the future life.

(1) The dead wandered about the cemetery seeking food, and were partly fed by the goddess in the sycamore tree. They therefore needed to have plates of food and jars of water in the tomb, and provided perpetually by their descendants in front of the doorway to the grave. The deceased is represented as looking out over this doorway in one case. Here came in the great principle of substitution. For the food, substitute its image which cannot decay, and the carved table of offerings results. For the farmstead of animals, substitute its carved image on the walls and the animal sculptures result. For the life of the family, substitute their carved figures doing all that was wanted, sacrificing and serving, and the family sculptures result. For the house, substitute a model upon the grave, and the pottery soul-houses appear with their furniture and provisions. For the servants, put their figures doing household work, and their service is eternal. For the master himself, put the most lifelike image that can be made, and his soul will occupy that as a restful home fitted for it. This principle is still believed in. Funeral offerings of food are still put even in Muslim graves, and a woman will visit a grave, and, removing a tile, will walk through a hole to her dead husband.

(2) The dead went to the kingdom of Osiris, to which only the good were admitted, while the evil were rejected, and consumed either by monsters or by fire. This heavenly kingdom was a complete duplicate of the earthly life. They planted and reaped, sported and played. And as the Egypt felicity consisted in making others work for them, so each man was provided with a retinue of serfs to cultivate the land for him. These ushabti figures in later times usually number 400, and often 1 in 10 of them is clad as an overseer. A special chapter of the Book of the Dead is to be recited to animate them, and this, more or less abbreviated, is often inscribed upon the figures.

(3) The dead joined the company of the immortal gods, who float on the heavenly ocean in the boat of the sun. With them they have to face the terrors of the hours of the night when the sun goes through the underworld. Long charms and directions are needed for safety in this passage, and these form a large part of the funerary texts, esp. on the Tombs of the Kings in the XVIIIth-XXIst Dynasties. To reach the boat of the sun a boat must be provided in the tomb, with its sailors and sails and oars. Such are frequent from the VIth-XIIIth Dynasties.

(4) The dead were carried off by the Hathor cow, or a bull, to wait for a bodily resurrection. In order to preserve the body for some life after the present age, each part must be protected by an appropriate amulet; hence dozens of different amulets were placed on the body, esp. from about 600-400 BC.

Now it will be seen that each of these beliefs contradicts the other three, and they represent, therefore, different religious origins.

The mythology is similarly diverse, and was unified by uniting analogous gods. Hence when we see the compounds such as Ptah-Sokar-Osiris, or Amen-Ra or Osiris-Khentamenti, it is clear that each god of the compound belongs to a different religion, like Pallas-Athene or Zeus-Labrandeus, in Gr compounds. So far as we can at present see, the gods linked with each of the beliefs about the soul are as follows:

5. Four Groups of Gods

(1) The soul in the tombs and cemetery.—With this belief belong the animal gods, which form the earliest stratum of the religion; also Sokar the god of "Silence," and Mert Sokar, the "Lover of Silence," as the gods of the dead. With this was allied a belief in the soul sometimes going to the west, and hence Khent-amenti, a jackal-headed god, "he who is in the west," became the god of the dead.

(2) The soul in the heavenly kingdom.—Osiris is the lord of this kingdom, Isis his sister-wife, Horus their son, Nebhat (Nephthys) the sister of Isis, and Set her husband. Set also was regarded as coequal with Horus. This whole mythology results probably from the fusion of tribes who were originally monotheistic, and who each worshipped one of these deities. It is certain that the later parts of this mythology are tribal history, regarded as the victories and defeats of the gods whom the tribes worshipped.

(3) The soul in the sun-boat.—Ra was the Sun-god, and in other forms worshipped as Khepera and Atmu. The other cosmic gods of the same group are Nut, the heaven, and her husband Geb, the earth; Shu, space, and his sister Tefnut. Anher the Sky-god belongs to Upper Egypt.

(4) The mummy with amulets, preserved for a future life.—Probably to this group belong the gods of principles, Hathor the female principle; Min the male principle; Ptah the architect and creator of the universe; his spouse Maat, abstract truth and justice.

Foreign gods frequently appear also in Egypt, mostly from Syria. Two importations were of great effect. Aton the radiant energy of the sun, the Adon or "lord," Adonai, Adonis, was introduced as a sole deity by Akhenaton 1380 BC, and all other gods were proscribed. This was a strictly rational and scientific religion, attributing all life and power to the action of the sun's rays; but it only lasted 20 years in Egypt, and then vanished. The other important worship was that of Zeus Sarapis. The Zeus statue is said to have been imported from Sinope by Ptolemy I, but the Sarapis was the god of Memphis, Osarhapi, the Osiris form of the Hapi bull. The Egyptian worshipped his old gods; the Greek was satisfied with Zeus; and both nations united in adoring Zeus Sarapis. The temples and ritual are too wide a subject to touch in our present space; but the essential principle was that of providing a banquet for the god, and feasting in his temple, not that of an expiatory sacrifice or burnt offering, which is Semitic.

The laws are but little known until the late Gr accounts. Marriage was usual with a sister, but this may have been with a half-sister,

7. Laws as among the Greeks and early Hebrews. Polygamy was unusual, but was legal, as many as six wives being represented in one instance. Kings of course had unlimited harems. Divorce was unusual, but was probably easy. In Coptic times a marriage contract provides for divorce by either party, on paying six times the marriage gift. Property was strictly guarded.

The national character was easygoing, kindly, never delighting in torture like the Assyrians and

8. Character Romans, but liable to be too slack and careless—as at present. Firmness, decision and fortitude were held up as the leading virtues. The structure of society, the arts and the industries are outside of the scope of this article.

Reference to this Egyptian and to the suppression of his rebellion by the procurator Felix is likewise found in Jos (Ant, XX, viii, 6; BJ, II, xiii, 5).

EHI, ē'hī (עִי, 'ēhī): Apparently a contracted form (Gen 46 21). See AHIRAM.

EHUD, ē'hud (עֲהֻד, 'ēhūdḥ, "united," "strong"): A Benjamite, son of Gera, deliverer of Israel from oppression by Moab (Jgs 3 15-30). Gaining access alone to the presence of King Eglon under pretence of a secret errand connected with the payment of Israel's tribute, Ehud, a left-handed man, drew the sword he had concealed upon his right side, and thrust the king through. He locked the doors of the upper chamber after him, made his escape, and with the Israelites overcame Moab at the fords of the Jordan, slaying some 10,000. Ehud's name occurs again in the Benjamite genealogy (1 Ch 7 10).

EITHER, ē'thēr, i'thēr: Often in the sense still common, "one or the other" (1 Ch 21 21; Mt 6 24, etc), but also in the obs sense of "both" or "each" (Lev 10 1; 1 K 7 15; Jn 19 18; Rev 22 2), or in place of (RV) "or" (Lk 6 42; 15 8; Phil 3 12; Jas 3 12).

EKER, ē'kēr (עֵקֶר, 'ēker, "root"): A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2 27).

EKREBEL, ek'rē-bel (Ἐκρεβήλ, Ekrebēl): Appears only in Jth 7 18. It lay on the brook Mochmur, S. of Dothan. It is identical with Akrabbein, of which Onom speaks as the capital of the district of Akrabattine. It corresponds to the mod. Akrabeh, 8 miles S.E. of Nāblus.

EKRON, ek'ron, EKRONITE, ek'ron-it (עֲקֵרֹן, 'ekrōn, "migration," "rooting out"; Ἀκκαρόν, Akkarōn): The most northerly of the chief cities of the Philis. It was not subdued by Joshua (13 3) but was allotted, in the division of the land, first to Judah and then to Dan (15 11.45.46; 19 43). It was taken by Judah (Jgs 1 18). The people of E. are prominent in the story of the ark in the land of the Philis. It was they who proposed to have it sent back to Israel (1 S 5 10; 6 16.17). After the defeat of the Philis, when David killed Goliath, the Israelites pursued them to the gates of E., which was evidently the nearest walled town in which the fugitives could take refuge (17 52). It was the seat of the worship of the god Baalzebub, as appears in the account of the sickness and death of Ahaziah (2 K 1 2.3.6.16). It is included among other cities in the denunciations of Amos (1 8) and of Jeremiah (25 20). Zephaniah declares that it shall be rooted up (2 4), and Zechariah speaks of its consternation at the fall of Tyre (9 5.7). From the Assy records we learn that it revolted against Sennacherib and expelled Padi, the governor he had placed over it, and sent him to Hezekiah, at Jerus, for safe keeping. Sennacherib marched against it and E. called in the aid of the king of Mutsri, formerly supposed to be Egypt but now regarded by some scholars as a district of Northwestern Arabia. Sennacherib raised the siege of E. to defeat this army, which he did at Eltekeh, and then returned and took the city by storm and put to death the leaders of the revolt and carried their adherents into captivity. He then compelled Hezekiah to restore Padi, who was once more made governor. This affair led to the famous attack of Sennacherib on Hezekiah and Jerus (Rawl., Anc. Mon., II, 159). E. is mentioned in 1 Macc 10 89 as being given by Alexander Balas to Jonathan Maccabaeus, and it appears in the accounts of the first Crusade.

EL. See GOD, NAMES OF.

ELA, ē'la (Ἠλᾶ, Ēlā, 1 Esd 9 27):

(1) Same as Elam (Ezr 10 26).

(2) Father of Shimei (1 K 4 18, AV "Elah"). See ELAH, 2.

ELADAH, el'a-da. See ELEADAH.

ELAH, ē'la (Ἠλᾶ, 'elāḥ, "oak" or "terebinth"):

(1) A "duke" or "sheik" (head of a clan, RV "chief") of Edom (Gen 36 41).

(2) Shimei-ben-Elah, Solomon's commissary in Benjamin (1 K 4 18 AV).

(3) A son of Caleb the son of Jephunneh (1 Ch 4 15).

(4) Father of Hoshea, last king of Israel (2 K 15 30; 17 1).

(5) A Benjamite, son of Uzzi, one of the chiefs of the tribes when the country was settled (1 Ch 9 8).

(6) King of Israel. See next article.

ELAH, ē'la. Son of Baasha, fourth king of Israel (1 K 16 6-14). He reigned two years, 888-887 BC. The statement that he came to the throne in the 26th year of Asa, reigned two years, and died in the 27th year of Asa, illustrates the Heb method of synchronizing the reigns of the kings of Israel and Judah (cf 1 K 15 33; 16 8). Elah appears to have been a debauchee. While he was drinking himself drunk in the house of Azra, his chamberlain, Zimri, one of his military leaders, conspired against him and murdered him. According to Jos (VIII, xii, 4) he took advantage of the absence of the army, which was at Gibbethon, to kill Elah. The extirpation of the royal family followed the murder of the king. Baasha's dynasty had its origin in a murder and it ended in a murder. The government had no stability. These revolutions illustrate the truth that "they who take the sword shall perish with the sword."

ELAH, VALE OF (עֵמֶק הָאֵלָה, 'emek hā-'elāḥ, "valley of the terebinth"; ἡ κοιλάς Ἠλᾶ, hē kōilās Ēlā; Α, τῆς δρυός, tēs druós): The scene of the events of 1 S 17 2 ff, referred to also in 1 S 21 9. There can be no doubt that this is the Wady es Sunf ("valley of the terebinth"), or part of it. This is the southernmost of the great valleys which cut through the Shephelah. Commencing near Hebron, close to Beit Sûr, it descends under the name Wady es Sûr in a more or less northerly direction until near Beit Nettif where it turns abruptly west and receives the name Wady es Sunf. Here it is joined by the Wady en Najûl, coming from the N., and from the E. by the Wady el-Jindy, down which descends an ancient road from Bethlehem. Where all these valleys coalesce the Wady eş Şunţ expands into a wide and level bottom, half a mile across. On a steep hill to the southern side and a little S.E. of the wide expanse is Kh. esh-Shuweikeh, the site of Socoh. That the great events of 1 S 17 2 ff took place here there can be no doubt: the Philis ranged themselves upon the southern hills; the Israelites to the N. or N.E. Upon the wide level valley the contest with Goliath occurred. The exact position of Saul's forces may be a matter of speculation, but the late Principal Miller of Madras, who made a special study of the locality (Least of All Lands, ch v), considered that the little valley ascending N.E. from Wady eş Şunţ to Beit Nettif was probably the actual Vale of Elah and that here the Israelites had their fortifications. His elucidation of the whole story is most convincing.

LITERATURE

A well-known tract, partly mountainous, whose western boundary, starting on the N.E. side of the Pers Gulf, practically followed the course of the lower Tigris. It was bounded on the N. by Media, on the E. by Persia and on the W. by Babylonia. The Assyro-Babylonians called the tract Ēlamtu, expressed ideographically by the Sumerian characters for Nimma or Numma, which seems to have been its name in that language. As Numma or Elam apparently means "height," or the like, these names were probably applied to it on account of its mountainous nature. Another name by which it was known in early times was Ashshan, for Anshan or Anzan (Anzhan), one of its ancient cities. The great capital of the tract, however, was Susa (Shushan), whence its Gr name of Susiana, interchanging with Elymais, from the Sem Elam.

Elam consisted of a plain occupying a depression in the mountains of Iran or Persia. Of this the smaller part—which, however, was also the most ancient historically—lay between the Pusht-e-Kuh on the W., the Lur mountains on the N., the Bakhtiari heights to the E. and S.E., and the hills of Ahwaz to the S. The larger plain has as its northern boundary these same Ahwaz hills, and reaches to the sea on the S.

The Pusht-e-Kuh mountains are a series of very high parallel ranges described as "a veritable wall" between Mesopotamia and the elevated depression of the Kerkha. Its principal peak is in the Kebir-Kuh (2,500 meters=8,200 ft.)—a difficult range of surprising regularity. The valleys on the S.W. slope belong properly to Babylonia, and could be invaded on that side with ease, but N.E. of the Kebir-Kuh the country is well protected not only against Mesopotamia, on the W., but also against Persia on the E. The nomad Lurs of the present day are practically independent of Persia. The mountain ranges of Luristan increase in height as one approaches the Pers plain, the loftiest summits of the principal range attaining a height of 5,000 meters (=16,400 ft.).

From these mountain ranges descend large rivers which flow through Elam to the sea. The Kerkha (Gamas-āb) rises in the Pers plain near Nehāvend, and is practically a torrent until it reaches Susa, below which it becomes less rapid, and loses itself in the Hawizeh marshes. The Ab-e-Diz, a river with a greater volume of water, is formed by the uniting of two streams above Dizful. It is so violent that it carries down boulders and even tree-trunks from the mountains, and after a winding course joins the Kārun at Kut-e-Bende-Kir. The Belād-Rud, between the Ab-e-Diz and the Kerkha, rises in the mountains of Luristan, and varies greatly as to its volume, being sometimes a mere brook, and at others a large river. The Kārun, with which a number of small streams unite, rises in the Bakhtiari mountains. After receiving the Ab-e-Diz and the Belād-Rud at Kut-e-Bende-Kir, it becomes an important waterway, navigable as far as Shuster. This is identified with the Bib. Ulai (Assyr Ulāa, classical Eulaeus). Anciently emptying itself into the Pers Gulf, which in past cents. extended much farther inland than now, it at present joins the Shatt-el-Arab at Mohammerah.

The climate is a variable one. Between November 1 and 15 the rains begin, with S.E. and S. winds, and the mountains are covered with snow. In January and February there are violent storms, and the night brings 8° or 10° of frost. Spring begins at the end of February, and vegetation advances so rapidly that harvest takes place about the end of April. The wind then turns S. and S.W., bringing with it a heat rising sometimes to 140° F., destroying all the verdure of the country. Notwithstanding the rigors of the climate, however, it was anciently a well-populated district, and exceedingly fruitful, as now. That the district of Arabistan is poor and barren is due to the carelessness and improvidence of the people, who, like the people of the Turkish province of Bagdad, have neglected the ancient irrigation canals which fertilized the land.

The vegetation of Susiana is said not to be very varied. On the river banks are to be found willows, tamarisks and many kinds of acacias. Apparently there are no forests—the sacred groves referred to by Aššur-bani-āpli are thought by De Morgan to have been artificial plantations. Oranges and lemons, which are at present cultivated there, are late importations. The date palm has been brought from the banks of the Shatt-el-Arab, and the pomegranate and other fruit trees from the Iranian plain. Wheat and barley, sown in October and November, are harvested in April. Sorghum remains in the ground all through the dry season, and is watered artificially until October, and cut in November. Castor beans, indigo, lentils, haricots, etc., are less cultivated.

The fauna is said at present to be less numerous than formerly. It contains species both of central Asia, Europe, and, to a certain extent,

7. Fauna Africa. The elephant, wild ass, wild ox and ostrich are no longer to be found on the Chaldeo-Elamite plain, but a few examples of the lion still exist there. Bears, panthers, wild boars, wolves, wild cats, foxes, jackals, and several species of wild dogs, however, still exist. Numbers of porcupines inhabit the brushwood by the rivers and marshes. Among the birds which do not leave the country are the eagle, vulture, falcon, raven, francolin, martin, sparrow, tomtit, wagtail, etc. The winter birds of passage are the pelican, stork, crane, cormorant, sea gull, many species of wild duck, the wild goose, bustard, woodcock, snipe, pigeon, turtledove, and numerous brilliantly colored waders. The water-courses are full of fish, among them being the barbel, silurus, carp (sometimes of great size), and gurnards similar to those of the Nile. Some of the rivers being salt, sea fish are also to be found, and it is not rare to see sharks at Shuster, and eels in the lower Kārun.

The population is naturally not homogeneous. Arab tribes, who are in reality Semites, occupy the plains, while Iranians inhabit the cities

8. The Population and dwell at the mountain bases. According to De Morgan, the original population was mainly negritic, and has mingled with the Arab stock to such an extent that mulattoes among them are not rare. He regards this type as being represented among the soldiers as well as among the people conquered by Naram-Sin about 3000 BC. Nevertheless pure Semites had settled in the country at a very early date, and it is probably on account of this that Elam is called (Gen 10 22) a son of Shem—indeed, the many Sem inscriptions found by the Fr. explorers at Susa show how strong their influence was. It was to all appearance during the 2d millennium BC that certain Kassites overran W. Mesopotamia, and settled in the northern part of Elam, which was thereafter called by the Assyrians māt Kaššī, “the land of the Cossaeans.” As these people seem to have spoken an Aryan language, there was apparently no really new race introduced in consequence of their invasion.

The two principal cities were Susa or Shushan, called Susun in the native texts, and regarded as the

9. The Principal Cities old capital, situated on the Ulai (Kārkha); and Anzan (Ashshan, Anshan), more to the S.W. This latter was the capital of Cyrus the Great and his immediate predecessors, the tract having been conquered apparently by Šišpiš (Teispes), his ancestor, at the end of the 6th cent. BC. Susa, an important commercial center in the 3d millennium BC, became again one of the three capitals of the Pers empire during the rule of the Achaemenians.

From the inscriptions of Mal-Amir, to the E., we learn that that was the place of another kingdom called Apirti, the land of the Apharsites of Ezr 4 9. In the 2d (so-called Median or Scythian) version of the late Pers inscriptions this name is given as Hapirti, Halpirti, and Haltupirti, and appears as the equivalent of the Bab Elammāt (Elamtu) or Elam without the nominative ending. In the Pers version this appears as (Huwaja or (Huwazha, whence the modern Ház or Khuzistan. This implies that the kings of Apirti at one time held dominion over Susa, and perhaps the whole of Elam. Strabo (xi.13.3,6), quoting Nearchus, speaks of “four bandit nations” who occupied the mountains E. of the Euphrates—the Amardians or Mardians on the Pers border, the Uxians, and Elymeans on the borders of Persia and Susa, and the Cossaeans (Kassites) by the Medes. The Amardians would seem to have been the Apirti (Hapirti), the Uxians were probably from (Huwaja, while the Elymeans (cf 1 Macc 6 1) were the Elamites. Among the tribes who made the history of the country, therefore, were probably the Uxians, who seem not to be mentioned in the early inscriptions.

The dialects of Susa, the second Achaemenian VSS, and of Apirti, differ but slightly from each other. They are variants of an agglutinative tongue, and are apparently

11. The Languages of Elam not related to any other known language. The statement in Gen 10 22, therefore, applies only to the Sem section of the population, as it is unlikely that the people speaking Apirtian could be described as “sons of Shem.”

(1) The earliest period.—Beginning with the semi-mythical period, we have the story of the fight of the Bab hero Gilgames with the Elam-

12. History ite tyrant Humbaba, who was defeated by the hero and his helper Enki-du, and beheaded. The earliest really historical reference to the Elamites as the foes of Babylonia, however, is apparently that contained in a letter from the priest Lu-enna to the priest En-e-tarzi announcing that the Elamites had invaded Lagaš and carried off considerable booty. The writer, however, had attacked the Elamites, and taken plunder from them in his turn. As there seems to be a reference to division of spoil, this is an excellent parallel to the Elamite expedition, made in alliance with the Babylonians, against the cities of the plain (Gen 14).

(2) Sargon of Agadé and his successors.—Sargon of Agadé, early in his reign, attacked the Elamites, but apparently Elam only fell under the dominion of the Babylonians during the time of Naram-Sin, his son, who is seemingly shown leading his troops in that region on the splendid stele bearing his name that was found at Susa. Elam apparently regained its independence, however, during the time of Uruwuš, king of Kiš, who invaded the country, and brought back considerable spoil. One of the chiefs of Susa about this time was Šimbi-išhak. Chaldaean domination, however, did not last long, for Dungi, king of Ur of the Chaldees, about 2500 BC, invaded the country, accompanied by his vassal Gudea, viceroy of Lagaš. Dungi has left evidences of his conquests in the buildings which he erected at Susa, but the principal buildings of this period were constructed by Ba-ša-Šušinak, son of Šimbi-išhak, viceroy of Susa and potentate in Elam. He built a temple to the god Šugu, reservoirs, the gate of Šušinak, and dug the Sidur canal. He was evidently one of the great rulers of the land.

(3) The suzerainty of the kings of Ur.—Somewhat later came Idadu I, his son Kal-Ruhurati, and his grandson Idadu II, who in turn occupied the throne during the time of Būr-Sin, king of Ur. Elam was at this time still under Bab suzerainty, which continued under his successor, Gimil-Sin, who also built at Susa, his vassal being Ebarti-kin-Daddu, viceroy of Susa. Gimil-Sin was succeeded by his son Ibi-Sin as overlord in Elam, who invaded and devastated the country, probably to suppress a revolt. There was apparently no ill-will between the two nations, however, for the viceroy of Susa is said to have married a daughter of Ibi-Sin. Another and possibly later viceroy seems to have married Mekubi, daughter of Billama, viceroy of Ašnunak, who, as Elamite princess, erected buildings at Susa.

Naram-Sin.

(4) Elam becomes predominant 2280 BC.—It was probably shortly after this that Kudur-Nahhunte threw off the Sem yoke, and, invading Babylonia, brought back much spoil to Elam. The date indicated for this ruler by the inscriptions of Aššurbani-āpli is 2280 BC. The positions of the rulers of Elam and Babylonia were now changed, and the kings of Babylon had to acknowledge Elamite suzerainty. As Elamite and Bab sovereign, Kudur-Nahhunte intrusted Susa to a feudatory ruler, and among the viceroys who governed Elam may be mentioned Širukdu', who constructed at Susa, and Temti-Agun, his sister's son, who built in that city the temple to Išme-karab, "for the health of Kutir-Nahhunte and his family." After passing to other rulers, the government of Susa fell to Ebari, father of Šilhaha, during whose reign Simti-Šilhak ruled in Babylonia. Nūr-Addi and Rīm-Anum, kings of Larsa (Elassar), were his vassals.

(5) The extension of Elamite authority westward.—Attapakšu (or Attahušu), Šilhaha's sister's son, then became "shepherd of Susa." Among the temples which he built was one dedicated to the goddess Narute, and he erected a bridge near his residence. Kudur-mabuk, son of Simti-Šilhak, was at this time adda ("father," probably meaning protector) of Ermutbālu and the W.—Amurru, the land of the Amorites, whither marched Chedorlaomer and Amraphel, with their allies, in the time of Abraham (Gen 14). Kudur-mabuk of Larsa was succeeded by his son Eri-Aku (probably the Iri-Agun of Larsa of the Elamite texts), and if he be really, as seems probable, the Arioch of Gen 14 1,9, then this is also the period when Chedorlaomer ruled in Elam. The strange thing, however, is, that the name of this last does not occur in any recognizable form, unless it be the Kudurlahgumal of certain half-legendary inscriptions (see CHEDORLAOMER). The Elamite line in Larsa was continued after the death of Eri-Aku by Rīm-Sin, his brother, who succeeded him.

(6) Babylonia again supreme.—What the history of Elam during this period was remains to be discovered, but Hammurabi, who is identified with the Amraphel of Gen 14 1,9, seems to have invaded the country in his 30th year. In his 31st he defeated Rīm-Sin of Larsa, following this up, in his 32d, by overthrowing the army of Ašnunak. All these successes in Elam and its dependencies probably made the kingdom of Babylon supreme in the land. But more details bearing upon this period are needed. It is thought probable that the Elamite king Sadi(?) or Taki(?) came into conflict with, and was defeated by, Ammi-šaduga, the 4th in descent from Hammurabi, who reigned about 1890 BC. Apparently the Elamite ruler had tried to regain his independence, but failed.

(7) Hurpatila's challenge to Kuri-galzu.—Omitting the names of rulers concerning whom but little or nothing is known, we come to the reign of Untaš-Gal, patron of the arts. Numerous temples were built by him, and sanctuaries at Susa dedicated. He has left a magnificent bronze statue representing his queen Napir-Asu. He seems to have been overthrown by Untaš-Gal, of a more legitimate line, who was likewise a builder of temples. After the apparently short reign of Kidin-Ĥutran came that of Hurpatila (Hurpatila), who, desiring to throw off the Babylonian yoke, challenged Kuri-galzu, king of Babylon, to battle at Dūr-Dungi. The challenge was accepted, with disastrous results, for Hurpatila was captured by the Bab king at the place named. This, however, did not put an end to the strife, and in the end Kidin-Ĥutrudaš was victorious over Bēlnadin-šum, king of Babylon, about 1180 BC.

(8) Elam again supreme.—Later came the military exploits of Šutruk-Nahhunte, who invaded Babylonia, slew the king Zagaga-šum-iddina, and helped by his son Kutir-Nahhunte, destroyed Sippar, and took away the stele of Naram-Sin, the code of Hammurabi, and several other monuments, which were carefully preserved at Susa. He also defeated the king of Ašnunak. It is this collection of spoils which has contributed to make the success of the Fr. excavations at Susa what it is.

(9) Elam again defeated, but recovers.—The war between Babylonia and Elam recorded for the reign of Nebuchadrezzar I (c 1020 BC) probably took place, according to Scheil, during the reign of Šilhina-šamru-Laqamar. The Elamite king was defeated on the banks of the Ulai, Elam was ravaged, and much spoil taken. The principality called Namar was detached from Susian territory and reunited to the domain of Babylonia. Apparently the Elamites now turned their attention to regaining their military prestige, the result being that an Elamite king occupied the Bab throne from 939 to 934 BC. The history of this period has still to be discovered, but the Babylonians apparently soon shook off the Elamite yoke. It is about this time, however, that another power—Assyria—appeared on the scene, and took the field—not only against Babylon, but also on the borders of Elam. An Elamite contemporary of Nabonassar of Babylon was Humbanigaš, 742 BC.

(10) The conflict between Elam and Assyria.—At this time, however, the Assyrians became dominant in Babylonia (see TIGLATH-PILESER and SHALMANESER), but it was probably not until the reign of Sargon of Assyria (see SARGON) that Elam came into conflict with Assyria. Merodach-baladan, a pretendant to the throne of Babylon, made common cause with Humbanigaš, who fought with the Assyrian army at Dêr. Naturally the Assyrians claim the victory, but the Babylonians say that they were defeated. After the death of Humbanigaš, his successor, Šutur-Nahhundi or Istar-hundu (Bab), still befriended Merodach-baladan, and advanced to his help. Sargon first attacked the Chaldeans and defeated them at Dûr-Athara, and, entering Elam, stormed and captured the cities of the land. The Elamite king took refuge in the mountains, and Merodach-baladan had to resist the Assyrians unaided.

geance, for Sennacherib invaded and ravaged the country from Râš to Bit-Burnaki. Apparently the Elamites had expected their new ruler, Kudurru (Kudur-Nahhunte), to save them from the reprisals of the Assyrians, but as he had failed to do this, he, in his turn, was deposed and killed after a reign of 10 months. The new king of Elam was Umman-Menanu, who espoused the cause of Mušêzib-Marduk, the new king of Babylon, and gathering a force of Babylonians and Elamites at Halulê, fought a battle there, in which the Babylonians record success for the allies. Sennacherib, however, himself claims the victory, and describes with great wealth of detail the horrors of the fight. Next year (689 BC) Sennacherib marched into Babylonia to complete the work, and Mušêzib-Marduk, having been

THE INSTALLATION OF UMMANIGAŠ.

(11) Sennacherib against Chaldaea and Elam.—As Sargon had his attention fully occupied elsewhere, he made no attempt to follow up his success, and it seems not to have been until the reign of Sennacherib that any serious invasion of the country on the part of the Assyrians was made. In 697 BC that king marched again against Merodach-baladan, who had taken refuge at Nagitu and other places on the Elamite side of the then elongated Pers Gulf. Here the Chaldeans, with their Elamite allies, were defeated, and the Elamite cities plundered and destroyed. Hallušu, king of Elam, on the retirement of the Assyrian troops, invaded Babylonia as being part of the territories of the Assyrian king, and having captured Aššur-nadin-šum, Sennacherib's son, who had ruled in Babylon 6 years, carried him off to Elam, setting Nergal-ušêzib on the throne of Babylonia. On the arrival of the Assyrian avenging host in Babylonia, Nergal-ušêzib fled to Elam, but was captured near Niffer. The Elamites were evidently very dissatisfied with their king—possibly owing to his policy—and killed him in a revolt after a reign of six years. This action on the part of the Elamites, however, did not save the people from Assyrian ven-capture, was sent prisoner to Assyria. Umman-Menanu died at the end of the year, after a 4 years' reign, and was succeeded by Humba-ḫaldāšu I (689-682 BC), of whom nothing is known. In 682 BC Humba-ḫaldāšu II mounted the throne. The death of Sennacherib and the troubles attending the accession of Esarhaddon encouraged Nabû-zêr-napišti-šîr, son of Merodach-baladan, again to raise the standard of revolt. Defeat was the result, and he fled to Elam, there to be captured by Humba-ḫaldāšu and put to death.

(12) Assyrian friendship and Elamite ingratitude.—Friendship with Assyria was a complete reversal of Elamite policy, and to all appearance peace, though probably unpopular, persisted between the two countries for several years. Humba-ḫaldāšu's two brothers revolted against him and assassinated him, and Urtaku, one of the murderers, took the Elamite throne. Not daring to be openly hostile to Assyria, however, he sent his brother Te-umman to intrigue in Chaldaea in favor of a man named Nabû-šallim, but the Chaldean chiefs answered that Na'id-Marduk, their lord, lived, and they were the servants of the king of Assyria. Also, during a famine in Elam, certain Elamite tribes migrated into Assyria to escape the scarcity, and were kindly treated by Aššur-bani-āpli, who had succeeded his father on the Assy throne. Notwithstanding this, however, Urtaku invaded Babylonia as ally of certain Chaldaean tribes. Overtaken by the Assy army, he fought with them near his own border, but was defeated and fled. He died prematurely (by his own hand) the same year, and was succeeded by his brother Te-umman (Tepti-Humban).

(13) Te-umman and the Elamite seed-royal; Assyria's triumph.—This king, who is described by Aššur-bani-āpli as being in the likeness of an evil spirit, immediately set to work to secure the death of all the sons of Urtaku and Umman-aldāše (Humban-Ḫaldašu II), his brother; and these princes, five in number, with 60 of the royal seed of Elam, fled and sought refuge with the Assy king. Te-umman immediately sent two messengers to Aššur-bani-āpli demanding the surrender of the fugitives. This was refused, and war broke out between the two countries immediately after. The Assyrians came up with the Elamites at Dêr, but Te-umman feared to join issue there, and retreating, took up a strong position near his capital, Susa, with his front protected by the river Ulai. Defections from his army now so weakened the forces of Te-umman that he endeavored to treat with Aššur-bani-āpli, who naturally refused to listen to terms, and ordered his troops to attack. The defeat of the Elamites was a foregone conclusion, and Te-umman perished, with his son, in the thick of the battle, as is dramatically depicted by the sculptors of Aššur-bani-āpli in the bas-reliefs which adorned the walls of his palace. An Assy general was now sent to Susa with Umman-igaš, the prince chosen to succeed Te-umman, and he was proclaimed while the bodies of the fallen Elamites covered the battlefield, and the waters of the Ulai carried others down to the place of its outflow. Tammariu, the new king's youngest brother, was at the same time made king of Ḫidalu, in the mountain region. In the triumphal procession at Nineveh which took place on the Assy army's return, the head of Te-umman and his son Tamritu figured, the former hanging from the neck of Dunanu, king of Gambulu, and the latter from the neck of Samgunu, Dunanu's brother.

Last Stand of Te-umman.

(14) Elamite ingratitude and treachery.—For a time there was peace in Elam, but soon the discontent of Šamaš-šum-ukīn, king of Babylon, Aššur-bani-āpli's brother, sought to break it. Urged by him, Umman-igaš forgot the benefits which he had received at the hands of Aššur-bani-āpli, and sent an army into Babylonia under the command of Undasi, son of Te-umman, telling him to avenge upon Assyria the killing of his father. Notwithstanding the great strength of the allied army, they did not succeed in making headway against the Assyrians. Tammariu, nephew of Umman-igaš, after the defeat of the Elamite forces in Chaldaea, revolted against him, and having defeated him, cut off his head, and took the crown. Šamaš-šum-ukīn immediately turned his attention to the new ruler, and induced him by fresh presents to come likewise to his aid.

Presentation of Umman-igaš to His Subjects by the Assyrian General.

Tammariu therefore marched at the head of an army into Babylonia, but in his absence Indabigaš, one of his servants, headed a revolt against him, and proclaimed himself king in Susa. In the battle which ensued between the two pretenders, Tammariu was defeated, and fled to the seacoast with a part of the Elamite royal family. He ultimately embarked in a ship on the Pers Gulf with the intention of escaping, but was wrecked, and gave himself up to an Assy officer, who sent him to Assyria.

(15) Elam's further changes of rulers.—Indabigaš, the new Elamite king, now sent an embassy to make peace with Aššur-bani-āpli, who at once demanded the surrender of Nabû-bêl-šumāti, son of Merodach-baladan, and the Assyrians whom he had enticed and taken with him. Before this demand could reach Indabigaš, however, his people had revolted against him and put him to death, and Umman-aldāsu, son of Attametu, sat on the throne, after defeating Indabigaš on the banks of the Ħutḫut. The same demand was made to Umman-aldāsu as had been made to Indabigaš, but Nabû-bêl-šumāti, not wishing to fall into the hands of the Assyrians, called on his armor-bearer to dispatch him, and the two ran each other through with their swords.

(16) King Tammariu's treachery.—Nevertheless Aššur-bani-āpli decided to replace Tammariu, the former Elamite king, on the throne, and to this end invaded Elam. The Assyrians were, as usual, successful, and on learning this, Umman-aldās fled to the mountains. Entering Susa, Tammariu was once more proclaimed king of Elam, he, in return, promising to regard Aššur-bani-āpli as his lord, and to pay tribute. No sooner had the Assy army departed, than the new king of Elam began to plot against the power which had raised him. To all appearance his intentions to revolt were reported to the Assy king, who at once sent an army and plundered the country, and Tammariu again fell into Aššur-bani-āpli's hands. Umman-aldās now returned and resumed the government. Unwilling to regard his former efforts as fruitless, the Assy king decided to finally subdue the land, and to this end invaded it, the pretext being that the Elamites refused to deliver up the image of the goddess Nanā, which had been carried off from Erech 1,635 years before, in the time of Kudur-Naḫḫunte (see [4] above). The two armies faced each other on the banks of the Itite, and after an attack in which the Assyrians were at a disadvantage, the Elamites gave way, and Umman-aldās fled to the mountains. According to the Assy king's record, an enormous booty was taken, including many sacred and ancient royal statues preserved at Susa. The image of Nanā was restored to its shrine at Erech with great rejoicing. In the triumphal celebrations at Nineveh, Tammartu was one of the captive kings who drew the Assy king's chariot to the temple of Ištar, when he rendered the goddess thanks for his victories.

(17) Dominion passes from Assyria.—To all appearance Elam now became a province of the Assyrian empire, though not for long, as this collapsed in the year 606 BC, and the center of government was shifted to Babylon, under Nabopolassar, who became its ruler. Nebuchadnezzar (604), Evil-Merodach (561), Neriglissar (559), and Nabonidus (555-538 BC), were successively masters of Elam. The mention of the kings of Elam in Jer 25 25, however, suggests that the old states of the country had practically resumed their independence; though 49 35-39 prophesies the dismemberment of the country, and the destruction of its king and princes. This is thought to refer to the annexation of the country by Teispes, and its passing, through his line—Cyrus, Cambyses, and Cyrus the Great, who were all kings of Anzan—to Darius Hystaspis. In Isa 21 2 it is apparently the later Cyrus who is referred to when Elam, with Media, is called upon "to go up" to the siege of Babylon.

(18) The later state of Elam.—After Cyrus, the history of Elam was that of Persia, of which it henceforth formed a part. In all probability, however, the Elamites were as warlike and as intractable as ever. During the reign of the little-known Kharacanian king, Aspāsinē, they made incursions into Babylonia, one of the opponents of this king's generals being Pittit, "the enemy, the Elamite"—a phrase of old standing, apparently. Elam, to its whole extent, was smitten with the sword, and Pittit [was slain or captured]. One of the cities which they attacked was Apameia, probably that on the Sellas river. Acts 2 9 implies that the old language of Elam was still in use, and the Elamites were still recognized as a nationality, as late as the 1st cent. of our era.

Owing to the many Semites in Elam, and the nearness of the Bab states, Bab deities—Anu and Anatu, Enlil and Ninlil, Merodach and Zēr-panītu, Šamaš and Aa, Tammuz and Ištar, Ninip, Nergal, Hadad or Rimmon, etc.—were largely worshipped (see BABEL, BABYLON). The chief deity of the non-Semitic pantheon seems to have been In-šūšinak, the patron-deity of Susa, identified with Ninip, the son of Enlil, by the Babylonians, who quote also other names applied to him—Laḫuratil Simeš, Adaene, Šušinak, and Dagbak. Merodach seems to have been represented by the Sumerian character Gal, "great," and Zēr-panītu was apparently called Nin-siš in Elam. Ištar was known as Usan. Lagamar, Laqamar, or Lagamal, was apparently identified with the Bab Lagamal, one of the gods of Dailem near Babylon—his name is generally regarded as forming part of the name CHEDORLAOMER (q.v.). Naḫhunte, Na'hunte, or (Bab) Nan-hundi was the Bab sun-god Šamaš; Kunzibami was the W. Šem. Hadad, also known by his Mitannian (Hittite) name of Tešup. Ħumban, Ħuman, or Umman (Assyr), "the god of gods," "the king," was possibly regarded as the Bab Merodach. The currency of Bab myths in Elam is suggested by the name of the goddess Belala, possibly the Bab Belili, sister of Tammuz. The word for "god" in Elamite was nap, explained by the Babylonians as one of the names of Enlil, implying that the Elamites regarded him as "the god" by divine right. Of their deities, six (one of them being Lagamar) were worshipped only by Elamite kings. Elam had temples and temple-towers similar to those in Babylonia, as well as sacred groves, wherein no stranger penetrated. (See ERE, s.v. "Elamites.")

The rediscovery of the history of Elam is one of the most noteworthy things of modern research. It has revealed to us the wonderful development which that kingdom had made at an exceedingly early date, and shows that it was politically just as important as the Bab states 4,000 years BC, though probably hardly so advanced in art and lit. Nevertheless, the country had adopted the cuneiform method of writing, and possessed also another script, seemingly of more ancient date. As both Sem Bab and Susian (Anzanite) were spoken in the country, numerous documents in both languages have been found, mostly historical, or of the nature of dedications, some of which are inscribed on objects presented to temples. There are also a number of archaic tablets of the nature of accounts, written in a peculiar cuneiform character. The cylinder-seals are either inscribed with dedications, or with the name of the owner, his father, and the god whom he worshipped, as in Babylonia. Of other lit. there are but mere traces—an exorcism against mosquitos shows the desire of the people to rid themselves of the discomforts of this life. Contracts testify to the existence of laws, but the laws themselves have yet to be discovered. The stele of Hammurabi, which was found at Susa, did not belong to Elamite lit., but to that of Babylonia.

Elamite art during the first period was naturally rude, and it is doubtful whether metals were then used, as no traces of them were found.

15. Art There were also no inscribed monuments. The pottery, however, was of 1st and 2d extreme delicacy, and very elegant. Prehistoric The second period is described as being Periods less artistic than the first. The pottery is more ordinary, and also more roughly made, though better ware also exists. Painted ornamentation is found. Vessels of white or pink limestone, some of them very large, occur, but alabaster is exceedingly rare. There is no indication of writing at this period, but rudely engraved seals, with animal forms, are found. The buildings were of crude brick or piled-up earth, though baked brick was sometimes used. A change seems to have taken place in the conditions of life at the end of this period, implying invasion by a more civilized race.

The indications of invasion during the second prehistoric period are confirmed, according to M. Jéquier, by what is found in the layer of the archaic period, which succeeded the Archaic it. This is accentuated by the numerous inscribed clay tablets, some of which have impressions of quite remarkable cylinder-seals. The pottery is scanty and not characteristic, but the working of alabaster into vases had developed considerably, and some of the smaller forms (ointment or scent-bottles) are good and varied. Some have the form of the duck, the wild boar, and other animals. During the period of the iššakē or viceroy, fine sculptures in low relief occur—the scorpion-man and the sacred tree, military prisoners with their guard, siege-operations and the dead on the battlefield; and as examples of work in the round, ivory and alabaster statuettes. Later on, during the time of the kings of Elam and Susa, the objects of art increase in number, though large objects in the round are rare. Noteworthy are the statuettes and statues in bronze, the former being very numerous. The largest production of this kind is the almost life-size statue of queen Napir-Asu, consort of Untaš-Gal, which, however, is unfortunately headless. It is a remarkable piece of work, and has great artistic merit.

In all probability Elam was much hindered in her material and intellectual development by the intractable and warlike nature of her people—indeed, the history of the country, as far as it is known, is a record of strife and conflict, and the temperament indicated by the ancient records seems to have been inherited by the wild tribes which occupy the more inaccessible districts. What conducted to quarrels and conflicts in ancient times was the law of succession, for the Elamite kings were not generally succeeded by their eldest sons, but by their brothers (see ELLASAR). The inhabitants of the towns at the present time in all probability do not differ in any essential respect from those of Persia in general, and among them there is probably no great amount of ancient Elamite blood, though the Elamite type is met with, and probably occurs, in consequence of ancient mingling, in various parts of modern Persia.

ELATH, ē'lath, or ELOTH, ē'loth (עֵלוֹת, 'ēloth, עֵלָת, 'ēlath; Αἰλά, Ailān [Dt 2 8], Αἰλά, Ailāth [2 K 16 6]): A seaport on the Red Sea in the territory of Edom. It is named along with Ezion-geber in the account of Israel's journey round the land of Edom (Dt 2 8). It appears as Ailath, and Ailōn in the LXX, and in Jos as Ilanis (Ant, VIII, vi, 4), while Onom has Αἰλά, Ailā. From this we may gather that the Aram. Ilān or Ilānā was in use as well as the Heb 'ēlath or 'ēloth. The name, "grove," was doubtless derived from the presence of certain sacred trees. It may be identical with El-paran of Gen 14 6, and Elah of Gen 36 41. When David conquered Edom, Elath passed into the hands of Israel (2 S 8 14). It was a position of great importance in connection with the trade with South Arabia. Here the merchant fleets of Solomon and Jehoshaphat were fitted out, and hence they sailed (1 K 9 26; 2 Ch 8 17; 1 K 22 48). In the reign of Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat, Edom shook off the hand of Judah (2 K 8 20), but under Amaziah and Uzziah it was again subdued (14 7.10.22). Finally it was taken from Ahaz by Rezin, king of Syria. The Jews were driven out and the Syrians (Edomites?) took permanent possession (16 6). It is identical with the modern 'Aḡaba, at the head of the gulf of that name. W. EWING

ELBERITH, el-bē'rith (Jgs 9 46). See BAAL-BERITH.

EL-BETH-EL, el-beth'el (אֵל בֵּית-אֵל, 'ēl bēth-'ēl, "God of Bethel"; Βαιθὲλ, Baithēl): By this name Jacob called the scene of his vision at Luz, when he returned from Paddan-aram (Gen 35 7).

ELCIA, el'shi-a, RV ELKIAH (q.v.).

ELDAAH, el-dā'a (אֵלדָּאָה, 'eldā'āh, "God has called"): A son of Midian (Gen 25 4; 1 Ch 1 33).

ELDAD, el'dad (אֵלדָּד, 'eldād, "God has loved"): One of the 70 elders chosen by Moses at the command of Jeh to share "the burden of the people" (Nu 11 16–25). Eldad and his companion Medad were not present with the rest at the tent of meeting, yet the Spirit rested also upon them and they prophesied in the camp (vs 26–29).

ELDAD, el'dad, AND MODAD, mō'dad, BOOK OF: In the LXX they are called Eldad and Modad. In the AV the names are given as Eldad and Medad; meaning "God has loved" ("God loves") and "object of love" (?). They were two of the seventy elders chosen by Moses (Nu 11 26), and while the others obeyed the summons and went to the tabernacle, these two remained in the camp and prophesied (Nu 11 26). The nature of their prophecy is not recorded, and this naturally became a good subject for the play of the imagination. It furnished the basis for a lost work which was quoted by Hermas (Vis 2 3): "The Lord is near to them who return unto him, as it is written in Eldad and Modad, who prophesied to the people in the wilderness." The Pal Tgs also filled in the subject of the prophecy of Eldad and Modad, and, as they have it, it related to the coming of Gog and Magog against Israel at the end of the days. One of the Tgs has the expression, "The Lord is near to them that are in the hour of tribulation." The authors of the Tgs were either dependent upon that work or upon a similar tradition; and the former of these views is the more probable. Lightfoot and Holtzman think the lengthy quotation in 1 Clem 23 and 2 Clem 11 is from the Book of Eldad and Modad. The work is found in the Stichometry of Nicephorus and consists of 400 stichoi, which would make it about twice the length of the Cant. A. W. FORTUNE

ELDER, el-dēr, IN THE OT (זֶקֶן, zāqēn): Among primitive peoples authority seems naturally to be invested in those who by virtue of greater age and, consequently, experience are best fitted to govern: thus Iliad iii.149. Later the idea of age became merged in that of dignity (Il. ii.404, ii.570; Odyssey ii.14). In like manner the word patres came to be used among the Romans (Cic. Rep. 2.8.14). So also among the Germans authority was intrusted to those who were older; cf Tacitus Agricola. The same is true among the Arabians to the present day, the sheik being always a man of age as well as of authority.

From the first the Hebrews held this view of government, although the term "elder" came later to be used of the idea of the authority for which, at first, age was regarded necessary. Thus the office appears in both J (9th cent. BC) (Ex 3 16; 12 21; 24 1, of the elders of the Hebrews; and of the Egyptians, Gen 50 7); and E (8th cent. BC) (Ex 17 5; 18 12; 19 7 [D]); Josh 24 31, elders of Israel, or of the people. Cf the principle of selection of heads of tens, fifties, etc, Ex 18 13 ff, seventy being selected from a previous body of elders); cf JE (Nu 11 16.24). Seventy are also mentioned in Ex 24 1, while in Jgs 8 14 seventy-seven are mentioned, although this might be taken to include seven princes. Probably the number was not uniform.

Elder as a title continues to have place down through the times of the Judges (Jgs 8 16; 2 7[D]; cf Ruth 4 2 ff) into the kingdom. Saul asked to be honored before the elders (1 S 15 30); the elders of Bethlehem appeared before Samuel (16 4); the elders appeared before David in Hebron (2 S 17 15; 1 Ch 11 3); elders took part in the temple procession of Solomon (1 K 8 3; 2 Ch 5 4). They continued through the Pers period (Ezr 5 5.9; 6 7.14; 10 8.14; Joel 1 14m) and the Maccabean period (Jth 6 16; 7 23; 8 10; 10 6; 13 12; 1 Macc 12 35), while the NT (πρεσβύτερος, presbúteros, Mt 16 21; 26 47.57; Mk 8 31; Lk 9 22; Acts 4 5.23) makes frequent mention of the office.

The elders served as local magistrates, in bringing murderers to trial (Dt 19 12; 21 1 ff; Josh 20 4), punishing a disobedient son (Dt 21 19), inflicting penalty for slander (22 15), for noncompliance with the Levirate marriage law (25 7 ff), enforcing the Law (27 1), conducting the service in expiation of unwitting violation of the Law (Lev 4 13 ff).

In certain passages different classes of officers are mentioned as "judges and officers" (Dt 16 18), "elders" and "officers" (31 28), "heads, tribes, elders, officers" (29 10 [Heb 9]). It is probable that both classes were selected from among the elders, and that to one class was assigned the work of judging, and that the "officers" exercised executive functions (Schürer). In entirely Jewish communities the same men would be both officers of the community and elders of the synagogue. In this case the same men would have jurisdiction over civil and religious matters.

ELDER IN THE NT (πρεσβύτερος, presbúteros):

(1) The word is used adjectivally to denote seniority (Lk 15 25; 1 Tim 5 2).

(2) Referring to the Jewish elders of the synagogue, usually associated with the scribes and Pharisees, and NT passages cited in the previous article.

(3) It denotes certain persons appointed to hold office in the Christian church, and to exercise spiritual oversight over the flock intrusted to them. From the references in Acts (14 23; 20 17) it may be inferred that the churches generally had elders appointed over them. That "elders" and "bishops" were in apostolic and sub-apostolic times the same, is now almost universally admitted; in all NT references their functions are identical. The most probable explanation of the difference of names is that "elder" refers mainly to the person, and "bishop" to the office; the name "elder" emphasizes what he is, while "bishop," that is "overseer," emphasizes what the elder or presbyter does. See BISHOP; CHURCH GOVERNMENT; MINISTRY.

A. C. GRANT

ELEAD, el'-ē-ad (אֵלְעָד, 'el'ādh, "God has testified"): An Ephraimite, slain while making a raid, by the men of Gath (1 Ch 7 21).

ELEADAH, el-ē-ā'da, ELADAH (AV) (אֵלְעָדָה, 'el'ādhāh, "God has adorned"): An Ephraimite (1 Ch 7 20).

ELEALEH, ē-lē-ā'le (אֵלְעָלֵה, 'el'ālēh, "God has ascended"): Lay in the country taken from Sihon and within the lot given to Reuben (Nu 32 3.37 f). "Their names being changed" seems to apply to all the towns mentioned. There is no indication of the other names. Elealeh is noticed with Heshbon in the oracles against Moab in Isa 15 4; 16 9; Jer 48 34. Onom locates it one Rom mile from Heshbon. It is represented today by el'Āl, a mound crowned with ruins, about a mile N. of Heshbān.

ELEASA, el-ē-ā'sa. See ELASA.

ELEASAH, el-ē-ā'sa (in Heb identical with ELASAH, which see):

(1) A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 2 39.40).

(2) A Benjamite, a descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8 37; 9 43).

ELEAZAR, el-ē-ā'zar, ē-lē-ā'zar (אֵלְעָזָר, 'el'āzār; Ἐλεάζαρ, Eleázar, "God is helper"):

(1) The 3d son of Aaron by Elisheba (Ex 6 23; Nu 3 2). He married one of the daughters of Putiel, who bore him Phinehas (Ex 6 25). With his father and 3 brothers he was consecrated to the priest's office (Ex 28 1). After the destruction of Nadab and Abihu, he occupied a more important position, and he and Ithamar "ministered in the priest's office in the presence of Aaron their father" (Lev 10 6 ff; Nu 3 4; 1 Ch 24 2 ff). He was given the oversight of the Levites and had charge of the tabernacle and all within it (Nu 3 32; 4 16). To Eleazar fell the duty of beating out for an altar covering the censers of Korah and his fellow-conspirators who had attempted to seize the priesthood (Nu 16 37.39). On the death of Aaron, Eleazar succeeded him (Nu 20 25 ff). He assisted Moses with the census after the plague in the plains of Moab (Nu 26 1 ff), and with Moses and the elders heard the petition of the daughters of Zelophead who wished to be served as heirs to their father (Nu 27 1 ff). After the entrance into Canaan, Eleazar and Joshua gave effect to the decision arrived at by giving the daughters of Zelophead a share in the land of Manasseh (Josh 17 4). He was priest and adviser to Joshua, the successor of Moses (Nu 27 19; 31 12 ff), whom he also assisted in partitioning Canaan among the tribes (Nu 34 17; Josh 14 1; 19 51; 21 1). He was buried in the hill (RVm "Gibeah") of Phinehas his son in the hill country of Ephraim (Josh 24 33). For some reason unknown the descendants of Ithamar seem to have held the chief position among the priests from Eli till the accession of Solomon, when Abiathar was sent into retirement, and Zadok, the descendant of Eleazar, was appointed in his place (1 K 2 26 ff). Ezra was a descendant of Zadok (Ezr 7 1 ff); and the high priest's office was in the family of Zadok till the time of the Maccabees.

(2) The son of Abinadab, sanctified to keep the ark of Jeh, when it was brought from Beth-shemesh to Kiriath-jearim after being sent back by the Philis (1 S 7 1).

(3) The son of Dodai, one of David's three mighty men. A famous feat of arms with David at Ephes-dammim is recorded (2 S 23 9 f; 1 Ch 11 12 f where he is named the son of Dodo).

(4) A Levite, a son of Mahli, a Merarite. It is recorded that he had no sons, but daughters only, who were married to their cousins (1 Ch 23 21.22; 24 28).

(5) A priest who accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Ezr 8 33); the son of Phinehas. (5) and (6) may be identical.

(6) A priest who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerus (Neh 12 42).

(7) A son of Mattathias and brother of Judas Maccabaeus (1 Macc 2 5; 6 43 f; 2 Macc 8 23). See ASMONEANS; MACCABEES.

(8, 9) Two others are mentioned in 1 Macc 8 17; 2 Macc 6 18 ff.

(10) An ancestor of Jesus, 3 generations before Joseph (Mt 1 15).

ELEAZURUS, el-ê-a-zû'rus, RV ELIASIBUS (q.v.).

ELECT, ê-lekt': That is, "chosen," "selected." In the OT the word represents derivatives of בָּחַר, bāhar, elegit; in the NT ἐκλεκτός, eklektós. It means properly an object or objects of selection. This primary meaning sometimes passes into that of "eminent," "valuable," "choice"; often thus as a fact, in places where AV uses "chosen" (or "elect") to translate the original (e.g. Isa 42 1; 1 Pet 2 6). In AV "elect" (or "chosen") is used of Israel as the race selected for special favor and to be the special vehicle of Divine purposes (so 4t in Apoc, Tob and Ecclus); of the great Servant of Jeh (cf Lk 23 35; the "Christ of God, his chosen"); of eminent saints as Jacob, Moses, Rufus (Rom 16 13); "the lady," and her "sister" of 2 Jn; of the holy angels (1 Tim 5 21), with a possible suggestion of the lapse of other angels. Otherwise, and prevalently in the NT, it denotes a human community, also described as believers, saints, the Israel of God; regarded as in some sense selected by Him from among men, objects of His special favor, and correspondingly called to special holiness and service. See further under ELECTION. In the Eng. VSS "elect" is not used as a vb.: "to choose" is preferred; e.g. Mk 13 20; Eph 1 4.

HANDLEY DUNELM

ELECT LADY, ê-lekt' lā'di (ἐκλεκτῇ κυρίᾳ, eklektē kuria; 2 Jn ver 1): In accordance with strict grammatical usage these words of address may be tr<sup>d</sup> in three ways: "to an elect lady" (which as an address is too indefinite); or, both words being taken as proper names, "to Eklektē Kuria" (an improbable combination of two very rare names); or "to Eklektē, lady"=anglice, "to the lady [or 'Madam'] Eklektē." The other translations which have been given—"to the elect lady" or "to the elect Kuria"—are open to objection on account of the omission of the article; but this violation of rule is perhaps not without parallel (cf 1 Pet 1 1). The translation adopted will partly depend upon whether we regard the epistle as addressed to an individual or to a community. Dr. Rendel Harris believes this question to be settled by the discovery in the papyri of numerous instances which prove that kurios and kuria were used by ancient letter-writers as terms of familiar endearment, applicable to brother, sister, son, wife, or intimate friend of either sex (Expositor, March, 1901; see also Findlay, Fellowship in the Life Eternal, ch iii). In the light of this suggestion we should naturally translate, "to my [dear] lady Eklektē." Grammatically, this is strongly supported by 1 Tim 1 2 and 2 Tim 1 2 (Τιμοθέε γνησίῳ . . . ἀγαπητῷ . . . τέκνῳ, Timothēō gnēsīō . . . agapētō . . . tēknō="to Timothy my true . . . beloved . . . child"); and the fact that the name Eklektē has not yet been discovered, though Eklektós has, offers no grave objection. This is the tr favored by Clement of Alexandria, who says of the epistle: scripta vero est ad quandam Babyloniam nomine Electam, significat autem electionem ecclesiae sanctae ("It is written to a certain Babylonian, Electa by name; but it signifies the further election of the holy church"). It seems doubtful whether he means by the last clause that Electa is simply a personification of the church, or a real person whose name was derived from the Christian idea of election. Either way the rendering, "to the lady Electa," is suitable, and upon the whole it seems the best. Eklektē is not an adj. but a noun. If a person is intended, it is "the lady Electa"; if a church, it is designated, not "the elect Lady," but "the lady Elect." The mention of "thy elect sister" in 2 Jn ver 13 does not hinder either supposition. See further CYRIA; JOHN, THE EPISTLES OF.

I. The Word in Scripture.—The word is absent from the OT, where the related Heb vb. (בָּחַר, bāhar) is frequent. In the NT it occurs 6 t (Rom 9 11; 11 5.7.28; 1 Thess 1 4; 2 Pet 1 10). In all these places it appears to denote an act of Divine selection taking effect upon human objects so as to bring them into special and saving relations with God: a selection such as to be at once a mysterious thing, transcending human analysis of its motives (so eminently in Rom 9 11), and such as to be knowable by its objects, who are (2 Pet) exhorted to "make it sure," certain, a fact to consciousness. It is always (with one exception, Rom 9 11; see below) related to a community, and thus has close affinity with the OT teachings upon the privileged position of Israel as the chosen, selected race (see under ELECT). The objects of election in the NT are, in effect, the Israel of God, the new, regenerate race called to special privilege and special service. From one point of view, that of the external marks of Christianity, they may thus be described as the Christian community in its widest sense, the sense in which the sacramental position and the real are prima facie assumed to coincide. But from 2 Pet it is manifest that much more than this has to be said if the incidence of the word present to the writer's mind is to be rightly felt. It is assumed there that the Christian, baptized and a worshipper, may yet need to make "sure" his "calling and election" as a fact to his consciousness. This implies conditions in the "election" which far transcend the tests of sacred rite and external fellowship.

II. The Mysterious Element.—Such impressions of depth and mystery in the word are confirmed by the other passages. In Rom 9 11 the context is charged with the most urgent and even staggering challenges to submission and silence in the presence of the inscrutable. To illustrate large assertions as to the liberty and sovereignty of the Divine dealings with man, the apostle brings in Esau and Jacob, individuals, twins as yet unborn, and points to the inscrutable difference of the Divine action toward them as such. Somehow, as a matter of fact, the Eternal appears as appointing to unborn Esau a future of comparative disfavor and to Jacob of favor; a future announced to the still pregnant mother. Such discrimination was made and announced, says the apostle, "that the purpose of God according to election might stand." In the whole passage the gravest stress is laid upon the isolation of the "election" from the merit or demerit of its objects.

III. Incidence upon Community and Individual.

—It is observable that the same characteristic, the inscrutable, the sovereign, is attached in the OT to the "election" of a favored and privileged nation. Israel is repeatedly reminded (see e.g. Dt 7) that the Divine call and choice of them to be the people of God has no relation to their virtues, or to their strength. The reason lies out of sight, in the Divine mind. So too "the Israel of God" (Gal 6 16) in the NT, the Christian community, "the new, peculiar race," holds its great privileges by quite unmerited favor (e.g. Tit 3 5). And the nature of the case here leads, as it does not in the case of the natural Israel, to the thought of a Divine election of the individual, similarly inscrutable and sovereign. For the idea of the New Israel involves the thought that in every genuine member of it the provisions of the New Covenant (Jer 31 31 f) are being fulfilled: the sins are remembered no more, and the law is written in the heart. The bearer of the Christian name, but not of the Christian spiritual standing and character, having "not the Spirit of Christ, is none of his" (Rom 8 9). The chosen community accordingly, not as it seems ab extra, but as it is in its essence, is a fellowship of individuals each of whom is an object of unmerited Divine favor, taking effect in the new life. And this involves the exercise of electing mercy. Cf e.g. 1 Pet 1 3. And consider Rom 11 4-7 (where observe the exceptional use of "the election," meaning "the company of the elect").

IV. Cognate and Illustrative Biblical Language.

—It is obvious that the aspects of mystery which gather round the word "election" are not confined to it alone. An important class of words, such as "calling," "predestination," "foreknowledge," "purpose," "gift," bears this same character; asserting or connoting, in appropriate contexts, the element of the inscrutable and sovereign in the action of the Divine will upon man, and particularly upon man's will and affection toward God. And it will be felt by careful students of the Bible in its larger and more general teachings that one deep characteristic of the Book, which with all its boundless multiplicity is yet one, is to emphasize on the side of man everything that can humble, convict, reduce to worshipping silence (see for typical passages Job 40 3-4; Rom 3 19), and on the side of God everything which can bring home to man the transcendence and sovereign claims of his almighty Maker. Not as unrelated utterances, but as part of a vast whole of view and teaching, occur such passages as Eph 2 8-9 and Rom 11 33-36, and even the stern, or rather awestruck, phrases of Rom 9 20, 21, where the potter and the clay are used in illustration.

V. Limitations of Inquiry Here. Scope of Election.—We have sought thus in the simplest outline to note first the word "election" and then some related Scriptural words and principles, weighing the witness they bear to a profound mystery in the action of the Divine will upon man, in the spiritual sphere. What we have thus seen leaves still unstated what, according to Scripture, is the goal and issue of the elective act. In this art., remembering that it is part of a Bible Encyclopedia, we attempt no account of the history of thought upon election, in the successive Christian centuries, nor again any discussion of the relation of election in Scripture to extra-Scriptural philosophies, to theories of necessity, determination, fatalism. We attempt only to see the matter as it lies before us in the Bible. Studying it so, we find that this mysterious action of God on man has relation, in the Christian revelation, to nothing short of the salvation of the individual (and of the community of such individuals) from sin and condemnation, and the preservation of the saved to life eternal. We find this not so much in any single passage as in the main stream of Bib. language and tone on the subject of the Divine selective action. But it is remarkable that in the recorded thought of Our Lord Himself we find assertions in this direction which could hardly be more explicit. See Jn 6 37. 44-45; 10 27-29. To the writer the best summary of the Scriptural evidence, at once definite and restrained, is the language of the 17th Anglican art.: "They which be endued with so excellent a benefit of God be called according to God's purpose by His Spirit working in due season; they through grace obey the calling; they be justified freely; they be made sons of God by adoption; they be made like the image of His only begotten Son Jesus Christ; they walk religiously in good works, and at length, by God's mercy, they attain to everlasting felicity."

VI. Perseverance.—The anxious problem of PERSEVERANCE will be treated under that word. It may be enough here to say that alike what we are permitted to read as revealed, and what we may humbly apprehend as the reason of the case, tend to the reverent belief that a perseverance (rather of the Lord than of the saints) is both taught and implied. But when we ponder the nature of the subject we are amply prepared for the large range of Scriptures which on the other hand condemn and preclude, for the humble disciple, so gross a misuse of the doctrine as would let it justify one moment's presumption upon Divine mercy in the heart which is at the same time sinning against the Divine love and holiness.

VII. Considerations in Relief of Thought.—We close, in view of this last remark, with some detached notes in relief, well remembering the unspeakable trial which to many devout minds the word before us has always brought.

First in place and importance is the thought that a spiritual fact like election, which belongs to the innermost purpose and work of the

1. Antinomies—Eternal, necessarily leads us to a region where comprehension is impossible, and where we can only reverently apprehend. The doctrine passes upward to the sphere where antinomies live and move, where we must be content to hear what sound to us contradictions, but which are really various aspects of infinite truth. Let us be content to know that the Divine choice is sovereign; and also that "his tender mercies are over all his works," that "He willeth not the death of a sinner," that "God is love." Let us relieve the tension of such submissive reliance by reverently noting how the supreme antinomy meets one type of human need with its one side, and with its other another. To the "fearful saint" the Divine sovereignty of love is a sacred cordial. To the seeking penitent the Divine comprehensiveness of love opens the door of peace. To the deluded theorist who does not love and obey, the warnings of a fall and ruin which are possible, humanly, from any spiritual height, are a merciful beacon on the rocks.

Further, we remember that election, in Scripture, is as different as possible from the fatal necessity of, e.g. the Stoics. It never appears

2. Fatalism as mechanical, or as a blind destiny. Another It has to do with the will of a God who has given us otherwise supreme proofs Thing that He is all-good and all-kind. And it is related to man not as a helpless and innocent being but as a sinner. It is never presented as an arbitrary force majeure. Even in Rom 9 the "silence" called for is not as if to say, "You are hopelessly passive in the grasp of infinite power," but, "You, the creature, cannot judge your Maker, who must know infinitely more of cause and reason than his handiwork can know." The mystery, we may be sure, had behind it supreme right and reason, but in a region which at present at least we cannot penetrate. Again, election never appears as a violation of human will. For never in the Bible is man treated as irresponsible. In the Bible the relation of the human and Divine wills is inscrutable; the reality of both is assured.

Never is the doctrine presented apart from a moral context. It is intended manifestly to deepen man's submission to—not force, but—mystery, where such submission means faith. In the practical experience of the soul its designed effect is to emphasize in the believer the consciousness (itself native to the true state of grace) that the whole of his salvation is due to the Divine mercy, no part of it to his merit, to his virtue, to his wisdom. In the sanctified soul, which alone, assuredly, can make full use of the mysterious truth, is it designed to generate, together and in harmony, awe, thanksgiving and repose.

A necessary caution in view of the whole subject is that here, if anywhere in the regions of spiritual study, we inevitably "know in part," and in a very limited part. The treatment of election has at times in Christian history been carried on as if, less by the light of revelation than by logical processes, we could tabulate or map the whole subject. Where this has been done, and where at the same time, under a sort of mental rather than spiritual fascination, election has been placed in the foreground of the system of religious thought, and allowed to dominate the rest, the truth has (to say the least) too often been distorted into an error. The Divine character has been beclouded in its beauty. Sovereignty has been divorced from love, and so defaced into an arbitrary fiat, which has for its only reason the assertion of omnipotence. Thus the grievous wrong has been done of ἀσχηρόν τι λέγειν περὶ τοῦ Θεοῦ, "defamation of God." For example, the revelation of a positive Divine selection has been made by inference to teach a corresponding rejection ruthless and terrible, as if the Eternal Love could ever by any possibility reject or crush even the faintest aspiration of the created spirit toward God. For such a thought not even the dark words of Rom 9 18 give Scriptural excuse. The case there in hand, Pharaoh's, is anything but one of arbitrary power trampling on a human will looking toward God and right. Once more, the subject is one as to which we must on principle be content with knowledge so fragmentary that its parts may seem contradictory in our present imperfect light. The one thing we may be sure of behind the veil is, that nothing can be hidden there which will really contradict the supreme and ruling truth that God is love.

3. The mystery, where such submission means Moral faith. In the practical experience of Aspects the soul its designed effect is to emphasize in the believer the consciousness (itself native to the true state of grace) that the whole of his salvation is due to the Divine mercy, no part of it to his merit, to his virtue, to his wisdom. In the sanctified soul, which alone, assuredly, can make full use of the mysterious truth, is it designed to generate, together and in harmony, awe, thanksgiving and repose.

4. "We and in a very limited part. The treat- Know in ment of election has at times in Chris- Part" tian history been carried on as if, less by the light of revelation than by logical processes, we could tabulate or map the whole subject. Where this has been done, and where at the same time, under a sort of mental rather than spiritual fascination, election has been placed in the foreground of the system of religious thought, and allowed to dominate the rest, the truth has (to say the least) too often been distorted into an error. The Divine character has been beclouded in its beauty. Sovereignty has been divorced from love, and so defaced into an arbitrary fiat, which has for its only reason the assertion of omnipotence. Thus the grievous wrong has been done of ἀσχηρόν τι λέγειν περὶ τοῦ Θεοῦ, "defamation of God." For example, the revelation of a positive Divine selection has been made by inference to teach a corresponding rejection ruthless and terrible, as if the Eternal Love could ever by any possibility reject or crush even the faintest aspiration of the created spirit toward God. For such a thought not even the dark words of Rom 9 18 give Scriptural excuse. The case there in hand, Pharaoh's, is anything but one of arbitrary power trampling on a human will looking toward God and right. Once more, the subject is one as to which we must on principle be content with knowledge so fragmentary that its parts may seem contradictory in our present imperfect light. The one thing we may be sure of behind the veil is, that nothing can be hidden there which will really contradict the supreme and ruling truth that God is love.

Finally, let us from another side remember that here, as always in the things of the Spirit, "we know in part." The chosen multitude are

5. The sovereignly "called, . . . justified, Unknown . . . glorified" (Rom 8 29,30). But Future for what purposes? Certainly not for an end terminating in themselves.

They are saved, and kept, and raised to the perfect state, for the service of their Lord. And not till the cloud is lifted from the unseen life can we possibly know what that service under eternal conditions will include, what ministries of love and good in the whole universe of being. ELECTRUM, ê-lek'trum: The RVm rendering of הַשֵּׁמֶט, hashmal, of Ezk 1 4,27; 8 2 (LXX ἤλεκτρον, ēlektron, Vulg electrum). Both AV and ERV have "amber" while the ARV has "glowing metal." Gesenius says electrum must not be understood as being here used for amber, but for a kind of metal remarkable for brightness, compounded of gold and silver. "Amber" is undoubtedly a poor rendering, as the Heb term means "polished brass." ARV has the more correct rendering. Amber, however, may well have been known to Ezekiel (EB s.v.). See also STONES, PRECIOUS; BUYING, IV.

EL-ELOHE-ISRAEL, el-ê-lô'hê-iz'râ-el, el-el'ô-he-iz'râ-el (אֱלֹהֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל, 'el 'êlôhê yisrâ'el, trd "God, the God of Israel" in ARVm and AVm): Found only in Gen 33 20 as the name given to the altar erected at Shechem by Jacob, henceforth known as Israel, on the parcel of ground purchased by him from the inhabitants of Shechem, his first encampment of length and importance since the return to Pal from Paddan-aram and the eventful night at Peniel (Gen 32 30). This unusual combination of names has given occasion for much speculation and for various text emendations. Already the LXX sought to meet the difficulty by reading wa-yikrâ 'el 'êlôhê yisrâ'el, "and he called upon the God of Israel," instead of the wa-yikrâ 'lô 'el of MT, "and he called it El" etc. Wellhausen, followed by Dillmann, Driver and others, changes "altar" to "pillar," because the Heb verb, hiccûbh, is used with mag-çêbhâh, "pillar," in Gen 35 14,20, so making this religious act a parallel to that at Bethel. But DeLitzsch, New Comm. on Gen, properly rejects this purely fanciful change, and understands the compound name as the altar's inscription. Dillmann well suggests that "altar" (or "pillar") be supplied, reading thus: "called it the altar of El, the God of Israel." The peculiar phrase is best and most readily understood in its close connection with the struggle at Peniel, recorded in Gen 32. Being victorious in that struggle, Jacob received the new name "Israel"; and to his first altar in Pal he gave that name of God which appeared in his own new name, further explaining it by the appositive phrase "Elohe-Israel." Thus his altar was called, or dedicated to, "El, the God of Israel." EDWARD MACK

ELEMENT, el'ê-ment, ELEMENTS (τὰ στοιχεῖα, tâ stoicheia, "the letters of the alphabet," "the elements out of which all things are formed," "the heavenly bodies," "the fundamental principles of any art or science"):

(1) In 2 Pet 3 10, the constituent parts of the physical universe ("elements shall be dissolved with fervent heat," ARVm "the heavenly bodies"). (2) In Gal 4 3,9, RV has "rudiments," as in AVm, and in Col 2 8,20, where the reference is to imperfect Jewish ordinances. See RUDIMENTS.

ELEPH ê'lef (הָאֵילָף, hâ-'eleph, "the ox"): A place in the lot of Benjamin not far from Jerus (Josh 18 28). The name is omitted by LXX, unless, indeed, it is combined with that of Zelah. It may be identical with Lifta, a village W. of Jerus (Conder, HDB, s.v.). Others identify Lifta with Nephthoah.

ELEPHANT, el'ê-fant (Job 40 15 AVm [ARVm "hippopotamus," RV "ivory"]; 1 K 10 22 AVm; 2 Ch 9 21 AVm; 1 Macc 3 34; 6 28 ff; 8 6): Possibly in Job it is the extinct mammoth. See BEHEMOTH; IVORY.

ELEUTHERUS, ê-lû'thêr-us (Ἐλευθέρος, Eleutheros; 1 Macc 11 7; 12 30): A river separating Syria and Phoenicia.

ELEVEN, ê-lev'n, STARS. See ASTRONOMY.

ELEVEN, ê-lev'n, THE (οἱ ἑνδεκα, hoi hēndeka): The eleven apostles remaining after the death of Judas. The definite art. used serves to designate them as a distinct and definite group whose integrity was not destroyed by the loss of one of the twelve. The college of "the Twelve" had come to be so well recognized that the gospel writers all used on occasions the word with the definite art. to represent the Twelve Apostles chosen by Jesus. This custom still remained and the numeral merely changed, as, "Afterward he was manifested unto the eleven" (Mk 16 14; cf Lk 24 9.33; Acts 2 14). On the other hand, however, the subst. is also sometimes used, as "The eleven disciples went into Galilee" (Mt 28 16; cf also Acts 1 26). As an illustration of the fixedness of usage, Paul refers to the eleven as "the twelve" when he recounts the appearances of Jesus after His resurrection: "And that he appeared to Cephas; then to the twelve" (1 Cor 15 5).

ELHANAN, el-hā'nan (אֶלְחָנָן, 'elḥānān, "whom God gave");

(1) A great warrior in the army of David who slew a Philii giant. There is a discrepancy between 2 S 21 19 and 1 Ch 20 5. In the former passage we read, "And there was again war with the Philis at Gob; and Elhanan, the son of Jaare-oregim the Beth-lehemite, slew Goliath the Gittite, the staff of whose spear was like a weaver's beam"; while in the latter we are told, "And there was again war with the Philis; and Elhanan the son of Jair slew Lahmi the brother of Goliath the Gittite, the staff of whose spear was like a weaver's beam." Most modern critics prefer as the original text of the latter part of the two discrepant statements the following: "and Elhanan the son of Jair the Beth-lehemite slew Goliath the Gittite, the staff of whose spear was like a weaver's beam." It is contended that the Chronicler slightly modified the text before him, in order to bring it into harmony with 1 S 17, where David is said to have slain a Philii giant Goliath. There is almost unanimous agreement that "Jaare-oregim" is a corrupt reading, and the "Jair" in 1 Ch is to be preferred. From Jerome to the present some scholars identify Elhanan with David, and thus remove the discrepancy. Ewald (Hist, III, 70) argued that the name "Goliath" was inserted in 1 S 17 and 21 by the narrators whose compositions are embodied in Samuel, Elhanan being the real victor over Goliath, while David's antagonist was simply called "the Philistine."

(2) The son of Dodo of Bethlehem, one of David's mighty men (2 S 23 24; 1 Ch 11 26). Some moderns think that there was only one Elhanan, and that he was the son of Dodo of the clan of Jair.

JOHN RICHARD SAMPEY

ELI, ê'li (עֵלִי, 'ēlî): A descendant of Ithamar, the fourth son of Aaron, who exercised the office of high priest in Shiloh at the time of the birth of Samuel. For the first time in Israel, Eli combined in his own person the functions of high priest and judge, judging Israel for 40 years (1 S 4 18). The incidents in Eli's life are few; indeed, the main interest of the narrative is in the other characters who are associated with him. The chief interest centers in Samuel. In Eli's first interview with Hannah (1 S 1 12 ff), she is the central figure; in the second interview (1 S 1 24 ff), it is the child Samuel. When Eli next appears, it is as the father of Hophni and Phinehas, whose worthless and licentious lives had profaned their priestly office, and earned for them the title "men of Belial" (or "worthlessness"). Eli administered no stern rebuke to his sons, but only a gentle chiding of their greed and immorality. Thereafter he was warned by a nameless prophet of the downfall of his house, and of the death of his two sons in one day (1 S 2 27-36), a message later confirmed by Samuel, who had received this word directly from Jeh Himself (1 S 3 11 ff). The prophecy was not long in fulfilment. During the next invasion by the Philis, the Israelites were utterly routed, the ark of God was captured, and Hophni and Phinehas were both slain. When the news reached Eli, he was so overcome that he "fell from off his seat backward by the side of the gate; and his neck brake, and he died" (1 S 4 18). The character of Eli, while sincere and devout, seems to have been entirely lacking in firmness. He appears from the history to have been a good man, full of humility and gentleness, but weak and indulgent. His is not a strong personality; he is always overshadowed by some more commanding or interesting figure.

ELIAB, ê-lî'ab (אֶלִּיָּאֵב, 'ēlî'ābh, "God is father"):

(1) Prince of the tribe of Zebulun in the Exodus (Nu 1 9; 2 7; 7 24.29; 10 16).

(2) A Reubenite, father of Dathan and Abiram (Nu 16 11.12; 26 8 ff; Dt 11 6).

(3) Eldest son of Jesse and brother of David (1 S 16 6), once called Elihu (1 Ch 27 18). He was of commanding appearance (1 S 16 6), and when serving with Saul's army at the time when it was confronting the Philis and Goliath, was inclined to lord it over his brother David (17 28 ff). His daughter Abihail became a wife of Rehoboam (2 Ch 11 18).

(4) An Ephraimite, an ancestor of Samuel (1 Ch 6 27; called Eliel in ver 34, and Elihu in 1 S 1 1).

(5) A Gadite warrior with David (1 Ch 12 9), one of 11 mighty men (vs 8.14).

(6) A Levite musician (1 Ch 15 18.20; 16 5).

(7) An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8 1; cf 9 2).

(1) One of the sons of David (2 S 5 16; 1 Ch 3 8; called BEELIADA, 1 Ch 14 7 [q.v.]).

(2) A descendant of Benjamin and a captain in the army of Jehoshaphat, commander of 200,000 men (2 Ch 17 17).

(3) Father of Rezon, an "adversary" of Solomon (1 K 11 23, AV "Eliadah").

ELIADAS, ê-lî'a-das (Ἐλιαδάς, Eliadás): A son of Zamoth who had married a strange wife (1 Esd 9 28); called Elioenai in Ezr 10 27.

ELIADUN, ê-lî'a-dun, RV ILIADUN (q.v.).

ELIAHBA, ē-lī'a-ba, ē-lī-ā'ba (אֱלִיָּהָבָא, 'elyah-bā', "God hides"): One of David's 30 mighty men (2 S 23 32; 1 Ch 11 33).

ELIAKIM, ē-lī'a-kim (אֱלִיָּאִים, 'elyākīm; 'Ελι-ακιμ, Eliakeim, "God sets up"):

(1) The son of Hilkiah who succeeded Shebna as governor of the palace and "grand vizier" under Hezekiah (Isa 22 20). The functions of his office are seen from the oracle of Isaiah in which Shebna is deposed and Eliakim set in his place (Isa 22 15 ff). He is the "treasurer" (RVm "steward"), and is "over the house" (ver 15). At his installation he is clothed with a robe and girdle, the insignia of his office, and, having the government committed into his hand, is the "father to the inhabitants of Jerus, and to the house of Judah" (ver 21). The key of the house of David is laid on his shoulder, and he alone has power to open and shut, this being symbolic of his absolute authority as the king's representative (ver 22).

One of Solomon's officials is the first mentioned as occupying this position (1 K 4 6), and this office was continued in both the Northern and Southern Kingdom (1 K 16 9; 18 3; 2 K 10 5; 15 5). Its importance is seen from the fact that after Azariah was smitten with leprosy, Jotham his heir "was over the household, judging the people of the land" (2 K 15 5).

When Sennacherib sent an army against Jerus in 701, Eliakim was one of these Jewish princes who held on behalf of Hezekiah a parley with the Assyrian officers (2 K 18 18, 26, 37; Isa 36 3.11.22). As a result of the invader's threats, he was sent by Hezekiah in sackcloth to Isaiah, entreating his prayers to Jeh on behalf of Jerus (2 K 19 2; Isa 37 2).

(2) The original name of Jehoiakim, the son of Josiah, whom Pharaoh-necho made king of Judah (2 K 23 34; 2 Ch 36 4).

(3) A priest who assisted at the dedication of the wall of Jerus, rebuilt after his return from Babylon (Neh 12 41).

(4) A grandson of Zerubbabel and ancestor of Jesus (Mt 1 13).

(5) An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 30).

ELIALI, ē-lī'a-lī ('Ελιαλει, Elialei): 1 Esd 9 34; possibly corresponds to "Binnui" in Ezr 10 38.

ELIAM, ē-lī'am (אֱלִיָּאָם, 'elī'ām, "people's God"):

(1) Father of Bathsheba (2 S 11 3); in 1 Ch 3 5 called Ammiel.

(2) One of David's "thirty," son of Ahithophel the Gilonite (2 S 23 34).

ELIAONIAS, ē-lī-a-ō-nī'as ('Ελιαωνίας, Eliaionias): A descendant of Phaath Moab (1 Esd 8 31); called "Eliehoenai" in Ezr 8 4.

ELIAS, ē-lī'as. See ELIJAH.

ELIASAPH, ē-lī'a-saf (אֱלִיָּאֶשָׁפ, 'elyāšāph, "God has added"):

(1) Son of Deuel; prince of the tribe of Gad in the Exodus (Nu 1 14; 2 14; 7 42.47; 10 20).

(2) Son of Lael; prince of the Gershonites (Nu 3 24).

ELIASHIB, ē-lī'a-shib (אֱלִיָּאֲשִׁיב, 'elyāshīb, "God restores"):

(1) A descendant of David (1 Ch 3 24).

(2) Head of the eleventh course of priests (1 Ch 24 12).

(3) The high priest in the time of Nehemiah. He, with his brethren the priests, helped in the rebuilding of the wall (Neh 3 1). But later he was "allied unto Tobiah" the Ammonite (13 4) and allowed that enemy of Nehemiah the use of a great chamber in the temple (ver 5); and one of his grandsons, a son of Joiada, married a daughter of Sanballat the Horonite and was for this expelled from the community by Nehemiah (ver 28). See SANBALLAT.

(4, 5, 6) Three Israelites, one a "singer," who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 24.27.36).

(7) Father of Jehohanan (Ezr 10 6); probably identical with (3) above. Called Elisib in 1 Esd 9 1.

ELIASIBUS, ē-li-as'i-bus ('Ελιασίβος, Elíasibos, AV Eleazurus): One of the holy singers who had married a foreign wife (1 Esd 9 24); called "Elia-shib" in Ezr 10 27.

ELIASIMUS, ē-li-as'i-mus ('Ελιασίμος, Elíasimos; AV Elisimus): One who had married a foreign wife (1 Esd 9 28).

ELIASIS, ē-lī'a-sis ('Ελιασίς, Elíasis): One who had married a foreign wife (1 Esd 9 34); corresponds to "Jaasu" in Ezr 10 37.

ELIATHAH, ē-lī'a-tha (אֱלִיָּאֲתָה, 'elī'athā, "God has come"): A Hemanite, head of the twentieth division of the temple musicians (1 Ch 25 4.27).

ELIDAD, ē-lī'dad (אֱלִידָד, 'elīdhād, "God has loved"): Prince of Benjamin in the division of the land (Nu 34 21); perhaps the same as ELDAD (q.v.).

ELIEHOENAI, ē-lī-ē-hō'ē-nī (אֱלִי־הוֹעֲנַי, 'elye-hō'ēnay, "to Jeh are mine eyes"):

(1) (AV Eliehoenai) a Korahite doorkeeper (1 Ch 26 3).

(2) (AV Elihoenai) Head of a family in the Return (Ezr 8 4).

ELIEL, ē-lī'el, el'ī-el (אֱלִיֵּל, 'elī'ēl, "El is God," or "my God is God"):

(1, 2, 3) Mighty men of David (1 Ch 11 46.47; 12 11).

(4) A chief of Manasseh, east of the Jordan (1 Ch 5 24).

(5, 6) Two chiefs of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 20.22).

(7) A chief Levite from Hebron (1 Ch 15 9.11).

(8) A Kohathite in the line of Elkanah, Samuel and Heman (1 Ch 6 34); see ELIAB (4).

(9) A Levite of the time of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31 13).

ELIENAI, el-i-ē'nā-i (אֱלִיעֵנַי, 'elī'ēnay): A Benjamite chief (1 Ch 8 20).

ELIEZER, el-i-ē'zēr, ē-lī-ē'zēr (אֱלִיעֶזֶר, 'elī'ēzer; 'Ελιέζερ, Elíezer, "God is help"):

(1) The chief servant of Abram (Gen 15 2); ARV "Eliezer of Damascus," ERV "Dammeseek Eliezer." The Heb is peculiar: lit. "And the son of the possession [meshek] of my house is Dammeseek [of] Eliezer." A possible but unlikely meaning is that his property would become the possession of Damascus, the city of Eliezer. Tg Syr (RVm) read "Eliezer the Damascene": this supposes a reading, "Eliezer ha-dammaskī" or "mid-dammeseek." The text may be corrupt: the assonance between meshek and Dammesek is suspicious. Abram calls Eliezer "one born in my house," i.e. a dependant, a member of his household, and so regards him as his heir, Lot having gone from him (Gen 13). Eliezer is probably the servant, "the elder of his house, that ruled over all that he had," of Gen 24.

(2) The 2d son of Moses and Zipporah, called thus for "the God of my father was my help, and delivered me from the sword of Pharaoh" (Ex 18 4; 1 Ch 23 15 ff.).

(3) A son of Becher, one of the sons of Benjamin (1 Ch 7 8).

(4) A priest who assisted in bringing up the ark from the house of Obed-edom to Jerus (1 Ch 15 24).

(5) The son of Zichri, ruler over the Reubenites in the time of David (1 Ch 27 16).

(6) The son of Dodavahu of Mareshah who prophesied the destruction of the ships which Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, built, because he had done so in coöperation with Ahaziah, king of Israel (2 Ch 20 35 ff.).

(7) One of the messengers whom Ezra sent to Iddo, the chief at Casiphia, with the request for ministers for the Temple (Ezr 8 16 ff.).

(8, 9, 10) A priest, a Levite, and one of the sons of Harim who had married non-Israelitish women (Ezr 10 18, 23, 31).

(11) An ancestor of Jesus in the genealogy given by St. Luke (Lk 3 29). S. F. HUNTER

ELIHU, ʿē-lī'hū (אֱלִיָּהוּ, 'Elihu; Ἠλείου, Ἠλείου, "He is [my] God," or "my God is He"):

(1) An ancestor of Samuel (1 S 1 1), called Eliel in 1 Ch 6 34 and Eliab in 1 Ch 6 27 (see ELIAB).

(2) Found in 1 Ch 27 18 for Eliab, David's eldest brother (1 S 16 6); called "one of the brethren of D."

(3) A Manassite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12 20).

(4) A Korahite porter (1 Ch 26 7).

(5) A friend of Job. See next art.

(6) An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8 1).

ELIHU (אֱלִיָּהוּ, 'Elihu, אֱלִיָּהוּ, 'Elihu, "He is [my] God"; Ἠλείου, Ἠλείου): One of the disputants in the Book of Job; a young man who, having listened in silence to the arguments of Job and his friends, is moved to prolong the discussion and from his juster views of truth set both parties right. He is of the tribe of Buz (cf Gen 22 21), a brother-tribe to that of Uz, and of the family of Ram, or Aram, that is, an Aramaean. He is not mentioned as one of the characters of the story until ch 32; and then, as the friends are silenced and Job's words are ended, Elihu has the whole field to himself, until the theophany of the whirlwind proves too portentous for him to bear. His four speeches take up chs 32-37. Some critics have considered that the Elihu portion of the Book of Job was added by a later hand, and urge obscurities and prolixities, as well as a different style, to prove that it was the work of an inferior writer. This estimate seems, however, to take into account only the part it plays in a didactic treatise, or a theological debate. It looks quite different when we read it as a real dramatic element in a story; in other words, when we realize that the prevailing interest of the Book of Job is not dialectic but narrative. Thus viewed, the Elihu episode is a skilfully managed agency in preparing the dénouement. Consider the situation at the end of Job's words (31 40). Job has vindicated his integrity and stands ready to present his cause to God (31 35-37). The friends, however, have exhausted their resources, and through three discourses have been silent, as it were, snuffed out of existence. It is at this point, then, that Elihu is introduced, to renew their contention with young constructive blood, and represent their cause (as he deems) better than they can themselves. He is essentially at one with them in condemning Job (34 34-37); his only quarrel with them is on the score of the inconclusiveness of their arguments (32 3.5). His self-portrayal is conceived in a decided spirit of satire on the part of the writer, not unmingled with a sardonic humor. He is very egotistic, very sure of the value of his ideas; much of his alleged prolixity is due to that voluble self-deprecation which betrays an inordinate opinion of oneself (cf 32 6-22). This, whether inferior composition or not, admirably adapts his words to his character. For substance of discourse he adds materially to what the friends have said, but in a more rationalistic vein; speaks edifyingly, as the friends have not done, of the disciplinary value of affliction, and of God's means of revelation by dreams and visions and the interpreting of an intercessory friend (33 13-28). Very evidently, however, his ego is the center of his system; it is he who sets up as Job's mediator (33 5-7; cf 9 32-35), and his sage remarks on God's power and wisdom in Nature are full of self-importance. All this seems designed to accentuate the almost ludicrous humiliation of his collapse when from a natural phenomenon the oncoming tempest shows unusual and supernatural signs. His words become disjointed and incoherent, and cease with a kind of attempt to recant his pretensions. And the verdict from the whirlwind is: "darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge." Elihu thus has a real function in the story, as honorable as overweening self-confidence is apt to be. JOHN FRANKLIN GENUNG

(1) The great prophet of the times of Ahab, king of Israel. E. is identified at his first appearance (1 K 17 1) as "E. the Tishbite, who was of the sojourners of Gilead." Thus his native place must have been called Tishbeh. A Tishbeh (Thisbe) in the territory of Naphtali is known from Tob 1 2; but if (with most modern commentators) the reading of the LXX in 1 K is followed, the word tr<sup>d</sup> "sojourners" is itself "Tishbeh," locating the place in Gilead and making the prophet a native of that mountain region and not merely a "sojourner" there.

I. The Works of Elijah.—In 1 K 16 29-34 we read of the impieties of Ahab, culminating in his patronage of the worship of the Tyrian Baal, god of his Tyrian queen Jezebel (ver 31). Ver 34 mentions as another instance of the little weight attached in Ahab's time to ancient prophetic threatenings, the rebuilding by Hiel the Bethelite of the banned city of Jericho, "with the loss" of Hiel's eldest and youngest sons. This is the situation which calls for a judgment of Jeh, announced beforehand, as is often the case, by a faithful prophet of Jeh.

Whether E. was already a familiar figure at the court of Ahab, the narrative beginning with 1 K 17

1 does not state. His garb and manner identified him as a prophet, in any case (2 K 1 8; cf Zec 13 4). E. declared in few words that Jeh, true and only rightful God of Israel, whose messenger he was, was even at the very time sending a drought which should continue until the prophet himself declared it at an end. The term is to be fixed, indeed, not by E. but by Jeh; it is not to be short ("these years"), and it is to end only when the chastisement is seen to be sufficient. Guided, as true prophets were continually, by the "word of Jeh," E. then hid himself in one of the ravines east of ("before") the Jordan, where the brook Cherith afforded him water, and ravens brought him abundant food ("bread and flesh" twice daily), 1 K 17 2-6. As the drought advanced the brook dried up. E. was then directed, by the "word of Jeh," as constantly, to betake himself beyond the western limit of Ahab's kingdom to the Phoen village of Zarephath, near Sidon. There the widow to whom Jeh sent him was found gathering a few sticks from the ground at the city gate, to prepare a last meal for herself and her son. She yielded to the prophet's command that he himself should be first fed from her scanty store; and in return enjoyed the fulfilment of his promise, uttered in the name of Jeh, that neither barrel of meal nor cruse of oil should be exhausted before the breaking of the drought. (Jos. Ant. VIII, xiii, 2, states on the authority of Menander that the drought extended to Phoenicia and continued there for a full year.) But when the widow's son fell sick and died, the mother regarded it as a Divine judgment upon her sins, a judgment which had been drawn upon her by the presence of the man of God. At the prayer of E., life returned to the child (vs 17-24).

"In the third year," 1 K 18 1 (Lk 4 25; Jas 5 17 give three years and six months as the length of the drought), E. was directed to show himself to Ahab as the herald of rain from Jeh. How sorely both man and beast in Israel were pressed by drought and the resulting famine, is shown by the fact that King Ahab and his chief steward Obadiah were in person searching through the land for any patches of green grass that might serve to keep alive some of the king's own horses and mules (vs 5,6). The words of Obadiah upon meeting with E. show the impression which had been produced by the prophet's long absence. It was believed that the Spirit of God had carried E. away to some unknown, inaccessible, mysterious region (vs 10,12). Obadiah feared that such would again be the case, and, while he entreated the prophet not to make him the bearer of a message to Ahab, appealed to his own well-known piety and zeal, as shown in his sheltering and feeding, during Jezebel's persecution, a hundred prophets of Jeh. E. reassured the steward by a solemn oath that he would show himself to Ahab (ver 15). The king greeted the prophet with the haughty words, "Is it thou, thou troubler of Israel?" E.'s reply, answering scorn with scorn, is what we should expect from a prophet; the woes of Israel are not to be charged to the prophet who declared the doom, but to the kings who made the nation deserve it (vs 17,18).

Elijah went on to challenge a test of the false god's power. Among the pensioners of Jezebel

2. The Ordeal by Prayer were 450 prophets of Baal and 400 prophets of the Asherah—still fed by the royal bounty in spite of the famine. Accepting E.'s proposal, Ahab called all these and all the people to Mt. Carmel (vs 19,20). E.'s first word to the assembly implied the folly of their thinking that the allegiance of a people could successfully be divided between two deities: "How long go ye limping between the two sides?" (possibly "leaping over two thresholds," in ironical allusion to the custom of leaping over the threshold of an idol temple, to avoid a stumble, which would be unpropitious; cf 1 S 5 1-5). Taking the people's silence as an indication that they admitted the force of his first words, E. went on to propose his conditions for the test: a bullock was to be offered to Baal, a bullock to Jeh, but no fire put under; "The God that answereth by fire, let him be God." The voice of the people approved the proposal as fair (vs 22-24). Throughout a day of blazing sunshine the prophets of Baal called in frenzy upon their god, while E. mocked them with merciless sarcasm (vs 25-29). About the time for the regular offering of the evening sacrifice in the temple of Jeh at Jerus, E. assumed control. Rebuilding an ancient altar thrown down perhaps in Jezebel's persecution; using in the rebuilding twelve stones, symbolizing an undivided Israel such as was promised to the patriarch Jacob of old; drenching sacrifice and wood with water from some perennial spring under the slopes of Carmel, until even a trench about the altar, deep and wide enough to have a two- $\text{se'ah}$  (half-bushel) measure set in it, was filled—the prophet called in few and earnest words upon the God of the fathers of the nation (vs 30-37). The answer of Jeh by fire, consuming bullock, wood, altar and the very dust, struck the people with awe and fear. Convinced that Jeh was God alone for them, they readily carried out the prophet's stern sentence of death for the prophets of the idol god (vs 38-40). Next the prophet bade Ahab make haste with the meal, probably a sacrificial feast for the multitude, which had been made ready; because rain was at hand. On the mountain top E. bowed in prayer, sending his servant seven times to look out across the sea for the coming storm. At last the appearance of a rising cloud "as small as a man's hand" was reported; and before the hurrying chariot of the king could cross the plain to Jezreel it was overtaken by "a great rain" from heavens black with clouds and wind after three rainless years. With strength above nature, E. ran like a courier before Ahab to the very gate of Jezreel (vs 41-46).

The same night a messenger from Jezebel found E. The message ran, "As surely as thou art E. and I am Jezebel" (so the LXX), "so let the gods do to me, and more also" (i.e. may I be cut in pieces like a sacrificed animal if I break my vow; cf Gen 15 8-11,17,18; Jer 34 18,19), "if I make not thy life as the life of one of" the slain prophets of Baal "by to-morrow about this time." Explain E.'s action how we may—and all the possible explanations of it have found defenders—he sought safety in instant flight. At Beersheba, the southernmost town of Judah, he left his "servant," whom the narrative does not elsewhere mention. Going onward into the southern wilderness, he sat down under the scanty shade of a desert broom-bush and prayed that he might share the common fate of mankind in death (19 1-4). After sleep he was refreshed with food brought by an angel. Again he slept and was fed. In the strength of that food he then wandered on for forty days and nights, until he found himself at Horeb, the mountain sacred because there Jeh had revealed Himself to Moses (vs 5-8). The repetition of identical words by E. in vs 10 and 14 represents a difficulty. Unless we are to suppose an accidental repetition by a very early copyist (early, since it appears already in the LXX), we may see in it an indication that E.'s despondency was not easily removed, or that he sought at Horeb an especial manifestation of Jeh for his encouragement, or both. The prophet was hidden to take his stand upon the sacred mount; and Jeh passed by, heralded by tempest, earthquake and thunderstorm (vs 9-12). These were Jeh's fore-runners only; Jeh was not in them, but in the "still small voice," such as the prophets were accustomed to hear within their souls. When E. heard the not unfamiliar inner voice, he recognized Jeh present to hear and answer him. E. seems to be seeking to justify his own retreat to the wilderness by the plea that he had been "very jealous," had done in Jeh's cause all that mortal prophet could do, before he fled, yet all in vain! The same people who had forsaken the law and "covenant" of Jeh, thrown down His altars and slain His prophets, would have allowed the slaughter of E. himself at the command of Jezebel; and in him would have perished the last true servant of Jeh in all the land of Israel (vs 13.14).

Divine compassion passed by E.'s complaint in order to give him directions for further work in Jeh's cause. E. must anoint Hazael to seize the throne of Syria, Israel's worst enemy among the neighboring powers; Jehu, in like manner, he must anoint to put an end to the dynasty of Ahab and assume the throne of Israel; and Elisha, to be his own successor in the prophetic office. These three, Hazael and his Syrians, Jehu and his followers, even Elisha himself, are to execute further judgments upon the idolaters and the scorners in Israel. Jeh will leave Himself 7,000 (a round number, a limited but not an excessively small one, conveying a doctrine, like the doctrine of later prophets, of the salvation of a righteous remnant) in Israel, men proof against the judgment because they did not share the sin. If E. was rebuked at all, it was only in the contrast between the 7,000 faithful and the one, himself, which he believed to number all the righteous left alive in Israel (vs 15-18).

The anointing of Hazael and of Jehu seems to have been left to E.'s successor; indeed, we read of no anointing of Hazael, but only of a significant interview between that worthy and Elisha (2 K 8 7-15). E. next appears in the narrative as rebuker of Ahab for the judicial murder of Naboth. In the very piece of ground which the king had coveted and seized, the prophet appeared, unexpected and unwelcome, to declare upon Ahab, Jezebel and all their house the doom of a shameful death (1 K 21). There was present at this scene, in attendance upon the king, a captain named Jehu, the very man already chosen as the supplanter of Ahab, and he never forgot what he then saw and heard (2 K 9 25.26).

4. The Case of Naboth

Ahab's penitence (1 K 21 28.29) averted from himself some measure of the doom. His son

5. Ellijah and Ahaziah

Ahaziah pulled it down upon his own head. Sick unto death from injuries received in a fall, Ahaziah sent to ask an oracle concerning his recovery at the shrine of Baal-zebub in Ekron. E. met the messengers and turned them back with a prediction, not from Baal-zebub but from Jeh, of impending death. Ahaziah recognized by the messengers' description the ancient "enemy" of his house. A captain and fifty soldiers sent to arrest the prophet were consumed by fire from heaven at E.'s word. A second captain with another fifty met the same fate. A third besought the prophet to spare his life, and E. went with him to the king, but only to repeat the words of doom (2 K 1).

A foreboding, shared by the "sons of the prophets" at Beth-el and Jericho, warned E. that the closing scene of his earthly life was at hand.

6. Ellijah Translated

He desired to meet the end, come in what form it might, alone. Elisha, however, bound himself by an oath not to leave his master. E. divided Jordan with the stroke of his mantle, that the two might pass over toward the wilderness on the east. Elisha asked that he might receive a firstborn's portion of the spirit which rested upon his master. "A chariot of fire, and horses of fire" appeared, and parted the two asunder; "and E. went up by a whirlwind into heaven" (2 K 2 1-11).

In 2 Ch 21 12-15 we read of a "writing" from E. to Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah.

The statements of 2 K 3 11.12 admit of no other interpretation than that the succession of Elisha to independent prophetic work had already occurred in the lifetime of Jehoshaphat. It has been pointed out that the difficult verse, 2 K 8 16, appears to mean that Jehoram began to reign at some time before the death of his father; it is also conceivable that E. left a message, reduced to writing either before or after his departure, for the future king of Judah who should depart from the true faith.

II. The Work of Ellijah.—One's estimate of the importance of the work of E. depends upon one's conception of the condition of things which the prophet confronted in Northern Israel. While it is true that the reign of Ahab was outwardly prosperous, and the king himself not without a measure of political sagacity together with personal courage, his religious policy at best involved such tolerance of false faiths as could lead only to disaster. Ever since the time of Joshua, the religion of Jeh had been waging its combat with the old Canaanite worship of the powers of Nature, a worship rendered to local deities, the "Baalim" or "lords" of this and that neighborhood; whose ancient altars stood "upon the high mountains, and upon the hills, and under every green tree" (Dt 12 2). The god imported from Phoenicia by Jezebel bore also the title Baal; but his character and his worship were worse and more debasing than anything that had before been known. Resistance offered by the servants of Jeh to the claims of the queen's favored god led to persecution, rightly ascribed by the historian to Jezebel (1 K 18 4). In the face of this danger, the differences between the worship of Jeh as carried on in the Northern Kingdom and the same worship as practised at Jerus sank out of sight. The one effort of E. was to recall the people from the Tyrian Baal to Jeh, the God of their fathers. The vitality of the true religion in the crisis is shown by the fidelity of such a man as Obadiah (1 K 18 3 f), or by the perseverance of a righteous remnant of 7,000, in spite of all that had happened of persecution (19 18). The work begun by E. was finished, not without blood, by Jehu; we hear no more of the worship of the Tyrian Baal in Israel after that anointed usurper's time (2 K 9, 10). To say that E. at Horeb "learns the gentleness of God" (Strachan in HDB) is to contradict the immediate text of the narrative and the history of the times. The direction given E. was that he should anoint one man to seize the throne of Syria, another to seize that of Israel, and a prophet to continue his own work; with the promise and prediction that these three forces should unite in executing upon guilty Israel the judgment still due for its apostasy from Jeh and its worship of a false god. E. was not a reformer of peace; the very vision of peace was hidden from his eyes, reserved for later prophets for whom he could but prepare the way. It was his mission to destroy at whatever cost the heathen worship which else would have destroyed Israel itself, with consequences whose evil we cannot estimate. Amos and Hosea would have had no standing-ground had it not been for the work of E. and the influences which at Divine direction he put in operation.

III. Character of the Prophet.—It is obvious that the Scripture historian does not intend to furnish us with a character-study of the prophet E. Does he furnish even the material upon which such a study may profitably be attempted? The characterization found in Jas 5 17, "E. was a man of like passions [m "nature"] with us," is brief indeed; but examination of the books which have been written upon the life of E. leads to the conclusion that it is possible to err by attaching to events meanings which those events were never intended to bear, as well as by introducing into one's study too much of sheer imagination. It is easy, for example, to observe that E. is introduced to the reader with suddenness, and that his appearances and disappearances in the narrative seem abrupt; but is one warranted in arguing from this a like abruptness in the prophet's character? Is not the sufficient explanation to be reached by observing that the historian's purpose was not to give a complete biography of any individual, whether prophet or king, but to display the working of Jeh upon and with the kingdoms of Israel and Judah through the prophets? Few personal details are therefore to be found recorded concerning even such a prophet as E.; and none at all, unless they have a direct bearing upon his message. The imagination of some has discerned a "training of E." in the experiences of the prophet; but to admit that there must have been such a training does not oblige us to discover traces of it in the scenes and incidents which are recorded.

Distrusting, for the reasons above suggested, any attempt at a detailed representation of the prophet's inner life, one may seek, and prize, what seems to lie upon the surface of the narrative: faith in Jeh as God of Nature and as covenant God of the patriarchs and their descendants; consuming "zeal" against the false religion which would displace Jeh from the place which must be His alone; keen vision to perceive hypocrisy and falsehood, and sharp wit to lash them, with the same boldness and disregard of self that must needs mark the true prophet in any age.

IV. Miracles in the Elijah Narratives.—The miraculous element must be admitted to be prominent in the experiences and works of E. It cannot be estimated apart from the general position which the student finds it possible to hold concerning miracles recorded in the OT. The effort to explain away one or another item in a rationalistic way is wholly unprofitable. E.'s "ravens" may indeed be converted by a change of vowel-points into "Arabians"; but, in spite of the fact that Orientals would bring offerings of food to a holy hermit, the whole tenor of the narrative favors no other supposition than that its writer meant "ravens," and saw in the event another such exercise of the power of Jeh over all things as was to be seen in the supply of meal and oil for the prophet and the widow of Zarephath, the fire from heaven, the parting of the Jordan, or the ascension of the prophet by a whirlwind into heaven. Some modern critics recognize a different and later source in the narrative of 2 K 1; but here again no real difficulty, if any difficulty there be, is removed. The stern prophet who would order the slaughter of the 450 Baal prophets might well call down fire to consume the soldiers of an apostate and a hostile king. The purpose and meaning of the E. chapters is to be grasped by those who accept their author's conception of Jeh, of His power, and of His work in Nature and with men, rather than by those who seek to replace that conception by another.

V. Elijah in the NT.—Malachi (4 5) names E. as the forerunner of "the great and terrible day of Jeh," and the expectation founded upon this passage is alluded to in Mk 6 15 || Lk 9 8; Mt 16 14 || Mk 8 28 || Lk 9 19; Mt 27 47-49 || Mk 15 35.36. The interpretation of Malachi's prophecy foreshadowed in the angelic annunciation to Zacharias (Lk 1 17), that John the Baptist should do the work of another Elijah, is given on the authority of Jesus Himself (Mt 11 14). The appearance of E., with Moses, on the Mt. of Transfiguration, is recorded in Mt 17 1-13 || Mk 9 2-13 || Lk 9 28-36, and in Mt 11 14 || Mk 9 13 Jesus again identifies the E. of Malachi with John the Baptist. The fate of the soldiers of Ahaziah (2 K 1) is in the mind of James and John on one occasion (Lk 9 54). Jesus Himself alludes to E. and his sojourn in the land of Sidon (Lk 4 25.26). Paul makes use of the prophet's experience at Horeb (Rom 11 2-4). In Jas 5 17.18 the work of E. affords an instance of the powerful supplication of a righteous man.

LITERATURE.—The histories of Israel and commentaries on Kings are many. Those which tend to rationalizing tend also to decrease the importance of E. to the history. F. W. Robertson, Sermons, 2d ser., V; Maurice, Prophets and Kings of the OT, Sermon VIII; Milligan, Elijah ("Men of the Bible" ser.); W. M. Taylor, Elijah the Prophet.

ELIKA, ʔ-lī'ka (אֵלִיקָא, 'ēlikā, "God is rector[?]"). The Harodite (Uradite), one of David's guard, the "thirty" (2 S 23 25). Omitted from 1 Ch 11 27.

ELIM, ʔ-līm (אֵילִים, 'ēlīm, "terēbinths"; Αἰλεῖμ, Aileīm): The second encampment of the Israelites after crossing the Red Sea. It was a contrast to the previous camp called "Marah" because of the bitterness of the waters, for there "were twelve springs of water, and threescore and ten palm trees" (Ex 15 27; 16 1; Nu 33 9f). The traditional site is an oasis in Wādy Ghurundel, cir 63 miles from Suez. See EXODUS; WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

ELIMELECH, ʔ-līm'e-lek (אֵלִימֶלֶךְ, 'ēlīmēlekh, "my God is king"; Αβειμέλεχ, Abeimēlekh, Αλιμέλεκ, Alimēlek): Elimelech was a member of the tribe of Judah, a native of Bethlehem Judah, a man of wealth and probably head of a family or clan (Ruth 1 2.3; 2 1.3). He lived during the period of the Judges, had a hereditary possession near Bethlehem, and is chiefly known as the husband of Naomi, the mother-in-law of Ruth and ancestress of David the king. Because of a severe famine in Judaea, he emigrated to the land of Moab with his wife and his sons, Mahlon and Chilion. Not long afterward he died, and his two sons married Moabitish women, Ruth and Orpah. Ten years in all were spent in Moab, when the two sons died, and the three widows were left. Soon afterward Naomi decided to return to Judah, and the sequel is told in the Book of Ruth. See RUTH; NAOMI.

ELIONAS, el-i-ʔ'nas (Ἐλιωνάς, Eliōnás, Ἐλιωνάϊς, Eliōnāis): The name of two men who had married foreign wives (1 Esd 9 22.23), corresponding respectively to "Elioenai" and "Eliezer" in Ezr 10 22.31.

ELIPHAL, ʔ-lī'fal, el'i-fal (אֵלִיפָאֵל, 'ēliphāl, "God has judged"): Son of Ur, one of the mighty men of David's armies (1 Ch 11 35). RV in a footnote identifies him with Eliphelet, son of Ahasbai, the son of the Maachathite (2 S 23 34; cf Davis, Dict. of the Bible, s.v. "Ur"). See also 1 Ch 14 5.7.

ELIPHALAT, ʔl-lif'a-lat ('Ελιφαλέρ, Eliphale't; 1 Esd 8 39; 9 33): Called "Eliphelet" in Ezr 8 13; 10 33.

ELIPHAZ, el'i-faz, ʔl-lif'az (עֲלִיפָאז, 'Eliphaz, "God is fine gold" [?]):

(1) Son of Esau by Adah, and father of Teman, Kenaz and Amalek (Gen 36 4.10; 1 Ch 1 35 f). See also EDU.

(2) See next article.

ELIPHAZ: The first and most prominent of the three friends of Job (Job 2 11), who come from distant places to console and comfort him, when they hear of his affliction. That he is to be regarded as their leader and spokesman is shown by the greater weight and originality of his speeches (contained in chs 4, 5, 15, 22), the speeches of the other friends being in fact largely echoes and emotional enforcements of his thoughts, and by the fact that he is taken as their representative (Job 42 7) when, after the address from the whirlwind, Jeh appoints their expiation for the wrong done to Job and to the truth. He is represented as a venerable and benignant sage from Teman in Idumaea, a place noted for its wisdom (cf Jer 49 7), as was also the whole land of Edom (cf Ob ver 8); and doubtless it is the writer's design to make his words typical of the best wisdom of the world. This wisdom is the result of ages of thought and experience (cf Job 15 17-19), of long and ripened study (cf 5 27), and claims the authority of revelation, though only revelation of a secondary kind (cf Eliphaz' vision, 4 12 ff, and his challenge to Job to obtain the like, 5 1). In his first speech he deduces Job's affliction from the natural sequence of effect from cause (4 7-11), which cause he makes broad enough to include innate impurity and depravity (4 17-19); evinces a quietism which deprecates Job's self-deceiving ebullitions of wrath (5 2.3; cf Job's answer, 6 2.3 and 30 24); and promises restoration as the result of penitence and submission. In his second speech he is irritated because Job's blasphemous words are calculated to hinder devotion (15 4), attributes them to iniquity (vs 5.6), reiterates his depravity doctrine (vs 14-16), and initiates the lurid descriptions of the wicked man's fate, in which the friends go on to overstate their case (15 20-35). In the third speech he is moved by the exigencies of his theory to impute actual frauds and crimes to Job, iniquities indulged in because God was too far away to see (22 5-15); but as a close holds open to him still the way of penitence, abjuring of iniquity, and restoration to health and wealth (22 21-30). His utterances are well composed and judicial (too coldly academic, Job thinks, 16 4.5), full of good religious counsel abstractly considered. Their error is in their inveterate presupposition of Job's wickedness, their unsympathetic clinging to theory in the face of fact, and the suppressing of the human promptings of friendship.

III. GENERAL ESTIMATE LITERATURE

A prophet, the disciple and successor of Elijah. He was the son of Shaphat, lived at Abel-meholah, at the northern end of the Jordan valley and a little S. of the Sea of Galilee. Nothing is told of his parents but the father's name, though he must have been a man of some wealth and doubtless of earnest piety. No hint is given of Elisha's age or birth-place, and it is almost certain that he was born and reared at Abel-meholah, and was a comparatively young man when we first hear of him. His early life thus was spent on his father's estate, in a god-fearing family, conditions which have produced so many of God's prophets. His moral and religious nature was highly developed in such surroundings, and from his work on his father's farm he was called to his training as a prophet and successor of Elijah.

I. His Call and Preparation.—The first mention of him occurs in 1 K 19 16. Elijah was at Horeb, learning perhaps the greatest lesson of his life; and one of the three duties with which he was charged was to anoint Elisha, the son of Shaphat of Abel-meholah, as prophet in his stead.

Elijah soon went northward and as he passed the lands of Shaphat he saw Elisha plowing in the rich level field of his father's farm. Twelve

1. His Call yoke of oxen were at work, Elisha himself plowing with the twelfth yoke.

Crossing over to him Elijah threw his mantle upon the young man (1 K 19 19). Elisha seemed to understand the meaning of the symbolic act, and was for a moment overwhelmed with its significance. It meant his adoption as the son and successor of Elijah in the prophetic office. Naturally he would hesitate a moment before making such an important decision. As Elijah strode on, Elisha felt the irresistible force of the call of God and ran after the great prophet, announcing that he was ready to follow, only he wished to give a parting kiss to his father and mother (19 20). Elijah seemed to realize what it meant to the young man, and bade him "Go back again; for what have I done to thee?" The call was not such an urgent one as Elisha seemed to think, and the response had better be deliberate and voluntary. But Elisha had fully made up his mind, slew the yoke of oxen with which he was plowing, boiled their flesh with the wood of the implements he was using, and made a farewell feast for his friends. He then followed Elijah, making a full renunciation of home ties, comforts and privileges. He became Elijah's servant; and we have but one statement describing their relationship (2 K 3 11): he "poured water on the hands of Elijah."

They seem to have spent several years together (1 K 22 1; 2 K 1 17), for Elisha became well known among the various schools of the prophets. While ministering to the needs of his master, Elisha learned many deep and important lessons, imbibed much of his spirit, and developed his own religious nature and efficiency until he was ready for the prophetic service himself. It seems almost certain that they lived among the schools of the prophets, and not in the mountains and hills as Elijah had previously done. During these years the tie between the two men became very deep and strong. They were years of great significance to the young prophet and of careful teaching on the part of the older. The lesson learned at Horeb was not forgotten and its meaning would be profoundly impressed upon the younger man, whose whole after-life shows that he had deeply imbibed the teaching.

The final scene shows the strong and tender affection he cherished toward his master. Aware that the end was near, he determined to be with him until the last. Nothing could persuade him to leave Elijah. When asked what should be done for him, before his master was taken away, he asks for the elder son's portion, a double portion, of his master's spirit (2 K 2 9). He has no thought of equality; he would be Elijah's firstborn son. The request shows how deeply he had imbibed of his master's spirit already. His great teacher disappears in a whirlwind, and, awestruck by the wonderful sight, Elisha rends his clothes, takes up the garment of Elijah, retraces his steps to the Jordan, smites the waters to test whether the spirit of Elijah had really fallen upon him, and as the water parts, he passes over dry shod. The sons of the prophets who have been watching the proceedings from the hills, at once observe that the spirit of Elijah rested upon Elisha, and they bowed before him in reverence and submission (2 K 2 12-15). Elisha now begins his prophetic career which must have lasted 50 years, for it extended over the reign of Jehoram, Jehu, Jehoahaz and Joash. The change in him is now so manifest that he is universally recognized as Elijah's successor and the religious leader of the prophetic schools. The skepticism of the young prophets regarding the translation of Elijah found little sympathy with Elisha, but he is conciliatory and humors them (2 K 2 16-18).

II. His Prophetic Career.—As we study the life of Elisha we look first at the record of his career. The compiler of these records has followed no strict chronological order. Like other Scripture writers he has followed the system of grouping his materials. The records in 2 K 2 19-57 are probably in the order of their occurrence. The events in chs 6-9 cannot be chronologically arranged, as the name of the king of Israel is not mentioned. In 6 23 we are told that the Syrians came no more into the land of Israel, and ver 24 proceeds to give an account of Ben-hadad's invasion and the terrible siege of Samaria. In ch 5 Gehazi is smitten with leprosy, while in ch 8 he is in friendly converse with the king. In ch 13 the death of Joash is recorded, and this is followed by the record of his last interview with Elisha (2 K 13 14-19) which event occurred some years previously.

When he began his career of service he carried the mantle of Elijah, but we read no more of that mantle; he is arrayed as a private citizen (2 K 2 12) in common garments (b'ghādhīm). He carries the walking-staff of ordinary citizens, using it for working miracles (2 K 4 29). He seems to have lived in different cities, sojourning at Bethel or Jericho with the sons of the prophets, or dwelling in his own home in Dothan or Samaria (2 K 6 24-32). He passed Shunem so frequently on foot that a prophet's chamber was built for his special use (4 8-11).

(1) Elijah's ministry began by shutting up the heavens for three and a half years; Elisha's began by healing a spring of water near Jericho (2 21). One of these possessed certain noxious qualities, and complaint is made to Elisha that it is unfit for drinking and injurious to the land (2 19). He takes salt in a new vessel, casts it into the spring and the waters are healed so that there was not "from thence any more death or miscarrying" (2 21).

(2) Leaving Jericho, 'a pleasant situation,' he passes up to the highlands of Ephraim, doubtless by the Wady Suweinit, and approaches Bethel, a seat of Baal worship and headquarters of idolatry. The bald head, or perhaps closely cropped head, of Elisha, in contrast with that of Elijah, provoked the ridicule of some "young lads out of the city," who called after him "Go up, thou baldhead," their taunt manifesting the most blatant profanity and utter disregard of God or anything sacred. Elisha, justly angered, turned and cursed them in the name of Jeh. Two bears soon break forth from the woods of that wild region and make fearful havoc among the boys. Elisha may have shown severity and a vindictiveness in this, but he was in no way to blame for the punishment which overtook the boys. He had nothing to do with the bears and was in no way responsible for the fate of the lads. The Sept adds that they threw stones, and the rabbis tell how E. was himself punished, but these attempts to tone down the affair are uncalled for and useless (2 23,24).

(3) From Bethel E. passed on to Mt. Carmel, the home of a school of the prophets, spent some time there and returned to Samaria the capital (2 25). His next deed of mercy was to relieve the pressing needs of a widow of one of the prophets. The name of the place is not given (4 1-7).

(4) On his many journeys up and down the country, he frequently passed by the little village of Shunem, on the slopes of "Little Hermon." The modern name is Sōlam. It was about three miles from Jezreel. Accustomed to accept hospitality of one of the women of the place, he so impressed her with his sanctity that she appealed to her husband to build a chamber for the "holy man of God, that passeth by us continually." This was done, and in return for this hospitality a son was born to the woman, who suddenly dies in early boyhood and is restored to life by the prophet (4 8-37).

(5) E. is next at Gilgal, residing with the sons of the prophets. It is a time of famine and they are subsisting on what they can find. One of them finds some wild gourds (paḳḳu'ōth), shreds them into the pot and they are cooked. The men have no sooner begun to eat than they taste the poison and cry to Elisha, "O man of God, there is death in the pot." Throwing in some meal, E. at once renders the dish harmless and wholesome (4 38-41).

(6) Probably at about the same time and place and during the same famine, a man from Baal-shalishah brought provisions as a present to Elisha—twenty loaves of fresh barley bread and fresh ears of grain. Unselfishly E. commands that it be given to the people to eat. The servant declared it was altogether insufficient for a hundred men, but E. predicts that there will be enough and to spare (4 42-44). This miracle closely resembles the two miracles of Jesus.

(7) The next incident is the healing of Naaman, the leprous commander of the Syrian army (5 1-19). He is afflicted with the white leprosy, the most malignant kind (ver 27). A Jewish maiden, captured in one of their numerous invasions of Eastern Pal, and sold into slavery with a multitude of others, tells her mistress, the wife of Naaman, about the wonder-working Elisha. The maiden tells her mistress that Elisha can heal the leprosy, and Naaman resolves to visit him. Through the king he obtains permission to visit E. with a great train and rich presents. The prophet sends his servant to tell him to dip seven times in the Jordan and he will be healed. Naaman is angered at the lack of deference on the part of Elisha and turns away in a rage to go home. Better counsels prevail, and he obeys the prophet and is cured. E. absolutely refuses the rich presents Naaman offers, and permits the Syrian to take some earth from Jeh's land, that he may build an altar in Syria and worship Jeh there. The idea was that a God was localized and could be worshipped only on his own land. E. grants Naaman permission apparently to worship Rimmon while avowedly he is a worshipper of Jeh. The prophet appreciates the difficulties in Naaman's path, believes in his sincerity, and by this concession in no way proves that he believes in the actual existence of a god named Rimmon, or that Jeh was confined to his own land, or in any way sanctions idolatrous worship. He is conciliatory and tolerant, making the best of the situation.

(8) An act of severity on the part of Elisha follows, but it was richly deserved. Gehazi's true character now manifests itself. He covets the rich presents brought by Naaman, runs after him, and by a clever story secures a rich present from the general. E. divines his trick and dooms him and his family to be afflicted with Naaman's leprosy forever (5 20-27).

(9) A group of the sons of the prophets, probably at Jericho, finding their quarters too small, determine to build new quarters near the Jordan. While felling the timber the ax-head of one, a borrowed tool, fell into the water and disappeared. It would have been useless to have attempted to search for it in that swift and muddy stream, so he cries in distress to the prophet. E. breaks off a stick, casts it in the spot where the ax fell, and makes the iron swim on the surface (6 1-7).

Elisha's services to his king and country were numerous and significant.

(1) The first one recorded took place during the attempt of Jehoram to resubjugate Moab which had revolted under King Mesha. In company with Jehoshaphat and the king of Edom, his southern allies, the combined hosts found themselves without water in the wilderness of Edom. The situation is desperate. Jehoram appeals to Jehoshaphat, and on discovering that Elisha was in the camp all three kings appeal to him in their extremity. He refuses any help to Jehoram, bidding him appeal to the prophets of his father Ahab and his mother Jezebel. For Jehoshaphat's sake he will help, calls for a minstrel, and under the spell of the music receives his message. He orders them to dig many trenches to hold the water which shall surely come on the morrow from the land of Edom and without rain. He moreover predicted that Moab would be utterly defeated. These predictions are fulfilled, Mesha is shut up in his capital, and in desperation sacrifices his firstborn son and heir on the walls in sight of all Israel. In great horror the Israelites withdraw, leaving Mesha in possession (3 4-27).

(2) His next services occurred at Samaria. The king of Syria finds that his most secret plans are divulged in some mysterious way, and he fails more than once to take the king of Israel. He suspects treachery in his army, but is told of Elisha's divining powers. Elisha is living at Dothan; and thither the king of Syria sends a large army to capture him. Surrounded by night, E. is in no way terrified as his servant is, but prays that the young man's eyes may be opened to see the mountains full of the chariots and horses of Jeh. Going forth to meet the Syrians as they close in, E. prays that they may be stricken with blindness. The word sanwērīm is used only here and in Gen 19 11 and probably means mental blindness, or bewilderment, a confusion of mind amounting to illusion. He now tells them that they have come to the wrong place, but he will lead them to the right place. They follow him into the very heart of Samaria and into the power of the king. The latter would have smitten them, but is rebuked by E. who counseled that they be fed and sent away (2 K 6 8-23). Impressed by such mysterious power and strange clemency the Syrians ceased their marauding attacks.

(3) The next incident must have occurred some time previous, or some time after these events. Samaria is besieged, the Israelites are encouraged to defend their capital to the last, famine prices prevail, and mothers begin to cook their children and eat them. The king in horror and rage will wreak vengeance on Elisha. The latter divines his purpose, anticipates any action on the king's part, and predicts that there will be abundance of food on the morrow. That night a panic seized the Syrian host. They imagined they heard the Hittites coming against them, and fled in headlong rout toward the Jordan. Four lepers discover the deserted camp and report the fact to the king. He suspects an ambuscade, but is persuaded to send a few men to reconnoitre. They find the camp deserted and treasures strewn the path right to the Jordan. The Samaritans lose no time in plundering the camp and Elisha's predictions are fulfilled to the letter (6 24-7).

(4) The prophet's next act was one of great significance. It was the carrying out of the first order given to Elijah at Horeb, and the time seemed ripe for it. He proceeds north to Damascus and finds Benhadad sick. Hearing of his presence the king sends a rich present by the hands of his chief captain Hazael and inquires whether he will recover. Elisha gives a double answer. He will recover, the disease will not be fatal, yet he will die. Fixing his eyes on Hazael, E. sees a fierce and ruthless successor to Benhadad who will be a terrible scourge to Israel. The man of God weeps, the fierce captain is ashamed, and when told of what he shall do, represents himself as a dog and not able to do such things. But the prospect is too enticing; he tells Benhadad he will recover, and on the morrow smothers him and succeeds to the throne (8 7-15).

(5) The next move of E. was even more significant. It is the fulfilling of the second order given Elijah at Mt. Horeb. The Israelites are fighting the Syrians in defense of Ramoth-gilead. The king, Jehoram, is wounded and returns home to Jezreel to recover. E. seizes on the opportune moment to have the house of Ahab avenged for its many sins. He despatches one of the young prophets with a vial of oil to Ramoth-gilead with orders to anoint Jehu, one of the captains of the army, as king over Israel. The young prophet obeys, delivers his message and flees. Jehu tries to conceal the real nature of the interview, but is forced to tell, and is at once proclaimed king. He leaps into his chariot, drives furiously to Jezreel, meets the king by the vineyard of Naboth, sends an arrow through his heart, tramples to death the queen Jezebel, butchers the king's sons and exterminates the royal family. He then treacherously murders the priests of Baal and the revolution is complete; the house of Ahab is destroyed, Baal worship overthrown and an able king is upon the throne (chs 9, 10).

(6) Elisha retains his fervent and patriotic spirit until the last. His final act is in keeping with his long life of generous deeds and faithful patriotic service. He is on his death bed, having witnessed the fearful oppressions of Israel by Hazael who made Israelites as dust under his feet. The young king Joash visits him, weeps over him, calling him, "My father, the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof." The dying prophet bids him take his bow and arrow and shoot eastward, an act symbolic of his victory over Syria. Being then commanded to smite upon the ground, he smites three times and stops. The prophet is angry, tells him he should have smitten many times, then he would have smitten

Syria many times, but now he shall smite her only thrice (13 14-19).

(7) The last wonder in connection with Elisha occurs after this death. His bones were reported to have vitalizing power (13 20-21). Tradition says that the man thus restored to life lived but an hour; but the story illustrates something of the reverence held for E.

(1) In comparison with Elijah.—In many respects Elisha is a contrast to his great predecessor. Instead of a few remarkable appearances and striking events, his was a steady lifelong ministry; instead of the rugged hills his home was in the quiet valley and on the farm; instead of solitariness he loved the social life and the home. There were no sudden appearances and disappearances, people always knew where to find him. There were no long seasons of hiding or retirement, he was constantly moving about among the people or the prophetic schools. There were no spectacular revolutions, only the effect of a long steady ministry. His career resembled the latter portion of Elijah's more than the earlier. Elijah had learned well his lesson at Horeb. God is not so much in the tempest, the fire and the earthquake, as in the "still small voice" (1 K 19 12). Elijah was a prophet of fire, Elisha more of a pastor. The former called down fire out of heaven to consume those sent to take him; Elisha anticipates the king when he comes to take him (2 K 6 32, 33) and gives promises of relief. He merely asks for blindness to come upon the army which surrounded him at Dothan, and spares them when the king would have smitten them (6 21-23). Elijah was austere and terrible, but Elisha was so companionable that the woman at Shunem built him a chamber. His prophetic insight could be helped more by the strains of music than by the mountain solitude (3 15). Some of his miracles resemble Elijah's. The multiplication of the oil and the cruse is much like the continued supply of meal and oil to the widow of Zarephath (1 K 17 10-16), and the raising of the Shunammite's son like the raising of the widow's son at Zarephath (17 17-24).

(2) General features of his ministry.—His services as a pastor-prophet were more remarkable than his miracles. He could be very severe in the presence of deliberate wrongdoing, stern and unflinching when the occasion required. He could weep before Hazael, knowing what he would do to Israel, yet he anointed him king of Syria (2 K 8 11-15). When the time was ripe and the occasion opportune, he could instigate a revolution that wiped out a dynasty, exterminated a family, and caused the massacre of the priests of Baal (chs 8, 9). He possessed the confidence of kings so fully that they addressed him as father and themselves as sons (6 21; 13 14). He accompanied an army of invasion and three kings consult him in extremity (3 11-19). The king of Syria consults him in sickness (8 7, 8). The king of Israel seems to blame him for the awful conditions of the siege and would have wreaked vengeance on him (6 31). He was something of a military strategist and many times saved the king's army (6 10). The king of Israel goes to him for his parting counsel (13 14-19). His advice or command seemed to be always taken unhesitatingly. His contribution to the religious life of Israel was not his least service. Under Jehu he secured the destruction of the Baal worship in its organized form. Under Hazael the nation was trodden down and almost annihilated for its apostasy. By his own ministry many were saved from bowing the knee to Baal. His personal influence among the schools of the prophets was widespread and beneficial. He that escaped the sword of Hazael was slain by Jehu, and he that escaped Jehu was slain by Elisha. Elisha finished the great work of putting down Baal worship begun by Elijah. His work was not so much to add anything to religion, as to cleanse the religion already possessed. He did not ultimately save the nation, but he did save a large remnant. The corruptions were not all eradicated, the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat were never fully overcome. He passed through a bitter and distressing national humiliation, but emerged with hope. He eagerly watched every turn of events and his counsels were more frequently adopted than those perhaps of any other prophet. He was "the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof" (13 14). No condemnation of calf-worship at Dan and Bethel is recorded, but that does not prove that he fully sanctioned it. His was a contest between Jeh worship and Baal worship. The corrupted form of Jeh worship was a problem which Amos and Hosea had to face nearly a cent. later.

III. General Estimate.—His character was largely molded by his home life. He was friend and benefactor of foreigner as well as of Israelite. He was large-hearted and generous, tolerant to a remarkable degree, courageous and shrewd when the occasion required, a diplomat as well as a statesman, severe and stern only in the presence of evil and when the occasion demanded. He is accused of being vindictive and of employing falsehood with his enemies. His faults, however, were the faults of his age, and these were but little manifested in his long career. His was a strenuous pastor's life. A home-loving and social man, his real work was that of teaching and helping, rather than working of miracles. He continually went about doing good. He was resourceful and ready and was gifted with a sense of humor. Known as "the man of God," he proved his right to the title by his zeal for God and loving service to man.

ELISHAH, ē-lī'sha (אֱלִישָׁה, 'Elishāh, "God saves"; Ἐλισά, Elisá, Ἐλεῖσαι, Eleisai): Mentioned in Gen 10 4 as the eldest son of Javan, and in Ezk 27 7 as the source from which the Tyrians obtained their purple dyes. On the ground of this latter statement attempts have been made to identify it with Southern Italy or the north of Africa. Jos (Ant, I, vi, 1) identified Elishah with the Aeolians. The Tg on Ezk gives "the province of Italy." Other suggestions include Hellas, Elis, and Alsa; the last-named is a kingdom mentioned in the Am Tab, but its precise location is unknown. It is impossible as yet to claim certainty for any of these conjectures.

ELISHAMA, ē-līsh'a-ma (אֱלִישָׁמָה, 'Elishāmāh, "God has heard"):

(1) Grandfather of Joshua and son of Ammihud; prince of the tribe of Ephraim in the Exodus (Nu 1 10; 7 48, 53; 1 Ch 7 26).

(2) A son of David, born in Jerus (2 S 5 16; 1 Ch 3 8).

(3) By textual corruption in 1 Ch 3 6 for Elishua, another of David's sons; cf 2 S 5 15.

(4) A scribe of Jehoiakim (Jer 36 12, 20, 21).

(5) One "of the seed royal," grandfather of Ishmael, the slayer of Gedaliah (2 K 25 25; Jer 41 1).

(6) A man of the tribe of Judah (1 Ch 2 41).

(7) One of the priests appointed by Jehoshaphat to teach the law (2 Ch 17 8). F. K. FARR

ELISHAPHAT, ē-līsh'a-fat (אֱלִישָׁפָת, 'Elishāphāt, "God is judge"): This man figures in the Levitical conspiracy against Athaliah, to make Joash king. He was one of the "captains of hundreds" employed in the enterprise by Jehoiada the priest (2 Ch 23 1).

ELISHEBA, ē-līsh'ē-ba (אֱלִישֶׁבָּה, 'Elishēbha, "God swears," "God is an oath"): Daughter of Amminadab, sister of Nashon, wife of Aaron, mother of Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar, the foundress, therefore, of the entire Levitical priesthood (Ex 6 23).

ELISHUA, el-i-shū'a, ē-līsh'ū-a (עִלְשֻׁא, 'ēlīshū'a, "God is rich," "God is salvation"): Son of David (2 S 6 15; 1 Ch 14 5); apparently called Elish-ama (1 Ch 3 6). In the latter locus we have most probably a misreading by the copyist of the name Elishua.

ELISIMUS, ē-lis'i-mus, RV ELIASIMUS (q.v.).

ELIU, ē-lī'ū (Ἠλιοῦ, Ēliou; RV ELIHU): One of the ancestors of Judith (Jth 8 1), and therefore of the tribe of Simeon.

ELIUD, ē-lī'ud (Ἠλιοῦδ, Ēliouđ, "God my praise"): An ancestor of Jesus, four generations before Joseph (Mt 1 15).

ELIZAPHAN, el-i-zā'fan, ē-liz'a-fan (עֲלִיזָפָן, 'ēlīzāphān; LXX Ἐλίσαφάν, Eleisaphān, Ἐλίσαφάν, Elisaphān, Ἐλίσαφά, Elisaphá, Ἐλίσαφάτ, Elisaphát, "God has protected"; cf. צְפָנְיָה, ṣ'phan-yāh, Zephaniah, "Yah has protected," and פְּנִיבַל, ṣ'pan-bēl, "Baal has protected"):

(1) The son of Uzziel, the son of Kohath, and so a prince of the Levitical class of the Kohathites (Nu 3 30; 1 Ch 15 8; 2 Ch 29 13). But in 1 Ch 15 8; 2 Ch 39 13 his class seems to be co-ordinate with that of the Kohathites. He is called Elzaphan in Ex 6 22; Lev 10 4.

(2) A "prince" or chief of Zebulun, who represented that tribe in the division of the land (Nu 34 25).

WALTER R. BETTERIDGE

ELIZUR, ē-lī'zur (עֲלִיזֹר, 'ēlīzūr; LXX Ἐλείουρ, Eleiour, Ἐλίσουρ, Elisour, "My God is a rock"; cf. Zuriel "my rock is God" [Nu 3 35]): A chief or prince of the tribe of Reuben (Nu 1 5; 2 10; 7 30.35; 10 18).

ELKANAH, el-kā'na (אֶלְקָנָה, 'elkānāh, "God has possessed"):

(1) An Ephraimite, the father of Samuel (1 S 1 1-28; 2 11-20). Of his two wives, Hannah, the childless, was best beloved. At Shiloh she received through Eli the promise of a son. Elkanah, with Hannah, took the young Samuel to Shiloh when he was weaned, and left him with Eli as their offering to Jeh. They were blessed with three other sons and two daughters.

(2) The second son of Korah (Ex 6 24), who escaped the fate of Korah, Dathan and Abiram (Nu 26 11).

(3) One "next to the king" in Jerus in the time of Ahaz; slain by one Zichri of Ephraim in war with Pekah (2 Ch 28 7).

(4) One of the Korahites among David's "mighty men" (1 Ch 12 1.6).

(5) A Levite, possibly the same as (2) above (1 Ch 6 23.25.36).

(6) Another Levite of the same line (1 Ch 6 26.35).

(7) Another Levite, ancestor of Berechiah (1 Ch 9 16).

(8) Another Levite (if not the same as [4] above), one of the "doorkeepers for the ark" (1 Ch 15 23).

F. K. FARR

ELKIAH, el-kt'a (Ἐλκία, Elkia; AV Elcia): An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8 1).

ELKOSHITE, el'kosh-it (אֶלְכֹשִׁי, hā-'elkōshī; LXX Ἐλκεσίου, Elkesaiou, Ἐλκασιέου, Elkai-séou, Ἐλκεσέου, Elkeséou): Used with the art. "the Elkoshite" (Nah 1 1). Probably a gentile adj. giving the home of the prophet; not definitely identified. Three traditions may be noted: (1) The Nestorians venerate the supposed tomb of the prophet in the village of Alkush not far from the east bank of the Tigris, about two days' journey almost directly north of Mosul. (2) Jerome states in the prologue to his commentary on Nah that the village of Helkesei in Galilee was pointed out to him as Elkosh. This Helkesei is probably El-Kauzeh between Ramieh and Bint Jebel. (3) The treatise De Vitis Prophetarum of the Pseudo-Epiphanius says that Nahum came from "Elkesei beyond Jordan towards Begabor and was of the tribe of Simeon." Nestle has shown that the words "beyond Jordan" are probably a gloss, and that for Begabor should be read Betogabra, the modern Beit Jibrin in Southern Pal. In favor of this identification may be urged the following facts: (a) that parallels to the name Elkosh, such as Eltekeh and Eltekon, are found in the southern country; (b) that the word probably contains the name of the Edomite god Kaush, whose name appears in the names of Edomite kings in the Assyrian inscriptions of the 8th and 7th cents. BC, such as Kaush-malaka and the like, and (c) that the internal evidence of the prophecy makes the Judaean origin of the prophet almost certain.

ELLASAR, el-ā'sār (עֲלָאֶסָר, 'ellāsar): The city over which Arioch (Ēri-Aku) and other Bab kings ruled (Gen 14 1). The Sem-Bab form of its name is (āl) Larsa, "the city Larsa," a form which implies that the Heb has interchanged r and s, and transposed the final vowel. Its Sumerian name is given as Ararwa, apparently for Araurwa, "light-abode," which, in fact, is the meaning of the ideographic group with which it is written. The ruins of this ancient site are now known as Sengāra, and lie on the E. bank of the Euphrates, about midway between Warka (Erech) and Muqayyar (Ur of the Chaldees). In addition to the name Larsa, it seems also to have been called Ašte-azaga, "the holy [bright, pure] seat" (or throne), and both its names were apparently due to its having been one of the great Bab centers of sun-god worship.

Like most of the principal cities of Babylonia, it had a great temple-tower, called Ē-dur-an-ki, "house of the bond of heaven and earth."

2. Its Holy Places The temple of the city bore the same name as that at Sippar, i.e. Ē-babbar, "House of Light," where the sun-god Šamaš was worshipped. This fane was restored by Ur-Engur, Hammurabi (Amraphel), Burnaburiaš, Nebuchadrezzar and Nabonidus. Among the tablets found on this site by Loftus was that which gives measures of length and square and cube roots, pointing to the place as one of the great centers of Bab learning. Besides the remains of these temples, there are traces of the walls, and the remains of houses of the citizens. The city was at first governed by its own kings, but became a part of the Bab empire some time after the reign of Hammurabi.

ELM, elm: Hos 4 13 AV, but in RV TERE-BINTH (q.v.).

ELMADAM, el-mā'dam (WH Ἐλμαδάμ, Elmadám; TR Ἐλμαδάμ, Elmōdām; AV Elmodam): An ancestor of Jesus, according to St. Luke's genealogy, in the 6th generation before Zerubbabel (Lk 3 28).

ELNAAM, el-nā'am (אֵלְנָאָם, 'elna'am, "God is delightfulness"; cf Phoen "Gadnaam"): According to MT the father of two of David's warriors (1 Ch 11 46); according to LXX himself one of the warriors.

ELNATHAN, el-nā'than (אֵלְנָתָן, 'elnāthān, "God has given"):

- (1) The grandfather of Jehoiachin (2 K 24 8).
- (2) A courtier of Jehoiakim; he was one of those sent to Egypt to bring back the prophet Uriah (Jer 26 22), and one of those who heard the reading of Jeremiah's roll and entreated Jehoiakim not to burn the roll (Jer 36 12.25)—possibly the same person as (1) above.
- (3, 4, 5) The name of two "chief men"—unless textual corruption has introduced the name at its second occurrence—and of one "teacher" sent for by Ezra from the camp at the river Ahava (Ezr 8 16).

ELOHIM, e-lō'him, el'ō-hēm. See GOD, NAMES OF.

ELOI, ē'loi, ē-lō'ī. See GOD, NAMES OF.

ELOI, ē'loi, ē-lō'ī, ELOI, LAMA, lā'mā, SABACHTHANI, sa-bakh'tha-ni, or ELI, ELI, LAMA SABACHTHANI (Ελωι, ελωι, λαμα σαβαχθανει, Elōi, elōi, lamā sabachthanei): The forms of the first word as tr<sup>d</sup> vary in the two narratives, being in Mk as first above and in Mt as in second reading. With some perversions of form probably from Ps 22 1 אֵלִי אֵלִי לָמָּה עֲזַבְתָּנִי, 'ēlī 'ēlī lāmāh 'āzabh-tānī). A statement uttered by Jesus on the cross just before his death, tr<sup>d</sup>, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" (Mt 27 46; Mk 15 34).

There is an interesting but difficult problem in connection with the interpretation of this passage. There seems to be a mixture of Aram. and Heb. The first two words, whether in Heb or Aram., have sufficient similarity to each other and each sufficient similarity to the name itself to warrant the jeer that Jesus was calling upon Elias, or the sincere supposition of those who might not fully understand the language, that he was actually calling on Elias. The forms lema and lama used in Mt and Mk respectively (WH ed) represent the various possible forms, the first the Aram., and the second the Heb. The various readings and tr<sup>s</sup> of the latter word, sabachthani, only add confusion to an effort at ultimate explanation of the real statement. Certainly the influence of the Aram. played a great part in the tr and transmission of the original. The spirit revealed by Jesus in this utterance seems to be very much like that displayed in the Garden when He cried out to have the cup removed from Him.

ELON, ē'lon (אֵילָן, 'ēlōn, "terebinth"):

- (1) A Zebulunite, who judged Israel ten years, and was buried in Aijalon (Jgs 12 11.12).
- (2) A son of Zebulun (Gen 46 14; Nu 26 26).
- (3) A Hittite whose daughter Esau wedded (Gen 26 34; 36 2).

ELON, ē'lon (אֵילָן, 'ēlōn, a "terebinth"; Αἰλὼν, Ailōn): An unidentified town in the territory of Dan named between Ithlah and Timnah (Josh 19 43). It is possibly identical with Elon-beth-Hanan which, along with Shaalbim and Bethshemesh, formed one of Solomon's commissariat districts (1 K 4 9). Conder has suggested Beit Anān, about 4 miles N.W. of Neby Samwil: it is quite uncertain.

ELON-BETH-HANAN, ē-lon-beth-hā'nan. See ELON.

ELONITES, ē'lon-its: Descendants of ELON (q.v. [2]) (Nu 26 26).

ELOQUENT, el'ō-kwent: "Moses said . . . I am not eloquent" (אִישׁ דְּבָרִים, 'ish d'bhārīm, "a man of words" [Ex 4 10]); but Aaron could "speak well." In Isa 3 3 RV בֵּן, bîn, "intelligent," is rendered "skilful [enchanter]," AV "eloquent [orator]." Apollos was "an eloquent man" (λόγιος, lógios, "full of words" [Acts 18 24, AVm "a learned man"]).

ELOTH, ē'loth. See ELATH.

ELPAAL, el-pā'al (אֵלְפָאֵל, 'elpa'al, "God has wrought" [cf אֵלְעָשָׂה, 'el'āsāh, Jer 29 3]): The name of a descendant of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 11.12. 18).

ELPALET, el-pā'let (RV ELPELET): The name of a son of David (1 Ch 14 5). See ELIPHALAT.

EL-PARAN, el-pā'ran. See PARAN.

ELPELET, el'pe-let. See ELIPHALAT.

EL ROI (Gen 16 13 m). See GOD, NAMES OF.

EL SHADDAI, el shad'ā-i, el shad'ī. See GOD, NAMES OF.

ELTEKE, el'tē-kē, ELTEKEH (אֵלְתֶּקֶה, 'eltēkēh [Josh 19 44], אֵלְתֶּקָה, 'eltēkē' [21 23]; B, Αλκαθά, Alkathá; A, Ελκεθώ, Elkethō): A place in the territory of Dan named between Ekron and Gibbethon (Josh 19 44), and again between Beth-horon and Gibbethon, as given to the Kohathite Levites (21 23). It is probably identical with the Assyrian Allaku, where Sennacherib (Hexagon prism inscrip.) claims to have defeated the allied armies of the Philis and the Egyptians. It should probably be sought somewhere E. of Ekron. Beit Likia, the place marked Eltekeh on the PEF map, seems a position for such an encounter. It is about 2½ miles S.W. of Beth-horon the Upper. W. EWING

ELTEKON, el'tē-kon (אֵלְתֶּקֶן, 'eltēkōn, "founded by God"): A city in the hill country of Judah (Josh 15 59) near BETHANOTH (q.v.) to be looked for, therefore, a little N. of Hebron. Site unknown.

ELTOLAD, el-tō'lad (אֵלְתוֹלָד, 'eltōlādh, "kindred of God"): A city of Judah in the Negeb near Edom (Josh 15 30); in Josh 19 4 ascribed to Simeon. Probably the same as Tolad (1 Ch 4 29), the Arab. art. el being omitted. Site unknown.

ELUL, ē'lul, e-lō'ol (אֵילּוּל, 'ēlūl, Neh 6 15; Ελουλ, Eloúl, 1 Macc 14 27): The 6th month of the Heb year, corresponding to August-September. The derivation is uncertain. See TIME.

ELUZAI, ē-lū'zā-i (אֵלְעִזַּי, 'el'ūzai, "God is my strength"; cf UZZIEL): One of David's heroes (1 Ch 12 5).

ELYMAEANS, el-i-mē'ans. See ELAMITES.

ELYMAIS, el-i-mā'is (Ελύμας, Elímās): This name, representing the OT Elam (see ELAM), was given to a district of Persia lying S. of Media and N. of Susiana. In 1 Macc 6 1 the common reading, which is adopted by AV, refers to Elymais as a rich city in Persia. No other reference, however, to such a city is found except in Jos (Ant, XII, ix, 1) who simply follows 1 Macc. The text should therefore be corrected to read as in RV, "in Elymais in Persia there was a city."

ELYMAS, el'i-mas ('Ελύμας, Elúmas, "wise"; Acts 13 8). See BAR-JESUS.

ELYON, ê-lí'on. See EL-ELYON; GOD, NAMES OF.

ELZABAD, el-zē'bad (אֶלְזָבָד, 'elzābhādh, "God has given"; cf ZABDIEL and ZEBADIAH):

(1) The ninth of David's Gadite heroes (1 Ch 12 12).

(2) A Korahite doorkeeper (1 Ch 26 7).

ELZAPHAN, el-zā'fan. See ELIZAPHAN.

EMADABUN, ê-mā'da-bun ('Ημαδαβούν, Ēmadabōūn; AV Madiabun [1 Esd 5 53]): The head of a family of Levites who superintended the repair of the temple; not named in Ezr 3 9.

EMATHEIS, ê-ma-thē'is ('Αμαθίας, Amathías; Emeus; B, 'Εμαθίς, Emathís; A, 'Εμαθίς, Emathís; AV Amatheis): One of the sons of Bebai (1 Esd 9 29), called "Athlai" in Ezr 10 28.

EMBALMING, em-bām'ing (הַנְּטִי, hānat, "to spice"): E. is mentioned in Scripture only in the cases of Jacob and Joseph (Gen 50 2 f.26). It was a distinctly Egyp invention and method of preserving the bodies of men and animals. Examples of it reach back to over 3,000 years ago. It prevailed to some extent among the peoples of Asia, and at a later period among the Greeks and Romans, but was in origin and use distinctly non-Israelitish. See BURIAL.

EMBRACE, em-brās': The word has two distinct meanings in the OT: (1) to clasp and hold fondly in the arms, pointing to a common custom (Gen 29 13; 33 4; 48 10; 2 K 4 16; Cant 2 6; 8 3; cf Acts 20 10), and (2) to have sexual intercourse (Prov 4 8; 5 20; Eccl 3 5). It seems to have acquired this technical sense in later Jewish usage.

EMBROIDERY, em-broid'ēr-i (רִקְמָה, rikmāh; AV Needlework):

Rikmāh was applied to any kind of cloth which showed designs in variegated colors. The method of manufacture is unknown. The designs may have been woven into cloth or drawn in by a needle or hook (Jgs 5 30; Ps 45 14; Ezk 16 10.13.18; 26 16; 27 7.16.24).

Ma'āseh rākām is tr<sup>d</sup> "the work of the embroiderer" in RV instead of "needlework" (Ex 26 36; 27 16; 28 39; 36 37; 38 18; 39 29; Jgs 5 30; Ps 45 14).

Rākām, "embroiderer," occurs in Ex 35 35; 38 23. The fact that this word is used instead of 'ārāgh, "weaver," would lead us to suppose that the embroiderers' work was either different from that of the weaver or that a "rākām" was esp. skilled in fine weaving. Another word, hōshēbh, is used to describe a skilful weaver. "Cunning work" in AV of Ex 26 1.31; 28 6.15; 35 33.35; 36 8.35; 39 3.8 is rendered in ARV "work of the skilful workmen." The passage has been freely rendered "designers."

In RV of Ex 28 39 shābhaq is tr<sup>d</sup> "weave."

In Ex 28 4 occurs the word tashbēc, which is tr<sup>d</sup> "broidered" in AV and "checker work" in RV. If this kind of work is what it is supposed to be, it is more truly "needlework" than the embroidery. This work is still done in some of the Syrian cities and towns, esp. in Damascus. Small caps for men to wear under their ordinary headdress and loose outer garments or dressing-gowns are the forms in which it is commonly seen. The checker-work effect is obtained by sewing in a cotton string between two pieces of cloth, so as to form designs. The patterns usually run to straight lines such as zigzags or squares. The effect is striking, and we can well imagine would have made an impressive priest's robe, esp. if costly materials were used. See also CRAFTS.

EMEK-KEZIZ, ê-mek-kē'ziz (עֶמֶק קִיִּז, 'emek kē'ziz; AV Valley of Keziz [Josh 18 21]): A town in Benjamin named between Beth-hoglah and Beth-arabah, and therefore to be sought in the plain, probably S. of Jericho. The name has not been recovered.

EMERALD, em'ēr-ald. See STONES, PRECIOUS.

EMERODS, em'ēr-odz (עֶפְרָיִם, 'ephālīm, תְּחֹרִים, t'hōrīm): These words are used in the account of the plague which broke out among the Philis while the captive Ark of the Covenant was in their land. 'Ophālīm lit. means rounded eminences or swellings, and in RV is tr<sup>d</sup> "tumors" (1 S 5 6-12). In the Heb text of this passage K<sup>rē</sup> substitutes for it the word t'hōrīm, a term which occurs in the next chapter in the description of the golden models of these swellings that were made as votive offerings (6 11-17). The swellings were symptoms of a plague, and the history is precisely that of the outbreak of an epidemic of bubonic plague. The older writers supposed by comparison of the account in 1 S with Ps 78 66 that they were hemorrhoids (or piles), and the older Eng. term in AV is a 16th-cent. form of that Gr word, which occurs in several medical treatises of the 16th and 17th cents. There is, however, no evidence that this identification is correct. In the light of the modern research which has proved that the rat-flea (Pulex cheopis) is the most active agent in conveying the virus of plague to the human subject, it is worthy of note that the plague of tumors was accompanied by an invasion of mice ('akhbōr) or rats. The rat is not specifically mentioned in the Bible, although it was as common in Can. and Israelite times as it is today, a fact demonstrated by the frequency with which their bones occur in all strata of the old Palestinian cities, so it is probable that the term used was a generic one for both rodents.

The coincidence of destructive epidemics and invasions of mice is also recorded by Herodotus (ii.141), who preserves a legend that the army of Sennacherib which entered Egypt was destroyed by the agency of mice. He states that a statue of Ptah, commemorating the event, was extant in his day. The god held a mouse in his hand, and bore the inscription: "Whosoever sees me, let him reverence the gods." This may have been a reminiscence of the story in Isa 37 36. For other references see PLAGUE.

EMIM, ē'mim (אֱמִי, 'ēmīm; 'Ομμαιν, Ommaēn; 'Ομμαιν, Ommēn, or 'Ομμαιν, Ommiēn): Stated to have been the earlier inhabitants of Moab (Dt 2 10.11), and to have been of tall stature, and hence "accounted Rephaim [or giants] as the Anakim" or the Zamzumim of Ammon (ver 20). As the name was given to them by the Moabites, it may not have been that by which they called themselves. A tall race, known to the Israelites as REPHAIM (q.v.), once existed in Southern Pal as well as on the E. side of the Jordan, but its exact relationship is unknown. In the time of Abraham the Emim were living in the Moabite district of Shaveh-kiriathaim, identified with the modern Kureiyat (Gen 14 5).

A. H. SAYCE

EMINENT, em'i-nent: In AV (only in Ezk 16 24.31.39; 17 22) refers lit. to physical elevation; RV in the last passage renders "lofty" (Heb tālūl, "uplifted," "heaped up") and in the others "vaulted place" (Heb gabh, "rounded place," "mound," ERV ma "a vaulted chamber").

EMMANUEL, ē-man'ū-el. See IMMANUEL.

EMMAUS, ē-mā'us, em'ā-us (Ἑμμαοῦς, Emmaous, derivation uncertain, but probably from ḥammāth, "a hot spring"): Jos (BJ, IV, i, 3) says: "Now Emmaus, if it be interpreted, may be rendered 'a warm bath' for therein is a spring of warm water useful for healing." Here he is referring to the hot springs near Tiberias. Possibly the same Gr name may not always have been derived from the same Heb, and as Cheyne suggests (2) may have come from ḥa-mōṣāh (see below).

(1) A place where Judas Maccabaeus defeated Gorgias (1 Macc 4); it was "in the plain" (1 Macc 3 40); it was subsequently fortified (1 Macc 3 40); it was subsequently fortified (1 Macc 9 50). It is of the frequently mentioned by Jos (Ant, XIV, Apocrypha xi, 2; BJ, I, xi, 2; II, v, 1; xx, 4; IV, viii, 1; V, i, 6), and also in the Talm and Midr. It is now the modern mud-village of 'Amwas, 20 miles along, and a little N. of, the main road from Jerus to Jaffa. In the 3d cent. it was called Nicopolis and was an episcopal see; in early Christian times it was famous for a spring of reputed healing qualities.

(2) The Emmaus of Lk 24 13, a village 60 furlongs (stadia) from Jerus.

Early Christian tradition appears to have identified it with (1) and hence, to harmonize the distance, some MSS have 160 furlongs. Eusebius and Jerome place this Emmaus at 'Amwas; but in the first place (1) was a city and not a village (kōmē), and secondly (2) the distance, 40 miles there and back, is an almost impossible one for the narrative. In Crusading times this difficulty appears to have been realized, and on what grounds is not known, Kubeibeh at just over 60 stadia, N.W. of Jerus, was selected as the site of Emmaus. There a fine church was built which has in recent years been rebuilt and today a Franciscan hospice and school, attached to the church, and a newer German R. C. hospice, combine with the considerable picturesque of the place itself to fortify the tradition.

A much more probable site is Kuloniyeh, a village about 35 stadia from Jerus, on the road to Jaffa. Jos narrates (BJ, VII, vi, 6) that Vespasian "assigned a place for 800 men only whom he had dismissed from his army which he gave them for their habitation; it is called Emmaus and is distant from Jerus 60 furlongs." This is almost certainly the Emmaus of Lk; it is highly probable that the name kuloniyeh is derived from the fact of its being this colonia. Close to this place is a ruin known as Bēt Mizza, which is probably the Mozah (מִצְאָה, ha-mōṣāh) of Josh 18 26 which in the Talm (Sukk. 4 5) is also described as a colonia. Today it is a "colony" of Jews who have revived and always use the old name Mōṣāh for their settlement.

Other suggestions for this Emmaus are (a) el Khamsa, considerably over 60 stadia S.W. of Jerus (Conder); (b) Koriet el 'enab, some 10 stadia farther along the Jerus-Jaffa road than Kuloniyeh (LB, etc); and (c) 'Artas, S. of Bethlehem, where remains of Rom baths have been found (Mrs. Finn). In not one of the places suggested are there any hot springs.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

EMMER, em'ēr (Ἑμμήρ, Emmēr): Head of a family, some of whom had married foreign wives (1 Esd 9 21); called "Immer" in Ezr 10 20.

EMMERUTH, em'ēr-uth (Ἑμμηρούθ, Emmērouth; AV Meruth; 1 Esd 5 24): Corresponding to "Immer" in Ezr 2 37.

EMMOR, em'or: Transliterated from the Gr Ἑμμόρ, Emmōr, the tr of Heb מִמֹּר, hāmōr, "ass" (Acts 7 16 AV; RV "Hamor", q.v.).

EMPEROR, emp'ēr-ēr (ὁ σεβαστός, ho sebastós; Lat augustus: The title of the Rom emperors; Acts 25 21.25). See AUGUSTUS; CAESAR.

EMPTY, emp'ti, EMPTYER, emp'ti-ēr (κενός, kenós): "Empty," adj. meaning void, etc, as the tr of רֵיק, rēk, רֵיק, rēk, רֵיקָם, rēkām, etc, occurs in the literal sense of "with nothing" (Gen 31 42; Job 22 9); in 2 S 1 22, it is equivalent to "in vain," "hungry" (Isa 29 8); in some instances the meaning is comparative only; בָּקָא, bākā, "to gush out," "to pour out," "to empty" is used adjectivally (Hos 10 1, "Israel is an empty vine"; but RV takes the Heb word in its original sense of "pouring out," rendering "Israel is a luxuriant vine"); תֹּהוּ, "emptiness" (Job 26 7); kenos, "empty" is so tr'd (Mk 12 3); in Mt 12 44, the Gr word is scholázō, "to be free," "unoccupied"; "to empty" (vb.) is the tr of בָּקָא (Nah 2 2), of דָּלַל, "to become poor," etc (Isa 19 6, ERV "diminished" ARV "diminished"). RV has "empty" for "vain" (Eph 5 6), "emptied himself" for "made himself of no reputation" (Phil 2 7), "emptied out" for "gathered" (2 K 22 9; 2 Ch 34 17, m "poured out"). W. L. WALKER

EMULATION, em-ū-lā'shun (ζῆλος, zēlos, παρὰζῆλῳ, parazēlō): Occurs twice in the NT, once in a bad and once in a good sense.

(1) In Gal 5 20 AV it is the tr of zēlos ("zeal," "earnestness," "enthusiasm") where it is classed among "the works of the flesh" and signifies the stirring up of jealousy or envy in others, because of what we are, or have, or profess. The Gr word is used in this sense in Acts 13 45; Rom 13 13; 1 Cor 3 3; Jas 3 14.16; 2 Cor 12 20; Gal 5 20; RV tr'd by "jealousy." It denotes a work of the flesh or lower nature, which Christians often fail sufficiently to guard against; it pleases "the flesh" to excite such a feeling in others.

(2) In Rom 11 14 AV "emulation" is the tr of parazēlōō ("to make one zealous or jealous"), and is there used in a good sense. "If by any means I may provoke to emulation [RV jealousy] them that are my flesh" (cf Rom 10 19, quoted from Dt 32 21). It is well to "provoke to emulation" in this sense, those who are slow or indifferent, by the example of earnestness and zeal on our part. This is not to please "the flesh," but to serve "the Spirit." W. L. WALKER

EN- (עַן, 'ayin [cf Arab. 'Ain]): The Heb word for "spring" or "fountain" (Gen 16 7; Nu 33 9; Neh 2 14; Prov 8 28 [fem. pl.]). It occurs in numerous compound words, as EN-GEDI, EN-HADDAH, EN-HAKKORE, EN-HAZOR, EN-RIMMON, EN-ROGEL, EN-SHEMESH (q.v.). In the same way the word 'Ain is a very common component of Arab. names of places throughout Pal and Syria at the present day. Places with names compounded with En- were almost certainly located near a spring. See FOUNTAIN; WELL.

ENABLE, en-ā'b'l: Only in 1 Tim 1 12 (AV and RV) in the sense of "strengthen" (Gr endunamōō, "endue with strength").

ENAIM, ē-nā'im (עֵנַיִם, 'enayim, "place of a fountain"; Alnān, Ainān; Gen 38 14 [AV "in an open place"; ver 21 AV "openly"]): A place which lay between Adullam and Timnath; probably the same as Enam (Josh 15 34). Also mentioned in close connection with Adullam. It was in the Shephelah of Judah. The Talm (Pesik. Rab. 23) mentions a Kephâr Enaim. Conder proposes Khurbet Wady 'Alin, which is an ancient site, evidently of great strength and importance, lying between Kh. 'Ain Shems and the village of Deir Aban. The ruins crown a lofty and almost isolated hill; the greatest objection to the identification is that there is no fountain at all in the immediate neighborhood. There may have been one in earlier times. See PEF, III, 128. E. W. G. MASTERMAN

ENAM, ē'nam. See preceding article.

ENAN, ē'nan (עֲנָן, 'ēnān, "having fountains," or "eyes," i.e. "keen-eyed"; in LXX Αἰνάν, Ainān): The father of Ahira, and prince of Naphtali in the first census of Israel (Nu 1 15; 2 29; 7 78.83; 10 27).

ENASIBUS, ē-nas'-i-bus (Ἐνάσιβος, Enásibos, 1 Esd 9 34): Corresponding to "Eliashib" in Ezr 10 36.

ENCAMPMENT, en-kamp'ment. See WAR.

ENCAMPMENT BY THE RED SEA: According to the version of the wanderings of Israel given in Nu 33, they "encamped by the Red Sea" (ver 10) after leaving Elim and before entering the Wilderness of Sin. See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

ENCHANTMENT, en-chant'ment: The occult arts, either supposedly or pretentiously supernatural, were common to all oriental races. They included enchantment, sorcery, witchcraft, soothsaying, augury, necromancy, divination in numberless forms, and all kinds of magic art. Nine varieties are mentioned in one single passage in the Pent (Dt 18 10.11); other varieties in many passages both in the OT and NT, e.g. Lev 19 26.31; Isa 2 6; 57 3; Jer 27 9; Mic 5 12; Acts 8 9.11; 13 6.8; Gal 5 20; Rev 9 21. The extent of the magic arts (forbidden under Judaism and Christianity) may incidentally be seen from the fact that the Scriptures alone refer to their being practised in Chaldaea (Dnl 5 11), Babylon (Ezk 21 21), Assyria (2 K 17 17), Egypt (Ex 7 11), Canaan (Lev 18 3.21; 19 26.31), Asia (Ephesus, Acts 19 13.19), Greece (Acts 16 16), Arabia also, as "customs from the East," etc (Isa 2 6) indicates. These secret arts were prohibited by the laws of Moses (Dt 18 9-12), inasmuch as they constituted a peculiar temptation to Israel to apostatize. They were a constant incentive to idolatry, clouded the mind with superstition, tended and were closely allied to imposture (Mt 24 24). The term "enchantment" is found only in the OT and its Heb originals indicate its varieties.

(1) לָטִים, lāṭīm, and לְהַטִּים, l'hāṭīm, "to wrap up," "muffle," "cover," hence "clandestine," "secret." It was this hidden element that enabled the magicians of Egypt to impose on the credulity of Pharaoh in imitating or reproducing the miracles of Moses and Aaron; "They . . . did in like manner with their enchantments" (Ex 7 11.22). Their inability to perform a genuine miracle is shown by Ex 8 18.

(2) נָחַשׁ, nāḥash, "to hiss," "whisper," referring to the mutterings of sorcerers in their incantations. Used as a derivative noun this Heb word means "a serpent." This involves the idea of cunning and subtlety. Although employed in the wider sense of augury or prognostication, its fundamental meaning is divination by serpents. This was the form of enchantment sought by Balaam (Nu 24 1). Its impotence against the people of God is shown by Nu 23 23 m. Shalmaneser forced this forbidden art upon the Israelites whom he carried captive to Assyria (2 K 17 17). It was also one of the heathen practices introduced during the apostasy under Ahab, against which Elijah protested (cf 1 K 21 20).

(3) לַחֲשׁ, lāḥash, "to whisper," "mutter," an onomatopoeic word, like the above, in imitation of the hiss of serpents. It is used of the offensive practice of serpent charming referred to in Eccl 10 11, and as Delitzsch says, in loc., "signifies the whispering of formulas of charming." See also Isa 3 3, "skilful enchanter"; Jer 8 17, "serpents, cockatrices [RV "adders"] . . . which will not be charmed"; Ps 58 4.5, "the voice of charmers [RVm "enchanters"], charming never so wisely." Ophiomancy, the art of charming serpents, is still practised in the East.

(4) הַבְּרָ, hebher, "spell," from הָבַר, hābhar, "to bind," hence "to bind with spells," "fascinate," "charm," descriptive of a species of magic practised by binding knots. That this method of imposture, e.g. the use of the magic knot for exorcism and other purposes, was common, is indicated by the monuments of the East. The moral mischief and uselessness of this and other forms of enchantment are clearly shown in Isa 47 9.12. This word is also used of the charming of serpents (Dt 18 11; Ps 58 5).

(5) אָנָן, 'ānan, "to cover," "to cloud," hence "to use covert arts." This form of divination was esp. associated with idolatry (so Gesenius, Heb Lex.). Delitzsch, however, in a note on this word (Isa 2 6), doubts the meaning "conceal" and thinks that it signifies rather "to gather auguries from the clouds." He translates it "cloud-interpretive" (Mic 5 12). This view is not generally supported. Rendered "enchanters" (Jer 27 9, RV "soothsayers"; so also in Isa 2 6). Often tr'd in RV "practice augury," as in Lev 19 26; Dt 18 10.14; 2 K 21 6; 2 Ch 33 6; a form of magical art corresponding in many respects to that of the Gr mantis, who uttered oracles in a state of divine frenzy. LXX κληδονίζουμαι, klēdonízomai, i.e. augury through the reading or acceptance of a sign or omen. A kindred form of enchantment is mentioned in the NT (2 Tim 3 13; Gr γόητες, gōētes, "enchanters," "jugglers," the original indicating that the incantations were uttered in a kind of howl; rendered "seducers" AV, "impostors" RV; cf Rev 19 20). The NT records the names of several magicians who belonged to this class of conscious impostors: Simon Magus (Acts 8 9); Bar-Jesus and Elymas (Acts 13 6.8); the slave girl with the spirit of Python ("divination," Acts 16 16); "vagabond [RV "strolling"] Jews, exorcists" (Acts 19 13; cf Lk 11 19); also the magicians of Moses' day, named Jannes and Jambres (2 Tim 3 8).

All these forms of enchantment claimed access through supernatural insight or aid, to the will of the gods and the secrets of the spirit world. In turning away faith and expectation from the living God, they struck a deadly blow at the heart of true religion. From the enchanters of the ancient Orient to the medicine-men of today, all exponents of the "black art" exercise a cruel tyranny over the benighted people, and multitudes of innocent victims perish in body and soul under their subtle impostures. In no respect is the exalted nature of the Heb and Christian faiths more clearly seen than in their power to emancipate the human mind and spirit from the mental and moral darkness, the superstition and fear, and the benighting effect of these occult and deadly arts. END (עֵץ, kēṣ, עֵץ, 'ephes, כָּלָה, kālāh; τέλος, télos, συντέλειω, sunteléō): The end of anything is its termination, hence also, final object or purpose. It is the tr of several Heb and Gr words, chiefly in the OT of kēṣ (properly, "a cutting off") and other words from the same root (Gen 6 13, "The end of all flesh is come before me"; 'ahārith, "hinder part," is also frequently tr<sup>d</sup> "end" (Dt 11 12; Ps 37 37. 38, ARV "There is a happy end to the man of peace . . . The end of the wicked shall be cut off"; ERV "latter end" [ver 37], m "reward" or "future posterity"; 73 17; Jer 6 31); šōph (from šūph "to come to an end") is several times tr<sup>d</sup> "end" (2 Ch 20 16; Eccl 3 11; 7 2). "End" in the sense of purpose is the tr of l'ma'an, "to the intent" (Ex 8 22, "to the end thou mayest know"), and of dibhrāh (from dābhar, "to speak"); Eccl 7 14, "to the end that man should find nothing after him" (RV "should not find out anything [that shall be] after him"). "Ends of the earth" is the tr of 'ephes, "extremities" (Dt 33 17; Ps 22 27), also of kānāph, "wing" (Job 37 3; 38 13). Other words are neṣaḥ, "utmost" (Job 34 36), t'kūphāh, "circuit," "revolution" (Ex 34 22; 2 Ch 24 23, RVm "revolution"), etc. The vb. occurs almost invariably in the phrase "to make an end," as the tr of kālāh, "to finish," "complete" (Gen 27 30; Dt 20 9; Jer 26 8, etc); also of nālāh, "to complete" (Isa 33 1), and shālam, "to finish" (38 12.13).

In Dnl 9 24, the Heb text has סָתַם, hātham, "to seal up" ("to complete or finish"), but the margin, followed by AV, RV, Driver and most moderns, has סָתַם, hāthēm, "to finish," "end," "complete," a difference of one letter, but practically none in the sense, "to bring to an end"; cf "to finish the transgression," which precedes.

In the NT the common word for "end" is telos "an end," "completion," "termination" (Mt 10 22; 24 6; Jn 13 1, RVm "to the uttermost"; Rom 6 21, "The end of those things is death"; 6 22, "the end eternal life"; 10 4, "Christ is the end of the law unto righteousness"; Rev 21 6; 22 13, etc); ēkbasis, "outgoing" (He 13 7, RV "issue"); suntéleia, "full end," is used of "the end of the world" (Mt 13 39; He 9 26); péras, "extremity," "the ends of the world" (Rom 10 18); ákros, "a point, end" (Mt 24 31, "from one end of heaven to the other"). "End" as purpose is the tr of eis tó, "with a view to" (Acts 7 19; Rom 1 11; 4 16; 1 Thess 3 13); of eis tóuto, "unto this" (Jn 18 37; Rom 14 9; 2 Cor 2 9); of prós tó, "toward this" (Lk 18 1). "To end" (vb.) is plērōō, "to fill up" (Lk 7 1; Acts 19 21); once ginomai, "to become" (Jn 13 2, "supper being ended," which RV corrects, giving, "during supper").

For "end" RV has "utmost part" (Josh 15 8, etc), "latter end" (Ps 73 17; ERV Ps 37 38; Prov 5 4); "issue" (Dnl 12 8, m "latter end"; He 13 7); "side" (Ezk 41 12). Conversely it has "end" for "utmost part" (Josh 15 5); for "side" (Dt 4 32); for "conclusion" (Eccl 12 13); for "an end" (Prov 23 18); "a reward," m "sequel" or "future," Heb "latter end"; "final" (He 6 16); for "an end of" (Job 18 2), "snares for" (ARV "hunt for"); for "at one end" (Jer 51 31), "on every quarter"; for "until the day and night come to an end" (Job 26 10), "unto the confines of light and darkness"; for "have an end" (Lk 22 37), "hath fulfilment," m "Gr 'end';" for "to the end for" (1 Pet 1 13), "perfectly on"; "at the end of" for "in these last days" (He 1 2); "His end was nigh" for "He died" (He 11 22); "its own end," instead of "for himself" (Prov 16 4, m "his own purpose"); "neither is there any end to" instead of "for thine iniquities are infinite" (Job 22 5); "to this end" for "therefore" (Mk 1 38; 1 Tim 4 10); for "for this cause," "to this end" (Jn 18 37 bis), "unto this end" (1 Pet 4 6); "to this end" for "for this purpose" (Acts 26 16; 1 Jn 3 8); "to which end" for "wherefore" (2 Thess 1 11); "to the end" is inserted in Gen 18 19 bis, and several other passages. For "ends of the earth" see ASTRONOMY, III, 2. W. L. WALKER

END OF THE WORLD. See ESCHATOLOGY; WORLD, END OF THE.

ENDAMAGE, en-dam'āj: Archaic for "damage"; Ezr 4 13 AV: "Thou shalt endamage the revenue of the kings," RV "It will be hurtful unto the kings" (Aram. ܥܬܬܐܝܢ, n'zak); cf 1 Esd 6 33.

ENDEAVOR, en-de'vēr: The sense of this word has suffered weakening since the time of AV. Then it implied utmost exertion and success; now rather forlorn hope and possible failure. Thus RV reads "giving diligence," "give diligence," for AV "endeavoring," "endeavor," in Eph 4 3; 2 Pet 1 15, respectively; but "endeavored" is suffered to remain in 1 Thess 2 17 (σπουδάζω, spoudázō, "hasten," "exert oneself"). Cf also Acts 16 10, AV "endeavored," RV "sought" (Gr zēteō, "seek").

ENDIRONS, end'i-urnz (סְפַתַּיִם, sh'phattayim): Used once (Ezk 40 43 AV) in the m only. In text, both AV and RV, "hooks," denoting stalls or places for the fastening of victims for sacrifice, or perhaps the two hearthstones. The term is a corruption from another word similar in form and identity of usage. This word, "andiron," from Middle Eng., has assumed many peculiar forms, as "anderne," "aundirne," from which the form is doubtless derived, though this is not the original and has no relation to it. ARVm reads, "According to Vulg and Syr, ledges."

ENDLESS, end'les (ἀκατάλυτος, akatalutos [He 7 16], ἀπέραντος, apérantos [1 Tim 1 4]): This Eng. word occurs twice in the NT, and is there represented by the two Gr words above noted.

(1) In He 7 16 Jesus is said to be a priest "after the power of an endless life." The word means lit., as in RVm, "indissoluble." It is not simply that Christ's priesthood was eternal. The priesthood was based upon His possession, by nature, of a life which in time and eternity death could not touch. This distinguished Him essentially from priests under the law.

(2) In 1 Tim 1 4, Paul warns Timothy against giving heed in his ministry to "fables [mýthoi] and endless [limitless] genealogies." The allusion seems to be to the series of emanations (aeons) in gnostic speculation, to which no limit could be set.

Distinct from the above are the words denoting "everlasting," "eternal," which see. JAMES ORR

EN-DOR, en'dor (עֵין דֹּר, 'en dōr, Josh 17 11; עֵין דֹּר, 'en dōr, 1 S 28 7; עֵין דֹּר, 'en dō'r, Ps 83 10; A, Νηδῶρ, Nēdōr; B, Ἀελδῶρ, Aeldōr): A town in the lot of Issachar assigned to Manasseh (Josh 17 11). Here dwelt the woman who had a familiar spirit, whom Saul consulted on the night before the battle of Gilboa (1 S 28 7). Here also, according to Ps 83 10, perished fugitives of Sisera's army, after their defeat at the Kishon. The place was therefore not far from the Kishon and Tabor. It is generally identified with the modern Endūr, a small village on the northern slope of Jebel ed-Dukhy, with several ancient caves. It is not far from Nain and Shunem, and looks across the valley along which the broken ranks of Sisera may have attempted to make their way eastward to the open uplands, and thence to their native North. Coming hither from Gilboa, eluding the Phili outposts under cover of the darkness, Saul would cross the Vale of Jezreel, and pass round the eastern base of the mountain, the Philis being on the west.

EN-DOR, WITCH, wīch, OF: In 1 S 28 3-25, it is narrated how Saul, in despair of mind because Jeh had forsaken him, on the eve of the fatal battle of Gilboa, resorted in disguise to "a woman that had a familiar spirit" ('ōbh: see DIVINATION; NECROMANCY), at En-dor, and besought the woman to divine for him, and bring him up from the dead whom he should name. On the woman reminding him how Saul had cut off from the land those who practised these arts—a proof of the existence and operation of the laws against divination, witchcraft, necromancy, etc (Lev 19 31; Dt 18 9-14)—the king assured her of immunity, and bade her call up Samuel. The incidents that followed have been the subject of much discussion and of varied interpretation. It seems assumed in the narrative that the woman did see an appearance, which the king, on her describing it, recognized to be that of Samuel. This, however, need be only the narrator's interpretation of the events. It is not to be credited that the saintly Samuel was actually summoned from his rest by the spells of a professional diviner. Some have thought that Samuel, by God's permission, did indeed appear, as much to the woman's dismay as to the king's; and urge in favor of this the woman's evident surprise and terror at his appearance (vs 12 ff), and the true prophecy of Saul's fate (vs 16-19). It may conceivably have been so, but the more reasonable view is that the whole transaction was a piece of feigning on the part of the woman. The LXX uses the word eggastimouthos ("a ventriloquist") to describe the woman and those who exercised kindred arts (ver 9). Though pretending ignorance (ver 12), the woman doubtless recognizes Saul from the first. It was she who saw Samuel, and reported his words; the king himself saw and heard nothing. It required no great skill in a practised diviner to forecast the general issue of the battle about to take place, and the disaster that would overtake Saul and his sons; while if the forecast had proved untrue, the narrative of the witch of En-dor would never have been written. Saul, in fact, was not slain, but killed himself. The incident, therefore, may best be ranked in the same category as the feats of modern mediumship.

ENDOW, en-dou', ENDUE, en-dū': "Endow" meant originally "to provide with a dowry"; "indue" took the meaning "clothe"; the likeness between the lit. meanings has confused the metaphorical use of the words in spite of their difference in origin. Thus we find in Gen 30 20, AV "endued me with a good dowry," RV "endowed" (זָבַח, zābhadh, "bestow upon," "endow"); Ex 22 16, AV "endow her to be his wife," RV "pay a dowry for her" (מָהָר, māhar, "purchase," "endow"); of Dt 22 29; 2 Ch 2 12.13, AV and RV "endued" with understanding (from יָדָה, yādha, "know"); and Lk 24 49, AV "endued with power," RV "clothed" (ἐνδύω, endūō, "clothe").

F. K. FARR

ENDS OF THE EARTH. See ASTRONOMY, III, 2.

ENDURE, en-dūr': Used in the Bible (1) in the sense of "continue," "last," as in Ps 9 7, "The Lord shall endure for ever" (ARV "Jeh sitteth as king for ever"); 30 5, "Weeping may endure for a night" (RV "tarry," m "may come in to lodge at even"); Jn 6 27, "the meat which endureth," AV, RV "the food which abideth"; (2) in the sense of "bear" (He 12 20): "bear up under" hardship, persecution, etc (2 Tim 3 11; 1 Pet 2 19); "to remain under" (He 10 32; 12 2; Jas 1 12; 5 11); "to be strong, firm" (He 11 27); "to persevere" beneath a heavy burden (Mt 10 22).

EN-EGLAIM, en-eg'lā-im, en-eg-lā'im (עֵינַי עֵגְלַיִם, 'ēn 'eghlayim, "fountain of calves"?): In Ezekiel's vision of the waters it is one of the two points between which "fishers shall stand" (Ezk 47 10). The situation must be near the entrance of the Jordan into the Dead Sea (see EN-GEDI). Tristram (Bible Places, 93) identifies it with 'Ain Hajlah (cf BETH-HOGLAH); Robinson (BRP, II, 489), with 'Ain Feshkah.

ENEMESSAR, en-ē-mes'ar (Ἐνεμессάρ, Enemessār, Ἐνεμессαρος, Enemessaros): Generally allowed, since Grotius, to be a corruption, though occasionally defended as an alternative form, of Shalmaneser (Tob 1 2.15, etc) who carried Israel captive to Nineveh, as related in 2 K. Among the captives was Tobit, taken from Thisbe in Gilead, where the prophet Elijah was born and for a time lived. The writer of Tob makes Sennacherib the son (1 15), as well as the successor of Enemessar, whereas, according to the Assyrian inscriptions, Sennacherib was the son of Sargon. This is only one of several serious historical difficulties in the narrative of Tob. The corruption of the name is variously explained. Rawlinson supposes the first syllable of the word Shal to have been dropped, comparing the Bupalussor of Abydenus for Nabopolassar. Dr. Pinches takes Enemessar for Senemessar, the sh being changed to s and then to the smooth breathing, though the rough breathing more commonly takes the place of a dropped s; both scholars admit the easy transposition of the liquids m and n. Shalman-asharid is the Assyrian form of Shalmaneser.

J. HUTCHISON

ENEMY, en'e-mi (אֹיֵב, 'ōyēbh, צָר, ṣar, חָר, ḥār; ἐχθρός, echthros): "Enemy," "enemies," are frequent words in the OT. The Heb word most often so tr'd is 'ōyēbh, meaning perhaps lit. "one who hates"; very frequent in the Pss, e.g. 3 7; 6 10; 7 5; 8 2; 9 3.6; 13 2, where the cry is often for deliverance from enemies. Another word for "enemy," found chiefly in the poetical books, is ṣār, or ḥār, "distresser," "straitener" (Nu 10 9; Job 16 9; Ps 27 2.12, RV "adversary," etc); also ḥārār (Est 3 10; Ps 8 2; 10 5 AV, etc). Other words are 'ār, "one awake" (1 S 28 16 AV; Dnl 4 19 AV); sānē, perhaps, "to be sharp or bite" (Ex 1 10; Prov 25 21; 27 6); shārar, "to watch" (Ps 5 8; 27 11), and kūm, "to stand up," or "withstand" (Ex 32 25).

In the NT echthros, "enemy," "opponent," is the only word tr'd "enemy" (Mt 5 43.44; Mk 12 36; Lk 1 71.74, etc; Rom 5 10; 11 28, etc), once with anthrōpos ("a man"), joined to echthros (Mt 13 28).

In RV "adversary" is frequently substituted for "enemy" (Nu 24 8; Dt 32 41; Ps 6 7; 7 6; 44 10, etc.); for "O thou enemy," etc (Ps 9 6) we have "The enemy are come to an end"; instead of "When the enemy shall come in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him" (Isa 59 19) we have "For he will come as a rushing stream, which the breath of Jeh driveth" (with the text of AV in m); for "The fire of thine enemies shall devour them" (26 11), "Fire shall devour thine adversaries" (text of AV in m).

The frequent reference to enemies in the OT is what we should expect to see in these early times on the part of a people settling in a land that had been occupied by other tribes, worshipping other gods. The spirit of their law was that expressed by Our Lord in His Sermon on the Mount, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor, and hate thine enemy." This He changed: "but I say unto you, Love your enemies." An approach toward this spirit had been made in the later prophets by their inclusion of the whole world under one God, who had a gracious purpose toward all, but the near statement of it we only find in Prov 25 21 (quoted by St. Paul, Rom 12 20). See also Ex 23 4, and of 2 K 6 22; 2 Ch 28 15.

ENENEUS, ē-nē'nē-us, en-e-nē-us ('Ενένιος, Enēnios; AV Enenius, RVm 'Enenis'): Occurring only in Apoc. According to 1 Esd 5 8, E. was one of the 12 leaders over the returning exiles from Babylon under Zerubbabel. Ezr 2 contains the parallel list of the returning leaders but omits E., giving only 11; but E. corresponds to Nahamani (Neh 7 7).

ENFLAME. See INFLAME.

EN-GADDI, en-gad'i (Sir 24 14 RV, "on the sea shore"). See EN-GEDI.

ENGAGE, en-gāj': From קָרַב, 'arabh, "to pledge," Jer 30 21, AV "Who is this that engaged his heart?"; RV "he that hath had boldness"; RVm Heb "hath been surety for his heart?"

EN-GANNIM, en-gan'im (עֵינֵן גַּנִּים, 'en gannim, "spring of gardens"):

(1) A town in the territory of Judah, named with Zanoah and Eshtaol (Josh 15 34). It is probably identical with the modern Umm Jina, S. of Wādy es-Sarār, not far from Zanoah (Zanū'a).

(2) A town in the lot of Issachar (Josh 19 21), assigned to the Gershonite Levites (21 29). In 1 Ch 6 73 it is replaced by Anem. It probably corresponds to the Ginnea of Jos (Ant. XX, vi, 1; BJ, III, iii, 4), and may certainly be identified with the modern Jenīn, a prosperous village on the southern edge of the plain of Esdraelon, with beautiful gardens, fruitful orchards and plentiful supplies of water from the local springs.

W. EWING

EN-GEDI, en'ge-dī, en-gē'dī (עֵינֵן גֵּדִי, 'en gedhī, "fountain of the kid"): Identical with the present Ain Jidi. According to 2 Ch 20 2 it is the same as Hazazon-tamar, mentioned in Gen 14 7 as occupied by the Amorites and as having been attacked by Chedorlaomer after leaving Kadesh and El Paran on his way to the Vale of Siddim. The place is situated upon the W. shore of the Dead Sea about midway between the N. and the S. ends, and was included in the territory of Judah (Josh 15 62). The spot is rendered attractive by the verdure clothing it by reason of immense fountains of warm water, 80° F., which pour out from beneath the limestone cliffs. In the time of Solomon (Cant 1 14) palms and vines were cultivated here. Jos also mentions its beautiful palm groves. In the time of Eusebius it was still a place of importance, but since the Middle Ages it has been almost deserted, being occupied now only by a few Arabs. The oasis occupies a small area a few hundred feet above the Dead Sea marked by the 650 ft. sedimentary terrace heretofore described (see DEAD SEA). The limestone borders rise so abruptly to a height of 2,000 ft. immediately on the W., that the place can be approached only by a rock-cut path. Two streams, Wady Sugeir and Wady el-Areyeh, descend on either side through precipitous rocky gorges from the uninhabitable wilderness separating it from Bethlehem and Hebron. It was in the caves opening out from the sides of these gorges that David took refuge from Saul (1 S 24 1). During the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 20 2), the children of Ammon, Moab and Mt. Seir attempted to invade Judah by way of En-gedi, but were easily defeated as they came up from the gorges to occupy the advantageous field of battle chosen by Jehoshaphat.

English Versions of the Scriptures.—The battle for vernacular Scripture, the right of a nation to have the sacred writings in its own

1. Intro- tongue, was fought and won in Engductory land. Ancient VSS, such as the Syr and the Gothic, were produced to meet obvious requirements of the teacher or the missionary, and met with no opposition from any quarter. The same was the case with the efforts of the Anglo-Saxon church to provide portions of Scripture for the use of the people. Even in later times the Lat church seems to have followed no consistent policy in permitting or forbidding the tr of the Scriptures. In one country the practice was forbidden, in another it was regarded with forbearance or permitted under authority (Addis and Arnold, Catholic Dictionary, London, 1884, art. "Bible"); and so it came about that the different nations of Europe came by the inestimable boon of an open Bible in different ways. Germany, for example, after the attempts of numerous translators who seem to have been quite untrammeled in their work owed, under Providence, to the faith, the intrepidity and the genius of Luther the national version which satisfied it for more than three centuries, and, after a recent and essentially conservative revision, satisfies it still. In England, as related below, things took a different course. In the Reformation period the struggle turned mainly on the question of the tr of the Bible.

The clergy and learned men had always of course access to the Scriptures in the Vulg, a tr of the original Scriptures into Lat completed

2. The Bible in Anglo-Saxon and Norman Times

by Jerome at the very beginning of the 5th cent.; and from this version—the Vulg—practically all further tr<sup>s</sup> were made till the days of Luther. Within a century or little more after the landing of Augustine in England and his settlement at Canterbury (597 AD) Caedmon, a monk of Whitby, produced (670) his metrical version of the Bible, hardly indeed to be reckoned a version of the Scriptures in the ordinary sense, though it paved the way for such. Bede of Jarrow (672-735) tr<sup>d</sup> the Creed and the Lord's Prayer and, according to the beautiful letter of his pupil, Cuthbert, breathed his last on the completion of his tr of the Gospel of John into the language of the people. Aldhelm, bishop of Sherborne in the county of Dorset (d. 709), tr<sup>d</sup> the Psalter in another tr with which the name of King Alfred is associated; and the other efforts of that ruler to spread the knowledge of the Scriptures among his people are well known. Notice, too, should be taken of the glosses. "The gloss," says Eadie (English Bible, I, 14, n.), "was neither a free nor yet a literal tr, but the interlinear insertion of the vernacular, word against word of the original, so that the order of the former was really irrespective of idiom and usage." The finest example of these is seen in the Lindisfarne Gospels, which were written in Lat about the year 700, and provided with an interlinear tr about 950 by Alfred, the priest. These with a version of a considerable section of the OT by Ælfric, archbishop of Canterbury about the year 990, comprise the main efforts at Bible tr into Eng. before the Norman Conquest. In Anglo-Saxon there is no proof of the existence of any tr of the complete Bible, or even of the complete NT. The sectional VSS, moreover, cannot be shown to have had any influence upon succeeding VSS. For nearly three centuries after the Conquest the interrelations of the different sections of the people and the conditions of the language prevented any real literary progress. The period, however, was marked by the appearance of fragmentary tr<sup>s</sup> of Scripture into Norman French. From some Augustinian monastery, too, in the north of the East Midland district of England, about the year 1200, appeared the Ormulum, a curious metrical work of some 20,000 lines, consisting of a paraphrase of the Gospel of the day and an explanatory homily for 32 days of the year. Like the work of Caedmon the monk, it was not exactly Bible tr, but it doubtless prepared the way for such. Three VSS of the Psalter, naturally always a favorite portion of Scripture with the translator, are assigned to the first half of Wycliffe's century. The reformer himself in one of his tracts urges a tr of the Bible to suit the humbler classes of society, on the plea that the upper classes already have their version in French. It was only in the long and splendid reign of Edward III (1327-77), when the two races that had existed in the country since the Conquest were perfectly united, that the predominance of English asserted itself, and the growth of the power and of the mental activity of the people instinctively demanded a new form of expression. The century of Wycliffe, it is to be remembered, was also that of Langland, Gower and Chaucer.

Born in Yorkshire about the year 1320, Wycliffe was educated at Balliol College, Oxford, of which he soon became a Fellow and was for a short time Master, resigning the latter position in the year 1361 on his presentation to a living in Lincolnshire. He died at Lutterworth in Leicestershire in 1384. It was during the last quarter of his life that he came forward as a friend of the people and as a prolific writer on their behalf. Notwithstanding the external glory of the reign of Edward III, there was much in the ecclesiastical and social circumstances of the time to justify popular discontent. The Pope derived from England alone a revenue larger than that of any prince in Christendom. The nobles resented the extortion and pretensions of the higher clergy; and, according to Green, "the enthusiasm of the Friars, who in the preceding century had preached in praise of poverty, had utterly died away and left a crowd of impudent mendicants behind it." The Black Death, "the most terrible plague the world ever witnessed," fell in the middle of the century and did much further to embitter the already bitter condition of the poor. In France things were no better than in England, and the Turk had settled permanently in Europe. It is not wonderful that Wycliffe began, as is said, his version of the NT with the Book of Rev. With his social teaching the present art. is not specially concerned. It probably involved no more than the inculcation of the inherently democratic and leveling doctrines of Christianity, though some of the Lollards, like the Munster peasants in the German Reformation, associated it with dangerous socialistic practice. In any case the application of Christianity to the solution of social problems is not in any age easy to effect in practice. His tracts show (Eadie, I, 59 ff) that it was from what Wycliffe had felt the Bible to be to himself that there sprang his strong desire to make the reading of it possible for his countrymen. To this was due the first Eng. version of the Bible. To this also was likewise due the institution of the order of "poor priests" to spread the knowledge of the Bible as widely as possible throughout the country.

There is some uncertainty as to the exact share which Wycliffe had in the production of the 14th cent. version. The tr of the NT was finished about the year 1380 and in 1382 the tr of the entire Bible was completed, the greater part of the OT being the work of Nicholas Hereford, one of the reformer's most ardent supporters at Oxford. The work was revised on thoroughly sound principles of criticism and interpretation, as these are explained in the prologue to the new edition, by John Purvey, one of Wycliffe's most intimate friends during the latter part of his life, and finished in 1388. "Other scholars," says Mr. F. G. Kenyon, of the British Museum, "assisted him in his work, and we have no certain means of knowing how much of the tr was actually done by himself. The NT is attributed to him, but we cannot say with certainty that it was entirely his own work" (Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts, 200, 3d ed, London, 1898). This entirely corresponds with the position taken up by Forshall and Madden, the editors of the great Oxford edition of Wycliffe's version issued in 4 large quarto vols in 1850. That work was undertaken to honor Wycliffe and in some measure to repay England's indebtedness to the reformer. The editors were men of the first literary rank; they spent 22 years upon this work; and it is recognized as a credit at once to the scholarship and research of Oxford and of England. Its honest and straightforward Introduction answers by anticipation by far the greater part of the criticisms and claims put forth by Dr. Gasquet (Our Old English Bible and Other Essays, London, 1898; 2d ed, 1908). The claim is made that the work published in Oxford in 1850 is really not Wycliffe's at all but that of his bitterest opponents, the bishops of the English church who represented the party of Rome. Gasquet's work on this subject is mainly worthy of notice on account of his meritorious research in other departments of the English Reformation. His arguments and statements are met by Kenyon (op. cit., 204-8). The controversy is further noticed in The Age of Wycliffe, by G. M. Trevelyan (2d ed, London, 1908), a work which cannot be too highly praised for its deep research, its interesting exposition and its cordial appreciation of the reformer and his works. "Nothing," says Trevelyan (Appendix, 361), "can be more damning than the licenses to particular people to have Eng. Bibles, for they distinctly show that without such licenses it was thought wrong to have them." The age of printing, it is to be remembered, was not yet.

The Wycliffe Bible was issued and circulated in copies each of which was written by the hand. About 170 copies of this manuscript Bible are still in existence. They form a striking proof of what England and the world owe to the faith, the courage and the labor of John Wycliffe and his "poor priests."

It is a remarkable fact that before the year 1500 most of the countries of Europe had been supplied with a version of the Scriptures printed in the vernacular tongue, while England had nothing but the scattered copies of the Wycliffe MS version. Even Caxton, eager as was his search for works to translate and to print, while he supplied priests with service-books, preachers with sermons, and the clerk with the "Golden Legende," left the Scriptures severely alone. Nor was there a printed Eng. version, even of the NT, for close on half a century after Caxton's death, a circumstance largely due to the energy of the Tudor dictatorship and the severity of the Arundelian Constitutions enacted by Convocation at Oxford in the year 1408 against Wycliffe and his work. These enactments forbade "upon pain of the greater excommunication the unauthorised tr of any text of the Scriptures into English or any other tongue by way of a book, pamphlet, treatise or the reading of such." Meanwhile the study of the new learning, including that of the original languages of Scripture, though generally resisted by the clergy, was greatly promoted by the invention of printing.

Erasmus, perhaps the chief representative name of the new age in the domain of learning, was professor of Greek at Cambridge from

6. William Tyndale 1509 to 1524, and in the 2d year of his professorship William Tyndale, an Oxford student in the 26th year of his age, migrated to Cambridge to study Greek. Ten years later Tyndale returned to his native county—Gloucestershire—to take up a private tutorship and there formed the determination which became the one fixed aim of his life—to put an ET, not of the Vulg but of the original Gr and Heb Scriptures, into the hands of his countrymen. "If God spared him life," he said, "ere many years he would cause a boy that driveth a plough to know more of the Scriptures than the Pope did." Erasmus at Cambridge had uttered a similar aspiration. "He boldly avows his wish for a Bible open and intelligible to all. . . . 'I long for the day when the husbandman shall sing to himself portions of the Scriptures as he follows the plough, when the weaver shall hum them to the time of his shuttle, when the traveller shall while away with their stories the weariness of his journey'" (Green, History of the English People, 1st ed, 308). In 1522 Tyndale went to London to try to find a patron for his work in Tunstall, bishop of London, who had studied Gr with Latimer at Padua and was one of the most noted humanists of the day. To show himself capable for the work, Tyndale took with him to London a version of a speech of Isocrates. But the Bishop of London's service was full; and after spending a year with a friendly alderman in London, "at last," he says in the Preface to his Five Books of Moses, "I understood not only that there was no room in my Lord of London's palace to translate the NT, but also that there was no place to do it in all England." He left the country and never returned to it. He spent the remaining twelve years of his life in exile and for the most part in great hardship, sustained by steady labor and by the one hope of his life—the giving to his countrymen of a reliable version of the Holy Scriptures in their own tongue. He went first to Hamburg, and there, as it seems, issued in the year 1524 versions of Mt and Mk separately, with marginal notes. Next year he removed to Cologne, and arranged for the printing of the complete NT, the tr of which he accomplished alone, from the study of the Gr text of Erasmus in its original and revised editions and by a comparison of these with the Vulg and several European vernacular VSS which, as already stated, had anticipated that of England. The story of the interruption by Cochlaeus of the actual work of printing, and of his warning the King and Wolsey of the impending invasion of England by Lutheranism, reads like a romance. His interference resulted in the prohibition by the city authorities of the printing of the work and in the sudden flight of Tyndale and his assistant, Joye, who sailed up the Rhine with the precious sheets already printed of their 3,000 quarto edition to Worms, the city of the famous Diet in which Luther four years before had borne his testimony before the Emperor. The place was now Lutheran, and here the work of printing could be carried out in security and at leisure. To baffle his enemies, as it seems, a small octavo edition was first printed without glosses; then the quarto edition was completed. The "pernicious literature" of both editions, without name of the translator, was shipped to England early in 1526; and by 1530 six editions of the NT in English (three surreptitiously) were distributed, numbering, it is computed, 15,000 copies. The unfavorable reception of Tyndale's work by the King and the church authorities may in some measure be accounted for by the excesses which at the moment were associated with the Reformation in Germany, and by the memories of Lollardism in connection with the work of Wycliffe. So vehement was the opposition at any rate to Tyndale's work, and so determined the zeal in buying up and burning the book, that of the six editions above mentioned there "remains of the first edition one fragment only; . . . of the second one copy, wanting the title-page, and another very imperfect; and of the others, two or three copies which are not however satisfactorily identified" (Westcott, History of the English Bible, 45, London, 1868). Meanwhile Tyndale took to working on the OT. Much discussion has taken place on the question whether he knew Heb (see Eadie, I, 209 ff). Tyndale's own distinct avowal is that it was from the Heb direct that such tr of the OT as he accomplished was made. Very early in 1531 he published separately VSS of Gen and Dt, and in the following year the whole of the Pent in one volume, with a preface and marginal glosses. In 1534 appeared the Book of Jon, with a prologue; and in the same year a new version of the NT to counteract one made by Joye from the Vulg. This has been described by Westcott (op. cit., 185) as "altogether

Tyndale's noblest monument," mainly on account of its short and pregnant glosses. "Bengel himself is not more terse or pointed." A beautifully illuminated copy of this edition was struck off on vellum and presented to Queen Anne Boleyn; and an edition of his revised NT was printed in London—"The first volume of Holy Scripture printed in England"—in 1536, the year of the Queen's death. Tyndale had for some time lived at Antwerp, enjoying a "considerable yearly exhibition" from the English merchants there; but his enemies in England were numerous, powerful and watchful. In 1534 he was betrayed and arrested; and after an imprisonment of nearly a year and a half at the castle of Vitorde, about 18 miles from Brussels, he was strangled and then burned in 1536, the same year as that of the death of the Queen. The last days of the hero and martyr may have been cheered by the news of the printing of his revised edition of the NT in England.

Miles Coverdale, who first gave England a complete and authorized version of the Bible, was a younger contemporary of Tyndale.

7. Miles Tyndale was a year younger than Coverdale Luther, who was born in 1483, and Coverdale was four years younger than Tyndale. Born in the North Riding of Yorkshire, he found his way to Cambridge at the time when Erasmus was professor of Gr, and appears at an early date—how is not known—to have got into the good graces of Crumwell, the "malleus monachorum," factotum and secretary to Wolsey, and later on the King's principal abettor in his efforts to render the Church of England thoroughly national, if not to an equal extent Protestant. Adopting the liberal party in the church, he held Lutheran or evangelical views of religion, cast off his monastic habit, and, as Bale says, gave himself up wholly to the preaching of the gospel. He is found in 1527 in intimate connection with More and Crumwell and probably from them he received encouragement to proceed with a tr of the Bible. In 1528 he was blamed before Tunstall, bishop of London, as having caused some to desert the mass, the confessional and the worship of images; and seeking safety, he left England for the Continent. He is said by Foxe to have met Tyndale at Hamburg in 1529, and to have given him some help in the tr of the Pent. An uncertainty hangs over Coverdale's movements from 1529 to 1535, a period during which much was happening that could not fail to be powerfully changing opinion in England. The result of the Assembly held at Westminster by Warham in May, 1530, and of the Convocation held under his successor, Cranmer, in December, 1534, was that in the latter it was petitioned that "his Majesty would vouchsafe to decree that the sacred Scriptures should be tr<sup>d</sup> into the Eng. tongue by certain honest and learned men, named for that purpose by his Majesty, and should be delivered to the people according to their learning." Crumwell, meanwhile, who had a shrewd forecast of the trend of affairs, seems to have arranged with Coverdale for the printing of his tr. However this may be, by the year 1534 "he was ready, as he was desired, to set forth" (i.e. to print) his tr; and the work was finished in 1535. And thus, "as the harvest springs from the seed which germinates in darkness, so the entire Eng. Bible, tr<sup>d</sup> no one knows where, presented itself, unheralded and unanticipated, at once to national notice in 1535" (Eadie, I, 266). It is declared on the title-page to be "faithfully and truly translated out of Douche and Latyn into Englishe: MDXXXV." Coverdale's own statements about his work leave the impression that he was a conspicuously honest man. Unlike Tyndale who regarded himself as, in a way, a prophet, with his work as a necessity Divinely laid upon him, Coverdale describes that he had no particular desire to undertake the work—and how he wrought, as it were, in the language of these days, under a committee from whom he took his instructions and who "required him to use the Douche [i.e. the German] and the Latyn." He claims further to have done the work entirely himself, and he certainly produced a new version of the OT and a revised version of the NT. He used, he says, five sundry interpreters of the original languages. These interpreters were, in all probability, the Vulg, Luther's version, the Zurich or Swiss-German Bible, the Lat version of Pagninus, and he certainly consulted Tyndale on the Pent and the NT. He successfully studied musical effect in his sentences and many of the finest phrases in the AV are directly traced to Coverdale. His version of the Pss is that which is retained and is still in daily use in the ritual of the Church of England. Two new editions of Coverdale's version were issued in 1537 "with the King's most gracious license," and after this the Eng. Bible was allowed to circulate freely. Certain changes in the title-page, prefaces and other details are discussed in the works mentioned at the end of this article.

Convocation meanwhile was not satisfied with Coverdale's tr, and Coverdale himself in his honest modesty had expressed the hope that an improved tr should follow his own.

8. Matthew's Bible Accordingly in 1537—probably at the suggestion of, and with some support from, Crumwell and certainly to his satisfaction—a large folio Bible appeared, as edited and dedicated to the King, by Thomas Matthew. This name has, since the days of Foxe, been held to be a pseudonym for John Rogers, the proto-martyr of the Marian persecution, a Cambridge graduate who had for some years lived in intimacy with Tyndale at Antwerp, and who became the possessor of his MS at his death. Besides the NT, Tyndale, as above mentioned, had published tr<sup>s</sup> of the Pent, the Book of Jon, and portions of the Apoc, and had left a MS version of Josh to 2 Ch. Rogers, apparently taking all he could find of the work of Tyndale, supplemented this by the work of Coverdale and issued the composite volume with the title, "The Bible, which is all the Holy Scriptures, in which are contained the Olde and Newe Testaments, truly and purely translated into English by Thomas Matthew. Esaye I, Harken to, ye heavens, and thou earth, heave eare: for the Lord speaketh. MDXXXVII." After the banning and burning of Tyndale's NT on its arrival in England 11 years before, it is not easy to account for the royal sanction with which the tr appeared. It was probably granted to the united efforts of Cranmer and Crumwell, aided perhaps by the King's desire to show action independent of the church. The royal sanction, it will be noted, was given in the same year in which it was given to Coverdale's second edition. That version became the basis of our present Bible. It was on Matthew's version that for 75 years thereafter all other versions were based.

Matthew's first edition of 1,500 copies was soon exhausted, and a new edition was issued with some revision by Richard Taverner, a cul-

9. Richard Taverner tivated young layman and lawyer who had in his early years been selected by Wolsey for his college at Oxford. He was imprisoned in its cellar for reading Tyndale's NT; but he was soon released for his singular musical accomplishments. He was an excellent Grecian, of good literary taste and of personal dignity. For the OT curiously enough he made, good Grecian as he was, no use of the Sept; but throughout aimed successfully at idiomatic expression, as also at compression and vividness. Some of his changes are kept in the AV, such as "parables" for "similitudes," and in Mt 24 12, "The love of the many shall wax cold," and others. He also does greater justice to the Gr article. His dedication to the king is manly and dignified and compares most favorably with the dedications of other translators, including that of the AV. The book appeared in two editions, folio and quarto, in 1539, and in the same year two editions, folio and quarto, of the NT. The Bible and the NT were each reprinted once, and his OT was adopted in a Bible of 1551. But with these exceptions Taverner's version was practically outside of influence on later tr<sup>s</sup>.

The next Bible to appear was named from its size. Its pages are fully 15 in. long and over 9 in. broad.

10. The Great Bible It was meant to be in a way a state edition, and is known as the Great Bible. As sufficiently good type, paper and other requisites could not be found in England, it was resolved that it should be printed in Paris. Coverdale and Grafton, the printer, went to Paris to superintend the printing; but the French church authorities interfered and the presses, types and workmen had to be transferred to London where the work was finished. It was the outcome of the Protestant zeal of Crumwell who wished to improve upon the merely composite volume of Tyndale and Coverdale. Its origin is not very accurately known, and authorities such as Hume, Burnet and Froude have ventured upon statements regarding it, for which there is really no proof (Eadie, I, 356 ff). The duty of editor or reviser was by Crumwell assigned to Coverdale who, as a pliant man and really interested in the improvement of the Eng. version, was quite willing to undertake a work that might supersede his own. The rapidity with which the work was executed and the proofs of the minute care devoted to it by Coverdale may appear remarkable to those who are acquainted with the deliberate and leisurely methods of the large committee that produced the AV in the reign of King James or the RV in the reign of Queen Victoria. Of course Coverdale had been over all the work before and knew the points at which improvements were to be applied; and a zealous and expert individual can accomplish more than a committee. Luther tr<sup>d</sup> the NT and, after revising his work with Melancthon, had it printed and published in less than a year. The printing of the Great Bible began in May, 1538, and was completed in April, 1539, a handsome folio, printed in black letter, with the title, "The Byble in Englyshe, that is to say, the contents of all the holy scripture, bothe of the olde and newe testament, truly translated after the veryte of the Hebrue and Greke textes, by the dylygent studye of dyverse excellent learned men, expert in the forsayde tongues. Prynted by Rycharde Grafton and Edward Whitchurch. Cum privilegio ad imprimendum solum. 1539." The elaborate notes for which asterisks and various other marks are provided were never supplied; but the actual tr shows devoted attention to the work and much fine appreciation of the original languages and of English. In the NT the version derived assistance from the Lat version of Erasmus, and in the OT from Munster and Pagninus. Variations in the text could of course be got from the Complutensian Polyglot. The Great Bible shows considerable improvement upon Tyndale in the NT, and upon Coverdale in the OT. "So careful," says Eadie (I, 370), "had been Coverdale's revision and so little attachment had he to his own previous version, that in the 53rd chapter of Isaiah the Bible of 1539 differs in nearly forty places from his version of 1535." The clergy of course had no love for Crumwell and still less for his work, though to avert clerical prejudices, Coverdale had made concessions in his tr. The work was cordially welcomed by the people, and a copy was ordered to be printed for every parish church, the cost to be paid half by the parson and half by the parishioners. A further revision of this version was carried out by Coverdale for a second edition which appeared in April, 1540, and is known as Cranmer's Bible, mainly from the judicious and earnest preface which the archbishop wrote for it. "It exhibits a text formed on the same principles as that of 1539, but after a fuller and more thorough revision" (Westcott, 254). Two other editions followed in the same year and three more in the year following (1541).

After the publication of the Great Bible (1539-41) no further advance took place for many years.

11. Reaction, 1541-57 The later years of Henry VIII indeed were marked by serious reaction. In 1542 Convocation with the royal consent made an attempt, fortunately thwarted by Cranmer, to Latinize the Eng. version and to make it in reality what the Romish version of Rheims subsequently became. In the following year Parliament, which then practically meant the King and two or three members of the Privy Council, restricted the use of the Eng. Bible to certain social classes that excluded nine-tenths of the population; and three years later it prohibited the use of everything but the Great Bible. It was probably at this time that there took place the great destruction of all previous work on the Eng. Bible which has rendered examples of that work so scarce. Even Tunstall and Heath were anxious to escape from their responsibility in lending their names to the Great Bible. In the midst of this reaction Henry VIII died, January 28, 1547.

No new work marked the reign of Edward VI, but great activity prevailed in the printing of previous VSS. Thirty-five New Testaments and thirteen Bibles were published during his reign of six years and a half; and injunctions were issued urging every person to read "the very lively Word of God" and for a copy of the Great Bible with the Eng. paraphrase of Erasmus to be set up in every church. By royal order a NT was to be sold for 22d., a sum representing as many shillings of present value.

Less repressive work regarding the tr and diffusion of Scripture than might have been expected occurred in the reign of Mary, though in other directions the reaction was severe enough. According to Lord Burghley, during the three years and nine months of Mary's reign, the number of 400 persons perished—men, women, maidens and children—by imprisonment, torment, famine and fire. Among the martyrs were Cranmer and Rogers; Coverdale escaped martyrdom only by exile and the powerful intervention of the king of Denmark. The copies of the Bibles in the churches were of course burned; and—though individual tr<sup>s</sup> were not specified—proclamations were issued against certain books and authors. Still the books were not, as formerly, bought up and confiscated; and so the activity of Edward's reign in the production of Bibles left copies widely distributed throughout the country at the close of Mary's reign. At this time a NT was printed at Geneva which had great influence upon future VSS of the Bible.

This NT was issued in 1557 and was most probably the work of W. Whittingham, an English exile who had married Calvin's sister. It was tr<sup>d</sup> from the Gr and compared carefully with other VSS. It had also a marginal commentary which was more complete than anything similar that had yet appeared in England; and it was the first tr that was printed in roman letter and in which chapters were divided into verses. Calvin wrote for it an introductory epistle, and it had also an address by the reviser himself. A few months after its publication the more serious task of the revision of the whole Bible was begun and continued for the space of two years and more, the translators working at it "day and night." Who the translators were is not said; but Whittingham, probably with Gilby and Sampson, stayed at Geneva for a year and a half after Elizabeth came to the throne, and saw the work through. It was finished in 1560, and in a dignified preface was dedicated to Elizabeth. The cost was met by members of the Congregation at Geneva, among whom was John Bodley, father of the founder of the great library at Oxford. Its handy form—a modest quarto—along with its vigorously expressed commentary, made it popular even with people who objected to its source and the occasional Calvinistic tinge of its doctrines. It became and remained the popular edition for nearly three-quarters of a century. The causes of its popularity are explained in Westcott, 125 f. Bodley had received the patent for its publication; and upon his asking for an extension of the patent for twelve years, the request was generously granted by Archbishop Parker and Grindly, bishop of London, though the Bishops' Bible was already begun.

The "Breeches Bible."—The Geneva version is often called the "Breeches Bible" from its tr of Gen 3 7: "They sewed figleaves together, and made themselves breeches." This tr, however, is not peculiar to the Genevan version. It is the tr of perizōmata in both the Wycliffe VSS; it is also found in Caxton's version of the "Golden Legend."

Queen Elizabeth, the beginning of whose reign was beset with great difficulties, restored the arrangements of Edward VI. A copy of the Great Bible was required to be provided in every church, and every encouragement was given to the reading of the Scriptures. The defects of the Great Bible were admitted, and were the not unnatural result of the haste with which—notwithstanding its two revisions—it had been produced. These became more apparent when set beside the Geneva version, which, however, the archbishop and clergy could hardly be expected to receive with enthusiasm, as they had had nothing to do with its origin and had no control over its renderings and marginal notes. Archbishop Parker, moreover, who had an inclination to Bib. studies, had at the same time a passion for uniformity; and probably to this combination of circumstances may be traced the origin of the Bishops' Bible. Parker superintended the work, which was begun in 1563-64; he was aided by eight bishops—from whom the version received its name—and other scholars. It appeared in a magnificent volume in 1568, without a word of flattery, but with a preface in which the revisers express a lofty consciousness of the importance of their work. It was published in 1568 cum privilegio regiae Majestatis. A revised and in many places corrected edition was issued in 1572, and another in 1575, the year of the archbishop's death. The general aim of the version is a quaint literality, but along with this is found the use of not a few explanatory words and phrases not found in the original text. More exact notice also than in previous VSS is taken of the use of the Gr art. and of the particles and conjunctions. It bears marks, however, of the hand of the individual translators by whom the work was done; and of the want of the revision of each translator's work by the rest, and of some general revision of the whole. The Genevan version was the work of collegiate labor, to which much of its superiority is due. Though Parker did not object to the circulation of the Genevan version, Convocation after his death made some unsuccessful attempts to popularize the Bishops' Bible; but the Genevan tr was not easily thrust aside. "It grew," says Eadie (II, 35), "to be in greater demand than the Bishops' or Cranmer's. Ninety editions of it were published in the reign of Elizabeth, as against forty of all the other VSS. Of Bibles, as distinct from New Testaments, there were twenty-five editions of Cranmer's and the Bishops', but sixty of the Genevan."

The production of an official version of the sacred Scriptures for Eng. Roman Catholics was probably due more to rivalry with the Reformers

16. Rheims and Douai Version than to any great zeal of the authorities of the Roman church for the spread of vernacular Scripture; though, according to the Arundelian Constitution above mentioned, it was only to the printing and reading of unauthorized tr<sup>a</sup> that objection was then taken by the Rom authorities. But if there was to be a special version for Catholics, it was clearly reasonable that the work should be done by Catholics and accompanied by Catholic explanations. This was undertaken by some Eng. Catholic scholars who, on the success of the Reformation in England, had left the country and settled at Douai in the N.E. of France, with a short transference of their seminary to Rheims. The version was probably produced under the influence of (Cardinal) Allen and an Oxford scholar, Gregory Martin. It was made from the Vulg, the Bible of Jerome and Augustine, and not, like the Protestant VSS, from the Heb and Gr originals. The NT was issued from Rheims in 1582 and the OT from Douai in 1609. The main objection to the version is the too close adherence of the translators to the words of the original and the too great Latinizing of the Eng., so that their tr "needs," as Fuller said, "to be tr<sup>d</sup>." Still they have a few words which along with a few Latinisms were adopted by the translators of the AV, such as "upbraided not," "bridleth his tongue," "at his own charges," and others; and they have the special merit of preserving uniformity of rendering. The tr met with no great success and the circulation was not large.

The AV owed its origin to a chance remark regarding mistranslations in the existing VSS made at the Hampton Court Conference,

17. The Authorized Version a meeting of bishops and Puritan clergy held (1604) in the interest of religious toleration before James was actually crowned. The meeting was ineffectual in all points raised by the Puritans, but it led to the production of the Eng. Bible. Dr. Reynolds, president of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, probably with some reference to the rivalry between the Bishops' Bible and the Genevan version, remarked on the imperfections of the current Bibles. The remark was not very enthusiastically received except by the King, who caught eagerly at the suggestion of a fresh version, "professing that he could never yet see a Bible well translated in English," and blaming specially the Genevan version, probably on account of the pointed character of its marginal notes. Probably with the aid of the universities, the King without delay nominated the revisers to the number of fifty-four from among the best Heb and Gr scholars of the day. Only 47 actually took part in the work which, however—officially at least—they were in no hurry to begin; for, although named in 1604 and with all the preliminaries arranged before the end of that year, they did not begin their work till 1607. Their remuneration was to be by church preferment, for which the archbishop was to take measures. The immediate expenses, the King suggested, should be supplied by the bishops and chapters who, however, did not respond. "King James' version never cost King James a farthing," says Eadie (II, 153 f), who here gives some interesting information on this aspect of the revision. They wrought in six companies of which two met respectively in Westminster, Cambridge and Oxford. Elaborate rules, given in full in most histories of the Bible, were laid down for the revisers' guidance, the King being particularly insistent upon Rule 9, which provided for the revision of the work of each Company by the rest. When any Company had finished the revision of a book, it was to be sent to all the rest for their criticism and suggestions, ultimate differences of opinion to be settled at a general meeting of each Company. Learned men outside the board of revisers were to be invited to give their opinions in cases of special difficulty.

One of the Cambridge Companies was specially appointed to revise the Apoc, in which considerable 18. The Apocrypha license was taken, as the seven members composing the Company had probably no very firm belief in the inspiration of its books. The marginal notes, too, are freer in character than those of the OT. By the early translators, Tyndale and Coverdale, the Apoc was simply accepted as part of the heritage of the church; it had a place likewise in the Great Bible, the Bishops' Bible and most even of the Geneva copies. But by the middle of the 17th cent. opinion even in the Church of England had changed regarding it, and it was about this time that Bibles began to be printed having the canonical books only. The Apoc is now hardly at all printed otherwise than separately (note also should be taken of the treatment of the Apoc in the RV, as stated below).

Impressed with the importance of their task, the revisers worked strenuously at it for two years; and nine months more were devoted to revision by a special committee consisting of two members from each center, and in 1611 the result of the work appeared. It is not wonderful that the work was described by a contemporary entitled to give a judgment on it (Selden, Table Talk) as "the best tr in the world"—a verdict that later opinion has abundantly ratified. It was the keystone of a work on which 90 years of solid labor had by different hands been expended, and it was done by half a hundred of the foremost scholars of the day who knew Heb and Gr, and who also knew Eng. For three centuries it has grown in popular esteem, and it is justly regarded as one of the best possessions and one of the most unifying influences of the widely scattered English-speaking race.

On the title-page as issued in 1611 the version is described as "newly translated out of the original tongues" and as "appointed to be read in churches," two statements not easy to reconcile with the actual facts. The first rule for the revisers' guidance provided that the work was to consist in a revision of the Bishops' Bible: it was not said that it was to be a new tr. There is, further, no sanction of the revision by King, Parliament, Convocation or Privy Council. Like Jerome's version twelve centuries before, it was left to find acceptance as best it might by its own intrinsic merit.

Already in the days of the Commonwealth proposals were made for a new version; but though several meetings were held of a committee appointed by Parliament for the purpose in 1657, nothing came of the movement (Lewis, History of Translations, 354). For nearly half a century the chief rival of the AV was the Geneva Bible which was in wide private use. Formal revision was not undertaken again till the reign of Queen Victoria. But between 1611 and the date of the recent revision not a few small alterations had been silently introduced into the AV, as was indeed only to be expected if the changes in the orthography of the language were to be correctly represented on the printed page. Advancing literary criticism, too, and minute linguistic study showed that since the days of the revisers many words had changed their meaning, and that verbal inaccuracies and a few less venial errors could be proved in the revisers' work. But what probably weighed most with scholars in inducing them to enter upon a new version was the extraordinary increase that since the last revision had taken place in our knowledge of the Heb text and more especially of the Gr text of Scripture. Important MSS had been brought to light of which the 17th-cent. revisers knew nothing, and scholars had with minute care examined and compared all the early copies of the Scripture studies which, without altering the main import of the gospel story, were shown to have considerable importance on the actual words and sometimes on the meaning of the text. After much discussion of the subject in special volumes and in the leading magazines and reviews of Britain and America, there was a general agreement among scholars that a fresh version was advisable.

The history of the Eng. revision is given at length in the preface to the ERV of the NT. It

20. English Revised Version originated with the Convocation of Canterbury of the Church of England in the year 1870, when a committee of 16 members was appointed with power to add to its numbers. By this committee invitations to join it were issued to the outstanding Heb and Gr scholars of the country, irrespective of religious denomination, and eventually two Companies were formed, one for the OT and one for the NT, consisting each of 27 members, in which all the churches of the country were represented, the Roman Catholics alone excepted, and Dr. Newman had been invited to join the NT committee. The churches of America were also invited to coöperate, and this they did by forming two Companies corresponding to the British with due provision for the mutual comparison of results and suggestions. Where the suggestions from America were not accepted by the British revisers, they were recorded in an appendix to the published volume. The names of the revisers and the rules and principles laid down for the procedure of both Companies will be found in Eadie (II, 481 ff). The NT was published in May, 1881; the work occupied the Company for about 40 days in each year for 10 years. The OT revision occupied the Company for 792 days in a period of 14 years. The entire Bible was published in May, 1885. It did not include the Apoc, a revision of which was issued separately in 1895. This was undertaken, not by Convocation, but by the

21. American Revised Version University Presses, a special Company being formed for the purpose from the OT and NT Companies. For AMERICAN REVISED VERSION see separate article. On REVISED VERSION see also BIBLE.

The RV has been before the English-speaking world for a quarter of a century and it can hardly

22. Has the RV Displaced the AV? be said with safety that it has as yet made any progress in displacing the AV in public esteem. Of course as much could be said for the AV in its day. It was very slow in gaining acceptance with the people; and yet unreasoning affection for its very words and phraseology is now one of the main obstacles to the acceptance of an admittedly more scientifically based original text and a more correct and not displeasing rendering of the same. A large number of the changes are certainly not such as appeal strongly to popular sympathy. "The Gr text of the NT of 1881 has been estimated to differ from that of 1611 in no less than 5,788 readings, of which about a quarter are held notably to modify the subject-matter; though even of these only a small proportion can be considered as of first-rate importance" (Kenyon, 239). On the other hand Heb, and esp. the cognate Semitic languages, are now a great deal better known than before 1611, and considerable improvement is noticeable in the bringing out of the meaning in the poetical and prophetic books. The RV contains the best results of the scholarship of the Victorian age and cannot fail to be regarded as of the greatest utility to the reader and student of the AV. In the religious life the mind is essentially conservative, and nothing but time will show whether the undoubted merits of the RV are such as to outweigh the claims of sentiment and affection with which the AV is held. See further AMERICAN REVISED VERSION.

LITERATURE.—Perhaps the most complete work on the subject in all its aspects is that by Dr. John Eadie, The English Bible: an External and Critical History of the Various English Trs of Scripture, 1876. Eadie was himself one of the revisers of 1870, and some of his concluding chapters contain "Remarks on the Need of Revision of the English NT." He is also highly appreciative but judiciously critical of his predecessors in the same field, e.g. of Lewis, Complete History of Several Trs of the Holy Bible and NT into Eng., 1731, 1818; and Christopher Anderson, The Annals of the English Bible, 2 vols, 1845, 1 vol rev. ed. 1862. An earlier and also very good book is Westcott's General View of the History of the English Bible, 1868. Westcott was also one of the revisers of 1870 and criticizes the work of the various translators as well as narrates the succession of the trs. A good discussion of the internal history of the text will also be found in the History of the English Bible by Dr. Moulton, another of the revisers. Kenyon, Our Bible and Ancient MSS, 1895, considers specially the text on which the successive Eng. VSS were based. He writes judiciously also on the Wycliffe period and on the RV. The Wycliffe period should also be studied in Forshall and Madden, 4 vols. 4to, Oxford, 1850; England in the Age of Wycliffe, by G. M. Trevelyan; Dr. Gasquet's Our Old English Bible and Other Essays, 1908; and Leclier's John Wycliffe and His English Precursors, trd and edited by Lorimer. For the Reformation period generally Foxe's History of the Acts and Monuments of the Church still deserves to be studied. "Foxe's story is doubtless substantially true, although disfigured by credulity and bitter prejudice." For Tyndale's special work see William Tyndale, a Biography, by R. Demaus, new ed by Lovett, 1886; and Fry's Bibliographical Descriptions of the Editions of the NT, Tyndale's Version in Eng. Fry has also written special works on the Great Bible, Cranmer's Bible and the Geneva Version. The AV is very fully described in the works above mentioned, and in this connection notice is due to Scrivener, The Authorized Edition of the English Bible, 1884, and more esp. to his careful and thorough "Introduction" to the Quarto Paragraph Bible, 1873. More popular histories of the Bible are those of Stoughton, Pattison, 1874, and Professor Milligan of Glasgow, 1895. General histories of England and of Eng. literature may also be profitably consulted on the history of the Bible and its tr into the vernacular, such as those of Hume, Burnet, Hallam, Froude, Green and Gardiner. The revision of the AV called forth a large literature, either in the way of preparation for it or of criticism of it when carried through. To this literature many of the revisers themselves contributed, among whom may be mentioned Eadie, Elliott, Westcott, Humphry, Newth and Kennedy; nor should the important contributions of Archbishop Trench and Dean Alford, though of a slightly earlier generation, be overlooked. The American revisers also republished a series of Essays written by some of their number on Biblical Revision: Its Necessity and Purpose, 1879; and account should be taken also of the Documentary History of the American Committee on Revision prepared by that committee for the use of its members.

ENGRAFT, en-graft' (Jas 1 21 AV, RV IMPLANT [q.v.]).

ENGRAVING, en-grāv'ing. See CARVING; CRAFTS.

EN-HADDAH, en-had'a (עֵין חֲדָדָה, 'ēn ḥaddāh, "swift fountain"): A town in the lot of Issachar mentioned along with En-gannim (Josh 19 21). It is probably identical with Kefr Adān, a village some 3 miles W. of Jenīn.

EN-HAKKORE, en-hak'ō-rē, en-hak-ō'rē (עֵין חֲקֹרֶה, 'ēn ḥa-kōrē, "spring of the partridge"): Interpreted (Jgs 15 19) as meaning "the spring of him that called." So LXX: πηγὴ τοῦ ἐπικαλουμένου, pēgē tou epikalouménou. The spring was in Lehi but the site is unknown.

EN-HAZOR, en-hā'zor (עֵין חָצֹר, 'ēn ḥāzōr; πηγὴ Ἀσόρ, pēgē Asōr): A city in the territory of Naphtali mentioned along with Kedesh, Edrei and Iron (Josh 19 37). The ancient name probably survives in that of Hazīreh, on the slopes W. of Kedesh. "En" however points to a fountain, and no fountain has been found here.

ENIGMA, ē-nig'ma. See GAMES.

ENJOIN, en-join': Its usual sense is "to impose something," as a command, a charge or a direction. In this last sense it is used in Job 36 23, i.e. "Who hath directed?" In Est 9 31 it means "to command"; in Philom ver 8, "to order" or "direct."

ENLARGE, en-lārj', ENLARGEMENT, en-lārj'ment: "To enlarge" is very frequently used fig.: "God enlarge Japheth" (Gen 9 27), i.e. "make him a great nation"; or "Thou hast enlarged my steps under me" (2 S 22 37), i.e. "Thou hast given me success." A very peculiar use of "enlarge" is found in AV Ps 4 1: "Thou hast enlarged me" (RV "set me at large"), i.e. "Thou hast given me freedom, deliverance from distress." "Our heart is enlarged" (πλάτνω, platinō; 2 Cor 6 11), and "Be ye also enlarged" (ver 13), express great love of one party to another. See also 1 S 2 1, "My mouth is enlarged," i.e. "full of praise." Ezk 41 7, "were broader" (AV "an enlarging").

Enlargement, AV Est 4 14 from רָוַח, rāwah, "to enlarge," "to respite," is rendered "relief" by RV in better harmony with "deliverance" with which the word is paired. A. L. BRESLICH

ENLIGHTEN, en-lit'n:

(1) אֶרָר, 'ōr, "illumination" in every sense, used in the ordinary sense of giving natural light (Ps 97 4 AV; see also Ezr 9 8) or as a sign of health and vigor (1 S 14 27, 29). "His eyes were enlightened," lit. "became bright." He had become weary and faint with the day's exertions and anxieties, and now recovers (see Job 33 30 and cf Ps 13 3). Thus in sickness and grief, the eyes are dull and heavy; dying eyes are glazed; but health and joy render them bright and sparkling, as with a light from within.

(2) In Ps 18 28 AV, the word נָגַח, nāghah, fig. describes the believer's deliverance from the gloom of adversity and the restoration of joy in the knowledge of God.

(3) Most frequently the terms so trd mean the giving of spiritual light to the soul (Ps 19 8; Eph 1 18, φωτίσω, phōtízō; He 6 4; 10 32). This spiritual enlightening the Spirit of God brings about through the Divine word (Ps 119 130; 2 Tim 3 15; 2 Pet 1 19). Sin mars the intellectual discernment; "but he that is spiritual discerneth all things" (1 Cor 2 15 AVm). M. O. EVANS

EN-MISHPAT, en-mish'pat. See KADESH.

ENMITY, en'mi-ti (אֶבְחָה, 'ēbhāh; ἐχθρα, echthra): "Enmity" (hate) occurs as the tr of 'ēbhāh in Gen 3 15, "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed," and in Nu 35 21.22, where the absence of enmity on the part of the man-slayer modifies the judgment to be passed on him.

In the NT "enmity" is the tr of echthra: Lk 23 12; Rom 8 7, "The mind of the flesh is enmity against God," Jas 4 4, "The friendship of the world is enmity with God" (because "the world" is preferred to God); in Eph 2 15.16, Christ is said to have "abolished in his flesh the enmity," by His cross to have "slain the enmity," that is, the opposition between Jew and Gentile, creating in Himself "one new man, [so] making peace." See also ABOLISH; HATE.

ENNATAN, en'a-tan ('Ennatán, Ennatán; AV Eunatan [a misprint]): One of Ezra's messengers to fetch Levites for the temple service (1 Esd 8 44); called "Elnathan" in Ezr 8 16.

ENOCH, ē'nok (עֲנוֹךְ, hānōkh, "initiated"; 'Ενώχ, Hēnoch):

(1) The eldest son of Cain (Gen 4 17.18).

(2) The son of Jared and father of Methuselah, seventh in descent from Adam in the line of Seth (Jude ver 14). He is said (Gen 5 23) to have lived 365 years, but the brief record of his life is comprised in the words, "Enoch walked with God: and he was not; for God took him" (Gen 5 24). The expression "walked with God" denotes a devout life, lived in close communion with God, while the reference to his end has always been understood, as by the writer of He, to mean, "By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death; and he was not found, because God translated him" (He 11 5). See further, APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, II, i, 1.

A. C. GRANT

ENOCH (CITY): In Gen 4 17 it is narrated that Cain, who had taken up his abode in the land of Nod, E. of Eden (ver 16), built there a city, and called it after the name of his firstborn son Enoch. It is impossible to fix more definitely the locality of this first of cities, recorded, as Delitzsch says (Genesis, in loc.), as registering an advance in civilization. The "city" would be a very simple affair, a place of protection for himself, wife and household, perhaps connected with the fear spoken of in 4 14.

ENOCH, SLAVONIC, sla-von'ik, BOOK OF. See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.

ENOCH, THE BOOK OF THE SECRETS OF. See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.

ENORMITY, e-nôr'mi-ti: The marginal rendering in AV of Hos 6 9 for "lewdness," and in RV of Lev 18 17; 19 29; 20 14 for "wickedness." In each case it is the tr of זִמְמָה, zimmāh, meaning originally, "thought" or "plot," mostly in a bad sense, lewdness, wickedness; in Lev it is unnatural wickedness—incest.

ENOS, ē'nos, ENOSH, ē'nosh (עֵנוֹשׁ, 'ēnōsh, "mortal"; 'Ενώς, Enōs): In the NT (RV and AV) and the OT (AV except 1 Ch 1 1), the form is Enos; in the OT (RV and 1 Ch 1 1 AV), the form is Enosh. The son of Seth and grandson of Adam (Gen 4 26; 5 6 ff; 1 Ch 1 1; Lk 3 38). Enosh denotes man as frail and mortal. With Enosh a new religious development began, for "then began men to call upon the name of Jeh" (Gen 4 26). There seems to be an implied contrast to Gen 4 17 ff which records a development in another department of life, represented by Enoch the son of Cain.

S. F. HUNTER

ENQUIRE, en-kwīr': This is an OE word now obsolescent. It is common in AV. In ARV it is nearly always replaced by the more modern "inquire," a few times by "seek" and "ask," once by "salute" (1 Ch 18 10). With this one exception in the OT the change does not affect the meaning. In Acts 23 15, "enquire something more perfectly" is substituted by "judge more exactly." In Mt 10 11, "search out" replaces it. In Mt 2 7.16, "learned exactly" replaces "inquired diligently." See INQUIRE.

EN-RIMMON, en-rim'on (עֵין רִמְמוֹן, 'ēn-rimmōn, "the fountain of Rimmon" [see RIMMON], or perhaps "the spring of the pomegranate"; 'Ερωμώθ, Erōmōth, 'Ρεμμών, Rhymmōn): A city of Judah (Josh 15 32), "Ain and Rimmon"; ascribed to Simeon (Josh 19 7; 1 Ch 4 32, "Ain, Rimmon"). In Neh 11 29 mentioned as reinhabited after the Captivity. Zec 14 10, runs: "All the land shall be made like the Arabah, from Geba to Rimmon, south of Jerus." It must have been a very southerly place. In the Onom ("Erimmon") it is described as a "very large village 16 miles S. of Eleutheropolis." Kh. Umm er Rumāmin, 9 miles N. of Beersheba is the usually accepted site. See PEF, 398; Sh XXIV.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

EN-ROGEL, en-rō'gel (עֵין רֹגֵל, 'ēn rōghēl; πηγὴ Ῥωγῆλ, pēgē Rhōgēl; meaning uncertain, but interpreted by some to mean "the spring of the fuller"):

No argument from this meaning can be valid because (1) it is a very doubtful rendering and (2) "fulling" vats are common in the neighborhood of most town springs and are today plentiful at both the proposed sites. G. A. Smith thinks "spring of the current," or "stream," from Syr rogālo, more probable.

(1) En-rogel was an important landmark on the boundary between Judah and Benjamin (Josh 15 7; 18 16). Here David's spies, Jonathan and Ahimaaz, hid themselves (2 S 17 17), and here (1 K 1 9) "Adonijah slew sheep and oxen and fatlings by the stone of Zohaleth, which is beside En-rogel," when he anticipated his father's death and caused himself rebelliously to be proclaimed king.

(2) The identification of this important landmark is of first-class importance in Jerus topography. Two sites have been proposed:

(a) The older view identifies En-rogel with the spring known variously as "the Virgin's Fount," 'Ain sittī Mirīam and 'Ain Umm el deraj, an intermittent source of water which rises in a cave on the W. side of the Kedron valley opposite Siloam (see GHON). The arguments that this is the one Jerus spring and that this must have been a very important landmark are inconclusive. The strongest argument for this view is that put forward by M. Clermont-Ganneau, who found that a rough rock surface on the mountain slope opposite, an ascent to the village of Silwān, is known as es Zehweleh, a word in which there certainly appears to linger an echo of Zohaleth. The argument is, however, not as convincing as it seems. Firstly, Zohaleth was a stone; this is a natural rock scarp; such a stone might probably have been transferred from place to place. Secondly, it is quite common for a name to be transferred some miles; instances are numerous. Thirdly, the writer, after frequent inquiries of the fellāhīn of Silwān, is satisfied that the name is by no means confined to the rock scarp near the spring, but to the whole ridge running along from here to, or almost to, Bir Eyyāb itself. The strongest argument against this identification is, however, that there are so much stronger reasons for identifying the "Virgin's Fount" with Gihon (see GIHON), and that the two springs En-rogel and Gihon cannot be at one site, as is clear from the narrative in 1 K 1.

(b) The view which places En-rogel at Bîr Eyyûb in every way harmonizes with the Bible data. It has been objected that the latter is not a spring but a well. It is today a well, 125 ft. deep, but one with an inexhaustible supply—there must be a true spring at the bottom. Probably one reason it only overflows today after periods of heavy rain is that such enormous quantities of débris have now covered the original valley bed that the water cannot rise to the surface; much of it flows away down the valley deep under the present surface. The water is brackish and is impregnated with sewage, which is not extraordinary when we remember that a large part of the rock strata from which the water comes is overlaid by land constantly irrigated with the city's sewage.

Although the well may itself be of considerable antiquity, there is no need to insist that this is the exact position of the original spring En-rogel. The source may in olden times have arisen at some spot in the valley bottom which is now deeply buried under the rubbish, perhaps under the southernmost of the irrigated gardens of the jellahîn of Silwân. The neighborhood, at the junction of two deep valleys—not to count the small el wâd, the ancient Tyropœon—is a natural place for a spring. There would appear to have been considerable disturbance here. An enormous amount of débris from various destructions of the city has collected here, but, besides this, Jos records a tradition which appears to belong to this neighborhood. He says (Ant. IX, x, 4) that an earthquake took place once at Eroge—which appears to be En-rogel—when "half of the mountain broke off from the remainder on the W., and rolling 4-furlongs, came to stand on the eastern mountain till the roads, as well as the king's gardens, were blocked." It is sufficient that En-rogel is to be located either at Bîr Eyyûb or in its immediate neighborhood; for practical purposes the former will do. En-rogel was an important point on the boundary line between Judah and Benjamin. The line passed down the lower end of the Kidron valley, past En-rogel (Bîr Eyyûb) and then up the Valley of Hinnom (Wady er Rabâbi)—a boundary well adapted to the natural conditions.

With regard to David's spies (2 S 17 17), where-as the Virgin's Fount—the great source of the city's water supply (see GIHON)—just below the city walls (see ZION) was an impossible place of hiding, this lower source, out of sight of almost the whole city and removed a considerable distance from its nearest point, was at least a possible place. Further, the facts that it was off the main road, that it afforded a supply of one of the main necessities of life—water—and that there were, as there are today, many natural caves in the neighborhood, greatly added to its suitability.

Here too was a most appropriate place for Adonijah's plot (1 K 1 9). He and his confederates dared not go to Gihon, the original sacred spring, but had to content themselves with a spot more secluded, though doubtless still sacred. It is recorded (1 K 1 40.41) that the adherents of Solomon saluted him at Gihon (the Virgin's Fount) and the people "rejoiced with great joy, so that the earth rent with the sound of them. And Adonijah and all the guests that were with him [at En-rogel] heard it as they had made an end of eating." The relative positions of these two springs allow of a vivid reconstruction of the narrative as do no other proposed identifications. The two spots are out of sight the one of the other, but not so far that the shout of a multitude at the one could not be carried to the other.

ENSAMPLE, en-sam'p'l. See EXAMPLE.

EN-SHEMESH, en-shê'mesh (עֵין-שֶׁמֶשׁ, 'en shemesh, "spring of the sun"): An important landmark on the boundary line between Judah and Benjamin (Josh 15 7; 18 17). The little spring 'Ain el hard, E. of Bethany, the last spring on the road descending to Jericho, seems to suit the conditions. 'Ain el hard is usually called the "Apostles' Fountain" by Christians, on account of a tradition dating from the 15th cent. that the apostles drank there.

ENSIGN, en'sîn. See BANNER.

ENSUE, en-sû': Synonymous with "to pursue," "ensue" is found in 1 Pet 3 11 AV as a tr of δῶκω, diôkō, "to follow after," "to pursue." Also in Jth 9 5, "such as ensued after" (τὰ μετέπειτα, tâ metépeita, "the things that follow").
